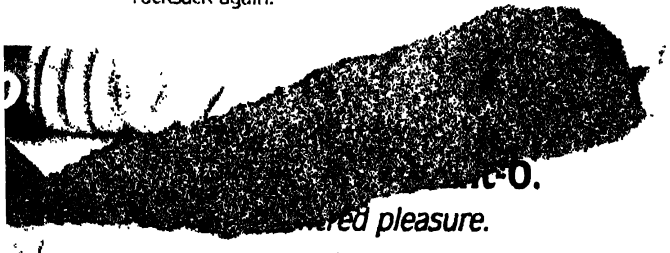
Bakeman's

Bakeman's MINT-O

PEPPERMINTS

Unpack this roll and observe its extraordinary effect on the people you go trekking with.



They keep offering to carry your rucksack.

And while familiarising themselves with its buckles and straps, they'll reach in, almost unthinkingly, to fish out your roll of MINT-O.

Those pearly white, nothing-centred peppermint rings with the irresistible flavour.

So cool, so refreshing. You immediately feel like reaching for another MINT-O yourself.

Give in to the feeling... you never know when you'll see your rucksack again.

...t-O.

...red pleasure.

CONTENTS

SUNDAY
VOLUME 17 ISSUE 5 RS 7.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION
4 -10 FEBRUARY 1990

20
COVER STORY

Heaven can't wait

Osho Rajneesh dies as he lived—amidst controversy, rejoicing and craziness.

LETTERS 4
SOUTH BLOCK 7
GOSSIP SWEET AND SOUR 9
SIGHT AND SOUND 11
SPECIAL REPORT 12
The test ahead
BODYLINE 18
COVER STORY 20
Heaven can't wait
GUEST COLUMN 28
ENVIRONMENT 32
The Green Dream
NEWSWATCH 40
CITYSCAPE 44
Grime and glitter
DRAMA 54
NEWS 59
BUSINESS 66
BOOK EXTRACT 76
Epic remake
CONTROVERSY 86
The last hurdle
MEDIA 88
SPORTS 90
The Nehru Cup farce
SPOTLIGHT 50
KHAAS BAAT 75
SUNDAYWEEK 95
RANDOM NOTES 97
DELHI DIARY 98

12
SPECIAL REPORT

The test ahead

The forthcoming Assembly polls in nine states are crucial for both the National Front and the Congress(I).

32
ENVIRONMENT

The Green Dream

Menaka Gandhi has given a new thrust to environmental consciousness.

40
NEWSWATCH

Down with monarchy

The participation of Indian MPs at the conference of the banned Nepali Congress leads to resentment.

76
BOOK EXTRACT

Epic remake

Excerpts from Garry O'Connor's book on the making of Peter Brook's film, Mahabharata.

86
CONTROVERSY

The last hurdle

Will Golden Girl P.T. Usha give in to parental pressure to quit the tracks?

88
MEDIA

Ambanis bag Patriot?

Rumours are rife that Dhirubhai has bought into the Delhi-based newspaper.

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu and edited by Vir Sanghvi from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001 Air surcharge for Srinagar ex-Delhi and Tripura 20 paise, North eastern states, 30 paise

CONTENTS

SUNDAY
VOLUME 17 ISSUE 5 RS 7.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION
4 -10 FEBRUARY 1990

20
COVER STORY

Heaven can't wait

Osho Rajneesh dies as he lived—amidst controversy, rejoicing and craziness.

LETTERS 4
SOUTH BLOCK 7
GOSSIP SWEET AND SOUR 9
SIGHT AND SOUND 11
SPECIAL REPORT 12
The test ahead
BODYLINE 18
COVER STORY 20
Heaven can't wait
GUEST COLUMN 28
ENVIRONMENT 32
The Green Dream
NEWSWATCH 40
CITYSCAPE 44
Grime and glitter
DRAMA 54
NEWS 59
BUSINESS 66
BOOK EXTRACT 76
Epic remake
CONTROVERSY 86
The last hurdle
MEDIA 88
SPORTS 90
The Nehru Cup farce
SPOTLIGHT 50
KHAAS BAAT 75
SUNDAYWEEK 95
RANDOM NOTES 97
DELHI DIARY 98

12
SPECIAL REPORT

The test ahead

The forthcoming Assembly polls in nine states are crucial for both the National Front and the Congress(I).

32
ENVIRONMENT

The Green Dream

Menaka Gandhi has given a new thrust to environmental consciousness.

40
NEWSWATCH

Down with monarchy

The participation of Indian MPs at the conference of the banned Nepali Congress leads to resentment.

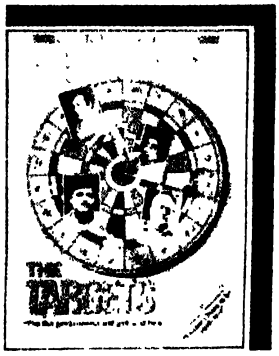
76
BOOK EXTRACT

Epic remake

Excerpts from Garry O'Connor's book on the making of Peter Brook's film, Mahabharata.

86
CONTROVERSY

The last hurdle



Will Golden Girl P.T. Usha give in to parental pressure to quit the tracks?

88
MEDIA

Ambanis bag Patriot?

Rumours are rife that Dhirubhai has bought into the Delhi-based newspaper.

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu and edited by Vir Sanghvi from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001 Air surcharge for Srinagar ex-Delhi and Tripura 20 paise, North eastern states, 30 paise

Victims of vendetta

The cover story (The targets, 14—20 January) raised many pertinent issues. It appears that this government is living in an ivory tower. While it is busy making attractive promises, it seems to be oblivious of the real issues. Defeating Rajiv Gandhi and gunning for Bofors should not be the government's only objectives. It shouldn't forget what happened to the Janata government in 1979. The Indira Gandhi witch-hunt led to its downfall. The article makes it clear that Amitabh Bachchan, Dhirubhai Ambani, G.P. Hinduja, and Satish Sharma will be the primary targets of the new government. Instead of indulging in political vendetta, the V P Singh government would do well to tackle the myriad problems facing the nation. The country's problems are greater than Bofors.

Sharma (left) and Ambani

Kalicharan Banerjee, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Rethinking on reservations

Reservations should definitely not be based on caste, class or tribe (Reservation politics, 14—20 January). Equal opportunities should be made available for all persons irrespective of their caste or creed. At the most, economic considerations might be a criteria for reserving jobs.

By seeking special concessions for women (reservation of seats in educational institutions and reservation in jobs) you only make them feel more unequal and inferior. Then why ask for reservations for the fair sex?

Mahesh Kumar, New Delhi

■ There should be no reservation, either on the basis of caste or economic considerations. Reservations are bound to breed inefficiency. Moreover, if reservation is done on economic basis many people will resort to hiding their real income, evading taxes etc.

Vipin Kumar Garg, Meerut (Uttar Pradesh)

Interesting

I read Amitabh Bachchan's interview with great interest ("I am a loser", 14—20 January). Amitabh has rightly decided to stay away from politics. He can serve the people even as a non-political figure. As his films have been flopping, he needs to concentrate on regaining the top slot in the movie world.

Mahesh Kapasi, New Delhi

■ There is no doubt about the fact that politicians fear any person who has a following as large as Amitabh

Amitabh Bachchan: right decision

Bachchan has. These people are now trying to tarnish the superstar's image through wild and baseless allegations in the print and electronic media. Amitabh can count on his numerous fans to help him counter his critics.

Ashok Kumar Dash, Barbil (Orissa)

Intriguing

While the release of MLA Venkateswara Rao from Naxalite capitivity is a welcome development, there are some intriguing aspects of this case that are still not clear (Terrorist triumph, 7—13 January). Why would the Naxalites abduct a TDP MLA to pressurise the Congress government, and why subsequently kidnap a Congress MLA? The calmness with which Dr Chenna Reddy faced the situation seems to suggest that he was quite sure of the outcome.

P. Siva Ram Prasad, Kurnool (Andhra Pradesh)

Chance for youth

It is good to see that young cricketers are finally being given a chance (Fresh blood, 14—20 January). These youngsters can play their natural game without any hangups or inhibitions. They are bound to be more fit and will have better reflexes. Our fielding will also improve with these energetic young cricketers in the side.

Ritesh Misra, Bhubaneswar (Orissa)

Good reading

I was surprised to read the searing criticism of Mani Shankar Aiyar that appeared on the Letters page (Advertising Rajiv, 7—13 January). Aiyar writes well and his column always makes very interesting reading. It is rare to find a columnist who presents facts as logically and forcefully as he does.

Aiyar: man of letters

Lalit M. Dutt, New Delhi

Secular politician

In his letter Why this euphoria? (14—20 January) Syed Shahabuddin asks the reason for the rejoicing over M.J. Akbar's electoral victory. I did not vote for the Congress this time, but even people like me are feeling thrilled by Akbar's victory, and the reasons for that should seem quite obvious.

The victory of a Congre candidate known to be p sionately committed to secularism in a state wh has rejected the Congres a victory for secularism.

Shahabuddin claims that Akbar has played the communal card by standing in Kishanganj. How so? Though Kishanganj is a Muslim dominated constituency Akbar stood there against Muslim candidates, so he had no added advantage on that score. Moreover, orthodox Muslims were expected to vote against him. Indeed, Akbar would have been much safer in West Bengal where he is well-known and his intellectual credentials widely admired. He took a risk by going to Kishanganj.

M.J. Akbar: sane choice

Akbar's victory brings a message of sanity in the currently insane sectarian atmosphere.

Susmita Bhattacharya, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Improving relations

If the new government wants to develop better relations with our neighbours, then it will have to sacrifice the glamour of signing trade agreements with the Western countries (Love thy neighbour, 14—20 January). Trade is the strongest bond of brotherhood. Therefore, India should consider purchasing rubber from Sri Lanka, newsprint from Bangladesh, and supplying tea to Pakistan. In other words, emphasis should be laid on barter deals with our neighbours, which would also help us avoid the Western debt trap. Our politician-rulers should learn to put national considerations above personal ones.

Panna Lall Mundhra, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Ready to collapse

The state of our legal system is such that its collapse is imminent (Resisting changes, 7—13 January). Former Chief Justice E.S. Venkataramaiah is right when he says that justice delayed is justice denied. The administrative reforms suggested by him will definitely help in quick dispensation of justice.

The main problem confronting the judiciary, however, is its image. To improve this, judges must stick to a strict code of ethics. As former Supreme Court judge V R. Krishna Iyer recently remarked, justice is more important than Justices.

E.S. Venkataramaiah

Manoj K. Jain, Serampore (West Bengal)

Resounding rejoinder

Shahabuddin: hitting back

I must refuse the crown you have tried to place on my head by crediting me with the electoral victory of the BJP (1989: That was the year that was, 7—13 January).

You have apparently adopted the conventional hypothesis of equating Shahabuddin with Muslim communalism, of defining Hindu communalism as a backlash or reaction to Muslim coommunalism, and then relating the BJP's victory to the Hindu upsurge. This is too simplistic a view.

During the 80s I raised the genuine grievances of Indian Muslims and their legitimate aspirations but within the context of a secular order and with a nationalist motive. I encouraged participation, not separatism, quest for a solution within and not outside the system, cooperation, not confrontation. To my mind that is not communalism.

The BJP's victory was only marginally due to communal polarisation; it was essentially a result of the Janata Dal's underestimation of its own strength and the strength of the secular forces and the anti-Congress sentiments, and overestimation of the BJP's strength, which resulted in over-allocation of seats to the latter. The BJP won not because of a wave in its favour but because of the anti-Congress wave. In Bihar there was a triangular contest between the Congress(I), Janata Dal and BJP for 14 Lok Sabha seats. The Janata Dal won each one of them. Similarly, the CPI(M) defeated the Congress(I) and the BJP in Faizabad and Buxur.

A left-of-centre alliance with a secular, democratic programme can defeat the right hands down even today because the Indian people still have their head and heart in the right place.

Syed Shahabuddin, New Delhi

Insincere

The first Parliament session after V.P. Singh came to power was an interesting one (Gaining confidence, 31 December, 1989—6 January, 1990). It is now quite clear that our former Prime Minister, Rajiv Gandhi, was not sincere when he stated that his party would play the role of a "constructive Opposition". The Congress(I) is capable of stooping to any level in order to discredit the National Front government, even if that entails indulging in anti-national activities.

Rajiv Gandhi

Samir Marx Mahajan, New Delhi

Conflicting views

Ajit Singh, in his interview, says that the electronics industry is more suited to the rural areas ("We will have to continue with liberalisation", 31 December, 1989—6 January, 1990). A little later he sneers at Sam Pitroda's mission to take telephones to the villages. I would like to ask Singh how his rural electronics industry is going to communicate. Carrier pigeons, maybe? •

Khalid Majid, Bombay (Maharashtra)

WHEN DO YOU WISH YOUR COURIER WAS DHL?

WHEN

YOU HAVE TO FACE

THE CHAIRMAN

BECAUSE

YOUR BIGGEST CLIENT

JUST WENT TO ANOTHER BANK

BECAUSE

YOUR CLIENT JUST LOST

HIS CLIENT

BECAUSE

THE LETTER OF CREDIT

ARRIVED 2 DAYS LATE

BECAUSE

YOUR COURIER WASN'T

DHL.

RAKA:2767-89 D

THAT'S WHEN.

BECAUSE DHL HAS MORE OFF..ES WORLDWIDE THAN ANY OTHER COURIER, YOU'RE IN SAFE HANDS ALL THE WAY.

To contact us, please refer to your Telephone/Yellow Pages Directory.

DHL
WORLDWIDE EXPRESS
DHL THE COURIER DIVISION OF AIRFREIGHT LIMITED.

INDER MALHOTRA

The Kashmir issue threatens to sour Indo-Pak relations

Unfriendly vibes

What a quirk of irony it is. The more sincerely India's new government tries to make South Asia an "area of friendship" the more it is thwarted by malign forces that cannot be wished away from the subcontinental scene.

These lines are being written on the morning after Inder Kumar Gujral's dinner in honour of Sahibzada Yaqub Ali Khan, Pakistan's astute and suave foreign minister, believed by many to be on his way out. The meal was delicious and the atmosphere heart-warmingly cordial. Gujral set the tone with a highly conciliatory speech in polished Urdu, enlivened by Faiz Ahmed Faiz's superlative verses. The Sahibzada replied in kind. However, he briefly switched over to English to deliver the message that the Shimla Agreement really reaffirms the commitment of both sides to conduct their relations "in accordance with the UN Charter"

The hint could not have been clearer. Apart from giving terrorists and secessionists of Kashmir ample covert help, in the form of Kalashnikovs, cash, training, indoctrination and sanctuary, Pakistan is now planning to internationalise the issue by taking it back to the UN.

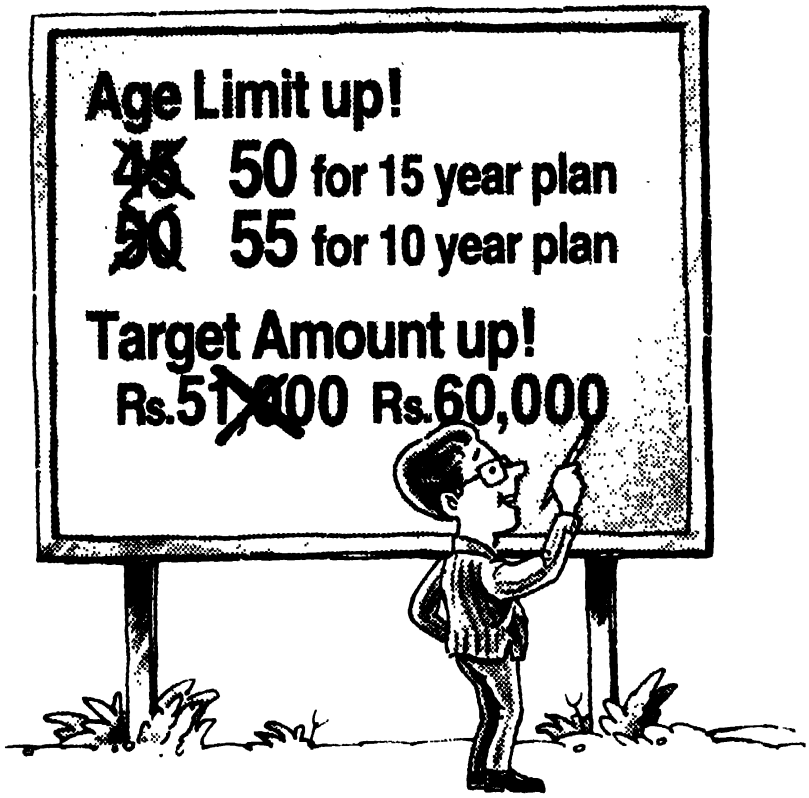
Ironically, just when the two foreign ministers were exchanging pleasantries in New Delhi, she declared at Islamabad that Pakistan would never "compromise" on the "right of the Kashmiri people to self-determination". Her attorney-general, Yahya Bakhtiar, closer to her than Yaqub, had earlier put this matter even more offensively. Other Pakistani spokesmen have been stating that a plebiscite under UN auspices must be held in Kashmir. None of this can be objected to because in July 1972 both sides committed themselves to the Shimla Agreement "without prejudice to their basic stand" on Kashmir. What is open to strong, indeed uncompromising opposition, however, is Pakistan's violation, actual or intended, of the Shimla accord on two counts.

First, these documents lay down that the two sides would solve the Kashmir issue bilaterally—without meddling by any third party—or by such other method as might be "acceptable to both". Any attempt to take the matter back to the UN, which had become irrelevant, way back in the Fifties after the US-Pakistan military alliance, is therefore out.

Secondly—and this is supremely important—Pakistan's not so covert help to the merchants of murder, secession and mayhem in Kashmir is not only a total negation of the Shimla Agreement but something that could cross the threshold of Indian tolerance before long.

Even if the Pakistani rulers are skilful enough to prevent things from going wholly out of control, it is quite obvious that in the current environment, hopes of friendly and cooperative relations with Pakistan make little sense. Negotiations between the two sides must continue, however, if only to limit the damage that is being done.

Strangely, there is much greater appreciation of this reality among visiting American dignitaries than among some of the euphoric Janata Dal leaders and the "think tanks" they rely on. Robert Kimmit, the highest ranking US diplomat to visit India in several years, and Congressman Stephen Solarz, have both gone back deeply disturbed. They realise that if Indian-Pakistan relations over Kashmir continue to deteriorate at the current rate, the US policy of befriending both India and Pakistan, of giving military aid and political support to Pakistan and economic and technological assistance to India, would become untenable.



Against this backdrop it is all the more laughable that Chandra Shekhar and some other Janata Dal MPs should have also complicated the much simpler process of mending fences with Nepal. Representatives of other Indian parties, to say nothing of other countries, also went to the Nepali Congress convention in Kathmandu to demand the restoration of democracy in the Himalayan kingdom. But the Nepalese ruling establishment has been infuriated only by the presence of the Janata Dal contingent. The vehemence of the Nepalese statements on the subject has to be heard to be believed. •

Yaqub Ali Khan (left) with Gujral

Ironically, when the two foreign ministers were exchanging pleasantries in New Delhi, Benazir Bhutto declared at Islamabad that Pakistan would never "compromise" on the "right of the Kashmiri people to self-determination"

GREAT NEWS WITH ULIP

UNIT LINKED INSURANCE PLAN is now even better than before!

Things are looking up with ULIP - the savings cum insurance scheme

With effect from January 1, 1990, the upper age limit for joining the scheme has gone up by 5 years. So you get longer life insurance and accident insurance cover

	Former Age Limit	Revised Age Limit
15 year Plan	45 years	50 years
10 year Plan	50 years	55 years

What's more, the target amount has gone up too - from Rs 51,000 to Rs 60,000. So, you can now claim a higher income tax rebate under Section 80C with an annual contribution of Rs 6,000!

Besides this, of course, you still get the other advantages of ULIP. You get high returns. Dividends on ULIP have been going up every year – the dividend for 1988-89 was 13.75% (Dividend eligible for exemption under Section 80L)

In addition, you get a Maturity Bonus too. At the end of the 10 year plan, you get a 5% Maturity Bonus. And at the end of the 15 year plan, you get a 7.5% Maturity Bonus.

For free literature on ULIP, please contact any Unit Trust office or Chief Representative or Agent, or selected Hindustan Petroleum petrol pumps.

Or mail this coupon to any of the Unit Trust offices

Please send me free literature on ULIP

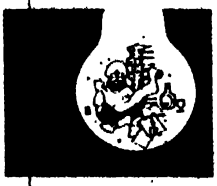
Name _____

Address _____

_____

UNIT TRUST OF INDIA

(A Public Sector Financial Institution)



- 13, Sir Vithaldas Thackersey Marg, (New Marine Lines), Bombay 400 020. Tel. 2863767, 6201995
- 2 & 4, Fairlie Place, Calcutta 700 001. Tel 209391/205322
- Justice Basheer Ahmed Syed Building, 45, Second Line Beach, Madras 600 001. Tel 587433/580938
- Gulab Bhavan (Rear Block), 2nd Floor, 6, Bahadur Shah Zafar Marg, New Delhi 110 002. Tel. 3318638, 3319786

Hurry. Take full advantage of the new benefits. Invest in ULIP now!

SHAH-LT-486-90-CD

KHUSHWANT SINGH

What's a blooper?

The word does not exist in the two-volume Short Oxford Dictionary. It is probably a variation of bloomer; a silly mistake, a slip of the tongue, a mispronunciation which embellishes the meaning of the original. Such verbal faux pas have different variations: fluffs and flubs, goofs and gaffes, boners and boo boos. Richard Ledever in his Anguished English has some amusing examples taken from answers given by school children in their examinations. For example, inhabitants of Moscow are called mosquitoes; having one wife is called monotony; man with more than one wife is a pigamist; a man who marries twice commits bigotry; acrimony is what a man gives to his divorced wife; and reversing a g and a q, an examinee wrote "when a man and a woman are deeply in love with each other, there is no quilt between them". Another wrote in an essay, "the girl tumbled down the stairs and lay prostitute at the bottom". Amongst other student howlers he quotes are: "a virgin forest is a place where the hand of man has never set foot...; the problem of inter-sexual swimming is that the boys often outstrip the girls; the difference between a king and a president is that a king is the son of his father, but a president isn't; artificial insemination is when a farmer does it to the cow and not the bull; a moth is a female myth; Socrates died from an overdose of wedlock (hemlock); Queen Elizabeth was the Virgin Queen. When she exposed herself before her troops, they shouted, "Hurrah!" Then her navy went out and defeated the Spanish Armadillo; Sir Frances Drake circumcised the world with a 100-foot clipper; Cervantes wrote Donkey Mote; Milton wrote Paradise Lost. Then his wife died and he wrote Paradise Regained; the sun never sets on the British Empire because the British Empire is in the east (from the USA) and the sun sets in the west."

The law courts provide another rich harvest of bloopers, most of them in cross-examinations in which lawyers make fools of themselves. "Do you know how far pregnant you are right now?" asked the lawyer. "I will be three months November 8th," she replied. "Then the date of conception must be August 8th" he asked. "Yes," replied the lady. The next question was: "What were you and your husband doing at that time?"

Printers' devils often provide hilarious bloopers. The 1632 edition of the Bible left out the word 'not' from the Seventh Commandment to read: "Thou shalt commit adultery." In another edition published in 1716, the command to John to "Sin no more" was printed as "Sin on more."

Nobody has thought of compiling an anthology of Indian bloopers. I have quite a sizeable personal collection. One I used in my recently published novel, Delhi. A man unwittingly broke wind while in company. Overcome by embarrassment, he stuttered, "excuse me, it was slip of the tongue."

Another two of my favourites have unfortunately been converted into Sardarji jokes. At the time I invented them, the most important Sardar was Swaran Singh. And as is the practice, they came to be attached to his name despite his being one of the ablest ministers to serve under Pandit Nehru and Indira Gandhi. The first was of an American journalist who wanted to find out reactions to the proposal to make Zakir Hussain, President of the Republic. He thought he would ask a Sikh traditionally (but wrongly) regarded to harbour anti-Muslim prejudices. "Sardar Sahib," he asked Swaran Singh, "what is your reaction to having a Muslim as President of India?" Swaran Singh replied in his Punjabi-English, "Why not? India is a seculiar state."

The second is when he was urban housing minister. He was shown plans for constructing urinals in the capital. Having approved of the plans he addressed the officials present, "Gentlemen, having passed plans for making urinals, I think we should seriously think of making plans to construct arsenals."

Inhabitants of Moscow are called mosquitoes; having one wife is called monotony; man with more than one wife is a pigamist; a man who marries twice commits bigotry

Night cricket

One night two rustics were listening to the cricket commentary of the one-day match between India and the West Indies on All India Radio. "Once again the West Indies beat the Indians. Why is it we never win against the West Indies?" asked one.

"You see our boys are not used to playing at night," explained the other.

(Contributed by J.F. Singh Kaka, New Delhi)

Changing styles

A footwear shop-owner sold a brown pair of shoes to a young man who was highly delighted with his purchase. Next day, he re-entered the shop, returned the pair of shoes and got his money back. "My girl doesn't like it," he explained. A week later, to the shop-owner's surprise, the young man breezed in and bought the same pair of shoes again. "Has your girl changed her mind?" the shop-owner asked him. "No," he smiled. "I've changed the girl."

(Contributed by Reeten Ganguly, Tezpur) ●

ILLUSTRATION: DEBASHIS DEB

THE HINDUSTAN TIMES

ANNUAL CARTOON CONTEST 1990

THEME :

1. THE NEW GOVERNMENT
2. Caricatures of prominent Indian/foreign personalities

DEADLINE

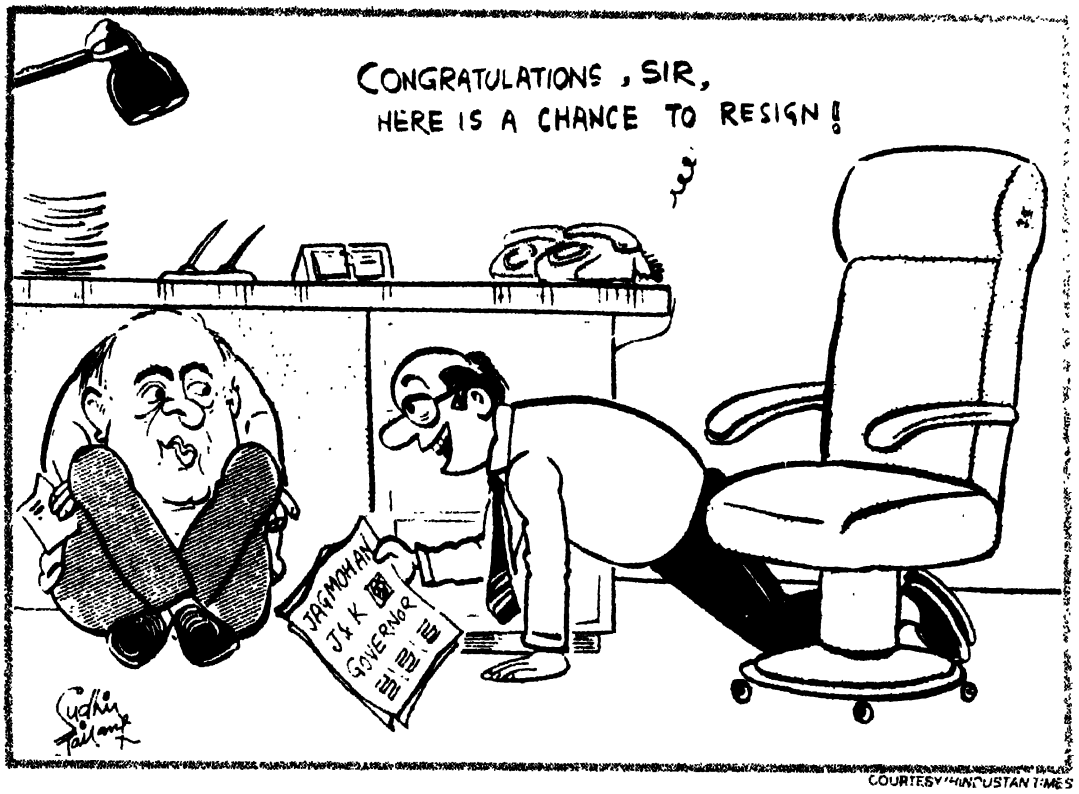
Wednesday, February 28, 1990

PRIZES

(in each category)

1. FIRST PRIZE : Rs. 15,000
2. SECOND PRIZE : Rs. 10,000
3. THIRD PRIZE : Rs. 5,000

There will be 10 consolation prizes of Rs. 500 each.



1. The contest is open to amateur, non-professional Indian cartoonists above the age of 18 years (Those who earn a living from cartooning are not eligible. Please attach a signed declaration that you are not a professional cartoonist.)
2. All works must be original and unpublished.
3. The size of the cartoon should not exceed 30x50 cm. or be less than 20x30 cm
4. Each entrant should indicate name, age, address, occupation, telephone number (if any) on the reverse side, in BLOCK LETTERS
5. Each contestant may take part in either category or both, but submit no more than THREE entries in EACH category. All caricatures should be identified on the reverse side
6. All prize-winning entries will become the property of The Hindustan Times. The Hindustan Times reserves the right to reproduce the award-winning cartoons in newspapers and magazines published by the HT Group
7. All entries should be on white drawing paper and in black, waterproof ink. All drawings should be neat and clean. No drawings in colour will qualify
8. The decision of the jury will be final and irrevocable.
9. The results of the contest will be published in The Hindustan Times dated March 18, 1990 (Dak editions: March 19)

F.N/XIII-707

Laugh and let laugh. Make India laugh.

The Hindustan Times once again invites all gifted amateur cartoonists from 18 to 80 who have a talent for making people laugh. Come, show your skill.

Entries should be addressed to: THE HINDUSTAN TIMES ANNUAL CARTOON CONTEST, 18-20, KASTURBA GANDHI MARG, NEW DELHI-110 001.

COURTESY HINDUSTAN TIMES

■ Our objective will be to bring the people into the mainstream, restore their confidence in the democratic institutions and have free and fair elections in Jammu and Kashmir.

MUFTI MOHAMMAD SAYEED, Union home minister

■ Mufti (Mohammad Sayeed) hails from Kashmir, so perhaps he knows better... (but) this is not the way to run a sensitive state like Kashmir.

CHANDRA SHEKHAR, Janata Dal leader, on the appointment of Jagmohan as Governor of Jammu and Kashmir

■ He (Rajiv Gandhi) is personally and wholly responsible for the explosive situation prevailing in the Kashmir Valley today.

S. JAIPAL REDDY, Janata Dal spokesman

■ They (the present government) seem to be thinking that any decision of the previous government can be dumped.

RAJIV GANDHI, AICC(I) president, referring to the compensation due to the Bhopal gas victims

■ When I see your enthusiasm and your expectations, I get frightened and I wonder whether it will be possible to live up to them.

V.P. SINGH, Prime Minister, speaking to the crowds in Ahmedabad

■ If Raja Saab could be termed as anti-national, what about the former Prime Minister? He not only approached me using Mr Akbar as a conduit, but also tried to buy me, offering to make me the chief minister of Punjab if I was ready for negotiations.

SIMRANJEET SINGH MANN, United Akali Dal (M) president

■ Jyoti Basuji has asked me to look after West Bengal's interests at the Centre as there is no minister from Bengal in the government right now. I would be happy to do the job.

P. UPENDRA, Union information and broadcasting minister

■ It was a horrendous tragedy but technology was no more at fault than if the lives had been lost in an airplane accident.

RUSSI MODI, chairman and managing director, Tata Iron and Steel Company, on the Bhopal tragedy

■ I am among the very few heroines who look beautiful even when they cry.

JAYAPRADA, actress

TESTING TI

If the November 1989 Lok Sabha polls wiped out the Congress from the Hindi-belt states, all was not yet lost for Rajiv Gandhi and his partymen. For, in most of the northern states, Congress governments were still in power. The real test for the Congress will be on 12 and 27 February when nine states and one Union Territory go to the polls. If the Opposition once again trounces the Congress in most of these states, it will be established once and for all that the country's largest political party has lost the confidence of the people. The Assembly elections are equally crucial for the Opposition. the polls may well turn out to be a referendum on the performance of the V.P. Singh government. This is the first instalment of SUNDAY's Assembly election reports.

If there is one state where the supremacy of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) is never in doubt it is Madhya Pradesh. The November 1989 Lok Sabha polls proved conclusively that this crucial Hindi heartland state is saffron territory—the BJP won as many as 27 out of the 39 parliamentary seats in the state leaving just eight to the Congress and three to the Janata Dal. Such a spectacular performance naturally made the party leadership confident of sweeping the Assembly polls—to be held on 27 February—and emerging as the single largest party in the 320-member House.

And the BJP's calculations are not entirely unfounded. The party has already thrashed out the contentious business of seat-sharing with the Janata Dal. Initially, of course, the Janata Dal, driven by an inexplicable ego problem, had demanded an incredible 170 seats. This, in spite of the fact that the Dal had won just three seats in the Lok Sabha polls and out of the eight constituencies where the Congress won, as many as six defeated candidates were of the Janata Dal. A clear indication that the Dal had little or no base in the state. But finally, V.P. Singh and his partymen saw reason, they decided to go by whatever decision the BJP took.

Of course, the task of the Opposition in Madhya Pradesh—the state has a Congress government headed by Shyama Charan Shukla—has become somewhat easy due to the continuous infighting within the Congress camp. Soon after the party's debacle in the parliamentary polls, the high command sacked both the chief minister and the Pradesh Congress president hoping that the new team of S.C. Shukla and Arjun Singh would be able to achieve the impossible: enthuse the disillusioned party workers and lead the Congress to victory in the Assembly elections in two months flat.

The main task of chief minister Shukla was to bring the warring factions within the state party unit together. Prior to Shukla's appointment, there were primarily two groups which never lost an opportunity to embarrass each other: one was headed by the former chief minister Motilal Vora and the ex-Union railway minister Madhavrao Scindia while the other was led by the formidable Arjun Singh. In the short period that Shukla has been in power, he has managed to form yet another group in the PCC(I): his own.

Chief minister Shukla began his term in a militant fashion. Realising perhaps that both Vora and Arjun Singh had to be cut down to size if he wanted to rule, Shukla declared that all that Vora did during his reign was wrong. He scrapped the tendu leaf policy, appointed his own men to head a host of corporations and publicly humiliated Vora. What is more, the

MADHYA PRADESH S.C. Shukla has a formidable task ahead of him. He has to rejuvenate the Congress, fight dissension and take on the might of the BJP

RAJASTHAN Harideo Joshi was recalled from Assam to lead the party in Rajasthan. This, pitted Joshi against former heavyweights

ME

The forthcoming Assembly elections are crucial for the ruling Janata Dal, the BJP and the Opposition Congress(I) large number of Congressmen both Vora and Arjun Singh had alienated, rallied around Shukla.

Shyama Charan Shukla was particularly harsh on his predecessor, Motilal Vora. While Vora's supporters claimed that Shukla was only capitalising on the developmental projects launched by the previous government, the chief minister's men held Vora responsible for all the ills plaguing the state. At one stage it seemed that Vora was Shukla's main rival and not the BJP or the Janata Dal.

The chief minister, however, was cautious in his criticism of Arjun Singh. And the wily politician that Singh is, he did not waste any time in unnecessary duels with Shukla. Instead, he went about consolidating his position in the PCC(I). With an eye to the crucial business of ticket distribution for the forthcoming Assembly polls, Singh appointed over 200 observers—all of them his trusted lieutenants—for the district committees to oversee the selection of candidates.

With the Congress stalwarts in Madhya Pradesh battling it out amongst themselves, the going for the BJP-Janata Dal combine is smoother than ever. Victory in the Assembly polls being a certainty, the BJP is now thinking in terms of forming the next government in the state. Who will be the chief minister in that case? None other than Sunder Lal Patwa, a leader accepted by all sections of the Opposition in Madhya Pradesh. But then, where does that leave the Janata Dal leader, Vidhya Charan Shukla? In the same place where he is at present: in the cold.

M.V. Kher/Raipur

"My task is stupendous. Mine is a war Cabinet and I have to work on a war footing," said Harideo Joshi soon after he was sworn in as chief minister of Rajasthan barely two months ago. For once at least, Joshi had correctly and honestly assessed a situation. The Congress was wiped out in the parliamentary elections just a few months back—the party lost all the 25 Lok Sabha seats from the state—and partymen were a thoroughly disillusioned lot. The deposed chief minister, Shiv Charan Mathur, was trying to make things difficult for Harideo Joshi. And with the Assembly elections round the corner and a spirited Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) determined to wrest the state from the Congress, even diehard supporters of the chief minister admitted that Joshi was aiming for the impossible.

But Harideo Joshi was not a man to give up easily. He began preparing the party for the polls right away. And as if everything is fair in war, the chief minister did not think twice before announcing a host of populist measures aimed at winning over the estranged electorate. Such is the hurry that even administrative formalities have been given a go-by. As the vice-president of the BJP, Bhairon Singh Sekhawat put it: "Joshi is acting like the commander of a defeated army. He is destroying everything knowing well that the Congress is not going to rule the state after the polls."

And, it is Joshi himself who has given the Opposition a stick to beat the government with. In one stroke, the Congress government, which is already burdened with heavy overdrafts, committed itself to liabilities worth over Rs 800 crores. Consider the following populist schemes announced by the Joshi regime within a month:

- Loans extended to farmers, artisans and weavers up to a sum of Rs 15,000 to be waived.
- Pension to old and infirm to be raised from Rs 65 to Rs 100 per month.
- All unauthorised con-

BIHAR Jagannath Mishra is known to pull off miracles—just what the Congress needs to form the next government in Bihar

MAHARASHTRA Sharad Pawar has a lot at stake. He has to prove that he still commands a sizeable following structions on government or private lands to be regularised. The commercial use of agricultural land to be permitted and development charges and conversion fee to be reduced

- At least 50,000 wells in the rural areas to be energised
- Ban on recruitment in state government services has been lifted and the upper age limit for eligibility in government services has been raised to 35 years
- Unemployed youths appearing for interview can travel free in state government buses
- A pension of Rs 150 per month for journalists retiring after 1 February, 1990.

This package is meant to placate all sections of the state's population. Whether the electorate gets carried away by such gimmicks remains to be seen but one thing is certain, the Congress has to first set its house in order before it can even dream of taking on the combined Opposition in the forthcoming elections. Infighting has reduced the Congress in Rajasthan to bickering groups and there is disenchantment within Joshi's Cabinet. Only recently, five senior ministers had threatened to resign in protest against what they called the chief minister's arbitrary and partisan style of functioning. In fact, the entire state unit of the party under the leadership of Mathur and former PCC president Ashok Gehlot raised the banner of revolt against Joshi. The high command had to intervene and the warring factions declared a truce. But observers feel that this is only the lull before the storm.

And the storm is not far off. Pressure and counter-pressure from both the groups have forced the state party leadership on the defensive. The Assembly elections are just over a month away but the Congress is yet to prepare a panel of candidates leave alone finalise the list. The Congress' only hope is that things are no better in the Opposition camp either. The Janata Dal president of the state unit and Union minister Nathuram Mirdha is dead against other senior party leaders from Rajasthan. In fact, both the warring groups run parallel offices in Jaipur. While Mirdha operates from 10, MLA Quarters, the other leaders, including the powerful general secretary, Digvijay Singh, functions from the official party office at 27 Museum Road. What is more, in separate press statements both Mirdha and Singh have asked Assembly ticket-seekers to deposit their forms with them. Naturally, such a bizarre situation has confused everyone including the party workers. Digvijay Singh, of course, has asserted that his differences with Mirdha are only over the internal functioning of the party. Otherwise, he added, "we are one and ready to give a tough fight to the Congress".

Though the BJP in Rajasthan is not altogether free from internal squabbles, it is, in the present circumstances, the most organised of the three. The party has already drawn up a panel of prospective candidates for all the 200 Assembly seats. "We have prepared a list for all the 200 seats not because we don't want an adjustment with the Janata Dal. We did this so that we are not caught on the wrong foot if seat-sharing talks break down," clarified Bhanwar Lal Sharma, the president of the BJP's Rajasthan unit. He is, however, confident that the Congress will be wiped out in the Assembly polls should there be a straight fight in all the constituencies.

But the BJP and the Janata Dal can hardly afford to rest on their laurels. There is no reason to believe that just because the Congress fared badly in the parliamentary polls, it cannot retrieve lost ground. In fact, there are precedents to establish that a party which swept the parliamentary elections did poorly in the Assembly polls. Take this example. In the 1984 Lok Sabha elections, the Congress(I) bagged all the seats. But the following year, the Opposition won as many as 85 Assembly seats.

THE OPPOSITION'S HOPE

RAGHUNATH JHA The Janata Dal leader from Bihar played a crucial role in the party's impressive showing in Bihar in the parliamentary polls

B.S. SEKHAWAT The veteran BJP leader could well assume the reins of Rajasthan should the party secure a majority in the polls

The forthcoming Assembly elections are crucial for both the ruling Janata Dal and the Opposition Congress(I). The BJP, too, is putting in all efforts to establish its hold over the Hindi belt states

BAL THACKERAY Though the Shiv Sena supremo has denied that he has chief ministerial ambitions, observers feel that he is the natural choice

S.L. PATWA He usually keeps a low profile but Patwa is the unanimous choice for the chief ministership of Madhya Pradesh

The mood in the Opposition camp is upbeat and such apprehensions are dismissed with disdain. Janata Dal and BJP leaders argue that since the Opposition unity in Rajasthan is complete, the Congress is bound to be wiped out.

Whatever the high command in Delhi might say, the state Congress leaders too feel the same. As a senior party functionary put it, "Seat adjustment or no seat adjustment among the Opposition, we are not going to win more than 50 seats."

Milap Chand Dandia/Jaipur

Only a month back, a group of Janata Dal activists had met Prime Minister V.P. Singh at his New Delhi residence. The discussions inevitably turned to the forthcoming Assembly elections in nine states and the Union Territory of Pondicherry. Explaining how important the polls were for the new government, V.P. Singh concluded the meeting with the warning: "Bihar should be the testing ground for the Janata Dal's strength."

The Prime Minister couldn't have been more right. The stakes for the Janata Dal alone in most of the states going to the polls are not really very high: in Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Himachal Pradesh, Gujarat and Maharashtra the party is riding piggyback on the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) and the Shiv Sena. The outcome of the elections in Manipur will have little bearing on the fate of the new government. The only other state, apart from Bihar, where the ruling Janata Dal's popularity will be put to test is Orissa.

And the Janata Dal stalwarts in New Delhi are indeed taking the Assembly polls in Bihar seriously. They began by holding prolonged discussions with the Dal's principal ally, the BJP. Initially, the BJP, with its new-found confidence, demanded as many as 200 seats out of the 324 in the Assembly. This, in spite of the fact that the BJP did not do too well in the parliamentary election in the state. On the other hand, the Janata Dal had put up an impressive show in the Lok Sabha polls: the party had secured as many as 31 seats from the 36 it had contested. At one stage, the Janata Dal had even threatened to go it alone if the BJP stuck to its "unreasonable demand". But better sense prevailed and though the modalities of seat-sharing are yet to be worked out, the BJP has informally agreed to go by whatever decision is thrashed out at the national level between the BJP and the Janata Dal leadership.

The problems for the Janata Dal, of course, does not end there. The Lok Sabha polls in the state had proved that the communists and the Jharkhand Mukti Morcha (JMM) had sizeable following in central Bihar and the Chhotanagpur areas respectively. The communists may arrive at an understanding with the Janata Dal as it did during the parliamentary polls but the JMM will definitely go it alone. The Jharkhandis are sure to cut into the votes of the Janata Dal.

And the Janata Dal cannot afford to lose a single vote. The Congress(I) has made the Assembly elections in Bihar a prestige issue and is reportedly putting in all efforts to retain its hold over this crucial Hindi belt state. Soon after the near-complete rout of the Congress in the parliamentary polls—it won just four seats out of the 54—party president Rajiv Gandhi made a number of changes in the state unit set-up. He sacked chief minister S.N. Sinha and replaced him by the indomitable Jagannath Mishra.

And, Mishra, true to his style of functioning, began the near-impossible task of rejuvenating the Congress and preparing the party for the battle ahead. Knowing full well that this was probably his last chance to prove himself, Jagannath Mishra took measures on a war footing with very little regard for the rulebook. And, inetivably he kicked off a major

"She's sacrificed so much... In time, I'll need a lump-sum for her dream house."

DHANARAKSHA

Set a target. Invest on a recurring basis. Watch the money grow. And get life cover* too.

LIC Mutual Fund

We'll help you meet your goals

Most of us find putting down a lump-sum difficult. That's why Dhanaraksha units are of great value.

We set a target amount for saving in 10 or 15 years. The amount is divided into equal, yearly or half-yearly, instalments which are paid into the fund. A small portion provides life cover...and the balance is issued as units with a face value of Rs. 10/-. Accident cover comes free!

Dividends will be declared every year and reinvested in units credited to our account. Should anything happen to us, the value of the units accumulated, plus the contribution remaining unpaid, becomes payable to our nominees.

A final reward of 10% to 15% of the target amount will be given for complete participation in the scheme.

Also, contributions are exempted from tax under Sec. 80C and dividends under Sec. 80L of income tax act.

Thus, our lump-sum target will definitely be met.

All payments are to be made only at designated branches of the Central Bank of India.

* Insurance appropriation varies by age. Restrictions of life cover and accident cover apply. Maximum target amount is Rs. 60,000. Please contact, any LIC branch or any LIC Mutual Fund agent for details controversy.

RKSWAMY/LMF/4694A

Soon after assuming power, Mishra began reorganising the bureaucracy, placing his men in key positions. Mishra's reading was that the Congress lost the Lok Sabha polls in the state because the people who matter were hostile towards the party. Within a week, as many as 150 IPS and IAS officers were transferred. This move irked the Election Commission, which asked the Bihar chief minister to stall all transfers and appointments on the grounds that such large-scale changes just before the polls went against the rules. Jagannath Mishra ignored the advice and went ahead with his Operation Revamp. The chief election commissioner, Peri Shastri, threatened to dismiss the Bihar government. But just when the battle was taking an interesting turn, Mishra chickened out.

That was not all that Mishra did. He announced a flood of populist measures to placate all sections of the electorate. But his fancy schemes gave rise to a fresh controversy: Mishra's critics alleged that the state's coffers cannot even fund a fraction of what the Bihar chief minister has announced. But Jagannath Mishra remains unperturbed. "You leave the implementing part to me," he says with confidence.

But whatever Mishra and his supporters may say, there is no doubt that the Congress has an uphill task in Bihar. But then, the Bihar chief minister is known to pull off miracles and bounce back just when he is written off.

Jaishankar Gupta/Patna

With just a few weeks to go before the Assembly elections in Maharashtra, the state's political scenario looks all but confusing. The contest for the 289 Assembly seats will be mainly confined between the Congress(I) led by Sharad Pawar and the BJP-Shiv Sena combine. Though the leaders of both the parties express the confidence that they will be able to form the next government, the general impression is that Maharashtra will have a 'hung' Assembly—a word that has become fashionable in political circles after the last general election.

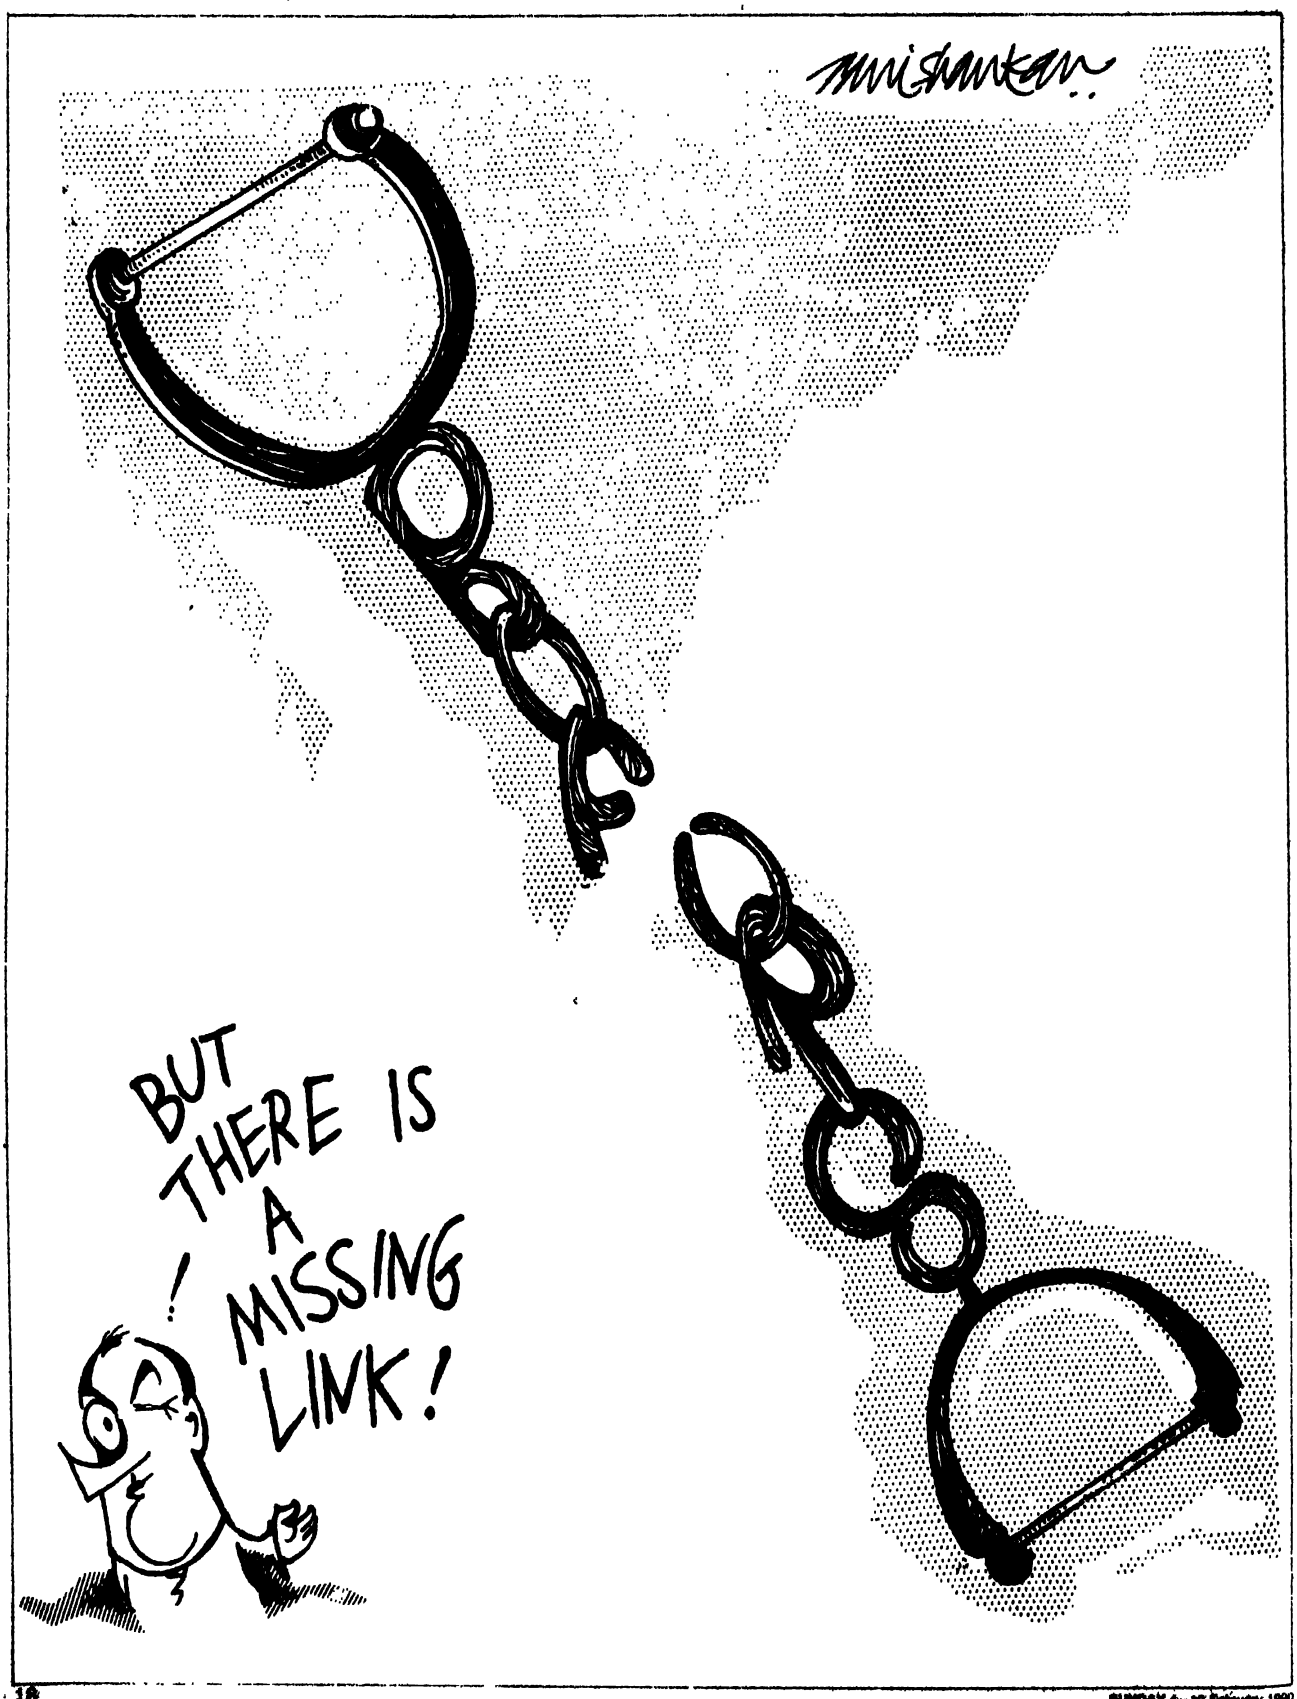
In the November '89 parliamentary polls, the Congress(I) led in 162 Assembly segments, the BJP-Shiv Sena in 82 while the Progessive Democratic Front (PDF) was ahead in 44 Assembly segments. But since then it is the, BJP-Shiv Sena alliance that has consolidated its position.

The prospects of the Janata Dal in particular is extremely bleak. Party leaders are not even sure whether they will be able to field candidates for all the Assembly seats. Moreover, the hope that the Republican Party of India would join them has also been dashed. The only men who are knocking on the doors of the Janata Dal in Maharashtra are some disgruntled Congressmen who have been denied party tickets. While a Janata Dal spokesman declared that they cannot promise tickets to such elements, Congressmen in their turn have alleged that they are being asked to pay huge sums to secure a Dal ticket.

The BJP-Shiv Sena alliance has made significant inroads into rural Maharashtra. The Janata Dal has virtually no base in the state and the Congress(I) is having a trying time to contain the Shiv Sena

In fact, state Congress leaders are somewhat apprehensive that these 'rebels' might spoil the chances of the party's success in the forthcoming elections. Former chief minsiter A.R. Antulay and Pratibha Patil are of the opinion that this mad scramble for tickets will have a demoralising effect on the Congressmen and they are highly critical of chief minister Sharad Pawar's role in the whole business.

The party which stands to gain most out of these internecine squabbles is the BJP-Shiv Sena alliance. Shiv Sena leader Bal Thackeray has persuaded the Dalits to support his party. In fact, the Shiv Sena is so confident of doing well that it has decided to field one of its leading lights, the popular actor-director Dadasaheb Kondke, against chief minister Sharad Pawar from the Baramati constituency.



With speculations rife about new political alliances and confusion getting the better of conviction everyday, it seems that the Assembly elections in the state will be a closely fought battle. In such a situation one cannot really rule out violence. •

Olga Tellis/Bombay

Bal Thackeray with A.B. Vajpayee: formidable alliance

RAVI SHANKAR

Experience the exquisite charm of Kanishka

In the very heart of Delhi

When at Hotel Kanishka, you're in the centre of Delhi's major commercial hub and important offices. You have an easy access to most of the places you want to visit during your business stay.

And you have at hand a host of facilities that make it more convenient to conduct your business. Telex, telephone and secretarial services. And a conference room in case you have a business talk.

To unwind after a hard day, there's Panorama. The roof-top restaurant, close to the stars. Have a sumptuous fare leisurely, while live music creates a spell. From your window, gaze at the infinite pearls scattered in the sky.

Hotel Kanishka
19 Ashok Road
New Delhi 110001
Tel 3324422
Cables KANISHOTEL
Telex 031-62788 KNK IN 031-62736 KNK IN

Dining and entertainment
Panorama: Roof-top restaurant serving Indian and continental cuisine. Live music. Dilkusha: Restaurant serving lavish buffet spreads for lunch and dinner Palm Court: 24-hour coffee shop. Tea Lounge: Serving the choicest flavours of tea. Mishti: Confectionery and Indian sweets. Kushan Bar: An intimate cocktail bar. Eagle Bar: Roof-top bar.

Conference and banquet
Gandhara: Seats 275 theatre-style, 350 for banquets. Party Rooms: Seats 25 theatre-style, 18 for sit-down lunch and dinner Party Room: Seats 50 theatre-style, 75 for (roof-top) banquets

The Ashok Group

India's host to the world

AKSHARA/ITDC-3230

HEAVEN CAN'T

"Osho: Never born, never died. Only visited the planet Earth between December 11, 1931 and January 19, 1990."
Epitaph composed by Osho Rajneesh's disciples

Rajneesh dies as he lived—amidst controversy, celebration and craziness

The going was as tumultuous as the visit. When Mohan Chandra Jain, the one-time Bhagwan Rajneesh (also known from time to time as Gautama Buddha, Zorba the Buddha, Rajneesh and the plain Osho) left the planet for good, the rollicking did not stop. His going was a 'tryst with destiny', a passing into the state of samadhi or oneness with the universe. Not a moment of mourning. And, almost as if with a vengeance, thousands of his followers went about proving that their performing priest's life and lessons were not mortal. The day he was cremated, thousands of maroon-clad Rajneeshites bade farewell to their controversial guru with 'song, dance and laughter'. It was a touching show but also oddly reminiscent of the forced gaiety that had always shadowed the purple priest's life and times.

The ecstatic cries of "Osho!", the chanting, the expressive forms of mass meditations and the initiation of a whole host of new sanyasins, could not detract from the fact that Rajneesh's passing was in the main an ordinary mortal affair, tinged with human pain and as tragic or commonplace as any death. The end for the 59-year-old guru, far from being a smooth transition to the 'other world', was in reality a particularly painful experience. As Swami Amrito, Rajneesh's personal physician and closest disciple, admitted in between wracking sobs: "He had been able to do less and less for the past few months, though he never did let on." And on 19 January, at 5 pm, when Rajneesh suffered a massive coronary thrombosis, Amrito asked the dying Swami whether he should prepare for cardiac resuscitation and the reply was: "No. If I die it will be a relief from the pain."

WAIT

COURTESY OSHO COMMUNE

The wheel had turned full circle. The Bhagwan, born Chandra Mohan Jain in Kuchwada, Madhya Pradesh, might have achieved Godhood, celebrity status and raised controversy in life, but in death he was back to human proportions. His roller-coaster life looks in retrospect as much a spectacle as his funeral, as unreal and melodramatic as his pronouncements and fantastic escapades. What, in fact, had made him the iconoclastic clown of religion was the irreverent form in which he would couch old truths. He had been playing godman since he was twenty-one years old (in 1953). He spent nine long years, between 1959 and 1968, travelling throughout India, challenging religious leaders in public debates. But polemics did not get him very far. What did was his book Sex To Superconsciousness published in 1968. "The title was enough to provoke people," recalls Swami Chaitanya Keerti, Rajneesh's press secretary. "And since then Rajneesh came to be known as the Sex Guru."

This image proved to be a boon for Rajneesh during the sexy Seventies. Flower children, freakheads and frustrated Indians homed on to Pune and the Rajneesh ashram in droves. The philosophy that maintained that salvation was to be found not in renunciation but in the celebration of life and all its processes, sex included, found instant appeal. "Enlightenment does not mean impotence," Rajneesh once declared, and delighted his disciples by advocating special methods of sexual intercourse to bring out man's fundamental sex energy and channel it towards creative directions. A disciple did one better and organised 'encounter therapy' sessions where devotees would engage in group sex. The Pune ashram received worldwide publicity after explicit photographs of the 'encounter sessions' appeared in the West German magazine Stern in 1977.

In terms of sheer flamboyance, Rajneesh's style had always been unbeatable. In the early 1980s, when he found the going was getting tough in Pune, the city of the orthodox Maharashtrian Brahmins, he disclosed that he was setting up a dream city on 126,000 acres of wasteland in Oregon, United States. Rajneeshpuram, as this city was called, grew into a 5,000-strong self-supporting community, and a centre of media attention. Those were the days of his famous Rolls Royces: 93 in all. Each afternoon, the Master would emerge from his mansion, slide into a Rolls and slowly cruise down the streets of Rajneeshpuram, benignly waving at his disciples, all of whom would dutifully line up by the curbside to pay homage.

But that paradise proved to be short-lived. Between July and September 1985, Rajneesh appeared on prime-time national TV nine times, including Good Morning America and Nightline. And what he said on TV was outrageous: calling Jesus Christ a crackpot for claiming to be the

THE COMMUNE AFTER RAJNEESH

New sanyasins are initiated into the faith while the body of Rajneesh lies in state

GAUTAM PATOLE

THE PUNE ASHRAM The meditations, the dancing, the discourses continue only son of God, accusing Christians of being hypocrites, lashing out at Reagan and his government for their sham democracy and manipulative Christianity, and declaring the Bible to be full of pornography.

"America couldn't take it", says Amrito, a member of Rajneesh's inner circle. "Bhagwan was trying to tell them many things, about the conditions of Americans, the barbarity of modern civilisation, and how drugs, mental illness and loneliness were destroying people." Amrito feels that Rajneesh rattled the shutters of the men in power in America, none of whom gave a toss for all the real, terrible problems of their country, and got back at him when the chance came. That was when Rajneesh's secretary, Sheela, defrauded the community of millions, and was exposed for a whole set of illegal acts and ultimately tried to flee. Rajneesh himself condemned her activities and invited the state police to properly investigate the matter. This was 14 September 1985. One and a half months later, Ranjeesh himself was arrested.

Photographs of the Sex Guru in chains splashed across newspaper front pages all over the West, his pleading guilty on two counts and his subsequent deportation from the country marked the beginning of a new kind of notoriety for Rajneesh. The downfall was complete. His name was suddenly associated with drugs, with sexual misdemeanors, and newspapers ran stories about him having AIDS. He tried to make his return to India as ostentatious, as extravagant

AFTER RAJNEESH WHO?

Apparently, there is no successor

After Rajneesh who? Nobody, if the late guru's closest disciples are to be believed. Questions about succession and the inheritance of Rajneesh's considerable empire are not welcome at Rajneeshdham. There is no successor, chorus Rajneeshites. The Master's death has changed nothing. Life will go on as usual at Oshodham, Pune. The meditations, the dancing, the chanting and evening discourses will continue.

But who will oversee things? Who will be the master of rites now? The questions persist, generating both curiosity and suspicion. Why did the Master not name a successor? Will some of his closest disciples now hijack the still-rolling Osho bandwagon? In an attempt to lay these apprehensions to rest, Rajneesh's closest disciples, the ones who administer the Pune ashram, called a press conference two days after his death. Here, Swami Amrito disclosed that on 6 April last year, Osho had ordered the setting up of a 21-member 'inner circle'. Rajneesh had, apparently, taken this decision because his health was fast deteriorating. Perhaps, knowing that the end was near, he felt he should do something to prevent Oshodham from plunging into chaos after his death.

In the new set up, Swami Jayesh as chairman of the inner circle is considered the unofficial successor to Rajneesh. Swami Amrito, inner circle vice-chairman, describes Jayesh as a "professional sanyasin" who joined the commune during the Oregon days. Ma Neelam, who had been Rajneesh's personal secretary and 'caretaker', says: "Jayesh looked after the legal affairs of the commune, and you know with Osho, these cases would keep popping up. He was part of a very intimate group and was in close contact with Osho."

"The workings of the inner circle are secret—and that's how Osho wanted it to be," claims Amrito. And indeed, secrecy seems to be the inner circle's distinguishing feature. Swami Jayesh is elusive and Amrito, who acts as the group's official spokesman, is not prepared to disclose any details about the Osho ashram. Amrito is equally evasive about the precise legal status of the inner circle. Does the inner circle only administer the ashram or does it own the whole complex, the Rolls Royces and everything else? Amrito merely says: "You could say that it isn't

SWAMI AMRITO

The vice chairman of the inner set up by Rajneesh an occasion as possible, hiring 60 rooms in a New Delhi five-star hotel and chartering a Vayudoot Avro to fly his entourage to the seclusion of Kulu Manali. He gave indignant interviews to Indian magazines, tried mustering his legendary aplomb and failed. He looked fatigued, hid his once lustrous eyes behind dark glasses and could not convince the world of his innocence.

GAUTAM PATOIL

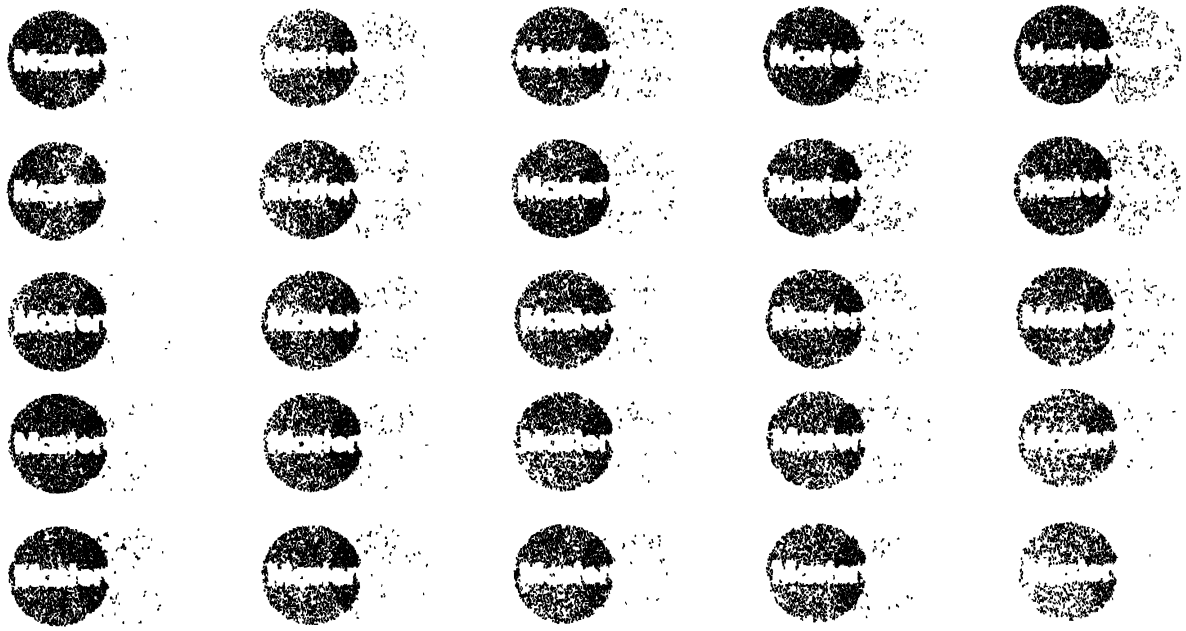
Instead within a few weeks, the Guru and his flock departed once again, on what was to prove an abortive world tour. The Rajneesh caravan stopped to preach in Kathmandu, then proceeded to Greece where he was once again arrested and asked to leave the country. From March to July 1986, Rajneesh hopped from one country to another, constantly hounded by securitymen. In all, 21 countries either deported him or refused him a visa. Finally, an exhausted Rajneesh returned to Bombay in early January 1987 and slunk back to his ashram in Pune, back to where it had all begun.

That, in restrospect, marked the end of his golden period. True, he did make a comeback exactly about a year ago by claiming to have been visited by none other than the soul of Gautama the Buddha. But the spirit had faded. So had his atrocious glamour of the Seventies. It was a different, more restrained Rajneesh. Sex seemed to be out. His devotees no longer ran about the streets of Pune half-naked, there was no group sex and the world no longer gasped when he opened his mouth. His claim to have been visited by Buddha elicited more amusement than shock. The only ones outraged were of course the Buddhists, who were soon silenced by Rajneesh's argument that being Buddha was merely a state of mind and applied to every individual who was truly enlightened. But the smiles soon faded and the world turned its back on the greatest performer of modern-day religion.

GAUTAM PATOIL

marriage but only a live-in relationship."

A salient feature of the inner circle is the dominance of 'foreigners'. Apparently, only five of the circle's 21 members are Indians. Zareen, who is in charge of publishing Indian sannyasins, Satya Vedanta, vice-chancellor of the Osho University of Creative Arts, Neelam, secretary of Indian Affairs, Jayashibha, who would look after the commune during Rajneesh's trips abroad, and Yatnagni, who handles the day-to-day running of the ashram.



MA NEELAM

The ordinary citizens of Pune, who had once risen in protest against Rajneesh and his disciples, had long forgiven their local prophet and his religious trespasses. He had become something of a local curiosity and when he died, Puneites to a man only wondered what would happen to the lucrative flow of foreigners into their city. "There is a chance that foreigners will stop coming to the city," worried a local police officer. "They were a major source of foreign exchange for us and obviously boosted the economy." Hoteliers, restaurant operators and other local tradesmen are equally worried. To them, the Bhagwan meant only one thing: good business.

If the mood of Puneites was predominantly cynical, that of the devotees of the dead prophet was no brighter. The celebrations, the meditations, the evening discourses of Rajneesh on video, and the carefully

If your credit card carries this symbol, walk into any of our 12000 outlets.

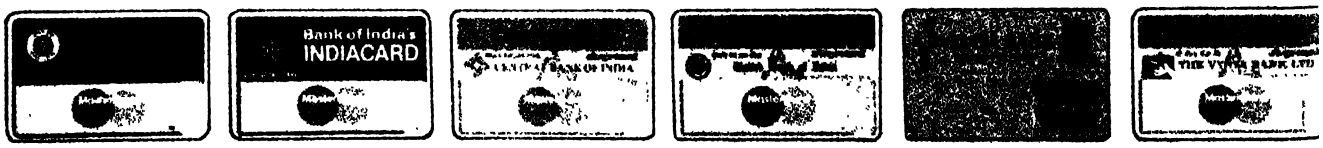
If it doesn't, stay at home.

Before you leave home, check your credit card for the MasterCard symbol.

It doesn't matter which Member Bank it belongs to. Walk into any of over 12000 Merchant Establishments in India and Nepal, where a warm welcome awaits you. Because with MasterCard, you get credit at the collective Merchant Establishments of ten leading banks in India and Nepal.

No other credit card is more widely accepted than MasterCard. None.

MasterCard is the world's largest association of banks and financial institutions. With over 29,000 banks in 170 countries. Offering the best financial services and products to customers around the globe. Servicing more than 153 million MasterCard cardholders. At 7.2 million Merchant Establishments worldwide.



Now, ten of the finest banks in India and Nepal are members of the MasterCard worldwide family. Andhra Bank, Bank of America, Bank of India, Central Bank of India, CitiBank, Hongkong Bank, United Bank of India, Vijaya Bank, Vysya Bank and Nepal-Arab Bank.

Come, use your MasterCard to its fullest advantage. Of course, if you've been reading this without owning a MasterCard, contact any of the MasterCard Member Banks.

Today!

ITALIA'90 OFFICIAL CARD OF THE 1990 WORLD CUP

More power to your credit card death was a turning point." That strangely enough would be the best thing that could happen. For, the later Rajneesh had turned his attention away from sex and focussed it against the crippling orthodoxies of religion, government and the view that the environment can be taken for granted.

But the magician of modern times, the flamboyant prophet of the 20th century was an exhausted man by the end of the 1980s. "Our Master's health had deteriorated alarmingly," says Ma Neelam, who, like most of Rajneesh's closest disciples, believe that US officials had secretly poisoned him with thallium during his imprisonment. His hair—the little that he had by that time—was falling out, his facial muscles twitched uncontrollably, his eyeballs moved on their own, eyesight was impaired and his gait had become unsteady. He suffered constantly from minor infections, was forced to wear dark glasses in public, could barely move about and slept most of the day. He would not see anybody save Ma Neelam, Maneesha and a handful of others and that too only between 3 and 4.30 pm. He emerged from the seclusion of his suite only thrice a day: twice to walk around his private lawn and once for delivering his daily discourse. And for a total of 14 hours every day, he slept.

"The Osho had been preparing for his samadhi long ago," believes Swami Amrito. "He effaced himself from everything and at the end he took a name like Osho which is not even a name and became a nameless person. He said: 'After I die, just forgive and forget me'." The forgiving will be easy. Not the forgetting. For, charlatan or saint, Rajneesh will remain one of the greatest performers in history, made more human in death. ●

Adite Chatterjee/Pune

Rajneesh's final performance

"Never speak of me in the past tense, my presence here will be greater without the burden of my tortured body." Those were Rajneesh's last words, uttered minutes before he succumbed to the massive coronary attack on 19 January, 1990. Present at his deathbed were Swami Jayesh, Swami Amrito and Ma Anando. Rajneesh, reportedly, also instructed the trio that he should be taken to the Buddha Hall for ten minutes and then directly to the burning ghat. The next instant, he was gone. "It was as if he was going for a stroll, it was that simple for him," recalls a distraught Swami Amrito.

Half-an-hour later, at 5.30 pm, a doctor certified that the cause of death was heart disease. At the Buddha Hall where the sanyasins were preparing for the evening meditation, Amrito made the official death announcement. Osho's body was brought in and bedecked with flowers. And instead of meditation that evening there was celebration. Cries of "Osho!" punctuated the air as sanyasins greeted the momentous event with song and dance.

Ten minutes later, the singing dancing throng proceeded to the burning ghat as scheduled. Clad in white, the official colour worn by the sanyasins in the evening, they presented a stunning sight. Clashing cymbals, and notes of the flute filled the night air as they moved on towards the burning ghats, where the Master's body was laid on the bier. Swami Vijay Bharati, brother of Rajneesh, lit the pyre and the singing reached a crescendo and climaxed with shouts of "Osho".

The next day, at 9.30 am, Osho's ashes were brought into the commune by Swami Vijay Bharati who was followed by chanting sanyasins, clad this time in maroon, and a band of musicians. The procession made its way to the sanctum sanctorum, the Chuang Tzu auditorium which has been redesignated Osho Tirth, the official samadhi. The urn containing the Master's ashes was placed on the samadhi. "He would have loved the celebration," said Ma Neelam. "You can see for yourself, this is not an old-style funeral of tears and grief but a Mardi Gras of laughter and dance."

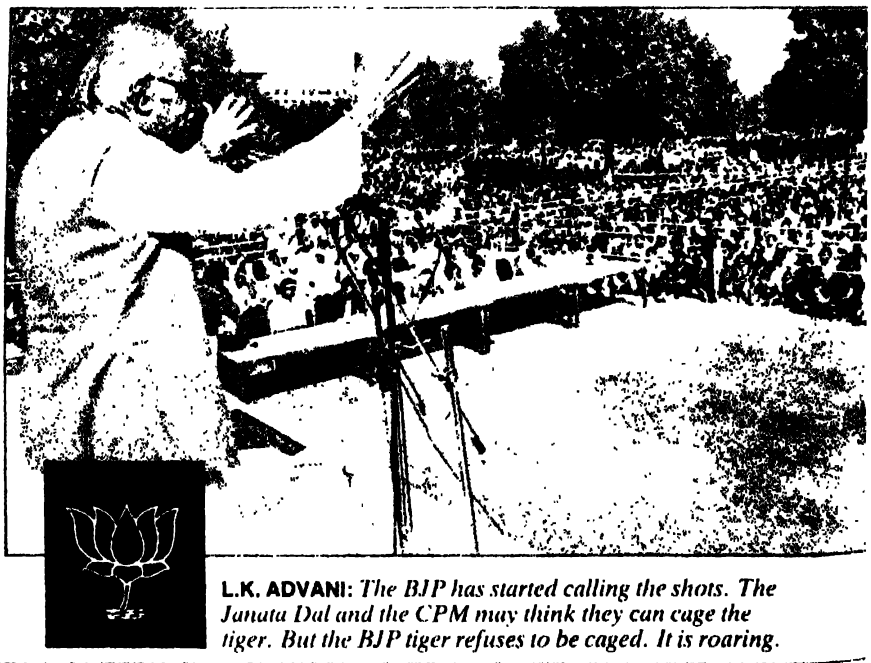
But in certain respects the "most enlightened master in the world" did conform to religious rites. Despite his claim that he did not want his way of life to become "a prison as all other religions", in the end he became just that: a prisoner of Hindu rites and rituals.

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

Everybody except the Bharatiya Janata Party

Who lost the elections?

Well, the Congress, of course. (Thought I'd better get that one off my chest before my more prolific readers reach for their economy-size vials of potassium cyanide to dip their quills in before dashing off yet another letter to the editor.) So, that's agreed on all hands, then. The Congress went into the last general elections with well over 400 seats and returned with a shade under 200. A sound and thorough drubbing.



But would one say the CPM won or lost? On one reckoning—which is the one their spokesmen use on the floor of the House - they were the great victors as they whittled the Congress down from 16 seats to four in West Bengal. Now that's an excellent showing for a regional party with regional aspirations. But is that anything to crow about for the voice of international proletarianism? They lost both the seats from Tripura (which bears roughly the same relationship to West Bengal as Romania once bore to the Soviet Union). They also lost all they staked in that other bastion of people's democracy, the lovely land of Kerala. In Punjab, where their courageous workers have lost more lives than any party (other than, of course - dare I say it?—the Congress), none of their candidates could match intimidation of the terrorists.(Instead, the Janata Dal, which has achieved the miraculous feat of buckling their knees in both directions to the terrorists, picked up a couple of seats). In Bombay and Ahmedabad and Coimbatore and Dhanbad—and wherever else the working class congregates in large numbers—the CPM drew a blank. (No, not quite everywhere: they've given Mrs Mohashini Ali from Kanpur, for which kind act grateful thanks from all who are good and true.) All in all, as one looks across the length of the country (from Kashmir to Kanyakumari, to coin a phrase) or indeed its breadth (from Kutch to Kolasib, shall we say, in order to keep the alliteration going) there is little to show from the CPM benches beyond a collection of the most interesting Bengali accents.

Yet there is no denying that, their minuscule numbers notwithstanding, the CPM are exulting. Why? For two reasons, closely interconnected.

First, they've got rid of Rajiv Gandhi. Since all of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Mao (not to mention the unmentionable lesser gods of the left) have, in the Indian political context, been reduced to the one-point programme of getting rid of Rajiv Gandhi (so that we can bring in Dhirubhai Ambani to realise our 'proletarian dream'.) The joy on the CPM benches knows no bounds. They've succeeded in transferring Rajiv from the treasury benches to the Opposition (that is, in the perspective of the seats on which they sit in Parliament, from their left to their right.

The second cause of their trumpeting triumph is that, with only about 7 per cent of the seats in the Lok Sabha, the fate of the country is clenched in their fist. The National Front and its principal supporter, the BJP, do not between them command a majority of the House. So it is the CPM that has pitchforked this odd couple into power—and the moment the pitchfork is removed the whole house of hay will come sagging to the ground. No wonder our Comrades feel quite chuffed. Even if, almost to a man (or even a woman, Geeta Mukherjee included), they come from but one state of India that is Bharat, they are now performing the function which rightfully should be shared by all the states and territories of our Union.

Yet, one wonders how long-lived the CPM's joy will, or could,be. It was no part of the CPM's election strategy to bring the BJP to the position of prominence it now occupies on the national stage. This is clear from the CPM's election manifesto, a text which I, for one, would prescribe as compulsory reading for all schools in West Bengal (along with such other standard text-books as the Collected Works of Nicolae Ceausescu, the Thoughts of Enver Hoxha and A Criti- que of the Convolutions of the Communist Line. The CPM election manifesto is replete with the usual heavy-verbiage condemnation of the Congress and its many misdeeds. But the choicest abuse is reserved for the BJP, a party of which the CPM speaks in only reptilian metaphors and similes: poisonous, venomous, slimy, slithering. The CPM (god bless their discerning souls) see the BJP as fork-tongued, like the snake, and sting-tailed, like the scorpion.

L.K. ADVANI: The BJP has started calling the shots. The Janata Dal and the CPM may think they can cage the tiger. But the BJP tiger refuses to be caged. It is roaring.

Nothing, then, was further from the CPM's purpose than having the BJP call the shots. Yet that is practically what is happening. The BJP having grabbed more than double the number of seats the CPM managed to garner, it is not the CPM but the BJP, as the senior partner, that has started calling the shots. They have just demonstrated their clout by getting the NF government to nominate Jagmohan as Governor of J&K over the shrill protests of our comradely Comrades.

The CPM guessed right when they predicted a Congress defeat. But they went hopelessly wrong in imagining that a left-of-centre coalition would emerge at the Centre. The NF neither holds sway on its own nor in collusion only with the CPM. This is no loss to the NF, whose natural posture is to sway in whichever direction the wind blows. But it obviously galls the CPM cadres, who don't expect the dictatorship of the proletariat to play second fiddle to majority communalism.

ALL of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Mao have been reduced by the CPM to a one-point programme: to get rid of Rajiv Gandhi. And they are exulting on their success

What the CPM strategists failed to anticipate was the Congress clean sweep in the south (Kerala included) and the Congress clean sweep in the north-east (Tripura included). That sweep has had two consequences. First, it put paid to any hopes of the NF forming a government on its own or with the collaboration of the CPM and its Left Front allies. Second, it hacked into nothingness every component of the National Front other than the Janata Dal– the DMK in Tamil Nadu, the Telugu Desam in Andhra Pradesh, the Hegde camp in Karnataka and, prospectively, the AGP in Assam. All that now remains of the National Front is the Janata Dal, as much a regional party of UP, Bihar and Orissa as the CPM is the regional party of West Bengal.

Far more disquieting for the CPM than the performance of the Congress in the south, north-east, and far north was the outcome of the seat adjustment between the NF and the BJP in the heartland where national laurels are won and lost: the vast plain that stretches from the deserts of Rajasthan through the battlefields and birthplaces of our epics to where the Ganga pours its heart out to the seas. In this thickly populated heartland, the political parameters are totally different to what they are in the India of the periphery. The implications and long-term lessons of the BJP-JD seat adjustments in the states of the Hindi heartland cannot be evaluated without a clear understanding of what, in political terms, distinguishes the south, east, north-east, far north periphery from the country's heartland.

Put in a nutshell, the distinction is that, whereas in the states of the periphery, our democracy has matured to a virtually two-party system, in the heartland the polity still remains split in at least three different directions. Let me explain.

In Tamil Nadu, now that the hiccup over who is MGR's true legatee has been resolved, the voter is given a clear choice between the DMK and the Congress-AIADMK alliance. All other parties are irrelevant. The Congress alliance wins.

JYOTI BASU: The CPM's election manifesto was full of the choicest abuses for communalism of the BJP.

V.P. SINGH: The Janata Dal has ended up being totally dependent on the BJP's support.

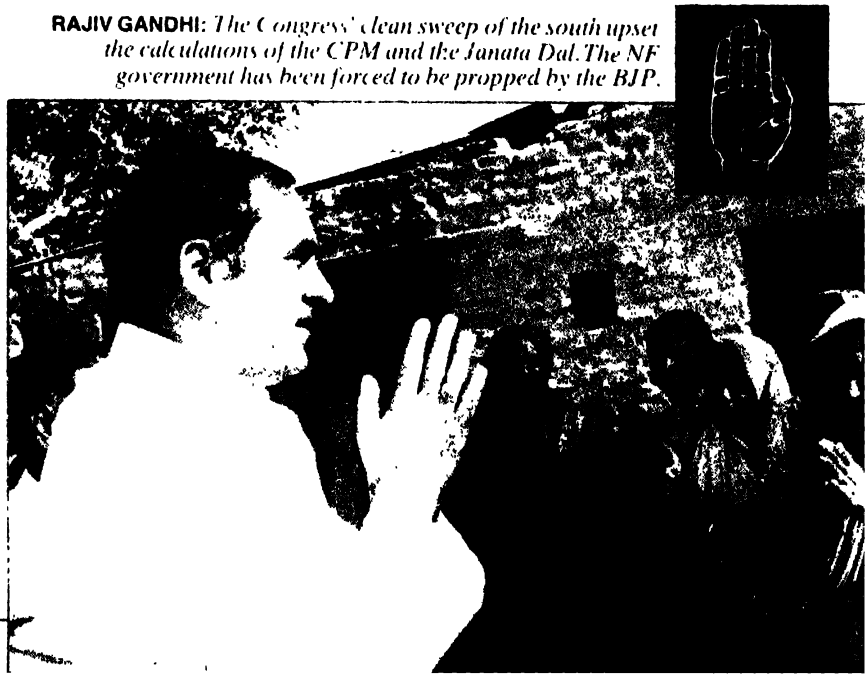
In Kerala, the choice lies between the Left Democratic Front [i.e., CPM + allies] and the United Democratic Front [i.e., the Congress + allies]. All other parties are irrelevant. The Congress-led front wins.

In Karnataka, the Hegde Janata Dal faces the Congress. With apologies to Subramaniam Swamy, it is virtually a straight fight, with Swamy's friends being little more than distracting noises off-stage. The Congress wins.

As in the south, so in the east—but with a difference in outcome. In Orissa, it is a one-to-one contest between Biju Patnaik's Janata Dal and our Patnaik's Congress. The Congress is worsted. In West Bengal, it is a titanic struggle between the CPM—led Left Front and the Congress. Again, it is the congress that is worsted. In Sikkim, of course, politics has become little more than a household quarrel. But whether it is Sikkim Congress versus Congress or husband versus wife, the contest is one-to-one.

In the north-east, be it Mizoram or Manipur, Tripura or Meghalaya, Nagaland or Arunachal—the contest is, in effect, one-on-one: x or y against the Congress. As in the south so in the north-east, the Congress takes all. And when the elections are held in Assam (with the Election Commission going the way it is, I almost said "if") it will again be in effect one-to-one, Congress versus AGP- and may the best man win.

As for the far north, it is the Congress in alliance with the National Conference that alone stood their ground against fundamentalism, terror and secession, as Mufti Mohammed Sayeed, with the courage and valour which has distinguished his tenure as home minister, fled to the safe haven of western UP from his home constituency of Anantnag in the valley the moment the communalists called for a boycott of the elections. Thus in J&K, too, it is one-on-one, the alliance versus those who would break our country. The country wins.



In sum, whether it is the Congress that wins or the other side, in the states of the periphery we have a two-party democracy. As is normal in such democracies, marginal shifts in the vote will lead to massive changes in seats held. It is a fair and equal fight, with the disproportionate change in the seats won by the victor being the guarantor of that political stability which is the bedrock of stable government. Commentators like Pran Chopra (pace his recent article in the Illustrated Weekly) are talking through their V.P. Singh fur caps when they pretend that coalition governments are a normal feature of democracy. They are a normal feature only of democracies based on proportional representation, as in continental Europe. The first-past-the-post system of democracy, which obtains in Britain and Canada and the United States as, for that matter, in Zimbabwe and Sri Lanka and Australia (or even, from time to time, in Pakistan) is predicated on the assumption that voters will choose any one party—albeit with a small plurality of votes but a large plurality of seats—to give the country a strong and stable single-party government. Far from being a "normal" feature of democracy, coalition governments in the first-past-the-post system can be no more than an occasional, short-lived aberration (which is, of course, what the NF government will be. Sorry, Pran, but better luck next time!)

THE real loser has been the people of India—who returned a confused mandate, but certainly not for the sale of the country to the forces of communalism

In contrast, however, to the periphery, the heartland of India remains fractured between three irreconcilable forces. The first is the Congress under Rajiv Gandhi. The second is the ex-Congress, whose pet aversion is Rajiv Gandhi. It is a politicalviewpoint that goes under many names much of the time and under one name some of the time, as now in the guise of the Janata Da'fand is fooling all of the people all of the time). The third is the force of communalism, with the BJP in the vanguard. All other forces - such as the CPM- count for little or nothing in the polity of the heartland.

It was only in 1984 that the political forces represented by the Congress established a clear, if wafer-thin, absolute majority in the heartland over the other two forces. In six of the other eight elections, the combined non Congress vote was higher than the vote of the Congress but because the parties representing the non-Congress votes were not combined, the Congress emerged the victor. The two exceptions were 1977 and 1989. In 1977, the non-Congress parties coalesced their different identities into a single identity (that the coalescing came unstuck is another but most germane story). This time round, the JD and the BJP retained their separate identities and, notwithstanding their fundamental differences on the issue of RAJIV GANDHI: The Congress' clean sweep of the south upset the calculations of the CPM and the Janata Dal. The NF government has been forced to be propped by the BJP.

majority communalism, came together to share the spoils

It was at this point that the Janata Dal lost the elections. In its anxiety to prevent the non-Congress vote from splitting two ways, the JD surrendered so many seats to the BJP that it lost all prospect of forming a government on its own or even in concert with its "natural allies" to the left

If, as I have argued, it was no part of the CPM's election strategy to find itself beholden to (of all parties) the BJP, nor was it any part of the JD strategy either to end up in such abject dependance on the spokes party of majority communalism. Between the essential secularism of the JD and the blatant communalism of the BJP is a bridge that can be built only on the pillars of opportunities.

If the story ended there, this piece might have been called 'A Comedy of Errors' or even 'As You Like It' What places it in the section titled 'tragedy' is what we are about to witness in round two, that is the forthcoming elections to eight state Assemblies and Pondicherry The JD is on the brink of surrendering the governance of a quarter of the country to the dark forces of majority communalism to keep their minority government going at the Centre, which guarantees the exclusion of Rajiv Gandhi even if it guarantees nothing else

Now, keeping the Congress out is fair game. Nothing undemocratic about it. Nothing unsecular about it. But what if the game means bringing the BJP in? Is that not a different and far more dangerous game? The JD and the CPM may think they can cage the tiger. But the tiger does not feel, or behave, as if it were caged. It roars. It struts. It demands more. And is being fed more.

The parallel between India in 1989-90 and Germany in 1931-33 is frightening. Then in Germany, as now in India, parties that wished to have no truck with the Nazis brought the Nazis in to keep the others out and themselves in. The tale of what happened eventually is too well-known to bear repetition. The only thing that can save us is for the Janada Dal to set itself up on its own as the alternative to the Congress in the heartland. That would be the way to bring in two-party democracy from the periphery to the heartland. Sometimes the Congress will win. Sometimes the Janata Dal will win. But at all times democracy will win.

What must be isolated and marginalised for the nation to survive is communalism, as represented by the BJP. There is hope for this still, provided the JD shows the necessary maturity, patience, skill and, yes, patriotism to strike out on its own. For, in this year of the Ram Janmabhoomi—and notwithstanding seat adjustment—the BJP increased its national vote by a mere 4 per cent from just over 7 per cent in 1984 to a little more than 11 per cent this time round (The parallel with the Nazis' rise to power begins with similar incremental percentages.) This means that, in the most frenzied period of communalism to overtake an Indian election since the Muslim League played its dirty card in 1946, nearly nine out of ten Indians have said "no" to the BJP. And yet—such is the consequence of the JD-BJP seat adjustment—the number of BJP seats in the Lok Sabha has exponentially soared from 2 to 88.

Who lost the last elections? The Congress, certainly. The CPM also in all but their own estimation. Even the National Front, notwithstanding its having formed the government. The only winner has been the BJP. The real loser has been the people of India—who returned a confused mandate, but certainly no mandate for the sale of the country to the forces of majority communalism. Whether the sale goes through is for the National Front to determine. True, that with the rout of their regional allies, nothing national remains of the National Front but its name, but should the NF's historic mission be but to remain a 'front' for the BJP? ●

The views expressed in this column are those of its author and do not purport to constitute official statement of the Congress Party's position.

Right in the heart of Calcutta

For super sensible Business Executives and people who don't want to spend more than is necessary—Big Star luxury at small star rates
Hotel Shalimar
Right in the heart of Calcutta
Opposite the USIS Library
Double and Single rooms Airconditioned. Wall-to-wall carpeting. Attached baths
Fully equipped Conference Room for 20 to 30 people
And an excellent restaurant called 'TAVA' for authentic Moghlai Cuisine

Hotel Shalimar

3 S N Banerjee Road
Opp USIS Library
Calcutta-700013
Phones. 28-5030 / 28-5016 / 28-4904

GREEN DREAMS

With Maneka Gandhi as minister, environment is suddenly 'in'

Twenty years after environmentalism caught fire in the West, it has only just begun to smoulder here. While environmental issues are crucial political determinants abroad, India's first "green" politician has only just emerged. But delayed reactions apart, suddenly there is a new awareness of environmental concerns: of the suicidal implications of denuding our forest cover, belching out noxious wastes, polluting our rivers and impoverishing our soil

Almost overnight, the ministry of environment has been transformed from a neglected backwater to a hub of frenetic activity. "We have received more letters from the environment ministry in this past month than we have in the past five years," says a source in the energy minister's office. "My ministry can be ignored only at the cost of the country's future," claims the 35-year-old minister of state for environment, Maneka Gandhi. This is no longer a ratpatiya (ramshackle) ministry. Not while I'm here, anyway." Bravo, bravissima, etc. Ignore the egotism and hang on to your seat belts. But do not believe anything till it happens.

Maneka is not the first Gandhi to evince an interest in the environment. Her late husband Sanjay's family was full of nature-lovers who were quite vocal about it. In Indira Gandhi's time, environmentalism had burgeoned to become a global issue whose time had come, and she responded to it marvellously—well, globally at least. Her address at the 1972 United Nations Conference on the environment in Stockholm was inspiring, and she was hailed the world over as a significant international environmentalist. However, at home she did little to sustain her lofty pronouncements to ensure a better world. Through the '70s, when many countries were thinking of ways to protect their ecosystems, India continued to sacrifice environmental aspects at the altar of "development". (Her father Jawaharlal's preoccupation with "development" in the '50s and '60s caused him to eulogise about the giant concrete dams he initiated—he referred to them as "the temples of today"—he did not live in an era where signs of an "ecocatastrophe" were all too evident to be ignored.)

When Rajiv Gandhi took over in 1984, he, like his mother before him, recognised the worth of supporting environmentalism: it was a fashionable cause to support for a Prime Minister who carefully cultivated his international image. To his credit, he did take some steps in the right direction (see box) but there was no holistic approach to development, and no real attempt to enforce the loophole-ridden laws formulated then. Vested interests and powerful forest and business lobbies continued to receive precedence over the interests and safety of the people. "The Gandhis made much of the environment, but their interest in it was at best superficial, and at worse, faddist," says a member of the Planning Commission.

NITIN RAI

Then what makes environmentalists hopeful that the new government will be any different? For a start, they have already soiled their record by dithering on the first environmental crisis to confront them: to dam or not to dam the Tehri river in the Garhwal Himalayas. The new-look Centre insists that it does not favour big dams. But the state, though run by a National Front majority, was adamant that work on the project would go on as scheduled. Sunderlal Bahuguna, the Chipko leader, announced a fast till death if work on the Tehri Dam continued. It required an assurance from Maneka herself that talks would be held before the fast was broken.

The conflict is by no means resolved: while activists in the area dramatically swear that cement for the dam will have to be poured over their bodies before work goes on, the Centre has called for yet another appraisal by a special committee, whose recommendations the Cabinet will use to decide the issue. Senior officials in the environment ministry claim that the younger Mrs Gandhi has already thrown her hands up over the issue. According to them, her attitude is that she cannot save Tehri because a lot of money has already been pumped into the project. Incontrovertible evidence that the dam is being built on a seismic fault is not enough reason to scrap the project, say sources close to the minister. Proclaims one: "There may be upheavals, but then again, there may not be. Bahuguna does not have a leg to stand on." While Maneka insists that she has no opinion on the subject, she concedes that "any project which submerges 1,09,00 hectares of land to provide (irrigation to) 1,20,000 hectares", cannot be such a great idea. She also admits that the Rs 400 crores spent on Tehri till now is not enough of an excuse to see the project through, if it means chasing it with another Rs 2,000 crores to further a costly mistake.

Bhopal victims: hoping for justice—again

Maneka plans to introduce an innovation that exists nowhere else in the world: environmental courts. Retired Justice P.N. Bhagwati has been asked to work out the modalities

Earth, wind and fire

Maneka Gandhi's approach to the environment is sensible, silly and controversial

As if orchestrated by some divine campaign manager, the blue skies cloud momentarily, and there is a shower. "Wherever I go, there is rain," proclaims Maneka Gandhi, as she arrives at a public meeting in Pilibhit in a green—she is the environment minister—cotton Kanjeevaram sari. "I am happy, but I believe it's not the best thing for the crops now."

If only life were that simple, our rain goddess could traverse the country, and with a touch of her personal magic—whatever that is—turn the parched earth to green. Instead, she sits at her ministerial office in the capital, signing endless letters, taking snap decisions—and snapping while doing so—and generating a whirl of activity at a ministry that has traditionally slumbered through everything. "It's important for me to give the right signals," she tells you. And so, she's begun at home. The dreary corridors of her ministry have sprouted beautiful indoor plants overnight. Down the road, at the zoo, she takes officials to task over an icecream wrapper found floating in a lake, or a bored monkey, who is fed overripe bananas. She wrinkles up her freckled nose as she toes a piece of cowdung on the road and wants to know how it got there. "Everything here is somebody else's job," says the hard task-master. "In the zoo, animals have the right of way and not the unions and not the staff." Fair enough, but don't ask questions about the cowdung.

While most environmentalists are sceptical about how much the new, and very green, minister can really achieve while being part of the political system, they all agree that Maneka is genuinely concerned about the environment—and pushy enough to get her way if she wants to. "Whatever you say about Maneka, you have to grant it to her that she is a go-getter," pronounced one of her Cabinet colleagues. Perhaps, this is the reason why the Prime Minister tagged on the programme implementation portfolio to her charge. "These are both policing jobs," explains the only woman in the Cabinet. "I run my ministry like a woman runs her house." Her plans include restructuring her kingdom and making people accountable. "Environment has been accorded such low priority," she claims, but refuses to dwell on where brother-in-law Rajiv Gandhi went wrong. Maneka hopes that her abiding interest in the ecosystem percolates down to her bureaucracy, but predicts, "Apres moi le deluge" (after me, the deluge).

The greening of Maneka is only a recent phenomenon. "I ate meat for breakfast as well, until I gave it up some years ago," when she discovered her true passion, which is now also her life's work. "I am religious in a different way," she continues, "For me, religion is beautiful things, not harming, not stepping on an ant, or breaking a leaf." Animals hold a special place in her heart: in the years after her defeat at Amethi in 1984, she spent much of her time at the hospital for animals she had set up, sometimes driving out in the dead of night to save a sick creature. "People call me up at the oddest of hours, and I can't even be annoyed. I rush there, because otherwise I wouldn't be able to sleep," says the minister who lives in a house with ten dogs.

Today, Maneka is at the helm of a ministry she has, in her own

NEERAJ RAI

If Maneka Gandhi cannot stop Tehri, it will have been her first battle lost. And yet, in many ways, she symbolises a significant change in the government's attitude to the environment—moves to reopen the Bhopal case is a major example. And despite the ministry's defeatist attitude on big dams, the Tehri issue is not really closed. "The real difference is that this government is prepared to listen,"

"There is nothing that you can bribe me with, or threaten me with," says Maneka, "After all, haven't I already lost whatever I had to lose" words, "been itching to get her hands on". And environmentalists who criticise her for her total lack of knowledge and understanding of environmental problems are quick to grant it to her that she is at least on the same side as them. The trappings of her new-found power are nowhere in evidence, but she cracks her whip and unleashes a harsh tongue when she wants to.

She is quick to disclaim all connections with the Emergency her husband and his mother imposed. "They make me out to be the arch queen of the Emergency," she says. "Nobody believes me when I tell them I was only 17 and straight out of Sanawar (public school). My whole life was my husband and college. I only knew more about that time after it was over." The years that followed her fairy tale marriage to the Prime Minister's son, his subsequent death and her ignominious exit from the Gandhi household are a legend. They couldn't have been easy for a girl in her early twenties, but Maneka was no ordinary girl. After realising that her Rashtriya Sanjay Vichar Manch would get her nowhere politically, she latched on to Ramakrishna Hegde's coat-tails and cultivated an interest she knew would get her an uncontested berth in any Opposition government. "One of the lessons I have learnt is that you have to be clean first, then you can achieve anything in life," she espouses sagely. "That is why I don't muddle up my life with want or attachment."

While environmentalists have reason to celebrate the fact that the environment ministry has a green politician to run it for the first time, bureaucrats in the ministry are upset at being mercilessly shouted at by a minister who sometimes behaves like an "immature teenager", in one senior bureaucrat's words. But Maneka couldn't care less about what people say. She is probably aware that her "purity of heart", as she calls it, might make her enemies in high places, but is not at all insecure about her future. "There is nothing you can bribe me with or threaten me with," she says in her usual dismissive manner. "After all, haven't I already lost whatever I had to lose?"

Shiraz Sidhva/Pilibhit and New Delhi

says environmentalist Shekhar Singh of New Delhi-based Indian Institute of Public Administration, who is also on the special Tehri committee. "The Rajiv government may have been interested in the environment, but their style of functioning made it difficult for them to achieve anything. It was a closed government which could not draw their power or strength from the people; without that, no environmental project will succeed," Shekhar explains.

Shyam Chainani of the Bombay Environmental Action Group (BEAG), like Singh, is optimistic that the new ministry will do something "positive". "With the reopening of the Bhopal compensation issue," he says, "there definitely seems to be a change in the right direction." But Chainani laments that environmentalists are not yet a powerful lobby, and are often defeated by other vested interests. For instance, the new development control rules have certain provisions—read loopholes—which will greatly benefit the builders' lobby. Says he: "Unless the reservation of rules is revised and the dereservation of plots discontinued, the city of Bombay can be ruined."

Sources in the ministry say that Devi Lal's proposed 'Disneyland' in the heart of Haryana has to first pass muster on environmental grounds

Yet, Chainani is hopeful that one day India's "green" movement will be strong enough to keep vested interests at bay. "If the Brits can go green (years after Germany did), so can India," he claims optimistically. "The new awareness is in response to issues and events that are affecting people here, and not a throwback on the Western movement."

"It's not going to be an easy ride," warns Bittu Sehgal, Bombay-based environmentalist and editor of Sanctuary magazine. "At least the government has been forced to realise that it can't ignore what is happening to our world today." Sehgal points out that till recently, people regarded environmental issues as the "luxurious fetishes" of a few. "Ecological issues have attained the status that they have today only because the movement has become a grassroots one," says Sehgal. He scoffs at the suggestion that environmentalism has gained momentum only because it is fashionable. "It is because people are realis-

Voices in the wilderness

India's important environmental crusades

It may take a while for thousands of students wearing gas masks and brandishing bottles of sewage and pesticides to throng our beaches as they did in Miami in the Seventies. Environmentalism may have been slow in coming to India, but over the past ten years, it has burgeoned to come of age at the Harsud rally last September. Thirty five thousand people crowded this little town on the Narmada to express their solidarity with its inhabitants and pledged that they would not allow the Indira Sagar megadam project to wipe Harsud off the map.

Worried villagers gather around the launching pad at Ballapal

The Harsud rallly was much more than an attempt to save the town's inhabitants. It symbolised the new-found strength of a people's awareness: they could make all the difference to their immediate environment and to the world.

The Centre for Science and Environment has contributed significantly to the awareness of environmental issues through the publication of Citizens' Reports on the State of India's Environment. It has documented some fascinating people's struggles. Here are some important environmental campaigns:

The Chipko movement

India's most famous environmental movement. It derives its name from the principle of hugging a tree and thereby saving it. Spearheaded by the Dasholi Gram Swarajya Mandal, a Gandhian organisation, the movement, headed by Sunderlal Bahuguna, began in 1973, to protest against the policy of the government of Uttar Pradesh to auction forests. Chipko activists stand for people's right to forests. They have organised women's groups to carry out afforestation in their areas.

Save the Silent Valley

The first major campaign against a dam in India, which started in the early Eighties, it successfully saved a genetically rich and one of the last-remaining rain forests in Kerala from being submerged. The campaign was spearheaded by the Kerala Sastra Sahitya Parishad, an organisation whose main objective is the demystification of science.

Save the Taj campaign

Environmentalists feared that pollution from the Mathura Refinery, located 40 km away, could seriously corrode the pristine marble of the Taj Mahal. The campaign they generated forced the authorities to take precautionary measures and monitor the monument for any further signs of deterioration.

Save the soil campaign

Known as Mitti Bachao Abhiyan, the movement was launched in 1977 against waterlogging and salinity caused by the Tawa Dam in Madhya Pradesh. The campaign mobilised local farmers to demand compensation for the affected lands.

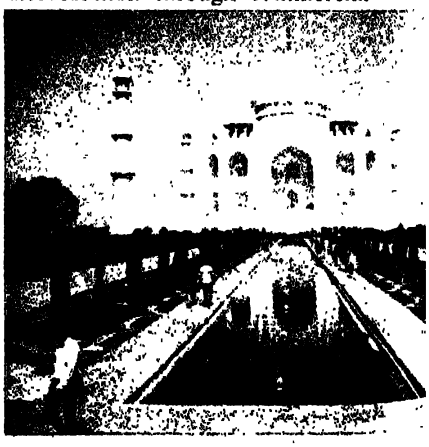
Thal Vaishet campaign

The siting of the world's biggest urea plant just 21 km from Bombay evoked enormous opposition from the city groups, notably Shyam Chainani's Bombay Environmental Action Group, which feared that the plant would increase Bombay's pollution and congestion. Their concerted efforts delayed the project over two years, but ultimately failed to change the site.

Bedthi campaign

This hydro-electric project in Karnataka was the second in India—after Silent Valley—to be abandoned after environmental protests. The project would have submerged tracts of dense forest and prosperous areca-nut, cardamom and pepper gardens but local farmers and eminent scientists from Bangalore campaigned and got the project scrapped.

Stop Bhopalpatnam-Inchampalli Dams



Work on these two dams on the Indravati river in Maharashtra was stopped by local protests from tribals led by the Jungle Bachao-Manav Bachao Andolan—a local coalition of activists, politicians, and social workers.

Doomed Valley

Limestone mining in the Doon Valley and Mussourie Hills has left permanent scars on this famous hill region, destroying forests and permanent water sources. The Rural Litigation and Entitlement Kendra in Dehra Dun filed a public interest case in the Supreme Court, which in a historic judgment, ordered the closure of the mines on grounds of environmental destruction.

Protect Karnataka's commons

The Karnataka government's decision to grant nearly 80,000 acres of degraded forest and revenue land to a joint sector company for afforestation is being opposed by environmentalists. Samaj Parivartana Samudaya, a local voluntary agency, has filed a petition in the Supreme Court contending that the people's access to government forest land is crucial to their survival and so the decision to undertake afforestation through commercial interests affects their fundamental right to life.

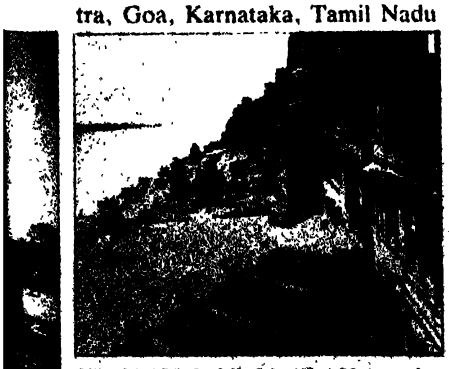
Kaiga campaign

Opposition to the nuclear plant at Kaiga in Karnataka started in 1984 and has since gained momentum. In spite of the government's decision to go ahead with the project, it may not come up due to escalating costs and concerted and continued agitation against it. The new government will have to review the project seriously.

Gandhamardhan bauxite mining



The proposal to mine bauxite in the Gandhamardhan reserve forest, though formally cleared by the government, has been stalled because of the intense agitation by the local tribes who do not want to see their forests destroyed.

The Narmada campaign

This campaign against the massive river valley project along the Narmada has mobilised enormous public interest. One dam, the Sardar Sarovar in Gujarat, is already being built, while another, in Madhya Pradesh, has been proposed. These projects will displace lakhs of tribals and thousands of little villages will be wiped out. The campaign has been joined by hundreds of small and large groups across the country. At the Woodstock-style rally in Harsud, several thousands gathered to express their solidarity with the environmentalists' case.

Save the Western Ghats march

This padayatru, jointly organised by a number of environmental groups in 1988, covered over 1,300 km across the states of Maharashtra, Goa, Karnataka, Tamil Nadu and Kerala. The march which was very popular focussed attention on the environmental problems of the Western Ghats.

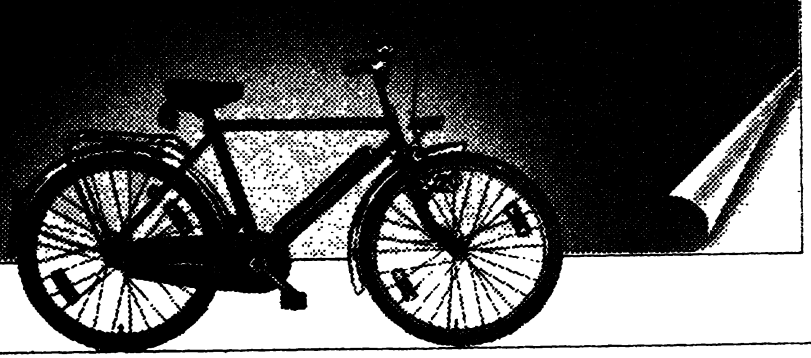
The Taj Mahal (left); the Narmada river valley project in Madhya Pradesh

Tehri Dam

The construction of the Tehri Dam in the seismic Himalayas has been challenged by many environmentalists. Protests by the Tehri Bandh Virodhi Sangarsh Samiti, a local organisation, have been raised for over 20 years. This is the new government's first real, environmental challenge.

Baliapal

In July 1985, J.B. Patnaik, then chief minister of Orissa, announced that a national testing range for missiles would be set up at Baliapal, a fertile coastal area in Orissa, resulting in the eviction of 70,000 people. The people of Baliapal (under the banner of the Khepanastra Ghati Pratirodh Committee) along with environmentalists all over the country have been protesting against the scheme. But all that the government has done so far is to revise its estimate—it now says that only 40,000 and not 70,000 people will be displaced. But this figure is disputed as it does not include the migrant population or the fishermen.



ing that these issues touch their lives that they are joining in," explains Sehgal. "People like Sunderlal Bahuguna, Baba Amte, Medha Patkar (who organised the Harsud rally last September) and Shabana Azmi participated in a process of sharing problems and solutions with the people, and merging the environment issue with human rights, economic skulduggery, global loss, deterioration of health, and the equal distribution of available resources."

Sehgal blames the Rajiv government for the arbitrary clearance of large dams. "The Narmada project, for instance, was not a national decision, but a Congress(I) decision," he charges. While nobody expects a magical transformation, the very fact that a free flow of information is possible is half the environmentalists' battle won.

Tehri: to dam or not to dam; (inset) Sunderlal Bahuguna

This is precisely where the Planning Commission can get involved. Already, there is a tremendous change in attitude, with members such as Laxmi Jain, Rajni Kothari and Ela Bhatt staunchly supporting the environmental battle and encouraging the participation of people on the one hand and the science and technology departments on the other. But how much can intellectuals, social workers and greenhorns do, even with the best of intentions?

THE WAY YOU DRIVE YOUR VEHICLE NOW WILL DECIDE WHAT YOUR CHILD WILL DRIVE IN FUTURE.

Let's face it
A major global crisis we could face in the near future is a world without oil. A crisis that will affect every aspect of life. Let us do something to prevent our children from facing it.

A few simple steps today could postpone this global crisis. And create time and opportunity for alternative sources of energy to develop.

Save oil today. It takes very little effort and goes a long way. All you have to do is to –

- Get engine tuned regularly.
- Have exhaust checked periodically.
- Get air filter cleaned from time to time.
- Check tyre pressure and wheel alignment.
- Turn off the engine even at short halts, instead of idling.
- Avoid unnecessary acceleration and frequent braking.
- Avoid using the clutch as a foot rest.

I am keen to know more about fuel saving.
Please send me a free booklet.

Name . _____

Address _____

_____

Dist. : _____ Town : _____

Pin . _____

TR/EV/2/SUNDAY

Petroleum Conservation Research Association

P.B No. 572, New Delhi-110 001.
Phone : 3315868.

SAVE OIL.
FOR YOUR CHILDREN'S SAKE.

everest/d90/PCRA/30

Anil Agarwal of the New Delhi-based Centre for Science and Environment (CSE), along with other environmentalists, points out that one party or a stray minister who is genuinely interested in the environment and willing to listen cannot solve the environmental problem. There has to be an integrated approach to environment, which involves all departments and ministries. Till then, all the legislation in the world will make no difference. "Our legislation is better than in most countries," claims Ashish Kothari of Kalpvriksh. "But we have to take into consideration the human side and adopt a holistic approach." For instance, says a prominent environmentalist who declines to be identified, if the minister—with her special penchant for birds—jails bird-trappers in Pilibhit, what will their families live on? "Maneka's main concern is animals," says another environmentalist. "She has to realise that the ecosystem has to be viewed as a whole."

Perhaps this realisation has already sunk in. The new ministry has recommended amendments to over ten legislations including those concerning hazardous chemicals, public liability, noise pollution and wildlife. Sources in the ministry say that the deputy prime minister Devi Lal's proposed "Disneyland" in the heart of Haryana will never get off to a start if it does not pass muster on environmental grounds. "We are working towards making the environment ministry stronger than any minister," says Maneka. "I may be here today and gone tomorrow, but our environment cannot be played around with."

Besides strengthening the Environment Protection Act and plugging its loopholes, Maneka plans to introduce an innovation that exists nowhere else in the world: environmental courts. Retired Justice P.N. Bhagwati has been asked to work out the modalities; the law ministry and the central government have agreed to it in principle. At the district level, there will be watchdog committees to accord power to the people and get them involved in protecting the environment at the grassroot level.

Also on Maneka's drawing-board are plans for alternatives for firewood: garbage turned into pellets. Since animals are her pet obsession, it is quite likely she will transfer the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act from the agriculture ministry to the environment ministry.

Already, Maneka has made herself unpopular with the Uttar Pradesh government because she has proclaimed all forest officials corrupt. "They probably are, but we are afraid she will go about alienating everybody, and then the larger cause will be lost," says a senior bureaucrat in the ministry.

Whatever her style of functioning or her level of ignorance (there is a story doing the rounds that Maneka only recently realised that the Narmada project consisted of two large dams in two different states), it seems crucial that the new government accept the wisdom that the environment is not a low-priority area. "Environment is not just pretty trees and tigers, threatened plants and ecosystems," explains CSE's Agarwal. "It is literally the entity on which we all subsist and on which our entire agricultural and industrial development depends." •

Shiraz Sidhva with Nandini Dasgupta/New Delhi, Adite Chatterjee /Bombay and bureau reports

What Rajiv did—and didn't

The Ganga Action Plan

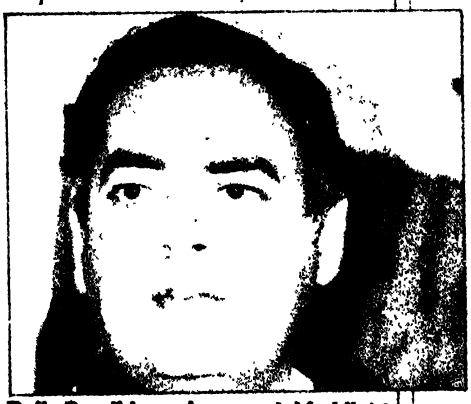
At the end of this year, around Rs 190 crores will have been spent on this ambitious project (total sanctioned cost Rs 266 crores), launched by Rajiv Gandhi in 1986.

The principal task of the 262 schemes, monitored by the Central Ganga Authority, is to cleanse the river. Most of the schemes deal with diverting the waste water and treating it before it enters the Ganga.

In addition, schemes for the conversion of dry latrines, the setting up of electric crematoria and the improvement of river fronts are being taken up. The task of cleaning the river is likely to be completed in the first two years of the 8th Plan, around 1992.

The project has generated worldwide interest. Its critics complain that it is not a people's project, but a network of sewage works.

The National Wastelands Development Board (NWDB)



Set up in 1985, the NWDB was the first programme of its kind on a national scale to develop wastelands with people's participation. Regarded as a failure by many and criticised for concentrating only on afforestation, its programme was restructured in October last year.

The Motor Vehicles Act

An important legislation for a cleaner environment, this amended Act ensures uniform emission standards all over India. Introduced by Rajiv's regime, this Act was left for the new government to implement on 1 March this year.

The Environment Protection Act (EPA)

Introduced in 1986, this significant umbrella-type legislation includes water, air, noise, hazardous substances and micro-organisms. Though there are serious loopholes in the EPA, it substantially increased fines under various heads and made public interest litigation possible. Besides, it empowered the ministry of environment to issue directives to other government departments.

Rajiv Gandhi : environmental faddist?

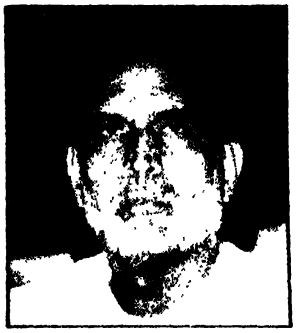
The Wildlife Protection Act

Amended in 1986, this Act banned trade in Indian ivory and regulated the export of African ivory by means of licensing. It also banned internal trade in furs and snakeskins. However, trade in these items continues because stay orders have been obtained by fur and snakeskin traders from various High Courts all over the country.

Mission solidarity

An NC rally at Chetrapati: demanding reforms

Indian MPs create a flutter by taking part in a conference of the banned Nepali Congress



The winds of change are blowing from the Caucasus to Kathmandu. The landlocked Himalayan kingdom of Nepal is heaving for a change in its 30-year-old political system, in which the King commands absolute power behind a facade of partyless democracy.

On 18 January, leaders of the outlawed Nepali Congress began their party's three-day national conference to chalk out a plan of action to fight for the restoration of a multi-party system of government in the country. The meeting was also attended by the representatives of a newly-formed front of Nepal's splintered communist parparties, and the leaders decided to launch a satyagraha from 18 February, if King Birendra, Nepal's reigning monarch, failed to concede their demands by then. But from all indications it appears that the King is in no mood to relent. And with the royalty chosing to remain impassive and impervious in the face of growing popular resentment against what has come to be regarded as a malevolent system, a time-bomb seems to be ticking away in Nepal.

This is not the first time, however, that the NC has raised a demand for political change. It has been stridently demanding the re-introduction of the multi-party parliamentary system, ever since Nepal's nascent democracy was subverted by a royal coup in 1960. That year King Mahendra, father of King Birendra, dimmissed the elected government of B.P. Koirala--one of Nepal's political titans—and dissolved solved Parliament. In their place, he introduced a partyless panchayat (parliament), in which the members are elected as individuals without any party ty affiliation and assumed absolute authority by reserving for himself all legislative and executive powers. His son King Birendra, who succeeded him in 1972, has fiercely defended that legacy and has, so far, refused to bow to popular pressure.

But what set the January conference apart from all previous conventions of the party was the participation of a number of Indian parliamentarians, who openly advocated an end to monarchical rule in Nepal, much to the chagrin of the country's loyalist establishment. The Indian delegation, led by the Janata Dal (JD) leader, Chandra Shekhar, comprised Hari Kishore Singh (JD) M.J. Akbar and Harish Rawat (Congress-I), Harkishan Singh Surjeet (CPI-M) Subramaniam Swamy (Janata Party), and M. Farooqi (CPI). While these seven leaders arrived to take part in the proceedings on the opening day, three more Janata Dal MPs--Yashwant Sinha, Kamal Murarka and Rabindra

KEY FIGURES

Chandra Shekhar: The veteran Janata Dal leader compared the King with Hitler and faced a government-sponsored protest demonstration

M.J. Akbar: The Congress(I) MP pointed to Romania where a decades-old order was swept away in December and wondered how the forces of change could be kept subdued in Nepal

Subramaniam Swamy: The Janata Party leader launched a frontal attack on the King and cast aside the civility of referring to him in innuendos

Harkishan Singh Surjeet: The CPI(M) leader criticised the King for perpetuating a feudal political system

Manchanda flew in the next day.

The conference was held at the residence of Ganesh Man Singh, who is designated as the supreme leader of the NC, because the government had refused permission to the party to hold the meeting in the Royal Academy Hall. The NC was, therefore, constrained to hold the public rally in an adjoining plot of vacant land which could at best accommodate 5,000 people.

When Chandra Shekhar rose to speak, the ground at Chetrapati in downtown Kathmandu, was packed to capacity with people perched on walls and trees. In a brief, fiery speech, punctuated by rapturous applause, Chandra Shekhar lashed out at the monarch and the monarchy. He cited the fate of some of the most hated dictators in history and said that if Hitler and Mussolini could fall, lesser despots could not hope to fare better. And Shekhar, whose speech was bound to affront the Nepalese royalty and had the potentials of torpedoing Indo-Nepalese relations, made it clear that he was not speaking in his individual capacity, but was voicing the sentiments of his party and the ruling National Front in India.

M.J. Akbar, who brought a message of goodwill from his party president and former Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, also spoke passionately, advocating changes in Nepal's political order, in a speech that was unmistakably Nehruvian in its lofty idealism and style of delivery. Pointing to Romania, where a popular upsurge swept aside a decades-old autocratic regime last December, Akbar wondered how the forces of change could be kept subdued in Nepal.

Subramaniam Swamy, a former Harvard professor and leader of the Janata Party launched a satirical attack on the King by casting aside the civility of referring to him in innuendos.

Surjeet and Farooqi, who represented the Indian left at the conference, were equally critical of the King for trying to perpetuate, what they called, a despotic feudal order. They particularly welcomed the increasing cameraderie between the NC and the Nepalese communists, who have decided to fight for democracy on the basis of common programmes.

Whether the participation of the Indian delegates and their fulminations against the monarch will affect Indo-Nepalese relations in not yet clear, but it was more than apparent that the ruling coterie in Nepal was irked by the goings-on. On 19 January, the second day of the conference, Chandra Shekhar, who was lodged at Kathmandu's plush Everest Hotel, faced an angry demonstration—said to have been organised by the government—of a few hundred loyalists, led by the leaders of the Kathmandu district panchayat. The agitationists handed over to the Dal leader a protest letter

The government whipped up a virulent campaign against the NC in the government-owned English daily, The Rising Nepal. For several consecutive days, the paper frontpaged denunciations of the NC by various loyalist groups which accused the party leaders of acting as stooges of a foreign power and railed against the Indian MPs for "interfering" in Nepal's internal affairs". The editor of the paper, K C. Bahadur, felt that the Indian leaders had offended Nepali sensibilities by equating the King with Hitler and Ceausescu and that this was unlikely to go down well with the people.

But Shekhar, who has been manoeuvred out of power and has been maintaining a low profile in India, has emerged a hero in the Himalayan kingdom. NC sources say that video recordings of his speech made by private professionals are selling like hot cakes in the Nepalese capital and are trickling to the districts.

The Kathmandu grapevine has it that the government would not have allowed the conference to be held had it not been for the presence of the Indian delegation. The leaders of the NC were themselves a trifle surprised by the government's unprecedented show of tolerence. They attribute this change of heart on its part to the fact that the rulers know they are sitting atop an active volcano.

The NC, led by the troika of veteran leaders such as Ganesh Man Singh, acting president K.P. Bhattarai and general secretary G.P. Koirala, is confident of carrying its struggle forward this time round, whereas earlier its programmes had either proved to be too conciliatory or had been countermined by the King.

Ganesh Man Singh told SUNDAY

VINAY BHARDWAJ-ACHARYA

Chandra Shekhar addressing the NC rally: speaking out

Most people in Nepal feel that the King is a unifying force but they want him to give up his powers and become a titular figurehead that his party has been inspired by the recent changes taking place across the world, but the initiatives to resuscitate the pro-democracy movement were taken much earlier. "I had an audience wih the King about 14 months back and I placed before him our very minimal demands. We have demanded fresh elections on a multi-party basis and the formation of an interim government to hold the elections. I also told the King that if we failed to restore full democracy in the country, all will be lost."

Few people in Nepal are against kingship as an institution. Even the most democratic people, including the members of the NC, say that the King is an unifying force and would like the monarchy to remain, but want the King to become a titular figurehead, leaving the governance of the country to the people's representatives.

Though the King tries to pass the present system, in which individuals are elected to the Rashtriya Panchayat (RS) as democratic but none in Nepal is ready to accept this. Of the 140 members in the RS, 112 are directly elected while the rest are nominated by the King himself. Moreover, there is what is called a Panchayat Policy Evaluation Committee (PPEC, which virtually dictates every aspect of the panchayat's policy and takes its orders from the King and, by extension, the royalty. The PPEC screens the candidates contesting for a seat in the RS and critics of the present system say that this automatically tilts the balance in favour of the royalty. It is mostly the yes-men who get elected and the RS merely serves as a rubber-stamp to ratify the diktats of the royalty as people's choice. No legislative or executive actions can be taken by the government without the sanction of the Palace and even routine decisions like bureaucratic promotions have to by endorsed by the King. And what makes the arrangement oppressive and draconian is that the crown or the royalty cannot be criticised.

However, there exists a body called the Commission of Probe into Abuse of Authority (CPAA) but sources reveal that an enquiry has never been initiated against any members of the royalty, who are steeped in corruption. "If in India you have had one Bofors, in Nepal we have kickbacks in every commercial transaction," laments a journalist, who has been in and out of jail several times for his no-hold-barred writings.

Not everyone in Kathmandu is as yet convinced of the NC's ability to make a dent in the present system, and are content with adopting a wait-and-see policy. But the leaders of the NC are hoping that the country's increasing bankrupty, rising unemployments, plummetting per capita income and all-pervasive corruption in the administration will help to rally the people behind them.

Though much of the kingdom's present economic hardships have been caused by India's refusal to renew trade and transit agreements in March 1989, (the matter has not been settled yet) people in Kathmandu are not prepared to lay the blame squarely on India's shoulders. This is a passing phase, they believe, and feel that the economic maladies have deeper roots.

According to Ganesh Man Singh, 30 years ago, only 15 per cent of the population were below the poverty line, but today the figure is 60 per cent. Nepal which once used to export grains has now become a grain-importing country. Its forests have been recklessly exploited to fill the royal coffers. Now the country stands on the brink of an ecological catastrophe. Moreover it is followed only by Ethiopia in the World Bank's list of poor nations.

The NC does not expect its movement to be a cakewalk. Ganesh Man Singh says there is every likelyhood of a crackdown before the satayagraha begins on 18 February, but he is confident that this time round his party activists are better prepared. Remarks a political observer, who prefers to remain incognito for safety's sake: "If the struggle for democracy fails yet again, terrorists will take over in future."

Quarters close to the Palace, however, say that the King is keen on meeting the challenge, politically. They have even hinted: the King might be ready to initiate a dialogue with the NC, if it sought a fresh referendum on the multi-party system. "We already have the verdict of the people on that score, and if the NC wants the multi-party system, it must seek the people's verdict again," say government insiders.

But, the NC is unlikely to change its demands, and with the political situation hotting up in Nepal, India may have thought it wise to follow a two-tier foreign policy. The participation of the Indian MPs at the NC conference may have caused some embarrassment to New Delhi's foreign office but the solidarity move at the party lavel is sure to pay off if the people were to get the better of the crown. ●

Anish Gupta/Kathmandu

THE TRIUMVIRATE

(Left to right) Singh, Bhattarai and Koirala: confident

Whether the participation of the Indian MPs will affect Indo-Nepalese relations is not very certain, but it was apparent that the rulers of Nepal were irked by the goings-on Nostalgia in Black & White, and Colour. That occasional flip through the family album Candid pictures of the little ones Captured in all their glory. Proud moments you'll cherish all your life It brings back a chain of events that kindle good old memories that will stay with you. Forever.

Keeping those moments fresh is Hindustan Photo Films. First with INDU Black & White Roll Film and Bromide Paper. And then, with Colour Negatives and Colour Paper. All manufactured to satisfy the uncompromising needs of professional and amateur photographers in the country

INDU films save the nation valuable foreign exchange, by cutting down imports Because this industry demands more in quality and quantity every day Photography today has become the cynosure of the publication and printing industry. A dedicated profession to thousands And a satisfying hobby for millions of amateur photographers.

The next time you take a trip down memory lane, remember

INDU

HINDUSTAN PHOTO FILMS

PHOTO
CINE
X-RAY GRAPHIC ARTS INDUSTRIAL X-RAY CHEMICALS MAGNETIC TAPE
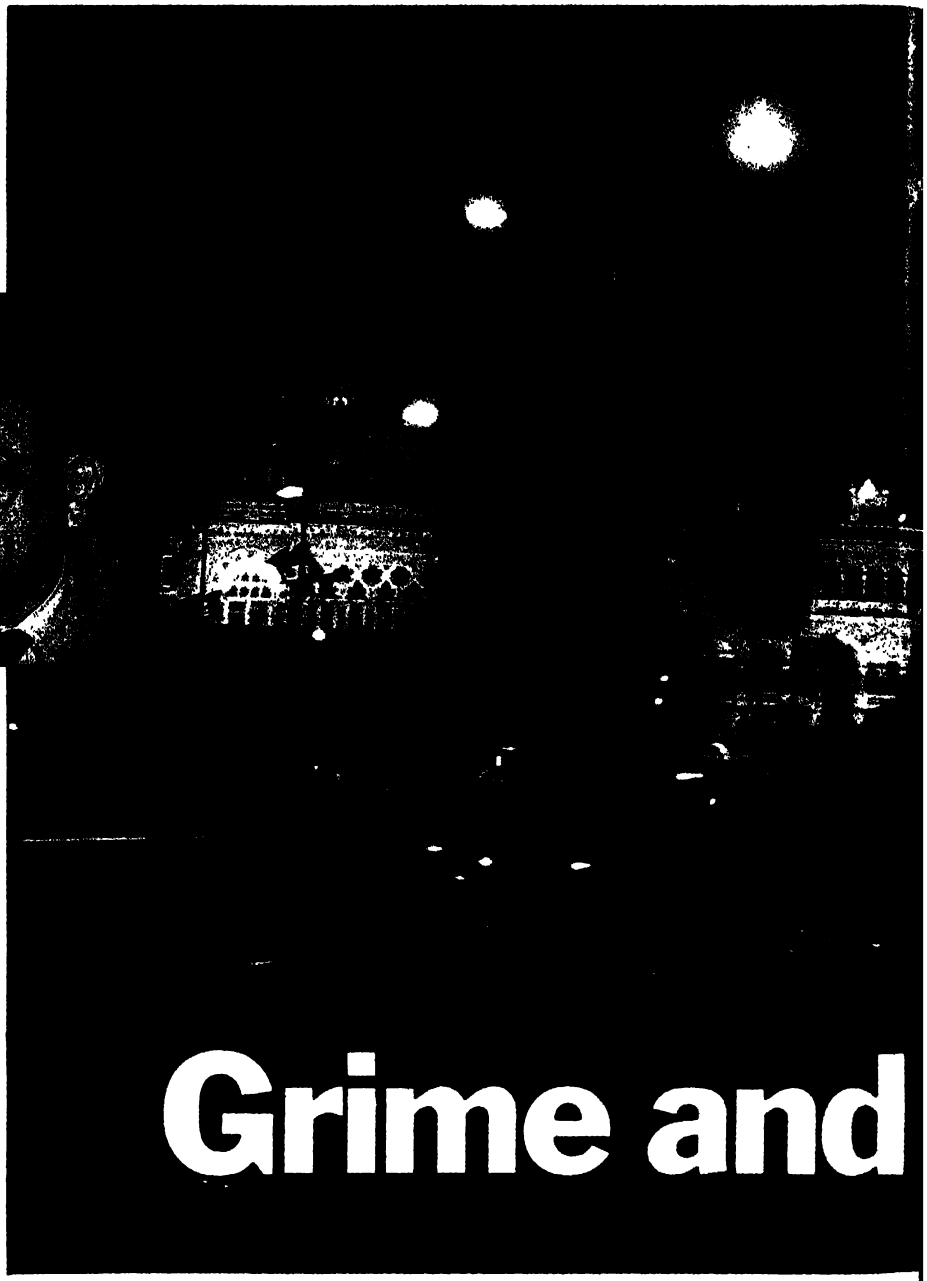
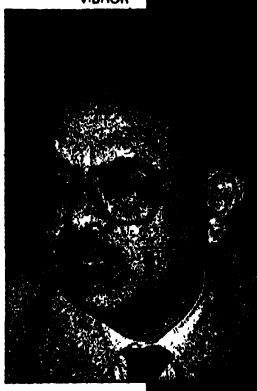
INSTANT PHOTOGRAPHY

मेरा भारत महान



F U T U R E I N F O C U S

Hindustan Photo Films Mfg. Co. Ltd. (A Govt. of India Enterprise)
Registered Office: Indunagar, Udhagamandalam 643 005
Marketing Headquarters: Bali Towers, 1 Abdul Razak Street, Saidapet, Madras 600 015.



R K SWAMY/HPF/7376

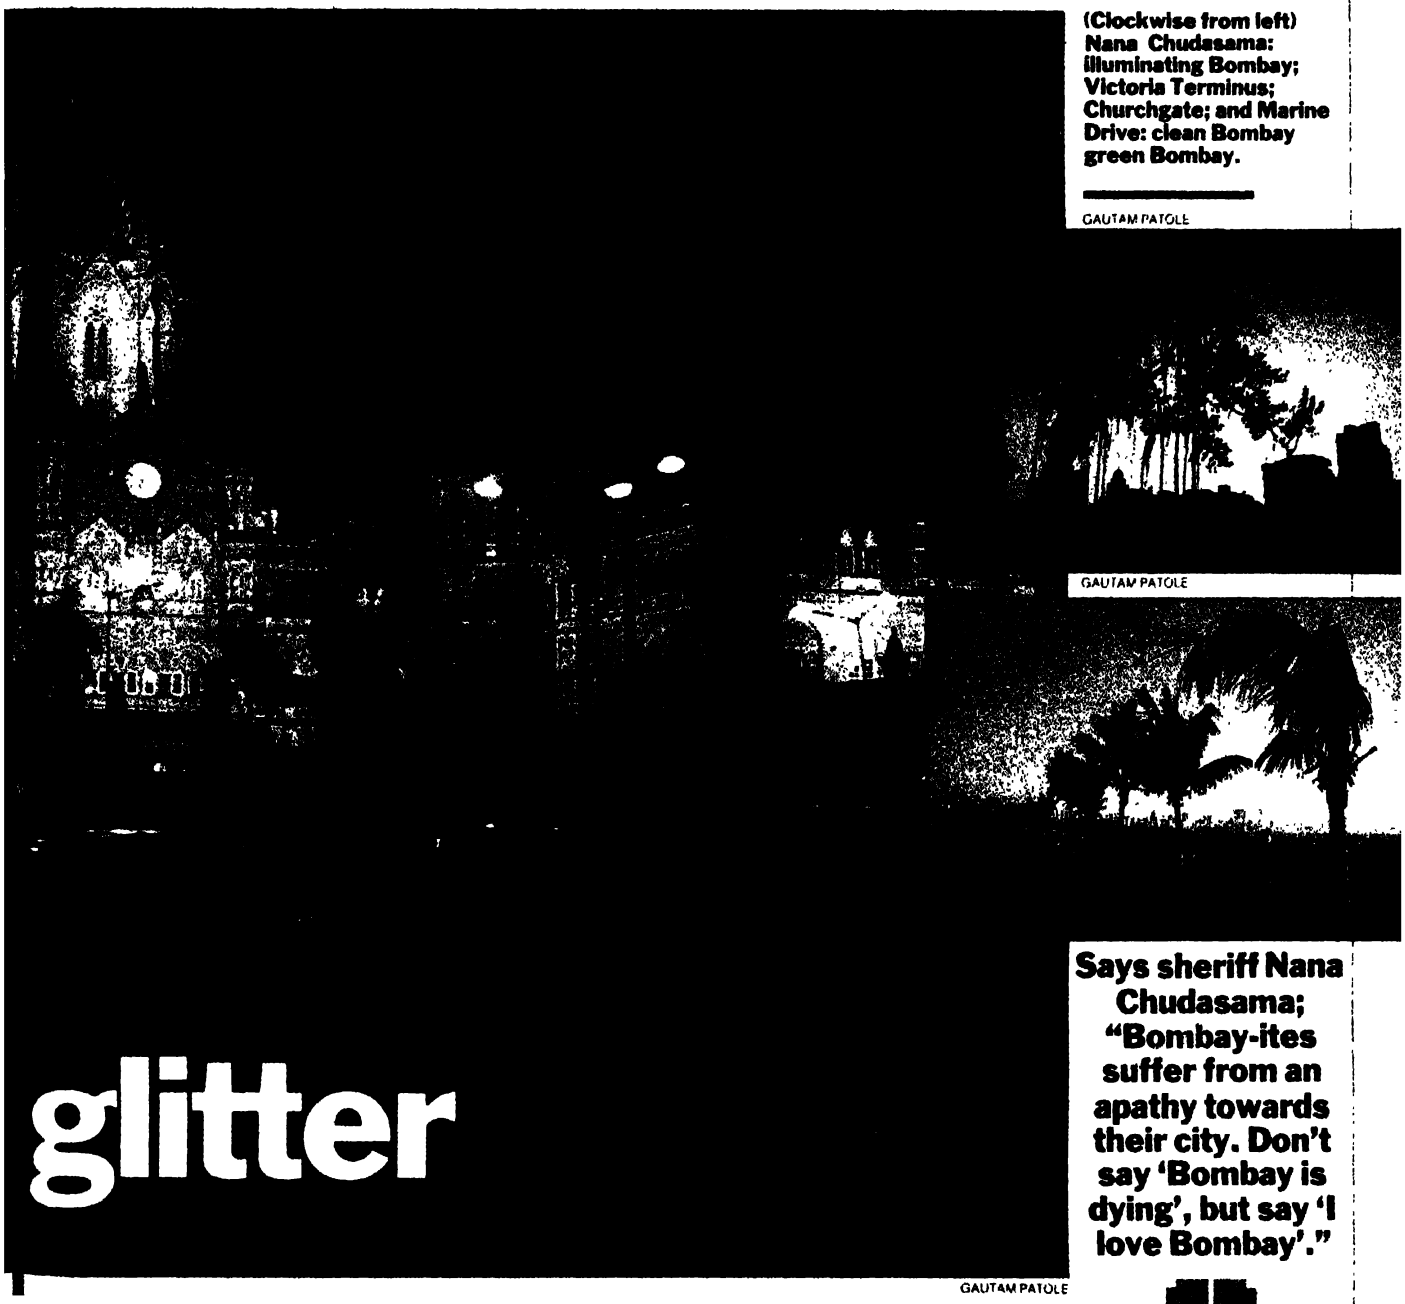
Grime and Businessmen and politicians team up to give Bombay a controversial facelift

VIBHOR



Bombay. Nana Chudasama, the city's sheriff and self-appointed do-gooder, wants to paint it white. Ex-mayor Manohar Joshi prefers green, in keeping with his much-trumpeted slogan "Clean Bombay, Green Bombay". And government officials, assorted businessmen and banks—in a sudden burst of civic awareness—are falling over each other to adopt traffic islands, set up road dividers, and light up historical monuments.

Last November, Chudasama and the Maharashtra Tourism Development Corporation (MTDC) hit upon the idea of illuminating the Rajabai Towers, a neo-Gothic monument attached to Bombay University. The MTDC is shelling out Rs 3 lakhs for initial installations, and the Housing Development and Finance Corporation is chipping in with Rs 70,000 a year for maintenance. Says Heta Pandit, an honorary secretary of the Indian Heritage Society's Bombay Chapter: "Lighting generates a lot of awareness among the citizens. People who would never have noticed certain facets of the building during the day, look at Rajabai Towers with new eyes when it's lit up in the evening." MTDC managing director D. Mehta talks about "illuminating" 30 historical monuments, including Bombay's Town Hall and the High Court building.

In January, the Bombay Municipal Corporation (BMC) unveiled plans for the proposed Veravali Gardens at Andheri, a North Bombay suburb, with a state government sanction of Rs 12 lakhs. The government has identified 13 such projects under its "Beautification of Bombay" programme, and has already sanctioned Rs 70 lakhs—with a promise of Rs 1.5 crores more—for the projects.

"Bombay-ites suffer from an apathy towards their city," says Chudasama. "I have been trying to awaken them, and my approach is a positive one. Don't say 'Bombay is dying' but say 'I love Bombay'." Chudasama took up the cause of planting saplings and transformed it into a crusade. Now, the sheriff is on to the whitewashing of any and every wall in residential compounds with a vengeance. Another Chudasama-inspired programme is to distribute plastic trashbags to slum dwellers to inculcate a sense of hygiene.

Good intentions, however, are usually not enough. For example, Chudasama has come in for flak for his ill-conceived programme of planting saplings (he claims to have distributed 70,000 of them) in the middle of a scorching summer. Says Kisan Mehta of the Save Bombay Committee: "In a city where 50 per cent of the population lives in slums, talk of beautifying it has no relevance unless you make an effort to provide the basic amenities. But creating pretty parks right next to a slum complex is (Clockwise from left) Nana Chudasama: illuminating Bombay; Victoria Terminus; Churchgate; and Marine Drive: clean Bombay green Bombay.

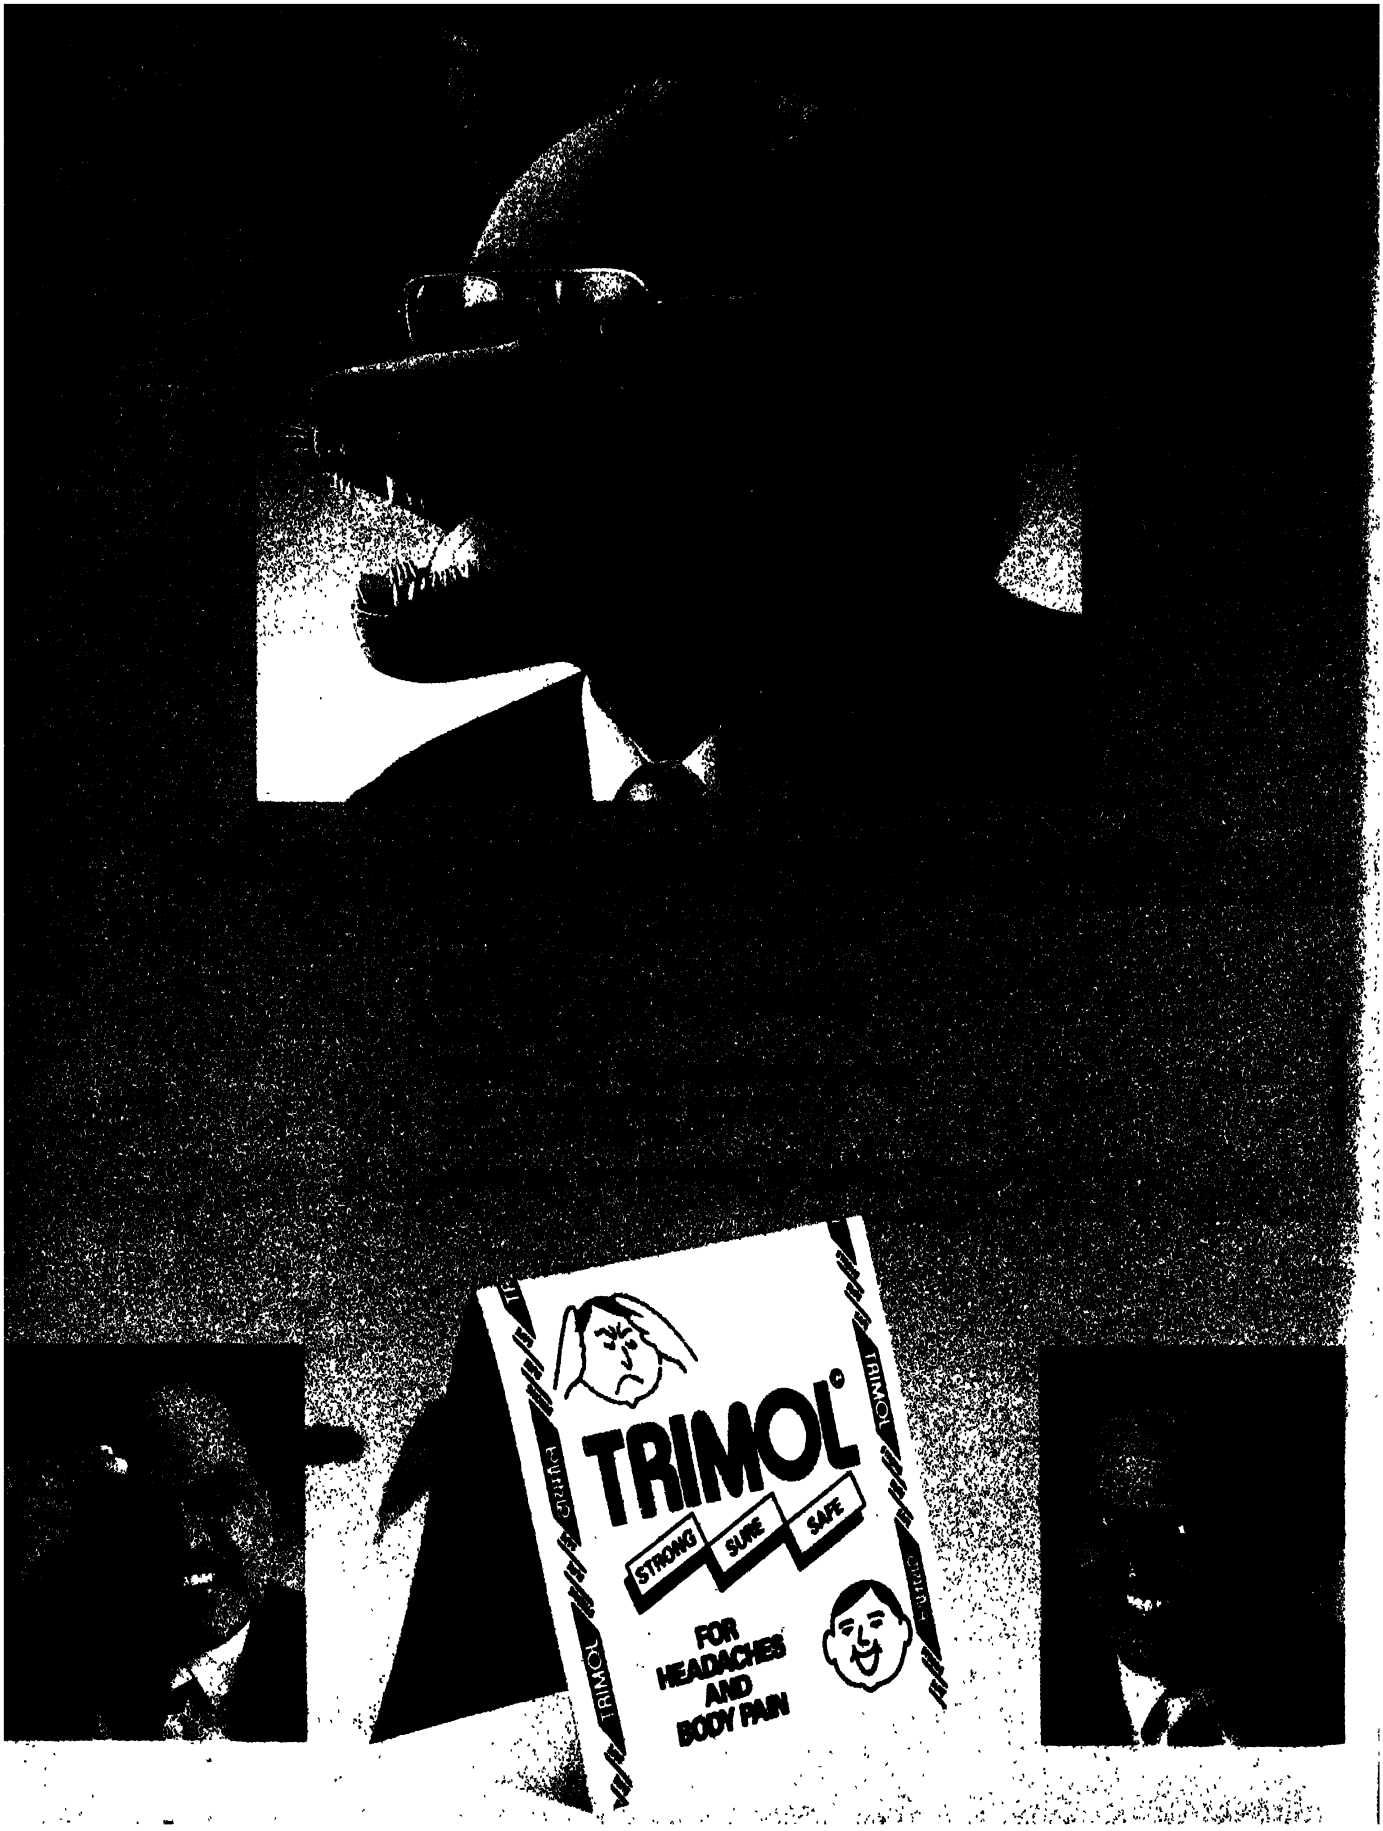
GAUTAM PATOLE

GAUTAM PATOLE

GAUTAM PATOLE



glitter

Says sheriff Nana Chudasama; "Bombay-ites suffer from an apathy towards their city. Don't say 'Bombay is dying', but say 'I love Bombay'."

neither aesthetic nor of any value." Mehta proposes that instead of big corporations spending lakhs on road dividers—which serve more as advertising space—they could adopt a slum and provide a more "sustainable" cleanliness programme. Says he: "The big businessmen are ignorant about what's good for the city. It's only their public image that they are worried about." Chudasama strikes back with a "What's wrong with getting a little mileage from it? If public image was their only concern, they would have gone in for advertising."

But deputy municipal commissioner Pravin Kamdar is not as enthusiastic as Chudasama. Says he: "Corporate sponsorship is most important in South Bombay where most of the offices are located. It's only natural that a party would be reluctant to take up a beautification project in the suburbs where it's most likely to go unnoticed." Nevertheless, Kamdar feels that corporate sponsorship is vital to beautification, as they have the resources. "Take for instance the Chowpatty beach, which was completely transformed after lights were provided," says Kamdar. "Now, the common man can enjoy his evenings at Chowpatty. It's a social service."

The Heritage Society, in an effort to create an awareness about the city, has instituted the Urban Heritage Awards Scheme—the first of its kind in the country. In the best-maintained public buildings category, Grindlays Bank's Fort branch won the gold award, the University's convocation

TRIMOL
STRONG
SURE
SAFE
FOR HEADACHES
AND BODY PAIN
TRIMOL
TRIMOL

hall the silver, and the Taj Mahal Hotel the bronze. The Mukand group is sponsoring a project to restore the BMC's conservatory. But at the same time, says Heta Pandit, misguided beautification can do more damage than help. For instance, the Muljee Jetha piao in Pydhonie was torn down and a new fountain set with ugly bathroom tiles came up to replace the one that was not working. Says Pandit: "The jewellers who had undertaken the project could have got the old fountain working, instead of tearing it down. By doing so, a part of the city's history has been lost." Adds a cynical Pandit: "The 'beautification of Bombay' is the most abused term today." Concurs Kisan Mehta: "Green Bombay means more trees and not just pretty shrubs. But then these projects are all propounded by a lobby that consists of influential people with money to burn, people who want to give the impression that they are doing something for society."

GAUTAM PATOLE

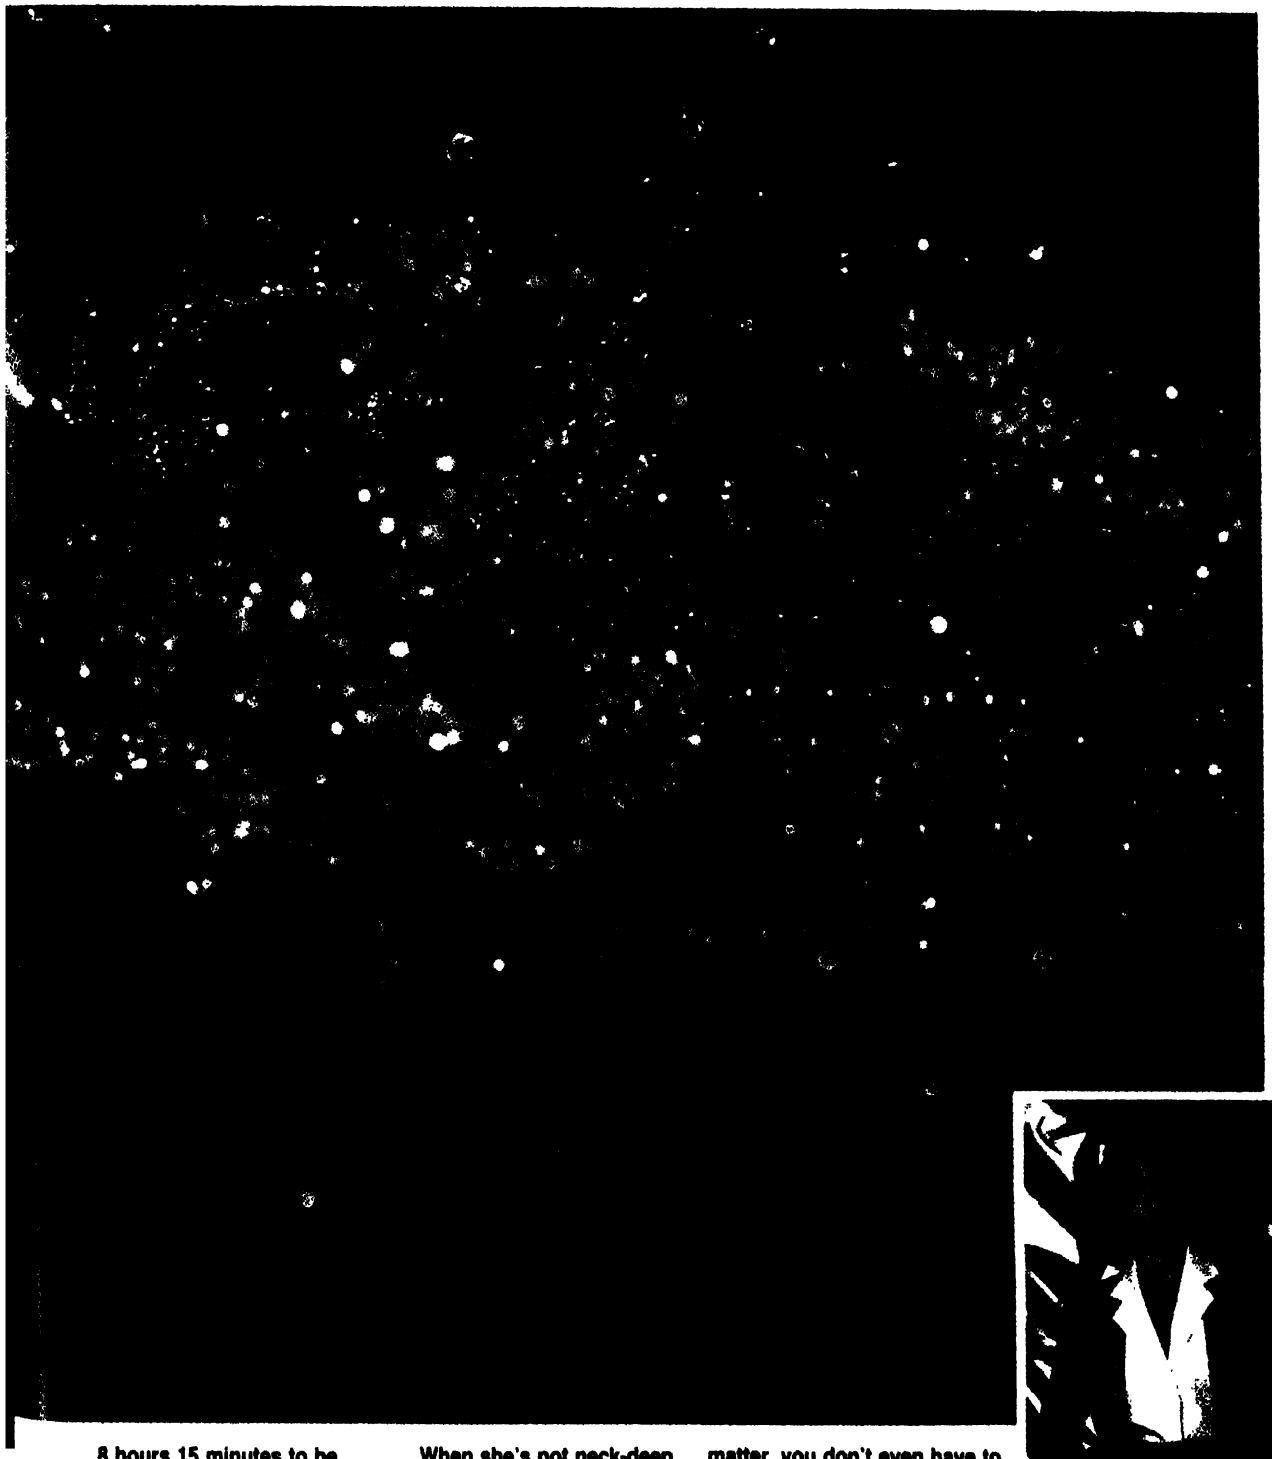
Rajabai Towers and (inset) Flora Fountain: part of the beautification plans

A scathing indictment and perhaps a little unfair. As Kamdar points out, one has to "view beautification in the context of the city's needs. Widening of roads will not have any value if there is a huge tree right in the centre. Just being a lover of trees is not enough, you have to take a realistic view in connection with the growth of the city." Chudasama, of course, has his usual way with rationalising: "I have always said that there are ten per cent people who work, ten per cent who watch, and the rest criticise."

And it is with similar disdain that the sheriff brushes aside all criticism about his project, which must surely rank among his most ambitious: a 200-feet high fountain right in the middle of the sea, across his sea-facing office at Marine Drive. Says Chudasama: "It will have laser electrification and the costing is being worked out by S.M. Dyechem, which has agreed to sponsor it. It's going to be the only project of its kind this side of Asia."

If Chudasama has his pet project, so does the state's urban development and environment minister, B.A. Desai.

The government has identified 13 'beautification' projects with a promise of Rs 1.5 crores for them



The minister is taking the credit for rescuing a 23-acre plot of reclaimed land from the clutches of real estate developers. So, instead of a cluster of multi-storied buildings, the plot has been turned into park—called Priyadarshini—with Rs 2.3 crores being pumped in to develop it. The plan envisages a synthetic athletics track, an artificial lagoon with facilities for boating, the works.

The cynics, of course, feel that it is just a ploy by the minister to keep the up-market residents of nearby Malabar Hill—who comprise his vote-bank—happy. But Desai protests that a good project is unnecessarily being politicised. But politicians do have a way with controversies. So do businessmen, especially these days. And their focus could well be the catch-phrase: "Beautify Bombay." ●

Adite Chatterjee/Bombay

You don't have to be the fastest Indian woman to swim the English Channel to be a Raymond's person.

8 hours 15 minutes to be precise. A new Asian record for man or woman, and the fifth fastest time in Channel history. For Anita Sood, this is par for the course. Her 22 mile swim from Capri to Napoli set a world record, high point of a brilliant career.

When she's not neck-deep in water, Anita may be seen making waves in a smart grey pant suit of sparkle polyester-and-wool, appropriately named "Sapphire".

You don't have to be a Raymond's man to be a Raymond's person. For that matter, you don't even have to be a Raymond's person.

... but it helps.

Raymond's

Never say no to life.

AUNTIE AZMI

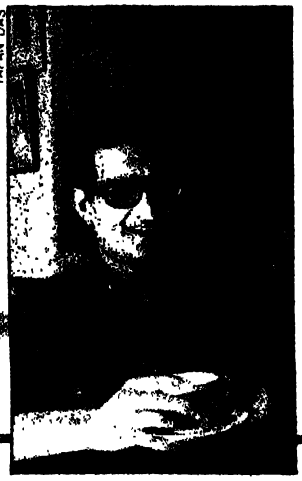
Film star by profession, hunger striker by choice, and now, chairman of the Children's Film Society by default: that's Shabana Azmi for you.

The resignation of Jaya Bachchan from the chairmanship last month brought the post back into the market, and there were reports that several film personalities were vying for it. But pavement demonstrations and outbursts against the Congress at the last international film festival paid off for activist Azmi. The National Front decided that she was "politically sound" and, therefore, the best bet for the job. Feelers were sent out to the actress, to be met with a positive response. And Azmi confirmed at the Calcutta film festival that she was open to the offer.

GAUTAM PATOLE

Shabana Azmi: rooting for Bugs Bunny

If Azmi does take up the job, "social realism" could well invade the realm of children's cinema as well. And nearly all indigenous cartoon strips will have Bugs Bunny as the leading character.



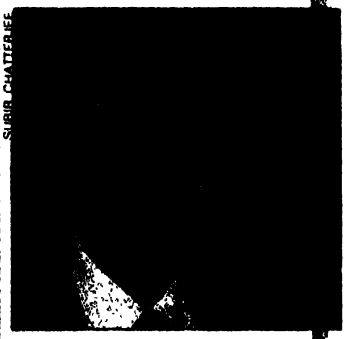
AWARDED

While still at Presidency College, Calcutta, a student of economics and philosophy, Amartya Sen occasionally came up with questions that left his professors stumped. It was obvious, they say now, that the young boy had the makings of a world-class economist.

The promise came true. And stints at Jadavpur University and the Delhi School of Economics were followed by teaching assignments at Cambridge, Berkeley, Stanford and Oxford.

The acme of his teaching career came when Sen was appointed dual professor of economics and philosophy at Harvard—the only other man to achieve this honour was Adam Smith: a good 200 years before.

Amartya Sen: not the last such honour, surely



TAPAN DAS

His reputation as an economist grew alongside, with Sen being considered an expert in socialist economics. His study of democratic values also assumed importance with the recent events in Eastern Europe proving right his belief that socialist government couldn't survive without democratic values.

Sen's contribution to the humanities has now been awarded: with the Senator Giovanni Agnelli Institute Award for Ethics. And it won't be the last such honour, by any means.

RAJA AND RAJA

[redacted] We'd thought, at first, that this was going to be a government of bureaucrats. But the V.P. Singh regime seems to be turning into a sarkar of technocrats instead. First, it was Dr M.G.K. Menon who was inducted as minister of state for science and technology. Now it's Dr Raja Ramanna's turn. The former chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission and scientific adviser to the ministry of defence was brought back into government: as the minister of state for defence.

SUBIR CHATTERJEE

Dr Raja Ramanna: the latest technocrat in government

The Prime Minister, for one, had no doubts that the appointment would serve the government well. "Obviously," said V.P. Singh, "he will be an asset."

And would the trend of inducting professionals into government prevail? "I believe in the philosophy of national consensus and people from a much broader section must be involved," said the Raja.

So, what's wrong with Sam Pitroda?

ON TO CANNES

The battle over the relevance of international film festivals may still rage, with no resolution in sight. But the Indian Panorama section, agree filmmakers, has its uses.

Buddhadev Dasgupta is bound to agree. After all, it was the viewing in the Panorama section of the recently concluded film festival in Calcutta, which got his film, Bagh Bahadur, in the running for the main section at the Cannes Film Festival, 1990. The movie comprises such exotica as is most popular in the West. The storyline: Ghunuram (Pavan Malhotra) is a tiger dancer without compare in a small village in Orissa. The commercial viability of his art is, however, threatened by the arrival of a circus troupe from the big city, which lures the villagers away from Ghunuram with its gimmickry and glamour.

Dasgupta uses this story idea to explore the psyche of an artist caught in the flux of time, who has to make a choice between his old vocation and the new alternatives before him.

RASHBEHARI DAS

Buddhadev Dasgupta on the sets of Bagh Bahadur: chosen from among the best

BACK FROM THE US OF A

He'd listed his profession as "writer" in his passport. And after that all-too-brief sojourn in Washington D.C. as the Indian Ambassador to the United States of America, Dr Karan Singh is back at work on his desk.

Only this time, it's not the Poetic Muse that has possessed him. Having submitted his resignation as the Indian envoy to the external affairs minister I.K. Gujral, Singh is all set to begin work on the memoirs of his time in the States.

The book should be ready by the end of this year. And keeping Singh's passion for American rock in mind, it will probably be called Back From The US Of A.

NITIN RAI

CHIPKO CHIPKO

In the old days if the original Indian pop star, Asha Puthli had crooned "Chipko, chipko" it would have been interpreted as the come-on. Now, everyone knows that the recently-converted Green is only championing Sunderlal Bahuguna's cause. For, the flashy singer (who's better known for other things) whom the lure of greenbacks took away to Manhattan is back in town, to promote the concept of a "green India", with an album called, appropriately enough, Chipko Chipko.

Asha Puthli: back with a vengeance

There's more to the new Puthli than praise of Bahuguna. One of her new numbers has the singer going all hysterical over the "frauds committed by Chandra Swami", while the sentimental-romantic treatment is reserved for Rail Travel In India.

If the new album succeeds, Alisha may be the next one turning green. ●

अहर्निशं सेवामहे

'Day and night will I serve.'

Leaving nothing undone to make the guest's stay an unforgettable joy and pleasure.

This is the true essence of India's timeless culture.

The tradition that manifests itself in a myriad colourful rituals and ceremonies.

Like offering auspicious leaves and flowers.

And giving the best in the house to our welcome atithi mitra or 'guest friends'.

To let them know how honoured we are to please them.

The 'guest friends', today, come by planes, trains, tourist buses and coaches.

To discover India's countless wonders.

And to bless us with a tourism industry that provides direct and indirect employment to more than 13 million people.

Plus incalculable goodwill and friendship.

Friendship First!

That's it. The real meaning of tourism.

And that's what we must make it mean, whenever we see or meet tourists.

Specially if they need help of any kind.

Let's make them feel so good they'll want to come back again.

God bless them!

Tourism is Friendship First

India. Destination of the 90s.

पर्यटन विभाग भारत सरकार Department of Tourism Government of India

HTA 6619

Playing on

Nataka Karnataka Rangayana, the third Indian theatre repertory, is alive and well

The light certainly seems to be fading out from the Indian stage. With television casting its shadow over cinema and theatre and the Eightjes witnessing the exodus of actors, actresses and directors from the stage to the small screen, there seems to be little hope for Indian theatre. But Karnataka is among the few states holding out against this trend, with the state-sponsored Nataka Karnataka Rangayana, the third Indian theatre repertory which celebrated its first anniversary in Mysore on 14 January, 1990.

SHIVARUDRAIAH

A Rangayana production: using folk ideas to add charm

The first anniversary performance by the Nataka Karnataka Rangayana was received with enthusiasm, proving that theatre was alive in the state

The repertory, which was constituted in the face of overwhelming scepticism, had reason to be excited: the audience reacted with great enthusiasm to the anniversary performances by the trainees. It was obvious that the first year trainees, who performed "exercise productions" of Jnanpith awardee K.V. Puttappa's Kindara Jogi in December 89, had a hit on their hands. Even before the official anniversary celebrations on 14 January the play had been performed 15 times in the outdoor 'Vanaranga' behind the Kalamandir complex of the repertory.

The chief of the repertory B.V. Karanth appeared to be surprised, and even a little frightened, with the success. He told SUNDAY: "I was not willing to expose the students so early. They have three years to go before they can become full fledged performers. With success will come complacency and they will stop learning." Rangayana's deputy director (art) Jayatheertha Joshi: shared Karanth's apprehension. But says Joshi "How do you expect us or them (the students) to hold ourselves back? We had to do something, show something.".

The staging of Kindara Jogi (an Indianised version of the Pied Piper Of Hamilyn) and Govina Kathe (A Cow's Story) was actually meant to be in the nature of a practical annual examination for the trainees, with no tickets charged. To avoid any danger of creating a 'mini-star system' among the 24 trainees, the lead roles are being played by different performers on a 'pick-your-draw' basis. As Karanth explains: "This will also make every show fresh and different. They have to rehearse afresh with every different casting." The experimental nature of the performances has not, however, dampened audience response."Ideally we would prefer to have a total audience of 200 for a show," says Karanth. But the 'Vanaranga' packs at least 500 for every show and some members in the audience—who have obviously seen the play several times—sing their favourite tunes along with the cast.

Kindara Jogi seeks to combine almost all elements of Indian theatre. The 24-member cast uses masks to play such stereotyped characters as the village landlord, the teacher, the Brahmin and the rampaging rats (of the Pied Piper story) The music is live: sung and played by the 'Mela' and the colourful costumes and stylised forms make it the ideal children's play.

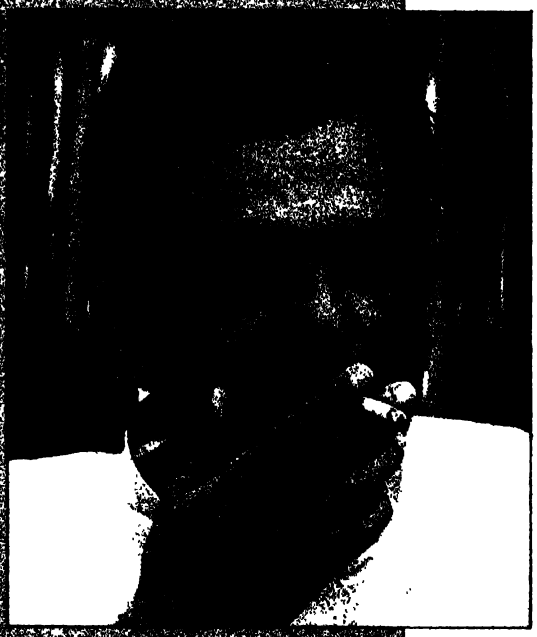
Rangayana was started last year, after two or three years of discussion. The former chief minister Ramakrishna Hegde, an avid theatre-goer promised to support a full-fledged repertory if B.V. Karanth was willing to run it. After the theatre pioneer was finally persuaded to take charge, candidates were selected from all over the state. Mysore, 140 kms from Bangalore, was decided as the location. Only 24 out of 400 candidates were selected after three interviews.

The participants would have to undergo three years of training before being considered artistes. After five years of its existence the repertory will commence touring all over the state and become fully functional. It is to be funded by the state government entirely during this period, (Rs 15 lakhs a year), but the repertory hopes to meet the production expenses from gate collections in the sixth year. The government will, however, continue to pay salaries to the employees of the repertory. At present, trainees get a stipend of Rs 800 per month, with an increase of Rs 100 every year. Their salaries double when they become artistes, after three years.

The repertory is well provided: with a students' hostel, a documentation centre for music and video studies, a library, indoor and outdoor auditoriums and production facilities. A visiting British theatre expert last month reportedly observed: "This is a godsend. We cannot dream of this kind of government support in the U.K." The ten teachers of the repertory, including four National School of Drama (NSD) graduates, are hopeful—for the first time in years—that there will be a regeneration of Kannada theatre.

SHIVARUDRAIAH

B.V. Karanth: creative genius behind the effort



SHIVARUDRAIAH

Scene from Kindara Jogi being performed by the repertoire members

Karnataka is unique in the enthusiasm of its amateur theatre. The state can boast of a strong folk theatre—the hugely popular Yakshagana, for instance

It was former NSD director Ebrahim Alkazi who first mooted the idea of repertories. But the man who implemented it was B.V. Karanth. The NSD repertory, which toured the country, under Karanth with three plays in the early Eighties created a minor sensation. It was Karanth again who, under the patronage of bureaucrat Ashok Vajpayee, started the 'Rangamandal' repertory in Bhopal, Madhya Pradesh. The great maverick has now come home to start the third Indian theatre repertory in Karnataka where he first came into prominence in the Seventies with the spectacular productions of plays like P.Lankesh's 'Sankranti', Dr. Chandrashekar Kambar's 'Jokumaraswamy', Girish Karnad's 'Hayavadhana' and J.B. Joshi's 'Sattavara Neralu'.

And Karnataka is ready for Karanth's repertory stock. The state has at least 30 NSD graduates in residence—Karanth himself is from the 1964 batch. And if ever a state needed a repertory it was Karnataka. The 'Ninasam Tirugata' of Heggodu, Shimoga district, is already running a nationally famous seasonal repertory. In the last three years two other touring companies 'Chinna Banna' and 'Srushti' are performing in Malnad districts of the state. As Karanth says: "We have been helped a lot by K.V. Subbanna's Ninasam Group.

B.V. Karanth has now come home to Karnataka, where he first came into prominence in the Seventies, to implement the idea of repertories Their's is really the first repertory venture in the state." But Ninasam survived mainly on the enterprise of its founder K.V. Subbanna and fell short of becoming a full-fledged repertory due to inevitable financial constraints. It is not surprising, therefore, that 40 per cent of Rangayana trainees are formerly of Ninasam.

Rangayana is not striving for proficiency but excellence. Says Joshi: "Our roots are still in amateur theatre. Karnataka is unique in the enthusiasm of its amateur theatre. We still get that creative madness and resolute courage from our amateur theatre." The state can also boast of a strong folk theatre with the hugely popular 'Yakshagana' in the coastal districts. In the professional theatre field there are at least eight companies. The Nataka Karnataka Rangayana wants to eventually branch out into the four zones of Karnataka, each with its own dialect of the Kannada language.

The theatre enthusiasts of the country are avidly watching Karanth's efforts in Karnataka. At the recent theatre retrospective in New Delhi, says Joshi, "There were so many question from delegates about our repertory. Even scepticism." But Joshi is confident: "In the Sixties and Seventies Karnataka gave the country a whole breed of great playwrights. In the Nineties we will give a whole new breed of playwrights."●

Prakash Belawadi/Bangalore

Fair deal

The Bishnupur Mela comes of age

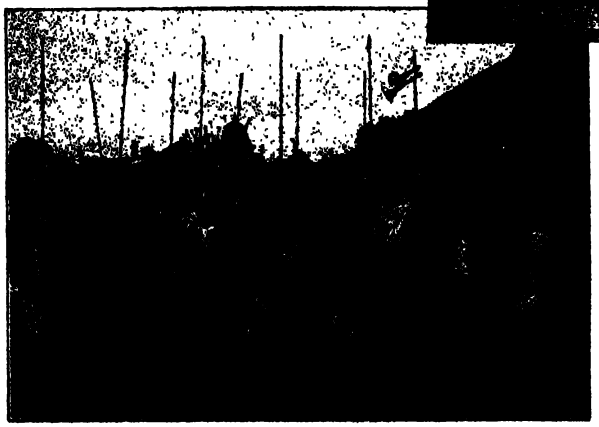
The Tourism Department of West Bengal organised a festival and nobody came. Except for the handful of art aficionados from Calcutta and the local populace who landed up at the Bishnupur Mela, 1988 for a spot of fun, that is.



In 1989, the story was very different. The response to the fair, organised jointly by the Bankura district authorities and the tourism department of West Bengal, with the Eastern Zone Cultural Centre providing the entertainment component, was "tremendous both from participants and tourists". Such was the rush to this rural retreat that state tourist officials had to turn away a number of craftsmen due to the unavailability of stalls. And not all the coachloads of people who landed up at the fair site could be accommodated.

Says Jayanta Sanyal, secretary, department of tourism, West Bengal: "We wanted to provide a venue for local craftsmen to display their wares and provide an opportunity to visitors to the fair to get a flavour of the rich cultural traditions of the area." To an extent that desire was fulfilled: over 100 craftsmen were provided with stalls and the visitors to the mela were treated to a rare glimpse of Bengal's craftsmanship and culture.

The mela presented a varied fare: Bankura burnt clay pottery, the famous Bankura horses, silk Baluchari saris, with themes from the Ramayana, Mahabharata and the Krishna Leela woven into their fabric, scrolls or patuas, and the work of dhokra and sanbha (conch shell) workers.

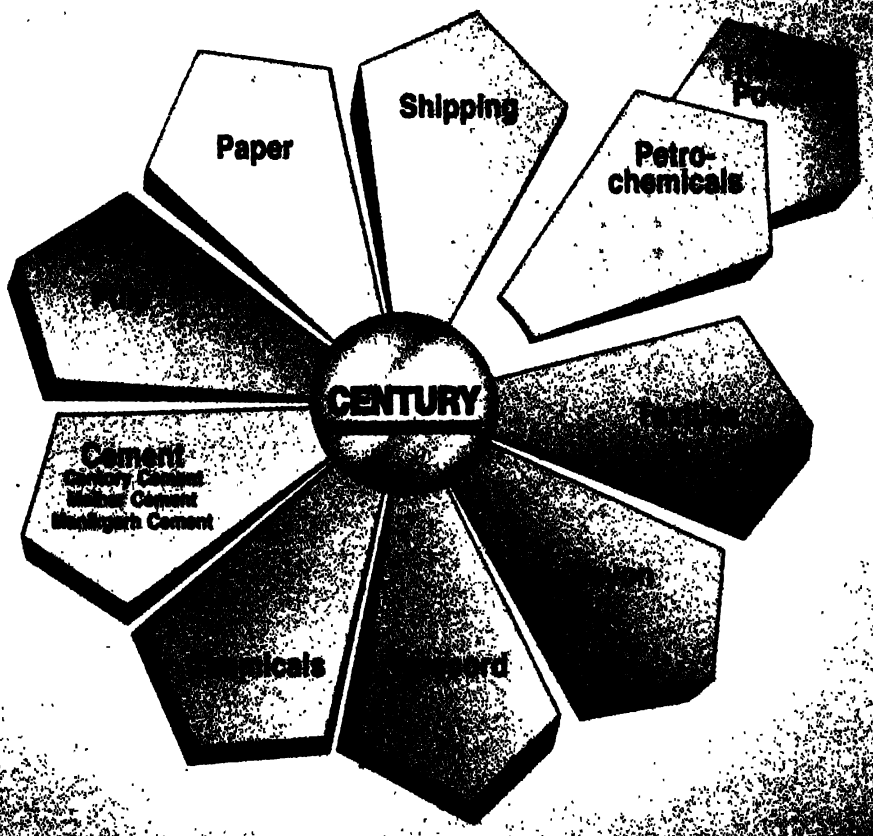
What attracted the greatest attention was the Naksha Tash, or hand painted cards. Legend has it that a Malla (the dynasty that founded Bishnupur) king once paid a visit to the Mughal court and was very taken with the cards, circular and brightly painted, which Akbar played with. He imported these Naksha card makers into Bishnupur, and the art took root here as well. Today there are only two proponents of this art form—the Faujdar brothers—who sold their sets of 120 cards at Rs 350 a pack at the mela.

(Right) View of a craftsman's workshop: good business; (below) local artistes and craftsmen at the mela: rich cultural traditions

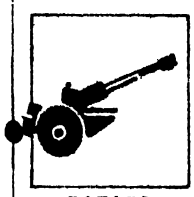
The response to the fair was heartening: most of the things on display were sold out. Says a spokesman of the Bankura Dhokra Shilpa Samabhay Samiti: "We brought very few pieces last time thinking that we would not be able to sell. But by the end of the mela we had very few pieces left. This year we have sold goods worth over Rs 4,000."



The Baluchari weavers of Bishnupur had a particularly good deal: they sold at practically their own doorstep, thus ensuring that the profits were much larger than usual. (A Baluchari sari costs anything between Rs 800 to Rs 2000—or more.) Also direct sales meant that the weavers didn't have to rely on government agencies to pick their stock at the arbitrary rates they fix.

Next year will see the Bishnupur Mela assuming even more interesting dimensions, with the proposal to get the tourism department of the Government of India involved gaining strength. Plans are also afoot to set up a Bishnupur Fair authority to ensure that standards are not compromised and new artistes and craftsmen are encouraged to come forward. Not only will this invigorate the economy of the Bankura district but also provide an impetus to local tourism.

The potential is enormous. But its realisation depends on how well the state government mobilises its resources. And, on whether the curiosity the annual Bishnupur Mela aroused this time round will hold year after year.



Debjani Sinha/Bishnupur

One of India's most progressive companies is also the most diversified

The CBI lodges an FIR, accusing 14 persons in the Bofors kickback controversy

A salvo too late?

BOFORS

It was a long-awaited move. On 22 January, the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) registered a First Information Report (FIR) relating to the Bofors deal. The National Front government had first promised to reveal the names of the beneficiaries of the commissions within 30 days of coming to power. That rash promise had not been kept and there were fears that the regime was backtracking on its commitment to get to the bottom of the scandal.

The FIR set those fears at rest. Not only did it demonstrate the government's sincerity, but because it minced no words and named names, indicated that nobody could expect special consideration from this regime. Fourteen individuals were accused of illegality in the FIR, but only three were named: Martin Ardbo, the former managing director of Bofors, Win Chadha, the head of Anatronic General Corporation, a 'consultant' to Bofors in India, and Gopichand P. Hinduja, the controversial London-based non-resident Sindhi (NRS) who plays a starring role in the Ardbo diaries. Eleven others are referred to as directors and beneficiaries of the various companies that received the kickbacks.

The Bofore gun; (above) Rajendra Shekhar (left) addressing a press conference: hopeful

In a sense, the FIR has little effective force. Martin Ardbo is hardly likely to present himself before a New Delhi magistrate and the 11 unnamed conspirators can hardly be apprehended if the CBI is not aware of their identities.

But in another sense, the FIR is a crucial first step towards unravelling the Bofors tangle. The National Front government believes that a close examination of the Bofors files will only yield evidence of a cover-up, not proof of the identity of the recipients.

Therefore, its investigations must be conducted outside the country: in Sweden where Bofors is headquartered and in Switzerland where the pay-offs were stashed away in numbered accounts. For any enquiry to be successful, both the Swedish and the Swiss governments must cooperate. So far, both have refused to help. The Swedish authorities have taken the line that they cannot intervene in a commercial dispute between Bofors and India while the Swiss have pleaded that their bank secrecy laws make it impossible for them to cooperate

The CBI hopes that with the filing of the FIR, both governments will change their attitude. The Swedes have consistently refused to reopen the Bofors deal but now they will be asked to assist in a criminal investigation. As for the Swiss, they told the Rajiv Gandhi regime that they would not cooperate in the preliminary investigation because the Indian government had said that it was only investigating charges of tax evasion against Win Chadha and, according to the Swiss, failure to pay income-tax does not count as a major crime.

The NF government believes that a scrutiny of the Bofors files will only yield evidence of a cover-up, not proof of the identity of the recipients

PRAKESH SAHAI

Win Chadha: named in the FIR

The FIR, however, refers to other crimes. These include:

- Criminal conspiracy
- Corruption
- Abuse of official position by public servants to gain pecuniary advantage
- Cheating
- Criminal breach of trust
- Forgery

Says the CBI's new director, Rajendra Shekhar, "Now that the principle of dual criminality has been established, we are hopeful of getting all the necessary cooperation from all other governments."

The CBI hopes that Bofors will now be forced by the Swedish government to reveal the names of the agents and that the Swiss will waive bank secrecy laws to reveal who the beneficiaries of the Svenska, Pitco/Moresco and AE Services accounts are.

This may or may not happen but the way ahead is not as clear as Shekhar appears to believe. Whatever one's moral views on the subject, it is not a crime in any country of the world for G.P. Hinduja to accept a commission from Bofors. (If he was an Indian resident—which he is not—and accepted the commission without informing the Reserve Bank, then he would be in violation of FERA: for non-disclosure, not for being an agent.) The CBI has, therefore, put the cart before the horse and argued that these commissions were used to bribe officials and to then conspire to prevent the truth from emerging. The charges may be valid but they relate to activities that occurred in India—not in Switzerland.

The Swiss may use this as an excuse for not cooperating (though the government is confident that they will not) arguing that there are no parallels with the case of Ferdinand Marcos. In that instance, the charge was that Marcos had accepted bribes and deposited them in Switzerland; so the Swiss agreed to open up his account. They may also claim that while they have cooperated with the American FBI in opening up the accounts of mafia figures, there is no evidence that the Hindujas or the Chadhas are criminals.

Nevertheless, nearly everybody agreed that after three years of deliberate cover-up, the Indian government was finally serious about investigating Bofors. Only, was it too late? ●

Vir Sanghvi

The last of Bhindranwale's closest aides, Harminder Singh Sandhu, is murdered

A militant's death

PUNJAB

"The Falcon" is dead. And Punjab will never see another militant like him. He was a brilliant mind, academically accomplished, well-read, astute, and, some say, too clever by half. He wanted to be too many things at the same time. He was an alleged "double-agent" who worked both for the extremists and the Research and Analysis Wing (RAW), and an ambitious politician who rode the bogey of 'Khalistan' till his last day.

At 33, Harminder Singh Sandhu, was perhaps the most articulate person in the ranks of the militant Sikh movement in Punjab. But he could never resist the impulse to live dangerously. From his rise as a Naxalite leader—who mysteriously escaped being killed in a police encounter because he is said to have been "recruited" to work for intelligence—in the late Seventies, when Prakash Singh Badal was chief minister, to his emergence from detention and declared avowal of the path of 'Khalistan', Sandhu lived with challenges. In his last days, he tried his best to outdo Simranjit Singh Mann and emerge as the chief architect of 'Khalistan'. He came up with a proposal to set up khalsa panchayats from 26 January, 1990, with the aim of setting up a parallel administration in the state. He had also announced a boycott of the Republic Day celebrations.

Sandhu had surrendered to security forces during Operation Bluestar in June 1984, spent three and a half years in a high-security prison, and was released last month on the orders of the then Punjab Governor S.S. Ray. Soon after his release, he called a press conference and declared that there was no alternative to 'Khalistan'. The then Punjab Governor, S.S. Ray, immediately got in touch with the V.P. Singh government to seek its permission to rearrest him. The central government would have nothing to do with it, because the decision to release Sandhu was the Governor's own "administrative matter". The former PM Rajiv Gandhi protested against this attitude of the new government during the debate on the confidence motion in the Lok Sabha, and made out that it was "acquiescing in terrorism".

Sandhu's assailants said they came from Canada. They had visited his house two days ago and gone away because he wasn't in. At around 7 am on 24 January, a youth in a jacket visited Sandhu's Court Road residence, and told his cousin Gurmit that he had come from Canada and wanted to see the leader. He said he was Satinder Singh. Moments later, he was with Sandhu. They were joined by a second visitor. While they were talking, the telephone rang. The caller said he was speaking from Canada. As soon as Sandhu began his conversation on the line, the second visitor got up, whipped out a revolver and emptied four shots into Sandhu's head from point-blank range. Rumours were rife that Sandhu was killed by Paramjit Singh Panjwar, the new KCF chief, and cousin of Gen Labh Singh alias Sukha Sipahi.

Four extremist outfits claimed responsibility for his murder. They are the Khalistan Commando Force (KCF), the Khalistan Liberation Force (KLF), Babbar Khalsa and the Daljit Singh Bittoo faction of the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF). The four organisations sent a joint press note to the Punjabi daily, Ajit, saying they were behind the killing. The note was signed by eight persons, "Gen" Paramjit Singh Panjwar, "Lt Gen" Gurnam Singh of Sultanmind (both of the KCF), KLO chief Bhai Gurjant Singh of Budhisinghwala, and Bhai Takhat Singh, Bhai Sukhdev Singh and Bhai Wadhwa Singh of Babbar Khalsa and Daljit Singh Bittoo of the breakaway AISSF faction. In the note, they also said that they were responsible for the murder of another AISSF leader, Sukhwant Singh Akanwali, who also belonged to the Manjit Singh faction of which Sandhu was the general secretary.

The statement denounced Sandhu and Akanwali as "traitors to the Sikh cause". It equated them with "Raja Dhian Singh Dogra, Prime Minister of Maharaja Ranjit Singh" for their "foxy moves". Sandhu and Akanwali were accused of trying to grab "the chair" and cash in on the sacrifices of the true fighters for 'Khalistan'. "We warn the leaders of the Sikh world," the note said, "that either they should fight sincerely for 'Khalistan' or sit quietly at home". Official circles see the hand of the Bittoo group behind the killing. Since the note held out a threat to other Sikh leaders, too, security for S S. Mann was tightened.

PARAM VEER

The body of Sandhu surrounded by his relatives: brutal murder

Sandhu was a Masters' degree holder in English and History. He stood first class first in the MA (History) examination, appearing from jail, and had registered himself for a Ph D. He was once a rabid Marxist who flouted the tenets of Sikhism and later joined the AISSF in 1978, after the Akali-Nirankari clash, and became Bhindranwale's foremost intellectual guide. But his detractors found it curious that he should have surrendered after Operation Bluestar, when all other major leaders were killed. Sandhu was general secretary of the AISSF for the longest-ever stint of seven years. Members of his family had come to associate a jinx with him. He was married for the first time on 6 May, 1984. The ceremony was performed by Bhindranwale himself, within the precincts of the Golden Temple. His wife Paramjit Kaur was killed during Operation Bluestar. On 17 January, 1990, he married Paramjit's younger sister Kulwinder Kaur. But he died six days later.

Whether Sandhu was a government agent or not, he remained a hero of a misguided section of Sikh youth

The rank and file of the AISSF is extremely upset about Sandhu's murder. The air at his funeral was tense. Most of the 1,000 activists who gathered to pay homage to their leader in the compound of the Shaheedganj gurdwara on 25 January looked too shocked for words. There were no pro-Khalistan slogans. The funeral pyre was lit by Baba Thakur Singh, head of the Damdami Taksal, amidst the chanting of the religious slogan Bole so Nihal, Sat Sri Akal. Among those who looked on were Sandhu's relatives and leaders of other Sikh organisations. The antim ardas (final prayer) was performed by Jasbir Singh Rode, who is still recognised by the Mann group as the chief of the Akal Takht. AISSF activists openly swore to avenge Sandhu's death on Daljit Singh Bittoo, whom they described as a frustrated element.

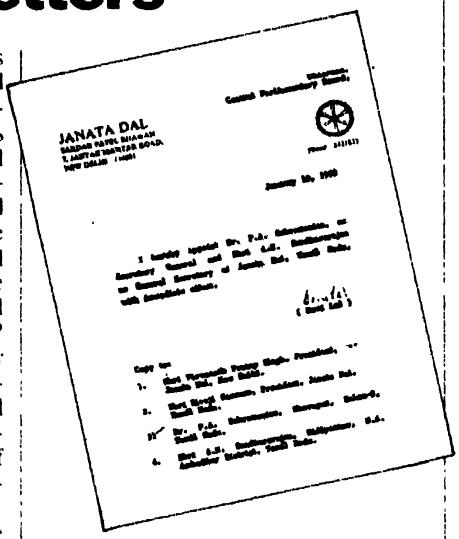
Whether Sandhu was a government agent or not, he remained a hero of a misguided section of Sikh youth. His death has come as a blow to the movement for 'Khalistan', and deepened the militant groups' mistrust of each other. It is a deterrent to all those Sikh politicians who claim to be "close to the militants", and hope to gain from it. •

Nirmal Mitra/New Delhi

Did Devi Lal appoint two Dal office-bearers without informing the state party unit?

Mysterious letters

TAMIL NADU



The Jat supremo has done it again. And even before the Janata Dal could get its act together in Tamil Nadu, a serious controversy has rocked the state unit. The issue: did Devi Lal appoint two office-bearers to the state party unit without informing the Dal central parliamentary board (CPB)? The Madras newspapers of 12 January featured a PTI report, quoting a "party release" which said that the Dal CPB had appointed Dr P A. Subramanian as the secretary general of the Tamil Nadu unit and A K. Sundararajan as the general secretary.

Even as the agency despatch came on the ticker the previous evening, the two virtually unknown politicians were addressing a press conference at a posh hotel in Madras claiming that they were personally chosen by Devi Lal to help the new state party president Sivaji Ganesan unify the various Dal factions in Tamil Nadu. They even showed photostat copies of the letter from Devi Lal, who is the chairman of Dal CPB, appointing them to the two important posts. The letter was dated 10 January, with copies endorsed to party president V.P. Singh as well as Sivaji Ganesan.

The news came as a big surprise to the state Janata Dal as the two men were hardly in the running for these posts in the newly rejuvenated state unit. Subramanian is a medical practitioner from Salem who was in the Lok Dal for some time, while Sundararajan is an advocate from Gudiyatham in North Arcot district. Beyond that nobody seemed to know much about them. Sivaji Ganesan was visibly upset when he saw the news in the morning papers: obviously, he had not been consulted by the high command about the appointments.

Ripples were created in the capital too. An exasperated Dal spokesman, S. Jaipal Reddy reacted to Ganesan's ire by altogether denying that the central parliamentary board had made any such appointments.

In another twist to the controversy,

A facsimile of the appointment letter: documentary evidence?

Dr Subramanian came up with a second letter from Devi Lal—this one was addressed to Sivaji Ganesan—dated 11 May, 1989, in which he expressed happiness about the talks Ganesan had had with state Dal 'secretary general' Subramanian regarding the merger of Ganesan's party, the Tamizhaga Munnetra Munnani, in the Janata Dal because "it is the right time to unite..." Significantly, Devi Lal said in the letter that his eldest son, Om Prakash Chautala, and Subramanian "are duly authorised" to discuss the Dal-TMM merger. While this implies that Devi Lal was actively involved in the merger efforts for several months, those in the know of things in the local Dal unit stoutly deny this.

Three questions emerge from the unusual controversy facing the Janata Dal. If the CPB did not make the appointments - as Jaipal Reddy has claimed—is it disowning Devi Lal's nominations? If so, will the high command pull up Devi Lal for making such unilateral appointments? And, in case the letters are forged and Devi Lal does not know anything about them, why is it that no criminal action is being taken against Subramanian and Sundararajan for flouting forged letters carrying the deputy prime minister's signature?

Meanwhile, Subramanian is learnt to have pushed off to Delhi to plead with Devi Lal to save the nominations. If that be so, does it then mean the Jat supremo did after all sign the letters?

R. Bhagwan Singh/Madras

A Janata Dal leader resigns over the Centre's failure to implement the Mandal Commission report

Falling out

Dissension once again threatens the Janata Dal. The party, which put up a show of unity after it came to power as a constituent of the ruling National Front at the Centre, received a rude jolt when its all-India general secretary, Rampoojan Patel, resigned from his post on 24 January. Patel had differences with his party leadership on the Mandal Commission issue and the appointment of deputy prime minister Devi Lal as the chairman of a Cabinet subcommittee which is to work out the modalities of implementing the commission's recommendations on job reservations for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.

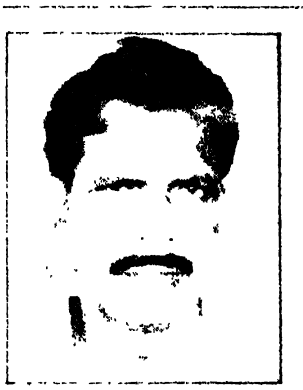
Patel, who is a prominent leader of the backward castes, and a close associate of Prime Minister V.P. Singh, resented the government's decision to go slow on the implementation of the commission's re-

Patel: firm stand

The rift between Biswal and Satpathy widens

Chinks in the armour

ORISSA



Janaki Ballabh Patnaik is perhaps the happiest person in Orissa today. A month after Nandini Satpathy took over as the PCC(I) chief and Hemananda Biswal replaced Patnaik as chief minister following the party's severe mauling in the Lok Sabha polls, the state Congress is witnessing a serious tug-of-war, and a reconciliation now seems unlikely before the coming Assembly elections. With his adversaries fighting it out, the chances of Patnaik taking over the reins of the party again have brightened beyond his expectations.

But no one had expected Satpathy and Biswal to fall out so soon -at least not before the crucial Assembly polls. After all, it was at Satpathy's behest that Biswal--who was a minister of state in the J B. Patnaik Cabinet in 1985 and 1986 before being sacked for anti-party activities--was nominated by the party high command as the chief minister. Satpathy preferred to head the state party unit rather than occupy the CM's seat.

The first cracks in the Biswal-Satpathy leadership surprisingly began to show within a few days of its taking over. Rumours began to do the rounds that Biswal was merely running "big sister's errands". An embarrassed CM tried to scotch the rumours by alleging that these were being spread by "interested parties", the implication being that the Patnaik camp was trying to divide the new leadership. But subsequent developments have made it more than clear that the Satpathy-Biswal team may not really be able to live up to its promise: ensuring an absolute majority for the Congress in the state elections.

Satpathy's first action which indicated that she intended to call the shots, was to issue press statements asking the CM to take certain measures to win back the electorate to the Congress fold. Some of the steps she suggested to the Biswal government were waiver of loans to small and marginal farmers, introduction of single-point taxation, that the new ministers should continue to reside in their MLA quarters instead of shifting to the larger ministerial bungalows, and that they declare their assets. When some of the ministers refused to submit their property statements, Satpathy reportedly wrote to the CM asking him to sack them.

Meanwhile, Biswal began to feel slighted by Satpathy's "overbearing attitude". Some eager partymen including ministers threw in their lot with the CM in his cold war with the PCC(I) chief. Biswal resented Satpathy's move asking him to appoint her as chairman of the state planning board, but had to agree to ensure his survival. Satpathy's appointment broke a long-standing practice of the planning body being headed by the CM. To Biswal's further discomfiture, the PCC(I) chief chose a chamber next to the CM's. The transfer of 35 commissioners and district magistrates within a month of the new government coming to power, which has created deep resentment in the bureaucracy, and drawn the chief electoral officer's objections, is known to be Satpathy's handiwork.

Hemananda Biswal (left) and Nandini Satpathy: parting ways?

But the issue which has virtually wrecked the Satpathy-Biswal team is that of collection of party funds through the award of as many as nine dolomite, manganese and limestone mining leases as well as the finalisation of some public works tenders in early January. The Satpathy camp is learnt to have taken serious exception to the fund collection drive behind her back. She got an opportunity to embarrass Biswal, mining minister Jayadev Jena, PWD minister Prakash Debata and forest minister Netrananda Mallick--who belonged to the Biswal camp--when she got copies of resignation letters of four ministers. Satpathy used these letters to heckle the CM and his confidants at a late-night meeting at her residence on 11 January. The acrimonious meeting, which continued till the early hours of the morning, ended with the ministers agreeing not to quit. But the crisis is far from over with the Biswal camp accusing Satpathy of having engineered the resignation threats by the ministers. ● comendations and the formation of the sub-committee, which, he feels is a ruse to stall the implementation process. Patel sent in his resignation to V.P. Singh, the Janata Dal president, who tried to dissuade the disgruntled leader from taking the extreme step. But Patel remained firm and said that he was not ready to compromise his principles. He feels that the formation of the Cabinet sub-committee, headed by Devi Lal, is a hoax because the Jat leader is known for his strong anti-reservationist stand.

Sarada P. Nanda/Bhubaneswar

Resentment has also surfaced within the party over the distribution of tickets for the Assembly elections. So, Patel's rebellion at this juncture could affect the party's poll prospects adversely given the fact that he enjoys the support of a significant chunk of the backward castes. For V.P. Singh, Patel's resignation could not have been more ill-timed. ●

Rajiv Shukla/New Delhi

A group of IAS officers is accused of appropriating prime land in Bombay

Landing in trouble

A welfare organisation has got the better of top bureaucrats on this occasion. A group of senior IAS officers who tried to put up a multistoried building in one of Bombay's prime locations, has been frustrated in its efforts by Bal Kalyan, an organisation looking after the welfare of underprivileged children, to whom the land belonged. Bal Kalyan filed a petition in the Bombay High Court against the Angarkari Cooperative Housing Society (ACHS), which had been formed by the IAS officers, alleging that the land for the proposed 17-storied building had been appropriated by unfair means. Justice S.C. Pratap, who heard the case, observed in his verdict that the manner in which the land had been cornered "was possible only for those wielding power and influence in the executive branch of the government".

It all began in 1988 when the IAS officers approached the state government for the release of a 33,000-sq ft plot on the posh Napean Sea Road in south Bombay. The Sharad Pawar government reportedly went out of its way to oblige them by issuing a letter of allotment on 31 August, 1988, even before the ACHS was officially registered.

The spadework for the deal had apparently been done much earlier. In July 1987, V. Ranganathan, then the revenue secretary to the government of Maharashtra, and the chief promoter of ACHS, had written to the minister for revenue requesting him to treat the plot "in isolation". It was a clever move, for this provision relieves the government of the obligation to issue a public notification before gifting away any land to an individual or organisation. Once this was done, Ranganathan again wrote to the revenue minister asking for the release of the plot to the housing society. And one of the first things that the state government did after Pawar took over, was to issue a letter of intent to the ACHS which was yet to be registered.

It was smooth going, till the Bal Kalyan authorities sensed that they were going to be robbed of the land. The land was originally given to G.D. Tendulkar, a Gandhian scholar and biographer of the Mahatma. Before he died, Tendulkar gifted the land to Bal Kalyan, which works for the welfare of children of servants of ministers, judges and other well-to-do families of the area. Realising that the land which belonged to it all these years was about to be appropriated, Bal Kalyan challenged the government's order in the High Court. It was joined by the Save Bombay Committee (SBC) in its campaign. The SBC alleged that the government had "in the most arbitrary and malafide manner allotted two plots measuring about 33,000 sq ft which included a public road", in a "surreptitious manner, without any public notice whatsoever, and that too virtually for a song".

The ACHS could only put up a lame defence in the no-holds-barred legal battle. It argued in its affidavit:

- The decision to allot the land to the housing society was an internal arrangement of the government made under the rules of business and that the petitioners had no business to question it.
- The government had a declared policy to house the poor at public cost but it may not always be possible for the weaker sections to be perpetually subsidised.
- It is not for the petitioners to stipulate government policy.
- The valuation, based on whatever applicable data, was no concern of the petitioners.

Justice Pratap found this line of reasoning particularly objectionable.

The plot on Napean Sea Road: disputed territory

Doctors in a Bombay hospital face charges of corruption

Medical misdemeanour

Gone are the days when medical practitioners stood by the Hippocrates' oath to offer selfless service to mankind. If an incident in Bombay is anything to go by, even the most expensive medical institutions and the highest paid specialists are no exceptions to this rule. This is precisely what prompted P.C. Singhvi, a former IAS officer from Rajasthan, to file a case before the medical council.

Singhvi's wife, Lila, was admitted to the Bombay Hospital in Bombay in 1987. But she died during the operation because of what her husband says was "callousness" on the part of Dr Prafulla Desai, director of the Tata Memorial Hospital, who is also a cancer specialist with the Bombay Hospital. According to the complaint lodged by Singhvi with the Maharashtra Medical Council, even though Dr Desai charged the full fees for Lila's operations, he did not even attend the patient despite being summoned by the junior doctors. As a result Lila breathed her last.

During the hearing of the case, one of Dr Desai's juniors came up

He observed: "To those enjoined to uphold the laws and the Constitution without fear or favour, affection or ill-will, the above averments sound rather unfortunate. One wonders whether this also reflects the thinking of the state government."

The court has now stayed the construction of the building and the case has been referred to the Chief Justice of the High Court. According to sources, a special bench is being set up to hear the case and the ACHS has been debarred from undertaking any construction work till the final disposal of the case. With that, the citizens have won the first round in their battle with the powerful bureaucrats. ● with some startling revelations. According to Dr A.K. Mukherji, fees were often charged from patients for the services of senior specialists, but junior doctors were pressed into service. Citing an instance of gross malpractice, Dr Mukherji alleged that Bombay Hospital was still charging fees for the services of Dr J.C. Paymaster who had retired from the hospital a few years ago. He also cited the instance of another doctor who had died three years ago, but in whose name patients were still being admitted to the hospital. These operations were allegedly being performed by one Dr Chitlangia.

Olga Tellis/Bombay

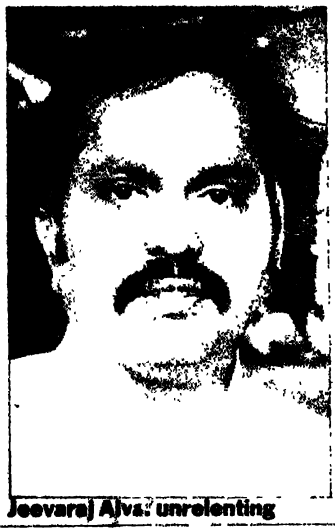
During the cross-examinations, Dr Mukherji came up with two more startling cases of this nature. While the cross-examinations have drawn to a close, the medical fraternity ought to be sufficiently chastised by these revelations. ●

Milap Chand Dandia/Jaipur

Vested interests oppose the merger moves between the Janata Dal and the Janata Party



Spanner in the works

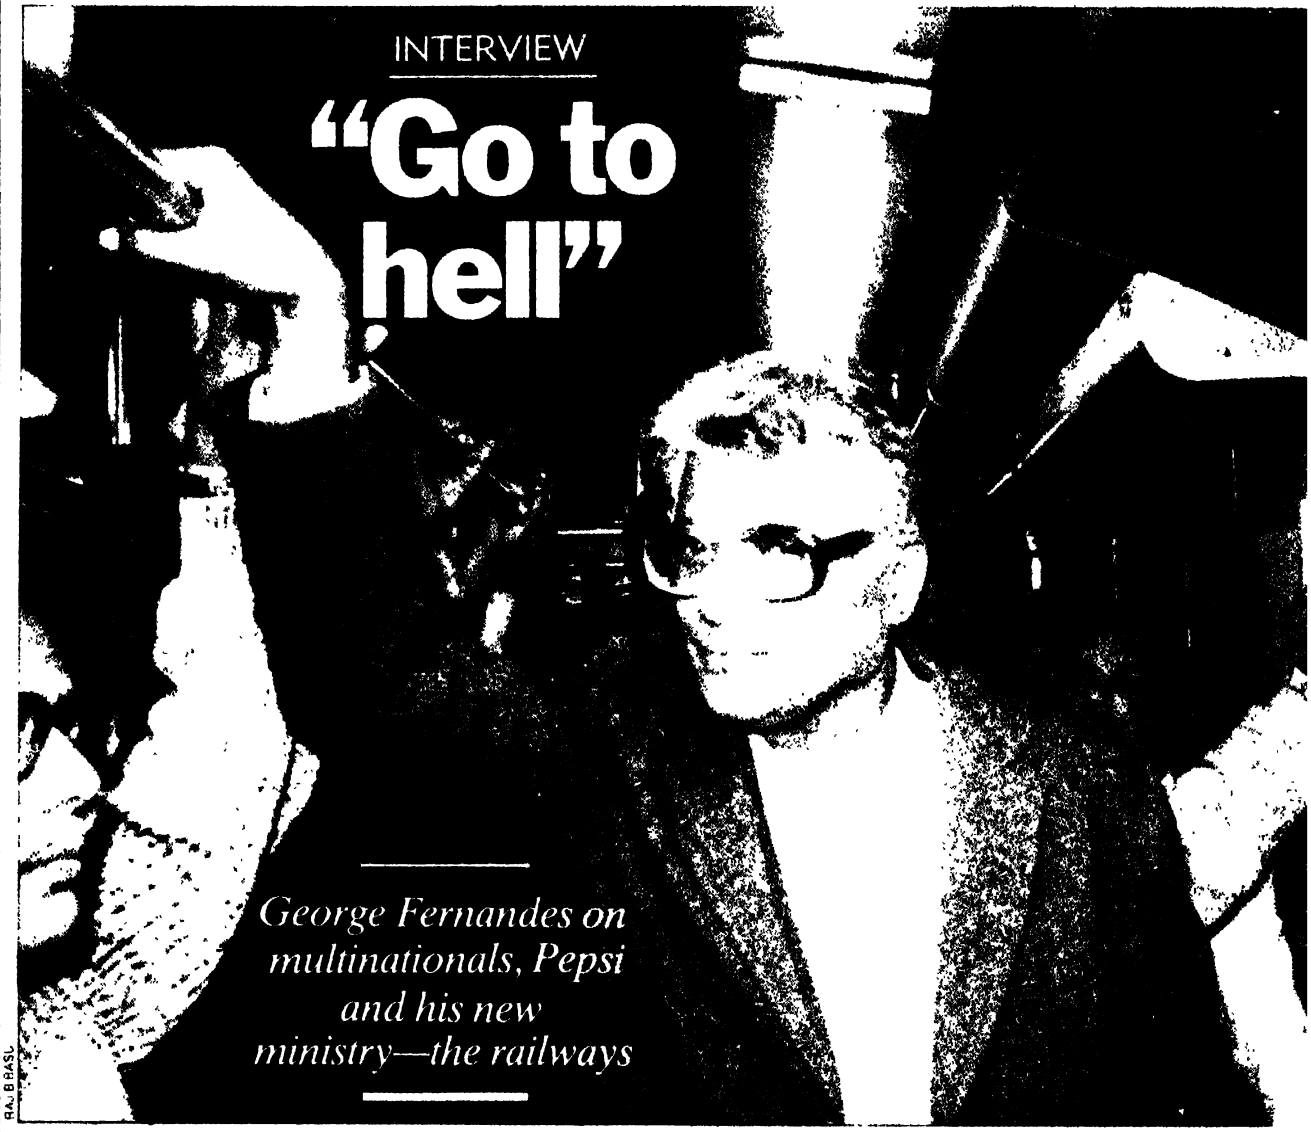
KARNATAKA

When the Janata Dal and the Janata Party (JP) in Karnataka were routed in the November polls, everyone blamed the feuding leaders of the two parties for the debacle. Kannada weekly, Lankesh Patrike, lampooned Dal's campaign leader Ramakrishna Hegde, and Janata party's H.D. Deve Gowda as the Jayalalitha and Janaki of Karnataka politics. However, unlike their Tamil Nadu counterparts, the Opposition parties in Karnataka have been unable to bury the hatchet. The unity moves initiated by well-meaning senior leaders in both parties are being opposed by hawks in the Janata Dal.

On 19 January, leaders of both parties went to New Delhi to consult central leaders about the unity moves. The immediate target of the negotiations was the civic polls in the state on 25 February. Despite all indications that the Opposition parties will repeat the November disaster in the civil polls if they fail to have seat adjustments, the Janata Dal stalwarts led by Hedge's frontman, Dr Jeevaraj Alva, are unrelenting.

Jeevaraj Alva: unrelenting

Alva, a traditional Deve Gowda baiter, is already going around singing the pre-election tune of November that Deve Gowda is a Congress(I) agent. Reacted Y.S.V. Datta, the general secretary of the Janata Party: "If the Janata Dal is not prepared to make seat adjustments, we are not in any desperate hurry to cajole them to do so." Deve Gowda's supporters point out that the initiative came from the Janata Dal's J.H. Patel, a senior leader who is disillusioned with Ramakrishna Hegde. In order to pre-empt the expected noises from Hegde's followers in the party, Patel first announced that he had Hegde's approval for taking the initiative. Later, however, he was compelled to 'clarify' that he was acting on his own counsel.



The hawks in the Dal comprise the Hegde-loyalists, Alva, R.V. Deshpande and B. Rachaiah. The role of former chief minister S.R. Bommai in the unity efforts is not clear. The Deve Gowda group believes that Alva and Deshpande will never agree to have seat adjustments. Alva has repeatedly stressed that the party's future was threatened under the old order and that he was the rightful heir to the leadership. Also the Hegde group believes that seat adjustments for the civic polls can only be a precursor to a full-scale merger of the parties. And Alva and Deshpande, who were among the few former ministers to win the Assembly elections, are not ready to share the leadership with the Deve Gowda faction. They have reportedly dismissed Deve Gowda as "finished".

But Janata Party leaders are far from convinced that they are finished. Says Datta: "There is no logic in these statements. The Janata Dal is prepared to make seat adjustments with the communists who got a mere 0.8 per cent of the votes and the BJP which got two per cent in the Assembly elections. The Janata Party, in comparison, got 15 per cent and finished second to the Congress(I) in more than 70 constituencies out of 224." ●

Prakash Belawadi/Bangalore

INTERVIEW

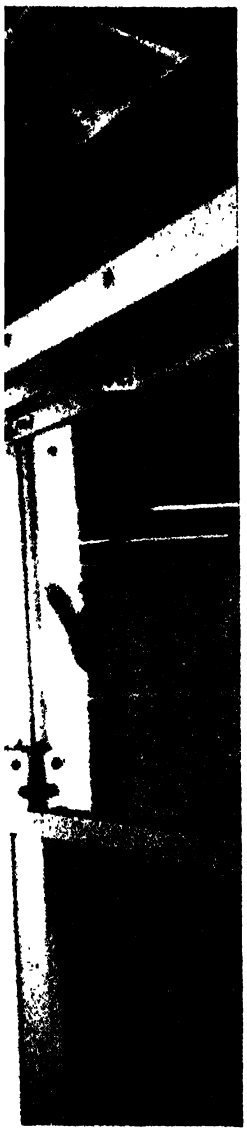
"Go to hell"

RAJ BASU

George Fernandes on multinationals, Pepsi and his new ministry—the railways

SUNDAY: Will you go ahead with the multi-crore computerisation programme initiated by (former minister) Madhavrao Scindia?

George Fernandes: The computerisation has reached a stage where it may not be possible to completely do away with it. I am making a review of the present situation and the extent to which computerisation has progressed, to find out what are the areas where it may be possible to do away with it, in terms of any future expansion, and in what areas it is now necessary for us to continue with it. Only after a review, will it be possible for me to come to any positive conclusion.



Q: Will your railway budget be very different from earlier ones?

A: Well, the railways have no budget, they only have balance sheets. After all, railways don't produce any fiscal policies, and so on. We are a transporting agency, like any public transport corporation. We could be a very big trucking agency, or a private railway in the country which would balance its books and do its business, that's all railways is about.

Q: But will there be any increase in fares and freight charges?

A: I am not in a position to answer that question at the moment for the reason that I am producing a status paper on railway finances and other related issues. This will be made available for public discussion, hopefully on 1 March. Only after the paper is out and we have had some discussion, will it be possible for me to take any view on how exactly we proceed to balance our books. At the moment, I can only say that we are losing Rs 1,700 crores this year on account of passenger traffic losses, and what are known as social costs, in the movement of freight, particularly in the movement of salt, fodder, and certain other essential commodities. It is necessary that the state underwrite these losses because at the moment it is the earnings in the freight which compensate for these losses and unless there is budgetary support to underwrite these losses, it will be very difficult for the railways to be in business.

Q: Will there be any departures from the past budgets in terms of expansion?

A: Yes, the railway budget indicates certain thrust areas of our developmental activity, like the laying of new lines, doubling of existent tracks, conversion of the meter gauge into the broad gauge, and so on. Now this is where some innovation or moving away from what has been happening is possible. For instance, the conventional wisdom in the railways is that we should go into areas where the new lines that we lay are going to earn profits for the railways -'remunerative' lines,that's the word used. If one is to talk only of remunerative lines, then it will mean that in all the backward areas of the country there will be no railways at all, because you don't have industry, you don't have electricity, you don't have much money in the hands of the people, then who's going to travel from these places? This conventional wisdom of railways following development rather than the other way around, will have to be abandoned, and we'll have to take railways into the backward areas.

There are also certain areas where for years, no special efforts have been made to build the lines that are very essential. Resource constraint is the argument that has been advanced, and it's quite a justified argument. But while there are resource constraints to take the railways to areas where they are desperately needed, the resources have been spent on computers, on metros and such other high-profile or sophisticated projects, which need not have been there, at least in the present state of our finances. So therefore, to that extent there is bound to be a shift in the priorities which I am going to have, and a change in the sort of budget to be presented.

Q: Does this also mean that during your tenure, there will be no modernisation of the railways? Also, will all development be indigenous, making the railways self-sufficient?

A: No, I don't think one needs to go in for any imports where the railways are concerned. Of course, we need technology to haul heavy-duty freight trains, to haul longer passenger trains, to have trains which can take on faster trains. Goods trains for instance, move at a speed of about 20-25 kms per hour on the broad gauge and on the metre gauge, at a speed of 14-15 kms per hour. Now, if you have better tracks which can carry more weight and which can take care of faster speeds, these are technologies we need.

Q: So that means you will import technology?

A: Well, we don't need to import it in the sense that it is not available with us, but we certainly need to improve on some of these things, and here we'll need collaboration. Again, for signalling, which is a very important factor which governs the speedy movement of trains, we need improvement. Because if your signals are remote-controlled, computerised, automatic, signalling has its own momentum, where it allows the trains to overcome the existing delays that we now have with the present signalling system which is quite outdated.

There is also the safety angle involved in signalling, very often the accidents we have of trains running into each other, is a failure of the signalling system. In these areas, we will need import of technology. Similarly, to reduce fuel consumption, whether it is electricity or diesel, and to go in for more fuel-efficient locomotion methods, we will need some kind of technical imports.

Q: What are the other changes you plan for your ministry?

A: One is to get out of the budget constraints, to go in for the laying of new lines. A proposal that I have mooted is to identify specific areas, like for instance, the west coast railway, where I would like to go in for the setting up of a west coast railway corporation, or west coast railway authority, in which there will be a participation of state governments who will be the beneficiaries of this new railway, namely Kerala, Karnataka, Goa and Maharashtra. These four state governments and the ministry of railways in the Government of India participating in the equity and then issuing bonds and debentures, to industries and to the people living in these areas. Because this west coast railway would ultimately cost between Rs 1,000-1,200 crores, if it is to be completed in, let's say, three or four years' time. And the railways do not have the money—the budget that we have had for new lines in the current year is only Rs 250 crores for the entire country. If you want to speed it up then you need to raise resources outside the budget. I have discussed this with the finance ministry and the Planning Commission, and we are now working on a proposal.

Q: To move to another area—industry. You have earlier been the industry minister, and continue to express strong views on the subject. Could you elaborate on your government's liberalisation policy, for instance?

A: But this is a subject where I can only express my views, and it becomes very difficult in government to express personal views, because then you are interfering in policy-making in what is not your area...

Q: Well, you used to be associated with the industry ministry...

A: I believe, and I continue to believe that a multinational presence in India in the non-essential sector should be done away with. And we should go in for an industrial policy which very categorically makes it clear to these companies that only in the priority sectors, where we need high technology, which we don't have but is necessary for us, that we would like to buy such technology where we can afford it, or if the only way of getting that technology is through financial collaboration, then we should go in for it. But beyond that, the Indian market for the multinationals, or inviting them to set up their units here in sectors where we don't need them, and Pepsi Cola is just one of those examples. Today, briefcases are made in collaboration with American Tourister in India, all Members of Parliament have been given these. You have foreign collaboration to produce toys in India, to produce commodes, and technology to produce kitchen sinks, and a whole lot of other non-essential sectors, where we should ask them to pack up and go.

"Any kind of cheating of the government will not be allowed until I am in power"

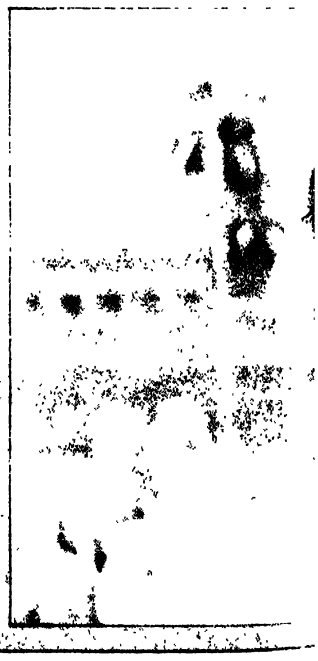
Q: So what does liberalisation mean then?

A: Liberalisation cannot mean that India should open its doors for exploitation, and here, it's just plain exploitation. I also do not favour these international brand-names being used in our country, because these put the indigenous manufacturer at a tremendous disadvantage, even though their products might be equally good. I know small footwear manufacturers who could never compete with Bata. And then Bata would go to these people as they became bankrupt, and tell them, you make it, we'll put our stamp and market it for you. That's the only way they survived.

A large number of these multinationals use our facilities. Who makes these toothpastes and soaps, and so on? I am sure that you have little units in Bombay and elsewhere which are making soaps for Hindustan Lever. I am sure Godrej lends its facilties to multinationals. We are losing on all sides. Our indigenous industries cannot grow, they cannot compete within the country, forget their being able to export things abroad. And another aspect of this is that these multinationals come in saying, we will export things from India, and they make a deal while getting their licence or permission to establish their units here. What they are exporting is not what they produce. Do you know that Hindustan Lever, which has the largest share of toilet soaps in the country, don't export soaps anywhere outside India? International brand-name, but they are using it only within the country. And this holds good for toothpaste and most of these toiletry manufacturers. Instead of an Indian export house doing its exports, these multinationals produce consumer goods here, buy up things which our export houses would have sent out, and claim that they have fulfilled their export commitments. So, these are some of the areas where discussing so-called liberalisation, we actually get into a situation of total exploitation of our economy by the multinationals, and I can't accept this.

Q: So now it seems that the Maruti 1000 stays. What about Pepsi? After all, you kicked out Coca Cola (in 1977).

A: I am not authorised to speak on Pepsi, it's for the ministry of industry and the minister for food processing, I think, who can speak on it. But there are one or two things that matters about Pepsi which need to be discussed.



Pepsi came into the country saying that...firstly, of course, Pepsi had no business to come into the country, they came in through kickbacks that they must have given to these earlier government leaders. Secondly, they have now upped the cost of the project from the original Rs 12-13 crores to Rs 70 crores plus, which makes me suspect that they have siphoned off a lot of money from India by over-invoicing the machinery that they are bringing into the country. So whatever money that was offered as kickbacks, they have made that and more. Thirdly, they promised to create 50,000 jobs in Punjab. My information is that they have created no jobs, and the number of jobs that will become available ultimately in this huge investment will not perhaps even touch four figures—could be under a thousand jobs. And the next point is that this whole idea of fruit processing about which so much of noise has been made, about how they'll process the fruit in India, grown in Punjab, and how this whole project was going to help the farmers of Punjab, and how this processed fruit was going to be exported to the rest of the world. Now they have backed out of that, and have said that they are not going to export this fruit because it's very expensive to export it. Now either you made a project report, you made a study of the markets abroad, etc., and then set up your unit.. I do not believe that an American company of the calibre of Pepsi could have made such a mistake, of not making a project report and not understanding the economies of processing this fruit and then exporting it and making money on it.

Related to this also is the point that they are now going to make potato chips. Now making potato chips in Punjab and then marketing them in India, doesn't make sense even as some kind of domestic enterprise, because potato chips are made all over the country by small and cottage industries. So therefore, to me this whole Pepsi thing has been one big exercise in cheating the Government of India and the Indian people, and particularly the people of Punjab. They have taken advantage of the economic and political situation in Punjab, and the Congress government decided to make some money out of them, and now the people of Punjab are going to be left high and dry because nothing is going to come their way. Yes, Pepsi must go from India, but unfortunately it is for the government to decide.

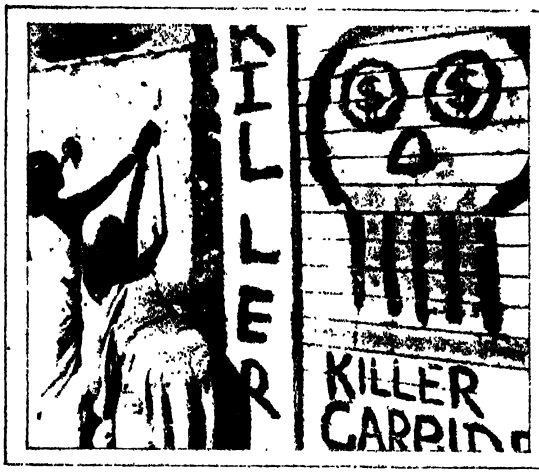
"Yes, Pepsi must go from India, but unfortunately it is for the government to decide"

PEPSI

"These multinationals buy up things our export houses would have sent out and claim they have fulfilled export commitments...I can't accept this"

Q: You have just been appointed on the Cabinet committee to look into the Bhopal case. The case has been reopened, but was it something that the government had to do?

A: Yes, we have taken two very important decisions on Bhopal. Firstly, we have rejected the judgement, which as the Janata Dal, and trade unionists, and as any patriotic Indian should have done, we had rejected it earlier. Because that was a "fixed" judgement. The man who delivered it, has gone to the international court of justice, he got his reward, and a lot of other people who were involved in the settlement need to be investigated.



Q: Does your government plan to investigate these people?

A: I don't think that our government has such plans at the moment, but they certainly need investigating. They were always in league with Union Carbide. Don't forget the way Union Carbide came into the country, the way the Bhopal plant was commissioned and run, and all the things that happened in the aftermath of that explosion.

Q: Why haven't any steps been taken to blacklist the company?

A: Well, that will depend on what happens from now on. The important point is that we have rejected that judgement, and therefore, we have liberated our country from the kind of sellout that (Rajiv) Gandhi and his government had organised by using the Supreme Court. The decision to provide interim relief to the victims numbering over four lakhs, every citizen in those 36 wards will be given interim relief.

I believe that on Bhopal, we have vindicated our earlier stand. The significance of what we have done is not merely helping the people who were involved, but restoring the dignity of the country which had been mortgaged by the Congress government to an American multinational.

"That was a fixed judgement... people involved in the settlement need to be investigated"

GOUTAM CHATTERJI

Q: To get to the political situation, what is happening on Punjab?

A: (In) Punjab, we have taken initiatives which I think are in the right direction. I feel that we should move in the direction of finding a solution to the problem in the not-too-distant future.

Q: The situation seems a lot more hopeless in Jammu and Kashmir.

A: Yes, in Jammu and Kashmir we are now paying for the anti-national policies that were pursued by the Congress Party, which totally alienated the people from the democratic process. It is very funny for Mr Gandhi to keep saying now that we are mishandling the situation, he is the architect of the situation, we are carrying Mr Gandhi's baby.

Q: Is it true that you have banned Pure Drinks (the makers of Campa Cola) on Indian Railways?

A: There's no such ban, but Pure Drinks owes the railways Rs two crores. The property of the railways they are occupying is (worth) Rs 50 crores, and if it were in the hands of a private developer, it would be worth many more fifty crores. And the man, (Pure Drinks chairman) Charanjit Singh, has been defying the courts with impunity, and manipulating and managing to avoid paying his dues to the railways, when a potter on the streets is removed with a lathi. Any kind of cheating of the government, and this one law for the poor and another for the rich will not be allowed at least until I am in power.

Q: What do you have to say to the general impression of the people that yours is a weak government which is bound to fall?

A: You know, we are a government with only 145 members or so in the present House of 525 members. And with our 145 members we were able to pass constitutional amendments, that shows the strength, and not the weakness of the government. We were strong enough to repudiate the mighty American multinational, and tell them, "go to hell". So what is the yardstick to decide whether we are strong or weak? The Prime Minister of the strong government could not dare to go to Punjab and talk to the people like we are doing. I believe that we are a very strong government, and we are going to run the country for the five-year mandate that the people have given us.

Interviewed by Shiraz Sidhwa in New Delhi

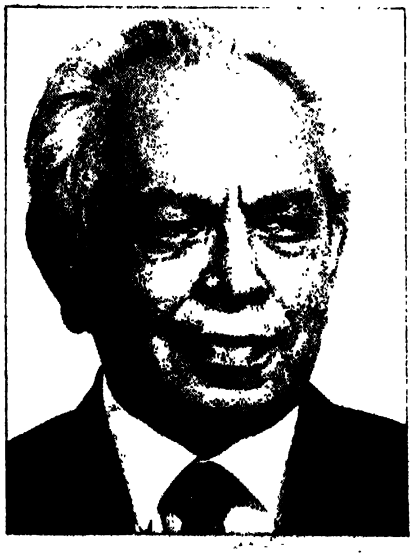
PETROCHEMICALS

Art of the possible

Darbari Seth snatches the Haldia petrochemicals project—and leaves R.P. Goenka behind—speechless

"It was as if the project was ordained for us," says Darbari Seth. Very likely, if the past has anything to do with the future. Seth, chairman of a group of Tata concerns—among them Tata Tea and Tata Chemicals—walked into Calcutta in the last week of December; and walked off less than a month later, on 22 January, 1990 with a Rs 3,000 crore naphtha cracker project and five downstream projects at Haldia, a sleepy, West Bengal port-township.

In the process, he left an enviable pack of industrialists dumbfounded with his finesse. Rama Prasad Goenka, who had been gunning for the project for the past five years, and had even formed a joint venture company with the West Bengal government to run it; Dhirubhai Ambani, whose petrochem ambitions are falling apart at Patalganga, and who craved Haldia as an alternate swansong, what with a change of government; Viren Shah, the Rs 400 crore iron-man, and his ambitious counterpart in Calcutta, Ispat group's Mohanlal Mittal. The Singhanias, Raunaq Singh of Apollo Tyres, the list goes on. What really struck home was the fact that while the assorted industrialists heavily publicised their intent, Seth moved quietly, swiftly, and with elan. Something that may go down in corporate history books as the "Bombay House" style. All Goenka said was how "painful" an experience this education was.



To hear Seth tell it, on 29 December last, he was in Calcutta to attend a Tata Tea board meeting (presumably to complete formalities for taking over Bangalore-based Consolidated Coffee Ltd) and met Asim Dasgupta, West Bengal's finance minister. "So I told him," relates Seth, "I was glad that Haldia has finally got off to a start and that many people have shown interest. But as a technical man I believe that if the Haldia project is to be a success, it cannot be a fragmented project. It should be an integrated project." Here lies the masterstroke. Haldia, planned as a naphtha cracker plant—supplying raw material downstream for the manufacture of ethylene, propylene, butadiene, benzene and other chemicals—made sense, according to Seth, only if that logical step between primary producer and consumers was taken. Very simply: it all goes to one bidder.

Continuing his tale, Seth says Dasgupta came up with something on the lines of "Your suggestion is very dramatic." Seth countered with a modest refrain that it was only a "concept", and that it is "neither a suggestion nor a proposal." Finance minister Dasgupta, in an apparent stroke of naivette—read: move to snare the big fish—asked Seth how this concept "could be made a reality". Seth, ever helpful, returned to Bombay, and was back in Calcutta armed with a full proposal barely two weeks later. By 21 January, when Seth was once more in Calcutta—for another Tata Tea board meeting—the word was out: Haldia belongs to the Tatas, and R.P Goenka picks up the scraps. The official confirmation came three days later in the state Assembly, when chief minister Jyoti Basu went public with this dramatic turnaround. But the point was made—West Bengal has snared a top industrial house.

Jyoti Basu went public with the dramatic turnaround—West Bengal had snared a top industrial house

At the cost of another, but that is the way of all business. Five years ago Goenka formed a joint-venture company with the West Bengal Industrial Development Corp (WBIDC), called Haldia Petrochemicals Ltd (HPL) with full backing of the state government. The venture gradually snowballed into a classic Centre-state battle for supremacy, with New Delhi tripping up Basu's pet project. And Basu,

Finance minister Asim Dasgupta asked Seth how his concept of an integrated project "could be made a reality". Seth obliged...and walked off with the whole project in turn, heaping emotional vitriol on anything that spelt Rajiv Gandhi. But in a sudden move, Gandhi showed up last October to lay the HPL foundation stone with much fanfare. Though some heaved a sigh of relief, most people correctly interpreted the move as a pre-election stunt, more to swing Basu's left-wing comrades towards the Congress(I), than to fulfill any fantasy about an industrially developed Bengal. Gandhi's electoral demise a month later firmed the project up still more. Basu was now a major force in the new government, and would be able to push the project through very quickly. Only, Basu—the master-strategist that he is—kept his options about a partner wide open. A horde of hopefuls stepped in.

One school of thought maintains that Goenka was never really in... last October, Gopi Arora stumped for Ambani

Ultimately, it was Seth's win. The Tata stalwart, under the Tata Tea banner, will chip in Rs 185 crores as equity for the Haldia project—ironically for Goenka, it will continue to be known as Haldia Petrochemicals. The state government will contribute Rs 190 crores to the total equity pegged at Rs 750 crores. The balance 49 per cent will be disbursed through public subscription. Term loans will account for a further Rs 2,250 crores.

Seth was initially hesitant about a joint venture, but the Basu-Dasgupta team won him around to their point of view. There is yet another round of convincing left: to tell Seth to share some ethylene production with Goenka, possibly in two downstream units. A six-member committee—three from the state and the rest, Tata executives—has been formed to speed up the project. Bombay House gossip has S.K. Ganguly, chief petrochem negotiator for Basu, as Haldia Petrochem's chairman, the post of managing director going to a Tata nominee. (Speculation is rife about the deal including Seth being asked to pick up a sick unit, perhaps Bengal Potteries. Wags say Goenka picked up Gramphone Co. of India in much the same way. Only, the operation is still a burden for him, and Haldia remains a distant dream.)

Both corporate and political observers are quick to praise Basu's quick-stepping. But even within this haloed circle of commentators, there are divergent views about what exactly happened. One school of thought maintains that Goenka was never really in. In October-November last year, ex-finance secretary Gopi Arora and Rajiv's economic adviser Montek Singh Ahluwalia(see SUNDAY 24—30 December 1989) stumped for Ambani as the WBIDC partner. Therefore, they maintain, Goenka's shaky seat was up for grabs anyway.

Another point of view—not entirely unexpected in business circles—says Basu's controversial son Chandan was on the Ambani take. This is a view repeatedly endorsed by the West Bengal Bharatiya Janata Party members, arch enemies of the state-based left. To make it all appear straight, other industrialists also had to be called in for discussions on Haldia. Seth took this opportunity, and despite being a late entrant in the race, worked the Tata magic on Basu.

A third argument has a Calcutta newspaper in the act. Goenka, goes the wisdom, chipped in with funds to keep this paper afloat. When he discovered that he was losing out as a Basu favourite, he orchestrated a media campaign against the chief minister. Basu was so livid that he axed Goenka's chances immediately. After that, it was merely a question of who offered the best deal.

Point. Counterpoint. But that is where the analogy to music ends. This is business, where one conducts power with more power. Not a flimsy baton. Basu has plenty of clout, and Seth is not without influence either. How one plays the other will now be corporate history. Perhaps Goenka, despite the heartburn, is a lucky man.●

Sudeep Chakravarti with Olga Tellis/Bombay

COMPANIES

Peer pressure

Peerless heavyweights knuckle down for a court battle

It is back to the court house for Peerless General Finance and Investment Co., a Rs 800 crore powerhouse and India's largest non-banking investment company. The actors are the same, but this time round, the charges are different.

Parvenu millionaire Parasmal Lodha—once the single largest Peerless shareholder—stands accused of forgery and cheating by the company's heavyweights: chairman and managing director P.C. Sen, and S.K. Roy, brother of Peerless founder B.K. Roy. Moreover, the Sen-Roy-led group claim that Lodha owes the company Rs 2.61 crores—almost four crores if interest is added on. The company filed criminal charges against Lodha, his wife Madhu and father Manoharmal in November last year, but they were able to get themselves bailed out a month later. The case is now due for hearing.

Parasmal Lodha: accused of forgery and cheating

These charges relate to a real-estate development project on Loudon

Street, an up-market central Calcutta thoroughfare. According to an agreement signed between Peerless and Indu Gouri Commercial Co. Pvt Ltd– later changed to Bhagyalakshmi Ltd—a Lodha venture, Lodha received Rs 2.61 crores to construct 54,000 square feet of commercial space in six months. The agreement was signed in June 1987, say Peerless officials, and even provided for a grace period of six months in case Lodha was not able to deliver in time. Their contention is two-fold: the construction was never completed, and documents produced by Lodha to defend himself had forged signatures, swinging the deal in his favour. Hence, the criminal charges brought against Lodha.

The other side, of course, has a different story to tell. According to a spokesman of the Lodha camp (as the matter is sub judice, people are unwilling to be identified) plans for the building, were changed numerous times. The proposal, originally intended as a residential complex, was later changed to an hotel—therefore, the delay. There is no breach of contract, they assert. And besides, they say, in case of a dispute an independent arbiter should have been appointed, as provided for in Section 16 of the agreement.

However, according to many corporate watchers, the bone of contention is really the much-coveted Peerless shares. Hounded by taxmen and controversies, Lodha resigned from the Peerless board in March 1988. At that time, he came to an arrangement with Roy for transferring his shares which would serve to break Lodha's link with Peerless. (The price at which shares changed hands is still a closely-guarded secret.) Now, however, there appears to be a rider. A second agreement was signed, say company insiders, which said that Lodha would buy back the shares once the controversies died down. But both Roy and chairman Sen are unwilling to sell shares back to Lodha. This has led to a lot of heartburn. Perhaps that is why, say observers, Sen found himself arrested in mid-September on charges of violating the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act. And Lodha, in turn, was dumped with criminal charges against him.

The truth will out in court. Until then—as has happened in the past three years—it is time for trading accusations. ●

Debjani Sinha/Calcutta

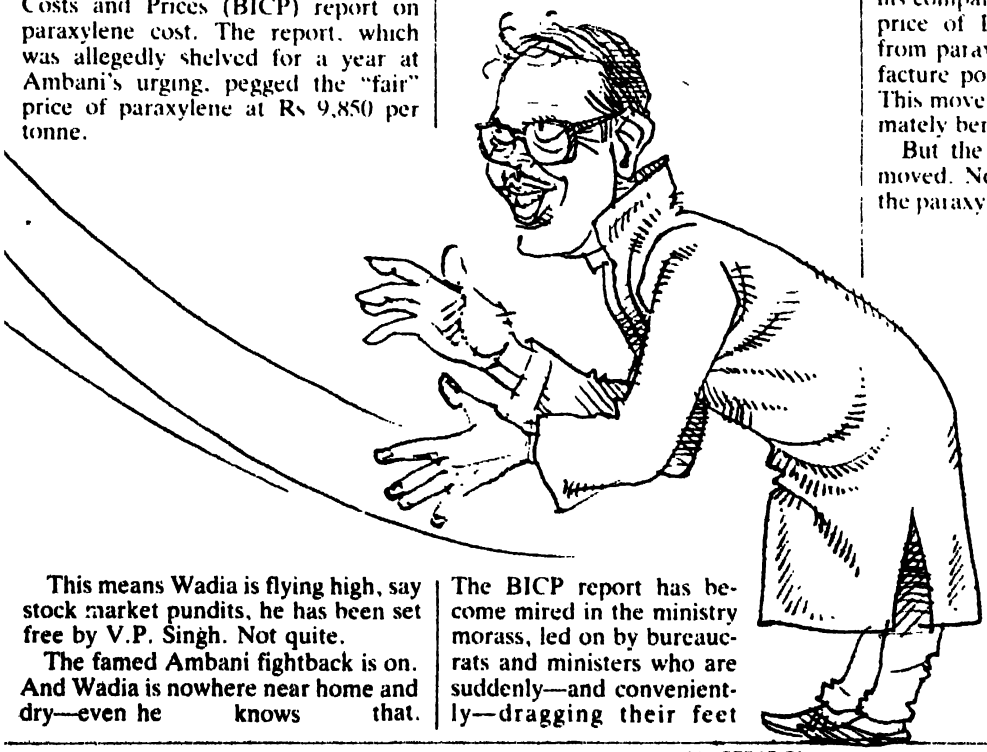
COMPANIES

Set free, forever?

Bombay Dyeing share prices signal great times for the company, but arch-rival Reliance is still good for a few surprises

You may call it defying gravity—or Dhirubhai Ambani. And if you look at its share price, you might say that Bombay Dyeing's fortunes are up there with the satellites. Since general elections were announced on 17 October last, the beleaguered company's shares have shot up from the Rs 120 level to end up at Rs 208 by the end of last week. Just three months—and a change of government—later. "How can I comment? Honestly," says Bombay Dyeing chairman Nusli Wadia. "It is the stock markets that decides these things."

Going by this logic, stock-brokers, analysts and investors appear to be dead certain that V.P. Singh as Prime Minister means good times ahead for the company. It means, perhaps, that Dhirubhai Ambani's Reliance group will not receive favoured treatment any longer. And Wadia, who—ironically enough—pays out over Rs 100 crores a year to buy paraxylene, a raw material for the ultimate manufacture of polyester, from rival Reliance at inflated rates, will now have to pay less than half the amount. As Wadia cautiously told SUNDAY last December: "I expect justice and fairplay from this government."



In Wadia's lexicon, "justice and fairplay" ties in neatly with stock market expectations, however much he may like to distance himself from it. Wadia's problem is that Reliance—the only private manufacturer of paraxylene—sells it to Bombay Dyeing at import prices, with duties and processing charges added on. That works out to almost Rs 22,000 per tonne, while Reliance's cost price is more like Rs 10,000. Wadia is forced to buy stock from Reliance as, more often than not, imports do not arrive on time. Ordinarily, paraxylene imports are routed through the Indian Petrochemicals Corp. Ltd. (IPCL). But Reliance, maintains Wadia, charges IPCL import rates but delivers domestically made paraxylene. A perfect setup, according to the Bombay Dyeing camp, and a prime example of Reliance manoeuvering. Reliance officials, expectedly, deny any wrongdoing.

This is precisely where the Raja can step in, as far as the Ambani doomsdayers are concerned. And it appears he has—along with the far more overt move to get engineering giant Larsen & Toubro out of the Reliance hold. In mid-January, the government updated and released a Bureau of Industrial Costs and Prices (BICP) report on paraxylene cost. The report, which was allegedly shelved for a year at Ambani's urging, pegged the "fair" price of paraxylene at Rs 9,850 per tonne.

The famed Ambani fightback is on. And Wadia is nowhere near home and dry—even he knows that

This means Wadia is flying high, say stock market pundits, he has been set free by V.P. Singh. Not quite.

The famed Ambani fightback is on. And Wadia is nowhere near home and dry—even he knows that.

The BICP report has become mired in the ministry morass, led on by bureaucrats and ministers who are suddenly—and conveniently—dragging their feet while passing the report around for necessary approvals

Nusli Wadia and Anil Ambani—Dhirubhai's go-getting younger son—and IPCL chairman Hasmukh Shah were in New Delhi on 24 January, for a protracted session of negotiations with government officials. Petrochemicals secretary M.S. Gill chaired the meeting, but finance secretary Bimal Jalan ran the show, say insiders. Wadia submitted in writing that if the government reduced paraxylene prices to around Rs 12,000 per tonne, his company would in turn reduce the price of DMT, a chemical derived from paraxylene—and used to manufacture polyester yarn—by Rs 6,800. This move, argued Wadia, would ultimately benefit the consumer.

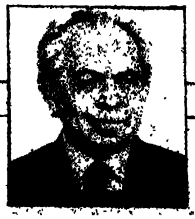
But the government remained unmoved. No case for any reduction in the paraxylene duty structure, it maintained. So, the import price remains high. And if Wadia goes to Dhirubhai for the chemical—and he continues to do so—the canny Gujarati will overcharge him. So it goes. The Raja may wait for the budget to really spring any duty or price-related surprises to elevate Bombay Dyeing and trip up Reliance—at least that is what Wadia and the stock market would love to believe. But with Ambani around, anything is possible. Ask Wadia. He knows all about it. ●

Olga Tellis/Bombay

ILLUSTRATION: ANUP RAY

■ Waiver wobble

Why shoot your mouth off? Wouldn't they have voted for you anyway, with the Rajiv-sickness setting in? When you went around asking to be elected, trying to tap the farmer vote banks—saying all the while that the country was broke—did you ever stop to think what a loan waiver means? Did you jump on the idea simply because Devi Lal is so hot in National Front politics?



Madhu Dandavate: wobbly?

If yes, didn't you realise most of his brainwaves are hot potatoes? Like this one, this loan waiver business. Rs 10,000 write-offs for "small, marginal, and landless farmers and artisans" Great stuff—happy farmers, granaries overflow, green revolutions one after the other, bringing on the golden age of golden corn, or whatever. But India, dear leaders, is a country of farmers. So many, that even your mind boggles with the total sum needed to fulfill your promise. So huge a sum, that your Prime Minister, finance minister and Planning Commission chief can't handle it, and say first it will cost the exchequer Rs 12,000 crores, then Rs 14,000, then Rs 8,000 and then Rs 10,000 crores. What's up, don't you know where the money will come from? First you say the Centre will handle it all, magnanimous soul. Then you panic, so it's a bit of the Centre, and the rest of this amazing sum split down the States. But from where, really? More octroi, more sales tax, more income tax? But haven't you promised some benfits in these areas also? Then you have a railway minister screaming for subsidies. Erase the dreams, dear leaders, please come down to earth. Before the dreams erase you.

Stock quote

"Next time Darbari Seth tells you he's not interested in you, prepare for your funeral. Bombay House style."

A disgruntled industrialist, after Seth walked off with the Haldic project

■ Banking on shares

If you think only foreign banks are desperate for stock market money—forget it. The era of the share boom and mega-issues—gathering in Rs 10,000 last year alone—have nationalised banks panting for the spoils, too. Slicking up and following in the footsteps of our banking superiors include as many gimmicks they lay on to attract fat commissions and interest earnings from companies raising money. That means—oh, glory be—picking up clients' tabs with an under-the-table intent. All costs for advertising the issue. Tabs for those five-star press conferences. A holiday or two for the company exeutives who select the lucky bank(s). In short: everything. With good reason. Which banker would say no to anything between Rs 5 and 500 crores locked up in the bank-books for three months or more? Lend this money around for high interest, short-term loans and you have fattened bottomlines at the year-end. Fat enough to earn a round of applause from New Delhi, that bureaucratic heaven-on-earth. Whatever happened to public sector morals? Or is it just a touch of "what the private sector does today..."

■ INCAB's intent

This is one of those—a closely held-company trying to spread its base, giving in to the practical lure of public money for expansion. INCAB Industries Ltd., a Rs 150 crore maker of cables—among other things, for the Navy, and for the Air Force's Jaguar aircraft—is diversifying into jelly-filled cables for telecommunications. The company plans to raise Rs 31.9 crores in a mid-February public issue to fund the expansion, a project backed by a technical collaboration with Eriesson Cables, a subsidiary of Swedish telecom giant Ericsson Aktiebolaget. The public issue will increase INCAB's capital base from Rs six crores to Rs 13 crores. The company's chairman and his associates currently hold 26 per cent of the equity, with financial institutions chipping in with 46 per cent, and TICC Holdings Ltd. of Britain accounts for 26 per cent. The rest is in the market, with a total shareholder strength of 3,000. Small company, big plans. With telecom, anything is possible.

K. Tapuriah : chairman INCAB

At the launching of Lalit Suri's discotheque at Holiday Inn, Vinod Khanna and Pooja Bedi were a conspicuous couple. Pooja, of course, true to form wore a micro-mini dress with a plunging neckline. Not content with dancing the evening away the duo made a together exit. And where do you think they ended up? Well, your guess is as good as

Vinod Khanna: real-life irony

Deepti Naval: comeback time

Aditya Pancholi's. Or Sonu Walia's for that matter.

Even by film industry standards the irony of it all was a bit too much. When Vinod Khanna first returned to India he began dating Sonu Walia who is now going around with Kabir Bedi. And Vinod Khanna has now switched his attentions to Kabir's daughter. That's the way the cookie crumbles in Bombay's film world.

The latest on Deepti Naval is that she is making a comeback in a big way. She has bagged the lead role opposite Chunky Pandey in Ramesh Khanna's Gopala. She also has Subhash Ghai's Saudagar in hand. While these are the typical masala films that Ms Naval has had to accept, she is also getting ready to direct a film entitled Aks. It is, appropriately enough, a woman-oriented subject and stars Ms Naval's real-life sweetheart, Nana Patekar.

Even if Sanjay Dutt's faithful directors ditch him, he need not worry. For, Raj Sippy remains faithful to the end. He has cast him in Thanedar, Indradhanush, Kuruksheira and Aag Hamare Seene Mein. Obviously, Sippy believes in throwing caution to the winds when it comes to his favourite hero.

Will someone remind him of the old saying about familiarity breeding contempt?

After three flops in a row Amitabh Bachchan is a changed man. He was in his element at the shooting of Shashi Kapoor's Ajooba, for instance. Pointing at Shashi he loudly bellowed for everybody to hear, "Who says Hitler is dead? He is very much alive. You see that fat old man there with a stick in his hand? He's Hitler."

The "fat old man", good sport that he is, took no offence and smiled charmingly instead.

While Kimi Katkar has taken to acting in a Marathi film Ek Full Char Half, Varsha Usgaonkar better known as the Kimi Katkar of the Marathi screen, is all set to conquer the Hindi screen in a big way. She has already been signed by Umesh Mehra for his Indo-Soviet co-production Shikari opposite Mithun Chakraborty.

With Kimi on the verge of quitting films and settling down into holy matrimony, Varsha may prove to be an ideal screen replacement for her. And she has coloured eyes, too •

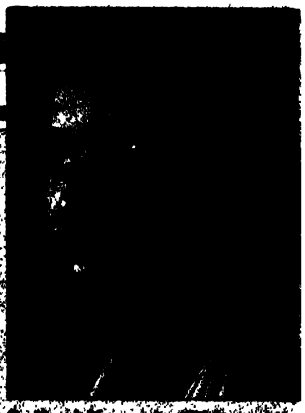
(Top) Amitabh Bachchan: changed man; (right) Varsha Usgaonkar: Kimi clone

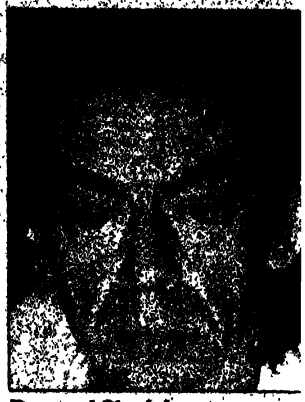
EPIC REMAKE

Excerpts from Garry O' Connor's book on the production of Peter Brook's Mahabharat*—the film*

For The Mahabharata Brook himself had to circle the world many times to bring the demi-gods and superhuman beings out of India and into the souls of his actors. With Carriere he had inaugurated an original approach to casting, using Carriere's script, with the playwright in attendance, Brook auditioned actors from all parts of the world. Brook then made Carriere, in front of the actors, play the characters. From then on possession had been penetrated straight away. Others resisted in differing degrees Several switched from one character to playing another.

Each of these individuals, highly recognisable as 'Brooktian' actors, had a definite nationality, yet their nationality did not impose on their character. For example, Yoshi Oida played Drona, the Brahmin sage and master of arms, like a Japanese and not like a Japanese. He brought to Drona the sympathy and heroism from his own culture that he recognised in Drona, yet he also made the character into a unique and timeless individual. His 'supra-nationalism' was the product of working with Brook for twenty years.





(Above) Vyasa starts to tell the child the story of his race; (right) Bhisma contemplates the problem of life-long celibacy

If The Mahabharata is the universal story of mankind— the mirror in which every human being can see him or herself, as Oida called it—the actor himself, as Hamlet says, also holds a mirror up to nature. Brook's actors employed their own national characteristics, but were endowed with something extra—an essence of universality, an appeal which crossed boundaries. Brook's method of work drew from each a range of expression that not only freed him or her to receive the character, but made the meaning as broad as it could conceivably be.

How do you achieve the magic and directness of a children's folk-tale, of scripture, and became a complicated, miraculous process. Some actors, when the work came to be filmed, believed that only then had they become fully changed into the personages they were conveying. Some, with the crude practicality of Haitian voodoo,

Ryszard Cieslak (Dhritharashtra)

PHOTOGRAPHS GILLES ABEGG

Bruce Myers (Krishna)

Mallika Sarabhai (Draupadi)

Vittorio Mezzogiorno (Arjuna)
Georges Corraface (Duryodhana)

of myth and legend everywhere? The Italian Vittorio Mezzogiorno confronted with the problem of playing the legendary warrior Arjuna, son of Indra, king of the gods, related that the words of Brook that helped the most—and, typically, were said to someone else and only overheard—were 'To think of playing a god is madness'.

Brook never generalised. In fact The Mahabharata achieved its universality by being, at every point, clear and specific. Paradoxically and completely unlike modern attempts to collectivise religious texts and universalise rituals—its richness was one of a deepened and concentrated image. Taking the best from each country he distilled it, or painted it deeper and harder so it stood out. As Kissoon pointed out, 'Peter's intention is to simplify'. Mamadou Dioume, who played the giant, demi-god Bhima, called it 'imagination instead of determination'.

The distinctive and gaunt six-foot-five frame, and finely sculpted head, of Sotigui Kouyate as the ideal celibate warrior-god, Bhisma, had a powerful and unforgettable presence both on stage and on screen. In the latter in particular, in close-up, Kouyate's radiant spiritual quality underlined Bhisma's renunciation: 'To avoid all conflict, and for love of my father, I swear the oath of absolute renunciation. I will say it clearly, I abjure forever the love of woman.'

Kouyate, a fifty-three-year-old 'Griot' from Upper Volta, is a highly sophisticated and all-round actor, dancer, singer and composer who has appeared in many African, German and French films. 'Can I play God?' he asked me when I met him at Joinville studio. 'No, it's stupid; you have to be yourself plus "something", a force which is beyond you.'

He had first created the role of Bhisma in the French version. I was struck by his relaxed Parisian manner and beautifully cut suit of black and grey silk, with leather-trimmed collar and pockets: not at all that of a sombre acolyte of high art. Yet he had, naturally, a stillness and timeless broad appeal, which might easily and instinctively have adjusted themselves to absorbing the presence of a god.

He found it very difficult. Bhisma is the son of a goddess. Although he finally takes up arms on the side of the Kauravas, his sympathies lie with the Pandavas because he knows they have no father on earth, and they were stripped bare of their lands and cheated of their possessions in the game of dice.

It had been, in Kouyate's case, the twelve-day trip he and the cast made as part of their preparatory work on The Mahabharata—in particular the effect of the omnipresence of Hinduism which helped him to understand the problem. The 'profound attachment of the people to their religion and how it was truly part of their life', gave him the solution. 'I had, at the same time, to be both man and god: never something in between the two.'

'Krishna is you and me, and fire and water.' The English actor, Bruce Myers, who had been with Brook from the (Above) The game of dice; (left) Draupadi disguised as a serving girl

1960s, asked the same question as Kouyate, yet in a different way. Krishna, incarnation of the god Vishnu, descends on earth with his supernatural power to save dharma, to restore the equilibrium which is menaced by the conflict of the Pandavas and the Kauravas. He has to accept his role, namely, that while as a god he can order destiny, as a man all he can do is to try to prevent the war, while still knowing it is inevitable. Krishna, therefore, is a highly ambiguous figure—'he does not answer questions'—and he even dies like a human. That 'there is no certain way', according to Myers, sums him up.

Mallika Sarabhai, who played Draupadi, complained that at first this ideal creature had been awfully misrepresented

Draupadi assaulted by Kitchaka during the exile

'The key to being Krishna,' Myers finally resolved, was that 'if you know something is going to happen, you are calm.' Parallel to the playing of Krishna, who sees people piercingly, who is unscrupulous and resorts to tricks and lies to save the principle of harmony in the world, Myers observed that the more he worked with Brook, 'the more I see what can be achieved through calmness than through dynamism'.

(Left) Shooting of the Bhagavad Gita scene; (above) Brook at work

'You might then ask where the emotion is in Krishna?' Myers claimed that Brook's answer to this would be that it is 'not personal' This was echoed by the diminutive Algerian Jewish actor, Maurice Benichou, the French Krishna, whom French critics credited with a smile more mysterious than the Mona Lisa 'You must not act Krishna, but be present,' said Benichou.

What drew Mireille Maalouf to The Mahabharata, although she had worked frequently with Brook since 1975, was the theme of war. Born in Paris, of Christian Lebanese and French parentage, she grew up in Beirut where she studied law. With dark, classical features and a compelling beauty, Maalouf played two key roles in both the French and English stage productions: Ganga, Goddess of the sacred river, the Ganges—the mother of Bhisma—and the Princess Gandhari, who on marrying the blind king, Dhritharashtra, binds up her eyes and embraces voluntary blindness. It is Gandhari who give birth to a hundred sons, the Kauravas.

Maalouf strongly identified the war between the Pandavas and Kauravas—not only a civil war, but a family war in which every warrior on both sides is somehow related — what has continued without end in the Lebanon. For her, Gandhari is a complete, farseeing woman. She binds her eyes to live in equality with her husband, a great act of love on which she never goes back. People have reproached Gandhari for her submissiveness, but Maalouf dismissed [illegible] emphasising that she is both human and tough—the only one who takes Krishna to task for the underhand and scheming way he runs the war. 'It's the same thing in the Lebanon, I can cry out against it, but nothing changes.'

As Ganga, Maalouf had to suggest that she carried a torrent and was, simultaneously, both a goddess and a very feminine and attractive woman passing through a number of stages quickly—almost an abstraction of a role. She described this transparency of non-being as needing incredibly precise and exact preparation, even to the extent of making sure, nightly, the creases in her veil were correctly ironed and fell in exactly the same place. She had to act 'without formulating gestures' and signify something concrete and true without making it smaller—and another 'colorato' she called it, a 'special note or dimension'. Hard although it was for her to put her finger on it exactly—how can one describe possession, when one is simply possessed?—she felt just as passionately involved after four years of playing this one page of text as she had been on the first night.

Andrzej Seweryn, blond-haired, heroic looking, who enhanced with mysterious, Christ-like power the role of the Pandava Yudhishthira—son of Kunti and of Dharma, the god of earthly harmony—played his diametric opposite Duryodhana in the French version. Ferocious and evil and first-born of the Kauravas, Duryodhana desires rulership of the whole earth. These two characters, more than any of the others, hold The Mahabharata on its course of action.

Seweryn saw Duryodhana as an idealist who, at one moment, succumbed to a terrible weakness: not a conventionally evil character but, as his father, Dhritharashtra, describes him—'He's blind and he attracts disaster.' 'In India,' said Seweryn, "We learnt that in Sanskrit the good-evil dualism does not exist.' Duryodhana, bent on achieving power and keeping it, is the nearest in the play to a godless egotist: 'He has no need of the gods nor of heaven, which is why he has to be exterminated.' Born a hundredth part, like each of his brothers, of the stone ball that issued from Gandhari, he can command mightier forces than the five sons of the gods he is bent on destroying.

But at the end, paradoxically,

Brook's actors in The Mahabharata employed their own national characteristics, but were endowed with something extra—an appeal which crossed boundaries

(Left) Kunti chants the mantra and asks for a child; (right) Karna seeks the absolute weapon

Brook never generalised. Taking the best from each country he distilled it, or painted it deeper, so it stood out detested as he is, legs smashed in a cheap trick played on him by Bhima, Duryodhana witnesses the terrible destruction wrought by Aswatthaman on the Pandava camp and dies happily. 'I reigned on earth, I was just, I laughed, I sang, I loved my friends and my wives. I knew all human joys. Conflict is a necessary part of man's emotional dualism: we cannot judge, but we must accept the consequences.'

Bhima the second Pandava

The notion is profoundly Hindu: condemned by destiny to what he is, Duryodhana achieves his dharma. Blindness had been passed on to him in a mental form from his father, and right to the end, he carries no regret of individual responsibility for his wickedness. Duryodhana reaches Paradise: 'He has,' said Seweryn, 'realised his dharma.'

Seweryn found Yudhishthira, his role in the English and film version, much easier to identify with. Although all the characters harbour qualities which oppose their central nature, Yudhishthira, for all the shadows he harbours in his personality, approaches an occidental hero more closely than any other character

Yudhishthira's tastes for gambling and perfection also precipitate the war that leaves eighteen million slain on the battlefield. 'There is no answer,' commented Seweryn, 'to why Yudhishthira does not stop playing dice before he has lost his possessions, his land, his brothers, and finally his—and their—wife Draupadi.' It seems an extreme dharma to have to realise, but, even so, Seweryn found that he drew upon his own Christianity, especially in the commandment, 'Thou shalt not kill'. While he understood the openness of Hinduism, and its acceptance of evil, The Mahabharata did not convert him to Brook's belief in the 'essential degeneracy' of Western Christianity: 'No one has proved to me that the love Christ has proposed to us is not a unique thing to follow and respect'.

'I must forget the light,' pointed out Ryszard Cieslak, also Polish, cast as the old blind king Dhritharashtra. Cieslak worked with the Polish director Jerzy Grotowski for twenty-five years. As an expert in 'self-penetration', which Grotowski taught him and 'in engaging in a sort of psychic conflict with the audience', Cieslak felt more prepared, perhaps, than some of the others for the assumption of a mythical character of Indian legend.

In Hinduism woman occupies a very different role from the one idealised in Christainity. Mallika Sarabhai, who played Draupadi, the woman married to the five demi-god Pandavas, complained that at first this ideal creature whom she had worshipped since childhood had been awfully misrepresented in the Brook-Carriere version. In Carriere's early scripts Draupadi 'had been portrayed as a wimp'. Both men were 'white' and did not understand 'the violence of an Indian woman and how, historically, women have never been secondary to men'. Particularly of significance, she found, was the ommission of shakti, the female principle without which the world does not function. She questioned why Draupadi had so little to do, why many of her scenes had been omitted, in favour of the dramatised 'masculine warrior side'. Brook and Carriere would not at first let her utter the curses on the Kauravas nor wash her hair in blood: 'Sometimes they were open and sometimes they were not.' She argued her case passionately.

Abhimanyu in Drona's iron disk

There were heated differences during rehearsals. 'You know,' Brook told her one day, 'working with you is like working with Princess Margaret.' 'I said "Why, have you ever worked with Princess Margaret?"' 'Don't stand there like a dancer,' he reproved her at another time when they clashed. 'When Peter gets angry he goes very red in the face and very silent. He goes redder and redder as if he would burst.' She resisted his will, but had the 'strong feeling that someone has to be broken down and recreated'.

Just before opening in Avignon, she related, Brook gave way to her demands and allowed Draupadi her full stature. In the preparation work she would have liked to see more of ananda, which is Sanskrit for bliss at the deepest level the bliss of creation.but she still felt at the end, after some hard tussles and differences of opinion, that Brook had made her a better actress. 'He taught me to peel away my character like an onion and find the nothing that is there at the centre.' She and Brook together were what another actor in The Mahabharata called 'the rubbing together of two sticks to make a spark', while Brook's assistant pointed out 'cette friction aide'.

Sarabhai was staggered, while they were playing The Mahabharata in Perth, when, at a meet-the-artist conference a spiky-haired young woman denounced the play as patriarchal, sexist literature. Her impassioned rebuttal of this brought wild cheers from the audience. 'One Indian person, a woman, at the centre, is of great value,' Brook had pronounced. As the sole Indian in the cast she delivered her final judgment. 'I am proud as an Indian to be in the play. Had I not thought it was a proper representation of The Mahabharata, the product of a loving and true attitude, I would not have taken part.'

Like Yoshi Oida, Vittorio Mezzogiorno was famous in his own country as a film star before he joined Brook. When he originally rehearsed with Brook for the French version of The Mahabharata, he had, to begin with, no key to understanding the character. He complained that as the central warrior-god, Arjuna had no psychology: 'Perfect, beautiful, strong, good, without problems..' Confronted with these demands he completely lost confidence in himself.

In the end he felt he could only be himself. The trip to India made a great impression on him, for he felt how ancient the country had remained, and how there was religiosity everywhere: it put him in touch with the gods. But it was not until near the end of the English-speaking tour, in Glasgow, that Mezzogiorno relaxed and felt at one with Arjuna.

Miriam Goldschmidt (Kunti), a West German national, read Brook's book The Empty Space, sold her late mother's wedding-ring and bought a one-way ticket to Paris, where she insisted on becoming a founder member of the Centre. An intense actress, she projects, off-stage, a complete lack of inhibition about her feelings of enthusiasm towards Brook.

Trying to capture the invisible, Brook never lost touch with common sense. The use of the story-teller, Vyasa, encouraged the spectator's belief, and this device extended into Vyasa having a child-companion to whom the whole story is told. As Brook said, 'The onlooker is a partner who must be forgotten and still constantly kept in mind.' •

Krishna is a highly ambiguous figure—he sees people piercingly, is unscrupulous and resorts to tricks and lies to save the principle of harmony in the world

The 'raccord'—adjusting Ghatotkatcha's make-up

The Mahabharata by Garry O Connor Hodder & Stoughton Distributed in India by Arnold Publishers Price Rs 375

"I was impressed when my doctor said Keo-Karpin Hair Vitalizer really stops hair loss.

But I was convinced when I used it."

"My doctor told me Keo-Karpin Hair Vitalizer* is a unique scientific formula based on extensive research. He also told me it provides all the essential proteins, co-enzymes and vitamins for strengthening hair roots.

All I know is that it has certainly stopped my hair from falling and checked dandruff."

Here's an excerpt from the research report :

"66.66% gave excellent and 33.33% gave good results with complete disappearance of dandruff in all cases and nearly cent per cent stoppage of fall of hair... So, success rate with Keo-Karpin Hair Vitalizer may be stated to be cent per cent."
Indian Medical Gazette 118, 223 (1984)

The proven scientific way to prevent hair loss and dandruff.

Dey's® Dey's Medical.Care you can trust.

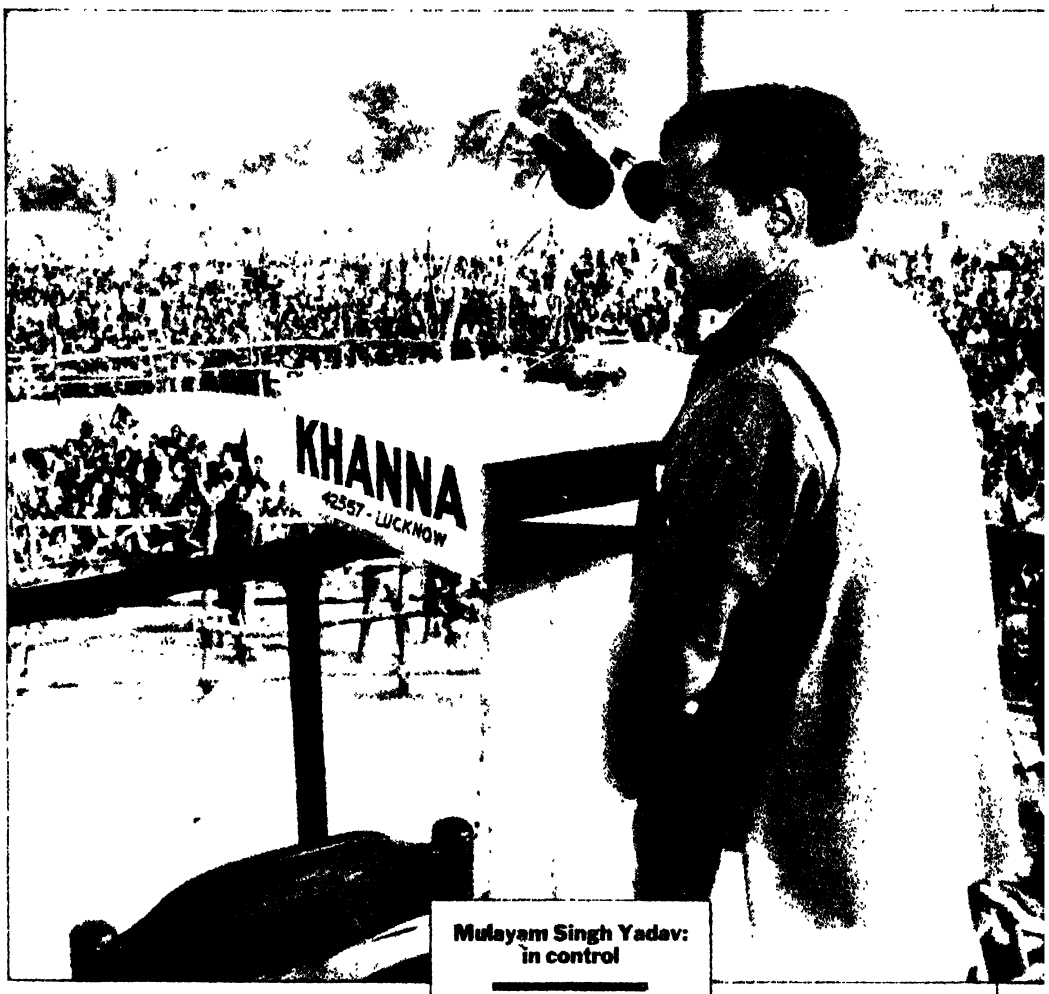
* It is not a toilet preparation.

TSA-C/DMHV/189



Taking charge

Mulayam Singh Yadav reigns supreme in Uttar Pradesh

Uttar Pradesh chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav's biggest achievement in his first 60 days in office is his success in politically isolating his arch rival, Union industries minister Ajit Singh. Mulayam Singh Yadav's election to the leadership of the UP Janata Dal unit had been bitterly opposed by Ajit Singh and Janata Dal heavyweight Arun Nehru. But today Mulayam Singh has outwitted both and is fast emerging as the undisputed leader of UP.

Today, Mulayam Singh Yadav's group claims to have won over as many as 40 MLAs who were earlier in the Ajit Singh camp. The UP chief minister is considered strong in eastern UP and is reported to have the complete support of backward castes. In western UP Mulayam Singh's grip is still weak because Ajit Singh still controls the powerful Jat lobby. But the UP chief minister, with the help of deputy prime minister Devi Lal, is determined to capture the Jat lobby as well.

The stakes for Mulayam Singh Yadav are high. Unless the influence Ajit Singh, who has unsuccessfully tried to become the chief minister of UP, is neutralised, Mulayam Singh knows his seat will never be secure. His trump card is the 100-odd ministerial and other appointments he can gift to his supporters. He can induct as many as 60 MLAs in his Cabinet and another 40 can be accommodated as chairmen of various corporations. Ajit Singh's supporters are clearly on the backfoot. After his defeat for the leadership, Ajit Singh did not visit the state capital, Lucknow for a month. This demoralised his supporters and Mulayam Singh lost no opportunity to humiliate them at every step. Not surprisingly, most of them have crossed over to the chief minister's camp. Luck too has played a major role in Mulayam Singh's remarkable ascendency. In the last one year, most of his rivals have lost out and can no longer pose him any real threat. Former chief minister and Janata Dal leader, Ram Naresh Yadav, for instance, was rallying opposition against Mulayam Singh a year ago but that ended when Ram Naresh crossed over to the Congress(I). Two other Janata Dal leaders who could have laid claims to the chief ministerial post, Satyapal Singh Yadav and Rajendra Singh (Ajit group), lost the Assembly elections.

Mulayam Singh Yadav: in control

Today, Mulayam Singh is the undisputed Janata Dal overlord in UP and does not take orders from his superiors in New Delhi

"There is no threat to my government"

The UP chief minister on the prospects of his party

SUNDAY: Are there still some differences between you and other Janata Dal leaders after your election as the chief minister of UP?

Mulayam Singh Yadav: There are no differences. We are working together. I am getting the cooperation of all the groups. There is no resentment in the party. All that is written about is only media propaganda. In fact, both the Prime Minister and the deputy prime minister are happy with the performance of my government.

Q: Do you foresee any threat to your government in near future?

A: There is no question of any threat to my government. This government will last five years. We have learnt from our mistakes of 1979 and are not going to repeat them. Our mistake led us to a political exile for nine years. And if we commit the same mistake, people will sentence us for life imprisonment.

Q: There is some controversy over the induction of Mohammad Azam Khan in your government who is also the general secretary of the Babri Masjid Action Committee.

A: There is no controversy. It was all propaganda. Moreover, Azam Khan has denied that he had ever said any derogatory words on India.

Q: There are some allegations against you that you have given protection to criminals.

A: I never give protection to criminals but I am in favour of changing their hearts. When Jai Prakash Narayan and Arjun Singh can change hearts of dacoits why can not I do the same? Can you name some criminals with whom I have links? These are all fabrications being levelled by several people with vested interests.

Q: Are you really going to write off loans up to Rs 10,000 in the state?

A: We are busy finding a way out. This is our commitment and we will fulfil it.

Q: How will you solve the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid issue?

A: This is not the issue of Ram Janmabhoomi or Babri Masjid. In fact, the issue of Hindu and Muslim has a historical basis which is very old. The Muslims of India will have to accept Babar as an attacker and nothing else. Their ancestors Akbar and Razia Begum have served the country very well. Both the communities will have to be educated in this matter. The need of the hour is communal harmony in every part of India.

"Both the Prime Minister and the deputy prime minister are satisfied with the performance of my government"

Sanjay Singh, who is V.P. Singh's great supporter and possible chief ministerial candidate, was defeated in the Amethi Assembly polls as well.

Interestingly, two of the chief minister's prominent Congress(I) rivals, Balaram Singh Yadav and Darshan Singh Yadav, too have been sidelined. Balaram Singh, for instance, has been removed from the presidentship of the UP Congress(I) committee and Darshan Singh has lost the Assembly elections. Mulayam Singh, all the same, is not banking on fortune. He is determined to build a solid political base for himself.

This he is doing by claiming to be the true inheritor of Charan Singh's legacy. K.C. Tyagi, MP and All India secretary of the Janata Dal, says: "I had been very close to Charan Singh during his last days. One day he told me that if he had made Mulayam Singh the UP chief minister in 1977, instead of Ram Naresh Yadav, then the entire political scenario of UP would have been different." Charan Singh, adds Tyagi, felt that Mulayam Singh was his real successor. The UP chief minister is carefully playing the Charan Singh card and to convince his supporters, keeps Charan Singh's portraits in every room.

The Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid : pressing problem

Mulayam Singh's other big advantage is his alliance with Devi Lal. The UP chief minister and the deputy prime minister have launched a programme to capture the entire vote bank of the backward classes in north India. The "Yadav" votes by and large are with Mulayam Singh not just in UP but in Bihar as well. Mulayam Singh, in fact, has been appointed the Janata Dal observer for Bihar. The UP chief minister consequently will have a major say in the choice of the candidates for the Bihar Assembly elections. More MLAs mean more clout and Mulayam Singh's frequent visits to Bihar prove that he is not going to confine his base to just UP. The "Yadav" leader of Bihar, Lallu Prasad Yadav, has thrown in his lot with the UP chief minister, who now wants to begin exercising his influence in national level politics.

Today, Mulayam Singh is the undisputed Janata Dal overlord in UP and does not take orders from his superiors in New Delhi. He can do precisely as he pleases in his state. The only central leader he listens to is Devi Lal. But Mulayam Singh's battle is not quite over. For, the Janata Dal hangs on to power on the slim majority of six MLAs. He consequently has to be on his toes and make every effort to raise his party's strength in the Assembly. So far he has managed to bring over three Lok Dal (B) MLAs and is reported to be busy wooing independent MLAs. But what really scares Mulayam Singh is the possibility of a coup attempt from within his own party. He knows that his rivals, Ajit Singh and Arun Nehru, are going to make many more attempts to dislodged him. But if his first 60 days in office is anything to go by, Mulayam Singh will not pull his punches. •

Rajiv Shukla/Lucknow

Ajit Singh

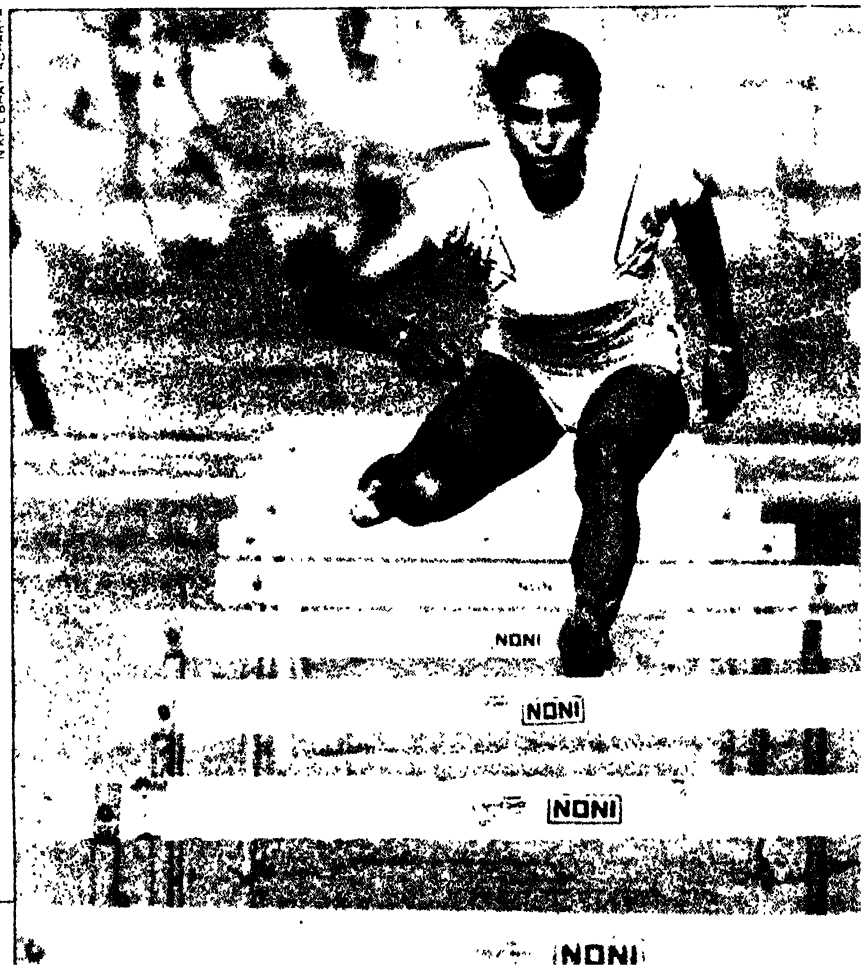
Arun Nehru

Mulayam Singh Yadav has certainly outwitted both Arun Nehru and Ajit Singh for the post of the state leadership. But he knows well that they are going to make many more attempts to dislodge him

The last hurdle

Will P.T. Usha give in to parental pressure to quit before the Beijing Asiad?

At 25, P.T. Usha is the most accomplished athlete in the history of Indian track and field and the best in Asia in the 400 metres hurdles. Criticised, humiliated and written off after her disappointing performance at the Seoul Olympics, the Golden Girl of Indian athletics made a great comeback in the recent Asian Track and Field (ATF) meet in New Delhi. Usha ran away with four gold and two silver medals and emerged as the fastest woman in Asia. But at the pinnacle of her career, Usha faces perhaps the most difficult hurdle she has yet encountered: to quit or not to quit.



Her decision has become all the more difficult because of the conflicting views of her parents and her long-time coach O.M. Nambiar about her future. Perhaps for the first time in her life, the fleet-footed runner is unsure about her next step. In fact, in Hyderabad, where she had gone to participate in the Inter-Railways Athletics Meet, she announced her decision not to participate in the Auckland Commonwealth Games and was evasive about taking part in the September 1990 Beijing Asiad.

Back in her native village Payyoli, 40 km north of Calicut, a depressed Usha told SUNDAY: "I am in a dilemma. My parents want me to retire and get married in September, while my coach and mentor Nambiar 'Saar' would like me to participate in the Beijing Asian games to be held at the same time." This prompted her mother T.V. Lekshmi, to intervene: "It took us months to fight the nightmare of the Seoul Olympic fiasco. Posters vilifying Usha and Nambiar appeared even in Payyoli. I would like me daughter to quit now after her ATF triumph." Her father, E.M. Pythae, a textile shop owner at Payyoli, added: "My daughter has suffered after her Olympic nadir mainly because of an injured heel. She has brought the family fame and wealth we could never dream of. Now we would like to get her married at the earliest and put a stop to her athletics career."

That could mean a big loss. In terms of gold, Usha remains India's best bet for two or three individual gold medals at Beijing.

While Usha is at present sulking in her house, 'Ushaas', gifted by the Kerala government, her coach Nambiar, who lives nearby, made it clear that he would persuade her parents to change their mind to enable her to take one last fling at the gold medals at Beijing (see interview). Nobody can forget Usha's brilliant performance at a number of Asian events at Seoul and Jakarta. Of India's tally of five medals at the Seoul Asiad in 1986, Usha won three and shared a large part of the credit for the fourth, the 4×400 relay. In the 1984 Los Angeles Olympics, she missed the bronze medal by a fraction of a second. Confessed Usha: "My only disappointment in life has been that I have not been able to bring home an Olympic medal. It's too late, because I will probably have retired and may be leading a happy married life by the 1992 Barcelona Olympics."

There are many who do not agree with Nambiar. According to Rajagopal, a sports writer who has covered all of Usha's international meets, "This is the right time for Usha to call it a day. She is being misled by Nambiar who is living on her glory." There is a strong belief in sports circles that had Usha undergone training abroad under a foreign coach, her results would have been much better.

The main complaint of sports critics is that Nambiar and Usha haven't yet realised the need to focus on a single event, as world class athletes normally do. Little was done to improve her high-knee action and hurdling technique. The emphasis has all along been on raking in the medals by running in as many events as possible. Nambiar, an ego-maniac according to many, wanted to prove that she was the 'ultimate' because of his training. But the returns to Usha herself have been considerable – about Rs 30 lakhs, including a two storeyed posh house in Payyoli, a shining red Standard 2000 (both gifted by the Kerala government) and a blue Maruti given by her employers, Indian Railways. Added to that, she has been showered with gold by her ardent fans, mainly in the Gulf. Says Rajagopal: "She has made more money than all other Indian athletes put together. But to be fair to her, she has not blown it up.

What now is to become of the ace athlete? Says an anguished Usha: "I am caught between the devil and the deep sea. I have to respect my parents' views. At the same time I should not let down my coach." Usha is likely to announce her future plans at the ATF award ceremony in New Delhi, slated to be held in the middle of February. The NIS camp for the Beijing Asiad has already started in Bangalore, and Usha and Nambiar have not reported so far. Huddled with her close relatives and Nambiar, Usha will have to work out a compromise, which will enable her one last chance to bring more Asiad medals from Beijing. Her father, meanwhile, is looking for a groom worthy of her. But for Usha, if she does go to Beijing a few months from now, the pressure on her is going to be higher than ever. •

Sreedhar Pillay/Payyoli

P.T. Usha training in her favourite event: will she clear it this time?

"I won't stand in her way if she wants to retire"

Coach Nambiar on his protégée Usha

SUNDAY: Any comments on Usha's premature retirement plans?

Nambiar: Her family is putting pressure on her to call it a day. I feel the girl has enough in her to last till Barcelona. Still, I won't stand in her way if she wants to retire. But only Usha can decide on her athletics future, other people should not influence her in any way.

Q: What made her think of retirement when she is at the top today?

A: There has been a witch-hunt following the Seoul Olympics disaster. Nobody realises that she had an injured heel then. After Seoul it was a nightmarish experience for the young girl. An angry mob near Calicut almost lynched me. Now after the ATF she has sent her bitter critics scurrying for cover. So, she now feels it is the right time to quit.

Q: Do you think she can maintain her form and win some medals in Beijing?

A: I am confident that she can win at least two gold medals with ease. If she wants, after that she can quit, though personally I feel she can try for the elusive Olympic medal at Barcelona. But now I will try to convince her parents.

Q: A lot of people feel that you are exploiting Usha and ruining her career.

A: Every other coach and sports administrator want my head on a platter. Because they are jealous of my success. Let me make it clear that I am largely responsible for her having reached such dizzy heights. What have other coaches who criticise me done? My detractors like Suresh Babu, a fellow Sports Authority of India (SAI) coach, under the talent-hunt scheme, coached two girls, Shalini and Kavita. Where are they now?

Q: You have been accused of making money out of Usha's success.

A: Till very recently I was hardly getting Rs 2500 as her coach from the Kerala Sports Council. But now, being a SAI coach enables me to get around Rs 4000. I may definitely have got some trinkets out of Usha's achievements. After the Seoul Asiad, the state government gave me Rs 1 lakh, and later I got the Dronacharya Award which fetched me Rs 25,000. I have never made money out of Usha.

Q: What do you feel is the reason for Usha's success?

A: It's her professional approach to her game that has made her reach such heights. She is totally committed.

Q: What about your future plans, after Usha retires?

A: I have three more years as a coach with SAI. After Usha retires I'd like to go back to the Cannanore sports division where it all started and look around for fresh talent. Later probably I may write a book on the making of P.T. Usha. •

Ambanis get Patriot?

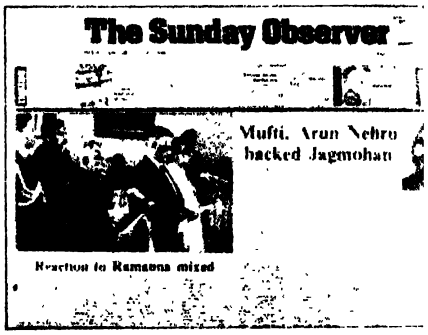
Rumours are rife that Dhirubhai has got a stranglehold on the Delhi-based paper



The Ambanis have indeed learnt a lesson from the drubbing they received at the hands of Ramnath Goenka's Indian Express which carried on a relentless campaign against the Reliance group for almost three years. There was no reason why, with all the money and resources at their disposal, they should not create a power bloc in the fourth estate and be in a position to take on their adversaries on their own home ground. So, they went on a buying spree and first grabbed, Commerce, and later, The Sunday Observer. Their latest acquisition is not a newspaper or a magazine but a senior journalist, R.K. Mishra, editor-in-chief of the pro-Moscow English daily from the capital, Patriot, who has been made chairman of the Ambanis' new company, the Observer Group of Publications. And it's not surprising that it has given rise to rumours that formally or informally, Patriot is going to be taken over by the new media baron.

A well-placed source in the Ambani camp straight away denies this and says that Patriot will continue to be an "independent paper" and the two apex bodies—A.V. Baliga Trust and A.V. Baliga Foundation—which between them hold the shares of United India Publications, would continue to be in command. Apart from Patriot, United India Publications brings out an English news weekly, Link, and the sprawling Link House on Bahadurshah Zafar Marg, the capital's own Fleet Street, is owned by the two trusts associated with the late Dr A.V. Baliga.

However, with the same source adding that the relationship between Link House and Observer Group of Publications is still evolving, there is intense speculation about a take-over. "It is an association of minds on the basis of identity of objectives," is his cryptic comment. While he insists that there is no financial relationship at the moment between the two organisations, he does not rule it out for all times to come.

And here lies the real story, say sources in Link Hosue who, for obvious reasons, are not willing to be identified. It is said in hushed tones that Dhirubhai Ambani has offered to meet the financial liabilities of both Patriot and Link which run into several crores of rupees. When a few years ago, Patriot was revamped and the latest printing technology introduced, it came as a surprise to media circles as neither Patriot nor Link enjoyed a good circulation. It is said that a hefty loan was taken from the Central Bank, but with circulation of the new-look paper not picking up, the group found itself in a financial soup. This clearly provided the Ambanis with an ideal situation to step in. Discerning readers have not forgotten that during the day of the anti-Reliance campaign, Patriot had carried avowedly pro-Ambani news items and articles and the nexus, howsoever nebulous it may have been, had come into the open even then.

Mishra describes as "totally baseless" the rumour that the Ambanis have informally taken over the Patriot. According to him, "the Ambanis have neither shown an interest in this regard nor did the question ever come up for discussion" When asked if there was any financial tie-up between the Patriot Group and the Observer Group, Mishra denied it saying, "Much more important than the speculated financial relationship is the fact that Indian journalism must grapple with the issue of relationship between investor, management and editorial. The fact that I have been invited to be the chairman of the Observer Group is an indication that the investors have opted for a professionalised management." He adds, "Indian journalism is entering a phase where the investor, management and editor will have to evolve a relationship based on mutually acceptable norms."

Dhirubhai Ambani: the new media baron is all set

A far-sighted political strategy too is said to be behind the tie-up between R.K. Mishra and his Patriot group and the Ambanis. It is well-known that Mishra has for a long time been very close to Union commerce minister Arun Nehru. It is also known that Nehru does not entertain the kind of animus V P. Singh has for the Reliance group. Moreover, the utility of a mass-circulating newspaper to a politician has been amply demonstrated by the way Indian Express carried on its untiring campaign in favour of V.P. Singh. So. Arun Nehru and his close associates like Mufti Mohammad Sayeed in the Union Cabinet would like to have a newspaper on which they can totally rely. And who can offer reliance better than the one and only Reliance Group.

So, the story goes, it is Arun Nehru who has really got Mishra installed as the chief of the Ambanis' media company—the Observer Group of Publications Mishra is also said to be lobbying for Ambanis' interests with the West Bengal government using his contacts among the left parties. While the Ambanis are out of the Haldia project, they are trying to get a contract for captive power generation in the state, much along the lines of the Tatas in Bombay.

A look at the Ambani plans is enough to convince that he means business, the only difference being that this time, instead of polyester, it is information that he is dealing in. No wonder then that his aides prefer to talk of "information business" rather than just newspaper industry. After a dizzy growth, the Reliance group has joined the Tatas and Birlas at the top of the Indian corporate world. With nearly three million shareholders, the group has the second largest number of shareholders in the world and the largest market capitalisation in the country. And the Ambanis know that in the coming decades, information is going to be the single most crucial input in the growth of society, economy and culture.

So, what is intended to be created is a vast information empire to cater to the needs of the Reliance group as well as of those who choose to become its clients. The Commerce Research Bureau, which possesses perhaps the best reference library on corporate information in the country with 80-year-old records, is planned to be expanded into a very large computer data centre which will store information on international finance, banking, technology, trade, policy and strategic planning.

Patriot*: an Ambani acquisition; (inset) R.K. Mishra: new role

Print media will form only a part of this burgeoning information business. Commerce has been renamed as Business and Financial Observer because it was felt that "commerce" was a nineteenth century concept and did not convey the totality of the present-day economic reality. The Sunday Observer is going to be brought out in Hindi shortly and very soon, editions in other languages such as Gujarati and Marathi will follow. Both the Business and Financial Observer and The Sunday Observer are being planned as multi-centre ventures. Even the Hindi Sunday Observer is expected to be a multi-edition newspaper.

"Indian journalism is entering a phase where the investor, management and editor will have to evolve a new relationship"
—Mishra

A source close to the Ambanis makes it clear that each newspaper would be free to pursue its own editorial policy and the Reliance group as a whole will not try to sell a particular line. The top editorial line-up is already ready. While Vinod Mehta is back with The Sunday Observer the paper he had himself started, Prem Shankar Jha will continue as editor of the Business and Financial Observer, and Udayan Sharma will hold charge of the Hindi Sunday Observer Mishra is unlikely to interfere in the editorial functioning of the various projected publications. As Mishra himself says, "It would be my responsibility to evolve, in consultation with the other editors, a mutually acceptable editorial policy. However, the editors may decide to agree on certain basic points and to disagree on certain others."

Then what is holding them up? Despite various deadlines, none of these have been able to come out so far, leading to speculations in media circles. Insiders attribute the delay to the fact that the photo type-setting equipment has not been delivered so far. The Ambanis have gone in for state-of-art technology and are importing the equipment from Britain. The use of such sophisticated technology on such a large scale is by itself revolutionary in the Indian context. Photo type-setting staff will be dispensed with, and so will paste-up artists. All editorial operations will be performed on computer terminals including layout and design. The final output will also be given by the computer. And all the publication centres will be linked to each other through modems.

Whenever the Ambani publications come out, one thing is certain: the face of Indian journalism is not going to remain the same. They have already pushed salaries of journalists to levels which the newspaper industry had never dreamt of. But, then, is all that glitters, gold? •

Kuldeep Kumar/New Delhi

The Nehru Cup farce

Soccer fans virtually boycott this premier international tournament

If one cares to find the reason behind the success of the Calcutta 300 festival, one will know exactly why the Nehru Centenary Soccer tournament was a failure. The city jubilee is being held at the Yuba Bharati Krirangan. The only way people could get there regularly and in great numbers is through special transport arrangements. Since a former Congress(I) minister was conducting the football tournament, the West Bengal government may have chosen to ignore the pleas to beef up the bus service, as a result of which very few people turned up to see the football matches.

But the callousness of the state government couldn't possibly be the only reason why Calcuttans so uncharacteristically spurned soccer. The way local football has been conducted here for the past two years was another reason. Things have come to such a pass that the 1989 league and the prestigious IFA Shield competitions have still not been completed. People just seemed fed up.

Another reason why the Nehru soccer flopped was the frequent change in the dates of the competition. First, this international competition was billed for October and then November. With the general elections being announced, even dates in December were altered and, finally, the second and third weeks of January were decided on. These changes had the effect of dampening the enthusiasm of football lovers who felt the whole tournament would be a farce.

Such a belief was strengthened by the frequent changes in the names of the foreign teams taking part. The organisers—the All India Football Federation (AIFF)—insisted for quite some time that teams from countries like West Germany and England would take part—perhaps even from Italy, where some of the best players of the world congregate. Ultimately, only two worthwhile teams turned up, along with one which came from the USSR for a lark, another from Denmark without any practice and a third as a national side in a club-level tournament.

FIFA sanctioned this as a one-time tournament purely because Nehru's name was associated with it. And the central government, then going through a centenary mania, readily sanctioned as much as Rs two crores in foreign exchange for this competition. Priya Ranjan Das Munshi, the AIFF president, was then commerce minister, so promises for sponsorship also flowed in.

But Das Munshi went out with the Congress(I) ministry and the cash flow immediately stopped. Organisations like the State Trading Corporation (STC), which had promised sums up to Rs 35 lakhs for each team, pleaded other commitments and backed out. When Das Munshi attacked them in print, they came out with lame excuses like "the change in the dates of the competition" to hide the fact that they were not prepared to get involved with a ship that had sunk.

Sports ministry officials went to the extent of questioning the foreign exchange sanction, saying that since the tournament was postponed twice, the sanction may be withdrawn. They stopped bickering only when the organisers told them the sanction was for the tournament and not for any specific dates.

Only a very small part of the foreign exchange spent on the competition was realised. That, too, in fits and starts as the two top teams played patchily up to the final. It was only in the last round that one got to see some really world class soccer.

The Soviet side, Metalist Kharkov, was a big disaster. Coming from a country which has had an excellent record of triumphs both at club and national levels in India, this team disappointed soccer fans. They drew with both the Argentinian team, Gimnasia Esgrima de La Plata, and with the Zambian side. The latter, too, was a big disappointment. Having reached the quarter-finals of the Seoul Olympics, they raised a lot of expectations at the Yuba Bharati Krirangan. But, despite their smooth approach work, they were totally bereft of ideas when it came to shooting.

NIKHIL BHATTACHARYA

The victorious Olimpia team captain with the Nehru trophy

Mohammedan Sporting playing Metalist (USSR): good show

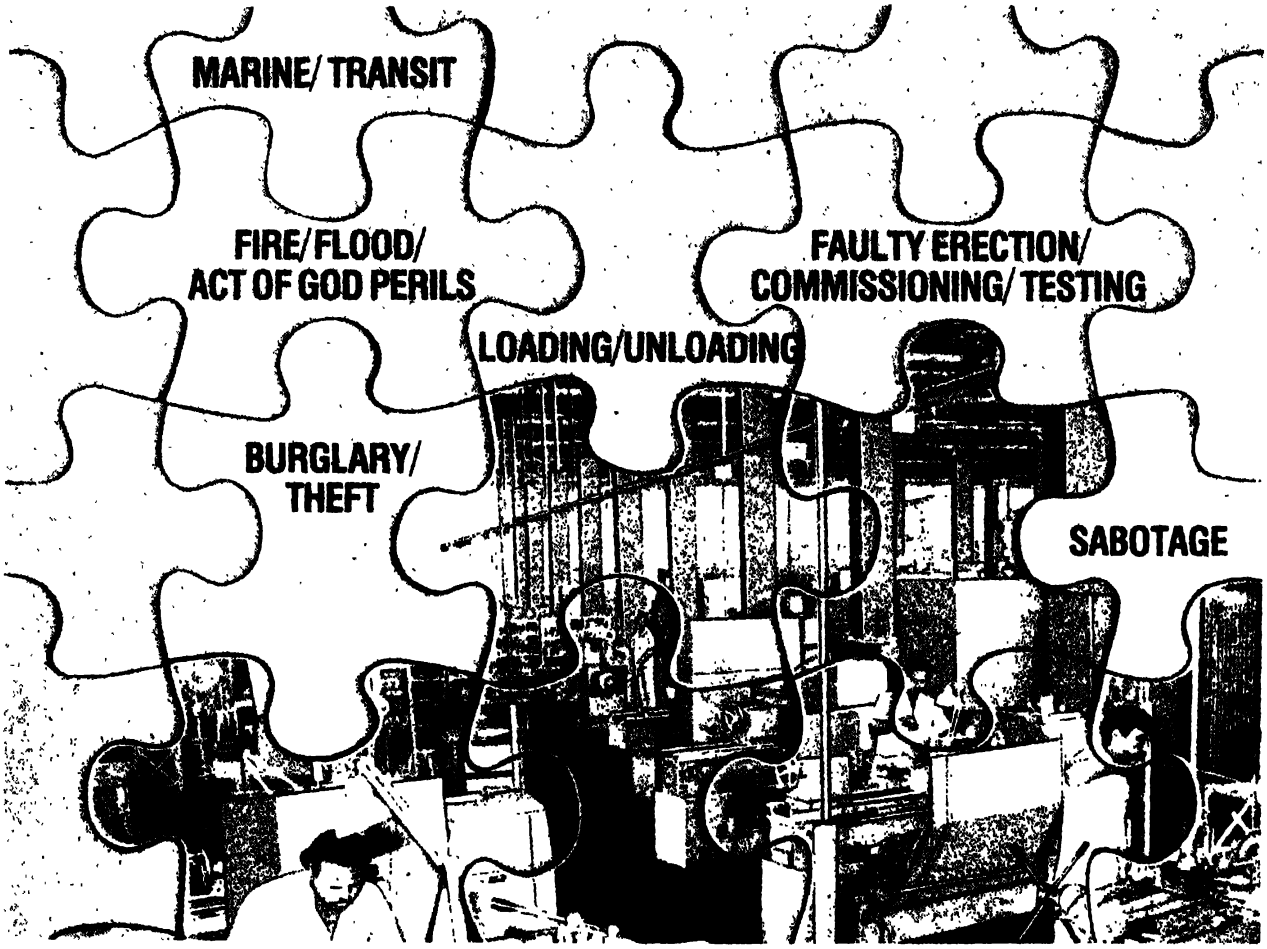
From the Indian point of view, the redeeming feature of this competition was the performance of Mohammedan Sporting. The simultaneous sacking of coach Syed Naeemuddin and the induction of Nigerian Emeka Izeugo, seemed to have transformed this team. One has to admit that luck was on its side in the matches against both the Zambian team and the Soviet side. But the fact remains that for large periods in both the matches, the local side looked superior. Actually, it was a combination of guts and go that got this team to the semi-finals despite the loss to Gimnasia in the pool league.

For the first time, one saw an Indian team not losing a match before getting on to the field. The resignation with which Indian players face foreign opposition was totally lacking. In almost every match, Mohammedan Sporting played an open game and carried the fight into the "enemy" territory. This paid them rich dividends because, once shorn of the natural impediment of fear, the players were able to play their natural game. Teamwork was superb and the opportunities well utilised.

The only unfortunate part of this success was that it made hopes soar far too high as Mohammedan Sporting faced Olimpia in the semi-finals. Club supporters, who by their presence in thousands raised the organisers' hopes of breaking even if the locals reached the finals, went berserk when a penalty was converted against them. Missiles were flung on the ground, chairs were uprooted from the stands and the game held up for a good 15 minutes. Thereafter, the team played well but could not score against the better-equipped Olimpia. The team from Paraguay played cool but the match was keenly fought by Mohammedan Sporting.

But unsporting behaviour reached an all-time high as far as India was concerned when the Argentinian team displayed the worst aspects of today's professionalism in their semi-final encounter with Lyngby. They literally tore the opposition apart every time the Danish players worked up a rhythm and, aided by very soft supervision by an Indian referee, kept making off-the-ball fouls and disrupted the proceedings by arguing needlessly with the referee and the opposition. Things came to a head when a player from the reserve bench went in to manhandle one of the Danish players and the team doctor also entered the playing area to try and waste some more time. Quite naturally, a spokesman of the Danish club remarked that his team lost to "the South American animals".

But severe warnings from the tournament committee and the prospect of possible penalties by FIFA sobered the team and they played clean football in the final with Olimpia. And once they did that, their shortcomings were thoroughly exposed. Without 'match-disrupting' tactics, the players seemed to run out of ideas, especially when trying to contain the marauding Olimpia players. The latter played superb football, with stamina assisting the remarkable fitness and footwork, coupled with uncanny understanding among the players. They played vintage football to take home the Nehru trophy.



From the Indian point of view the redeeming feature of this competition was the performance of Mohammedan Sporting

But the lack of transport, the disgust with local football and the International Film Festival which was on simultaneously in the city robbed Calcuttans of some great moments of soccer. The net effect may well be the end of top-level international tournaments in the city where, on some days, the gate collections were as abysmally low as Rs 1000! No organisation can sustain such loss—the AIFF lost a good Rs 43 lakhs on this misadventure. •

Arijit Sen/Calcutta

WE COVER VARIOUS RISKS FOR YOUR PLANT AND MACHINERY.

As an industrialist, you may be setting up a new project. Or modernising your production capacity with new machinery and equipment. Or expanding your plant for higher capacity

Subject to certain exclusions, New India's Marine-cum-Erection Policy provides comprehensive cover for new machinery and equipment under installation. The cover starts from the time the plant and machinery leave the manufacturer's warehouse to the time they reach the site of erection. Thereafter, the policy covers risks of storage (pending erection), as well as risks during erection, testing and commissioning.

At an additional premium, the policy also covers risks of third party liability, surrounding property damages, express freight, additional customs duty, and escalation in price of plant and machinery.

So, get in touch with your nearest New India Office for further information. You'd be settling for the services of India's largest international insurance company.

NEW INDIA ASSURANCE

A Subsidiary of the General Insurance Corporation of India

1919 1989

BORN TO LEAD

MARINE-CUM-ERECTION POLICY FROM NEW INDIA.

CONTOUR ADS-NIA-251D/89

ODDS AND TRENDS

D P SINHA

Amjad Ali Khan inaugurating the Ikebana exhibition

Sepal spring

■ The selfish giant won the hearts of children with flowers. S. Ali is all set to win the hearts of the people of Calcutta with flowers. His boutique 'Sepal', at the Royal Living Exhibition at Park Hotel, has 60 different kinds of flowers to offer to the public. 'Sepal' is the only stall for artificial flower decoration known as Ikebana. This exquisite handicraft is Ali's fertile imagination. He has worked round the clock to make it a success. Ali hopes that his efforts will surely not go waste if the Calcuttan responds wholeheartedly with all his idle curiosity and enthusiasm. With winter on the wane, the flowers of 'Sepal' can welcome the spring.

Airline surprise

■When you're travelling by an Indian Airlines flight you should be prepared for a shock or an irreversible trauma. A person who was travelling by an Indian Airlines flight from Delhi to Madras had a bad and unpalatable experience so far as the food served on the flight was concerned. He ordered non-vegetarian food. Soon a smiling air hostess brought a tray containing the sealed food. He opened the packet thinking that it would contain hot and sumptuous stuff as the packet bore the seal of a five-star hotel's catering unit.

The quantity of food was okay and so he started off. Quietly enjoying his dinner he was suddenly struck by something odd when the spoon picked up some foreign matter. Guess what? It was a beedi stub. He was shocked that such a thing could occur on a flight and that too an expensive one. Well if this had happened on the railways one could have believed it but it was hard to digest that the country's premier airlines would serve food which contained such an abominable thing as a beedi. The man has taken a vow that he will never travel on an Indian Airlines flight again

THIS INDIA

GHAZIABAD: The thesis papers of three PhD students of Meerut University found their way to a wastepaper seller even before degrees could be awarded to them. The research papers submitted by Nandini Singh, Maya Devi and Veena Khera were discovered at the shop of a wastepaper seller Anis, in Muzaffarnagar. Anis used to buy wastepaper from the university and the research work might have been sold to him by mistake. The three candidates are yet to take their oral examinations for the awarding of degrees. Prominent educationists have demanded an enquiry into the incident and called for action against those responsible—The Hindustan Times (Babu Vellera, New Delhi)

ILLUSTRATIONS DEBASHIS DEB

MADRAS: Balasubramaniam alias Mani, who used his collection of 44 ration cards to buy commodities from ration shops in the city and make a profit by selling them in the open market for a higher price, was arrested. He was trapped by the police at a ration shop in Korukkupet, as part of a drive to check interference of touts and anti-social elements in the distribution of commodities at ration shops. Belonging to Cheriyan Nagar, Mani had 44 ration cards made out in the names of various persons using which he could draw ration from 11 shops in north Madras—Indian Express (S. Siva Kumar, Madras)

AGARTALA: An attempt to save the life of a pet goat cost a woman her life when she challenged miscreants who were butchering it in a nearby jungle in Mandari village in Belonia sub-division. The woman was seriously injured in the skirmish that followed and succumbed to her injuries in the hospital. The police arrested two persons in this connection—The Telegraph (D.J. Patro, Bhubaneswar)

INDORE: Swayamvaram, the ancient practice of groom selection, came in handy for a young girl from Naliheda town in Madhya Pradesh, when she was allowed to choose her life partner at a "parichay sammelan" (introduction conference). 20-year-old Seema was among scores of young, eligible women and men who had assembled at the sammelan. She caught the fancy of two boys' families. The dilemma was sorted out when she was asked to choose her mate. Seema chose Brijmohan of Sahore district, and her parents readily offered Re 1 to the boy as a mark of acceptance—The Telegraph (Roy George, Dimapur)

Act with confidence
Being a man has its own privileges And pleasures.
Enjoy every moment of it — with confidence.
With New Moods
Super-thin, super-strong condoms made with the latest Japanese technology.
Ask for Moods by name.
The Indian condom of international quality.
Now, you can also order Moods by mail.
Kindly send me a pack of 15 MOODS
Condoms at the Retail Price
Name
Address
Pincode
Enclosed please find a Cheque* / Postal Order for Rs 19.50, made in favour of FPS
Send your Coupon to
FPS PB No 16603, Bombay 400 018
*Only Bombay cheques acceptable MOODS
3 LUBRICATED
COLOURED CONDOMS
NOW IN A BOLD, NEW PACK
New MOODS
Hindustan Latex Limited
The world's largest manufacturer of condoms
R K SWAMY/HLL/7457

BEGINNING 4 FEBRUARY 1990 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (21 March—20 April)

Your income will increase commensurate your expenditure. Do not lend money for it will be difficult for you to get it back. An elderly relative might create problems. There might be problems on the domestic front.

Good dates: 4, 7 and 10
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 7
Favourable direction: West

TAURUS (21 April—20 May)

Do not sign any document before giving it a thorough check. Important papers should be kept in safe custody. An unexpected event might upset your plans. Check extravagance. A favourable time for marriage.

Good dates: 6, 8 and 10
Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 8
Favourable direction: North

GEMINI (21 May—20 June)

The financial front looks bright and prospective. Students might secure foreign scholarships. You can start on a new venture. The time is ripe for romance. Avoid taking hasty decisions. Keep an eye on your health.

Good dates: 5, 6 and 8
Lucky numbers: 5, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: East

CANCER (21 June—20 July)

You might have to undertake a journey which may provide you with a likely solution to a nagging problem. Those in service are likely to get promotions. This is a good time to seek favours from your superiors.

Good dates: 7, 8 and 9
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 6
Favourable direction: South

LEO (21 July—20 August)

A pleasant surprise is in store for you this week. You may, however, incur some financial losses. Matters relating to the heart are not well indicated. Avoid making fresh investments.

Good dates: 4, 5 and 6
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: South-west

VIRGO (21 August—20 September)

The week is not a good one for you. The time is not favourable for entering into new business ventures. You may have to go in for loans. However, love and matrimonials are well indicated.

Good dates: 5, 7 and 9
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: West

LIBRA (21 September—20 October)

Your determination and perseverance will help you to tide over your problems this week. Do not indulge in speculation or gambling. Your seniors and superiors will be helpful to you.

Good dates: 4, 9 and 10
Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: North-east

SCORPIO (21 October—20 November)

A successful week lies ahead of you. A good friend will help you solve a problem that has been worrying you for long. Keep a close watch on your health. Be careful in your dealings with the opposite sex.

Good dates: 6, 7 and 9
Lucky numbers: 4, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: South

SAGITTARIUS (21 November—20 December)

This is going to be a good week for you. New ventures are likely to make steady progress. Be cautious on the domestic front Be careful in the dealings with your near ones. A past error might take its toll on you.

Good dates: 8, 9 and 10
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 8
Favourable direction: East

CAPRICORN (21 December—20 January)

Your ambition and ability to work hard will bring you success. Secret matters will make steady progress. Intellectuals will contribute to your happiness. You will gain new friends. But avoid straining yourself too much.

Good dates: 7, 8 and 10
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: North-east

AQUARIUS (21 January—20 February)

A fair measure of good fortune is in store for you. But avoid taking hasty decisions, risks and loans. Postpone your plans for the future. You are advised to be on your guard against deception.

Good dates: 5, 6 and 9
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 4
Favourable direction: South

PISCES (21 February—20 March)

You will undergo a lot of physical and mental strain this week. Your efforts may not bear fruit. Lawsuits might cause anxiety. Politicians should be extremely cautious. Your domestic front will be peaceful.

Good dates: 4, 5 and 7
Lucky numbers: 5, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: West

STAR PARTNERS: LIBRA—ARIES

Both the partners should be careful not to make their relationship a drab, mundane affair. Though mutual attraction exists, the Libran's brooding nature might clash with her husband's practical sense. So, the union will go perfectly well, if the couple is willing to exercise discretion. ●

Invest in a future of total comfort

TIRUPATI TEXKNIT LTD.

Public Issue of Rs. 27,50,000 Equity Shares of Rs. 10/- each for cash at a premium of Rs. 2/- per share aggregating Rs. 3.3 crores.

Premium Issue Opens on 12th February, 1990.

T.T. – the mark of excellence for over 25 years.

For application form, Please contact Share Brokers or Bankers to the issue

Standing guard

For all the Raja's protestations (he was going to be treated like any other ordinary citizen, traffic should not be stopped for him, etc.) he has become as much a prisoner of his security apparatus as his predecessor.

And what's more, so has his family. Recently, a bunch of Special Protection Group (SPG) guards landed in Calcutta to provide security for V.P. Singh's granddaughters. Their duties: to escort the young girls to school and back, and hang around while the little ones attended classes. (In the original arrangement, the Calcutta Police would look after the security of the Raja's brood.) The Prime Minister's daughter also came in for special attention: a security cordon was thrown around her apartment, and the

V.P. Singh: prisoner of his security apparatus

SPG stood guard outside her door at all times.

Apparently, all these special arrangements are only a fall-out of the Rubaiya Sayeed kidnapping. The administration is taking no chances this time around.

Lal sees red

We weren't joking when we asked you not to laugh at Chaudhuri Devi Lal. For, you might just end up laughing the other side of your mouth.

HEARD IN KRISHI BHAVAN

After Devi Lal became agriculture minister, we realise that even Bhajan Lal would have made a better choice for the post. This man just doesn't listen.

A MINISTRY OFFICIAL

As K.R. Puniya has been doing of late. Even when Puniya led a mass resignation bid of Haryana ministers immediately before the general election, it had been obvious—to those who know the Chaudhuri—that he would be made to pay. I would have made him the President of India, the Chaudhuri had declared in his inimitable style. He has committed the mistake of his lifetime by betraying me.

Puniya took this as the empty boast of an old and foolish man. But Devi Lal may well manage to make good his threat. For, K.R. Puniya has a younger brother: P.L. Puniya, an IAS officer and managing director of the State Industrial Finance Corporation.

Devi Lal: hell hath no fury...

The Chaudhuri has, apparently, decided to extract revenge on his former minister by ruining his sibling's life—or at the very least, his career. He has already met Mulayam Singh Yadav, the Uttar Pradesh chief minister, in this connection, to ask him to confer a punishment posting on the officer.

Bhure Lal, who is a good friend of the man, has managed to protect him until now But the Chaudhuri's malignancy may well prevail.

THERMOMETER

All the candidates for the Bihar chief ministership

- Lallu Prasad Yadav: Former leader of the Opposition in the Bihar Assembly, he is now a Janata Dal MP. But the Devi Lal-Sharad Yadav lobby would rather have him back in the state as chief minister.
- Ram Sharan Das: Former chief minister of Bihar and now president of the state unit of the Dal. He has the support of the Ajit Singh group in his bid for the chief ministership.
- Ram Bilas Paswan: Even though he has been awarded a Cabinet berth at the centre, he still wishes to take over government at the state level. Is banking on the Raja's support in this attempt.
- Raghunath Jha: Was removed from the presidentship of the state Janata Dal unit. His ambitions are, however, intact. Wants to become chief minister with Chandra Shekhar's blessings.
- Shatrughan Sinha: Though a relative newcomer in state politics, he is lobbying hard for the CM's post. The V.P. Singh camp will probably support his candidature, as well as the BJP.
- Kalieshpati Mishra: If seat adjustments in Bihar are such as provide for a BJP chief minister, then he will get the nod.

Legality be damned

Arbitrary appointments there have been many. But the elevation of Arun Jaitley to the post of additional solicitor general last week had Supreme Court circles abuzz. Jaitley, a former ABVP student leader and Supreme Court lawyer was denied a Bharatiya Janata Party ticket in the last elections, even though he is, reportedly, a member of that party's charmed circle. He has, however, now been adequately recompensed.

While most such appointments are political, what is alarming about this case is that the articulate lawyer-politician was not even designated a senior counsel by the Supreme Court, and yet, considered suitable for the post. Hours before he was appointed to his new office, there was a hurried full court meeting of the High Court, to elevate Jaitley to the exalted category of senior counsels.

Clearly, the BJP wins every time, and the so-called independence of the judiciary is no exception. •

Imperfect ten

A few months ago, Dr Karan Singh had gone hoarse complaining to all who would listen that Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi was proving all too elusive. That, no matter how many requests he put in for a meeting, he never managed to get an appointment.

This, coupled with the fact that the Raja had visited him off and on during his political exile, made Dr Singh reasonably sure that he would retain the ambassadorship to the United States

Dr Karan Singh: the call cost him dear

The poet-politician had another guess coming. When he came down to New Delhi last, he asked for an appointment with the new Prime Minister Only to be kept waiting for two days by V.P. Singh. In the meanwhile, the ambassador decided to pay Rajiv Gandhi a courtesy visit. He was summoned to Gandhi's Parliament House office almost immediately and exchanged pleasantries for around ten minutes.

That was enough. Intelligence sources reported the meeting to the Raja, who, in a fit of pique, refused to grant an audience to the unfortunate Singh And no sooner did the envoy reach Washington than he was informed that he should resign, or else...

Dr Singh was left with no option but to quit.

HEARD IN CENTRAL HALL.

It was Mera Bharat Mahan then. It is Mera Bharat Mann now.

A NATIONAL FRONT MP

No technocrats required

The country may rejoice that merit has finally been rewarded. But Janata Dal MPs are very cross at the appointment of such non-political persons as Dr M.G.K. Menon and Dr Raja Ramanna to the Union council of ministers.

There is little sense, argue party members, in appointing these people when political heavyweights such as Vidya Charan Shukla, Raj Mangal Pandey Yashwant Singh, K C. Tyagi and Janeshwar Mishra remain unrewarded with ministerial berths

Dr Raja Ramanna: the PM's choice

It technocrats need to be inducted into government at all, surely they can be designated advisers to the Prime Minister, with Cabinet rank? This was what Rajiv Gandhi had done and there's no reason why the Raja cannot emulate him on this score. At least this would obviate the need for finding Rajya Sabha seats for them.

But the Raja refuses to see reason. And the latest rumours doing the rounds in the capital have it that Vinod Pande and Bhure Lal will also be joining the ministry very soon!

Going places?

Yet another journalist to be all set for a career switch. Kuldip Nayar's name, say informed sources, is being suggested as the next Indian high commissioner to Pakistan.

Apparently Nayar's name was first suggested for the governorship of a state, but the veteran journalist made his disinterest clear. He'd rather be envoy to Pakistan, he said. Good friend Inder Kumar Gujral, evidently, agreed that this was a good idea.

So, the next couple of years might just find Nayar stationed in Islamabad.

Kuldip Nayar: bound for Pakistan ?

BAROMETER

How the filmi groupies rate at the Raja's durbar

Raj Babbar: His fund-collection sprees for the Dal and his campaigning during the recent election have ensured his place in the durbar. Called to Delhi for consultations every week, Babbar may well be granted a Rajya Sabha seat. Is specially close to the Rani.

Shabana Azmi: Used to be a Raja favourite until a few months ago when V P. Singh made it a point to visit her on every visit to Bombay Now, however, she finds it difficult to wanglean audience.Rumours have it that the Prime Minister'sOffice is also delaying her appointment as chairman of the Children's Film Festival Shatrughan Sinha: His influence remains undiminished, with government officials lining up outside his door to get recommendation letters. The latest is that the Dal is seriously considering making him the chief minister of Bihar.

Mithun Chakraborty: Though he has thrown in his lot with the Opposition, he doesn't have much access to the Prime Minister, allegedly because of his closeness to the communists.

Uttarpara Public Library

Zeeshan Ali meets Power. Power Tennis Gear. Tennis Shoes. Socks. T-shirts and shorts. Rackets and balls. The champion's range. Wear the Power. Feel the Power. And gear up for that awesome performance.

Available at select Bata and POWERSPORTS stores

POWER.

LINTAS:CAL/BAP/112/2719

MAKE YOUR INTERIORS
A PERMANENT SHOWPIECE OF INTERNATIONAL ART

Imagine creating interiors as classy as European art galleries! All you need is Art Concept. 'International Art' laminates for the first time in India. With designs admirably painted by French, German and Italian art-maestros. Conceived in collaboration with the most aesthetic innovators in interiors, Dekodur of West Germany.

Art Concept. So imaginative, no two sheets are absolutely identical. However, sheets of a given art motive are similar in colour and pattern. For authenticity, each sheet is signed by the artist rendering the masterpiece. The sheer exclusivity qualifies Art Concept for very selective and intelligent use.

Art Concept is created for your exclusive lifestyle by Caprihans — The people who give you Sungloss 1.5 mm and 1 mm laminates, besides unique, new surfaces like Sungloss Metallica, Sundekor furniture film and Sunlip edge banding. All fine art!

SunGLOSS
Art concept
STUDIO SERIES LAMINATES

Only from caprihans
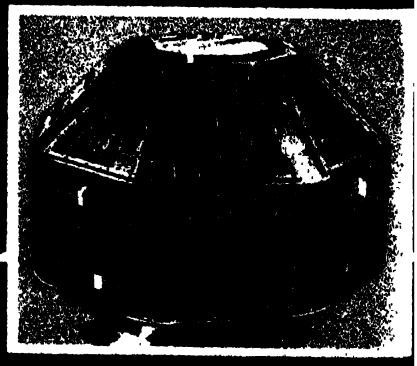
The Pioneers

H... 25575, 52062 ... Bangalo... Tel: 680334, ... Calcutta Tel: ... 729 ... Cochin Tlx: 0... 02... IN

26 AUGUST—1 SEPTEMBER 1990 □ AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION □ RS 7.00

PAKISTAN: AGE OF UNCERTAINTY



Millions of years ago this immense mass took shape as a planet we call EARTH

The history of Zinc in India dates back to over 2500 years, when mining took place in Zawar, Rajasthan. Now once again, India is exploring new horizons in this field and is poised to join the world league of major zinc producers.

Hindustan Zinc Limited, a Government of India Enterprise, came into being in 1966. Today, HZL is a multi-unit, multi-faceted company with a nationwide network of sales offices and stock points. Its new mining & smelting complex, now under construction in Rajasthan, will double HZL's metal output by 1991-92, to vastly improve the demand satisfaction for strategic base metals and allied products.

Millions of years later Man flings it back into outer-space on spaceships and satellites He calls it ZINC

SILVER JUBILEE YEAR (1966-1991) Hindustan Zinc Limited

(A Government of India Enterprise)

Growing to meet the challenges of growth

Newfields

CONTENTS

SUNDAY
VOLUME 17 □ ISSUE 34 □ RS 7.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION
26 AUGUST –1 SEPTEMBER 1990

24
COVER STORY
Mid-term poll?
Prime Minister V.P. Singh's Independence Day speech gave ample evidence that he was willing to go to the people.

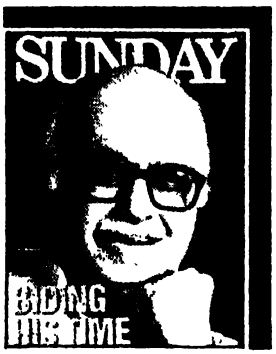
14
NEWSWATCH
Rallying the farmers
With Devi Lal out of the government, the Congress(I) makes a serious bid to woo the peasants.

15
INTERVIEW
"We will not yield to pressure"
Union labour minister Ram Vilas Paswan on the anti-reservation stir.

50
HERITAGE
Art in the times of decay
Three hundred years and still going strong. That's Calcutta's cultural history.

58
BUSINESS
Exit Lakshman
The ITDC chairman-cum managing director resigns.

72
TRENDS
Follow the leader
More and more filmstars and celebrities are taking to modelling.



78
EXTRACT
War
An imaginative account of what might happen in the event of an India-Pakistan conflict.

LETTERS 4
GOSSIP SWEET AND SOUR 7
COUNTERVIEW 10
MANI-TALK 16
SOUTH BLOCK 19
CAPITAL MATTERS 23
NEWSWATCH 41
Battle for Bombay
FOCUS 43
A crown of thorns
SPOTLIGHT 44
KHAAS BAAT 71
GUEST COLUMN 75
MEDIA MUSINGS 76
THE TUBE 85
MILESTONES 86
SUNDAYWEEK 87
RANDOM NOTES 89
DELHI DIARY 90

Cover transparency:
Shooter

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu and edited by Vir Sanghvi from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001 Air surcharge for Srinagar ex-Delhi and Tripura: 20 paise North-eastern states: 30 paise

Waiting in the wings

The cover story (Biding his time, 5—11 August) was well-written. The Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP)—perhaps the only disciplined party in India—is capable of lifting the country out of the present morass. Despite the National Front government's several drawbacks, the BJP is still lending it support.

The Janata Dal is not functioning all. It is plagued by infighting and internal squabbles. Punjab and Kashmir are burning, and inflation seems to have reached an all-time high. The latest reservation policy speaks volumes of the so-called secularism of the front regime. Therefore, the BJP, minus the RSS, might be a good bet after all.

U.S. Iyer, Bangalore (Karnataka)

■ It has been an excellent assessment of the goings-on in Delhi. The Prime Minister's offer to resign followed by the unceremonious dismissal of the deputy prime minister has shaken the foundations of the National Front government. At present, the nation seems to be in the throes of a deep crisis. Even during the last days of the Janata Party government in the late Seventies such things never happened.

Hence L.K. Advani's advice to his partymen to be prepared for a snap poll seems timely. The Congress(I) is also thinking along the same lines. It is high time that the Centre got down to the business of governing, for the BJP might not tolerate its dithering any longer. Therefore, the BJP is doing the right thing by adopting a wait-and-see policy and at the same time gearing itself up for a mid-term poll.

Kali Charan Banerjee, Calcutta, (West Bengal)

Raring to go

In tennis, Leander Paes seems to be the only hope for India. He has done the nation proud by bagging the junior Wimbledon crown (Game, set and match, 22—28 July). However, what is distressing to find is that he is unable to take part in all tournaments. Whenever Ramesh Krishnan plays any match abroad, he is given free passage by Air India to the venue. If Paes is also extended similar facilities, it will be easier for him to attend tournaments abroad and gain more experience.

A. Srinivasa Murthy, Secunderabad (Andhra Pradesh)

L.K. Advani (extreme right) : a credible alternative ?

Paes: India's only hope

Taking a stand

The article by Shrabani Basu on (Off the stands?, 29 July—4 August) was truly flattering. It was more so because for more than a quarter of a century, the Indian press corps stationed in London have tended to ignore the India Weekly.

She says that the paper is broadly recognised as a Congress newspaper. Though this is largely true, her observation is not entirely correct. If we have supported the Congress, despite its present problems, it is because we believe that it is the only organisation that can ensure the unity and integrity of the country. A more effective party may be forged one day; but till that happens, it would be unwise to destroy or throw away the instrument that we have in hand.

Iqbal Singh, New Delhi

Way ahead

With reference to the article (Whisper and stayfree, 15—21 July), I would like to draw your attention to certain factual inaccuracies.

The retail audit by ORG puts Johnson and Johnson's market share at 80 per cent and not 65 per cent as stated in the article. The statement that J&J is overreacting to Procter&Gamble's entry in the market is not true, for over two decades, J&J is constantly providing women with the right kind of sanitary protection—hygienic and innovative. A visit to the nearest chemist will provide enough evidence of Johnson & Johnson's wide range of feminine products.

Johnson's Stayfree guarantees a natural feeling, which is most essential in our warm and humid climate. It is also disposable, unlike other feminine hygiene products.

By investing huge amounts in research and development, J&J has emerged as the pioneer in meeting the growing needs of women. So it really doesn't matter to Johnson & Johnson as to who competes with them—as they are way ahead of others, armed with a wide range of products, which offer the consumer a wide choice.

Rahul Kansal, Bombay (Maharashtra)

■ The article on sanitary napkins seems to be one-sided. One is really surprised to find that the single most important shortcoming of this new product—that it is not disposable by flushing down the toilet—has been omitted. To this, people like me will simply have to say, "No thanks!"

Amrita Halder, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ Pinkie Virani's article on personal care was very interesting. Proper care should be taken in the disposal of used napkins. Lately, a company is providing disposable bags along with their napkins. Most women throw used ones into the streets. Children also ask curious questions about them. A more discreet method of disposal should be thought of by the manufacturers.

C.K. Ramani, Madras (Tamil Nadu)

Frozen frames

Raghubir Singh's perspective on (Kashmir, then and now, 8—14 July) was a tremendous job. The photographs, particularly the one showing an old woman weeping, is the best. Today, Kashmir is aflame and the situation is turning from bad to worse. It is time the powers that be woke up and thought of something constructive to solve the Kashmir problem.

Fayaz Mir, Srinagar (Jammu and Kashmir)

Nowhere to go

One really feels sorry for the Kashmiri migrants (The exodus, 15—21 July) who had to flee the Valley. The government has treated them callously so far. The government should realise that the problem cropped up after the removal of Jagmohan. The situation has come to such a pass that if suitable measures are not taken, the whole nation might have to suffer. The migrants can neither return to their homes nor stay at the camps they have been put up in indefinitely. Their future seems to be very grim indeed.

Kashmiri migrants: homeless in their own land

B. Nithyananda Rao, Tezpur (Assam)

Their problems, our problems

Inder Malhotra's observations in (Big brother backs out, 5—11 August) were rightly timed. It is high time the present regime at the Centre gave a second thought to its stand relating to strife-torn Sri Lanka.

With Karunanidhi accusing the IPKF of genocide, V.P. Singh remaining silent on his partner's allegations and the LTTE going on the rampage even on Indian soil, President Premadasa of Sri Lanka got the much-needed opportunity to internationalise the issue. This gimmick of Premadasa may spell disaster for all sides concerned.

Krishnendu Chakrabarti, Howrah (West Bengal)

Premadasa: blaming India

A true saint

The piece on Deoraha Baba (Death of a Godman, 15—21 July) has cast aspersions on one of the true saints of our time. He was a plain and simple man who tried to awaken the goodness in all who came in contact with him. He blessed anybody and everybody who happened to seek his blessings. His ashram was open to all and sundry irrespective of caste, creed and colour. He never owned any property. In fact, every offering made to him was distributed as prasad among his devotees.

Sachchidanand Pandy, Lucknow (Uttar Pradesh)

The infighting continues

The cover story (Friday the 13th, 22—28 July) was interesting. The repeated crises within the Janata Dal have shaken the people's confidence in the National Front government. The Prime Minister's resignation drama was a big blunder. V.P. Singh should have realised that the nation would only accept him as the Prime Minister, and nobody else.

B. Nithyananda Rao, Tezpur (Assam)

A shattered dream

The article on Maneka Gandhi's resignation (A quiet protest, 29 July—4 August) was quite absorbing. It seems that Maneka's educational background, youth and personality went against her. It is apparent that nobody is willing to work and she was perhaps one of the few who was trying to get things done. She had a purpose in whatever she was doing. In fact, India needs more dynamic persons like Maneka at the helm of affairs to change the face of the nation.

Maneka : unfortunate

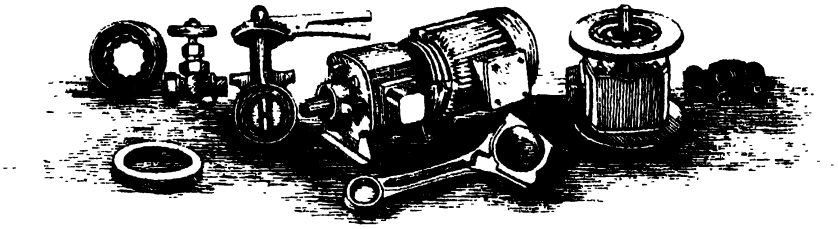
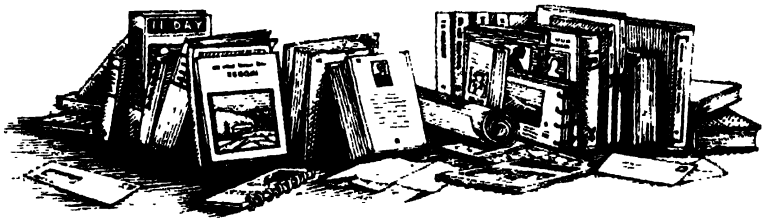
P.N. Banerji, Meerut (Uttar Pradesh)



The lost cause

There are doubts about the National Front government lasting its full term as it is losing its credibility day by day (The aftermath, 29 July—4 August). The government seems to have been immobilised by infighting and factionalism. It is least bothered about the people as is clear from its forgotten promises.



Balia Das, Vani Vihar (Orissa)

IN THE LAST 21 YEARS, WE'VE DELIVERED MILES OF GARMENT SAMPLES.

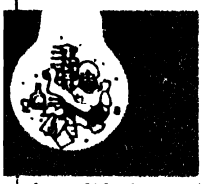
TENS OF THOUSANDS OF SPARE PARTS OF EVERY TYPE AND SIZE.

HUNDREDS OF TONS OF PRINTED LITERATURE.

AND MILLIONS OF OTHER CONSIGNMENTS.

WHATEVER GAVE YOU THE IMPRESSION WE ONLY CARRY DOCUMENTS?

RAKA:3150:A:90



21 years ago, we pioneered the air express industry. Since then, we've been carrying shipments of all types, shapes, sizes and weight. From the ordinary – such as garments, leather samples and printed literature, to the unusual – such as blood samples and even the occasional pregnant cow. Hundreds of thousands of consignments, door-tc-door, everyday. And always, through one network, with one service, and one all-inclusive invoice. The next time you have a shipment to send, why not call us for an immediate pick-up?

We are listed in the Yellow Pages/Telephone Directories.

DHL
WORLDWIDE EXPRESS®
DHL THE COURIER DIVISION OF AIRFREIGHT LIMITED.

KHUSHWANT SINGH

Violet Dias Lannoy

I take great pleasure in introducing an Indian author unknown outside her circle of friends because very little of her writing was published during her lifetime. She wrote one long novel, some novellas and short stories. Most of the stuff she sent to publishers was returned to her. "Paper the walls with your rejection slips but never lose hope," wrote the celebrated black American novelist Richard Wright, who admired her work. So she persisted with her writing. At long last, her Pears From the Willow Tree was published some years after her death. The title was taken from an Indian proverb: "When a man is confused, he expects pears from the willow tree."

Violet Dias had good reason to be a very confused person. She was one of three children of Jose Vicente Dias and Maria Clara, Goan Catholics, born in 1925 in Mozambique, then a Portuguese colony, where her father was working as a civil servant. She spent her childhood years in Laurence Marques, the capital of Mozambique. At the age of eleven, she returned to her native Goa before moving on to Belgaum for her schooling. She was an exceptionally bright student, topping her class in every examination and won a scholarship to Santa Sophia school and later St. Francis Xavier College in Bombay. By then she was no longer a practising Catholic and was caught up in the freedom movement as an ardent devotee of Mahatma Gandhi. She never accepted his views on celibacy and non-violence in all circumstances but wholeheartedly supported his dedication to work amongst the lowliest of the low. After Partition of the country, she gave up further studies to work in the Kurukshetra refugee camp. It was there she met the Mahatma who was by then, she recorded "a broken man living in the ruins of a shattered dream". His assassination, a few months later, left a deep scar on her mind and she decided to propagate Gandhism as best as she could.

Violet married a Parsi, Behram Warden, and the two worked among slum dwellers in Bombay. In 1951, Behram died suddenly leaving her some ancestral property. It took her ten years of litigation to establish her claim over it. And when she got it she put it in a trust fund for poor students. For some years she taught in a school in Goa. She won a Tata scholarship and proceeded to London to study educational psychology at the University College. Even in England she involved herself in the Goan liberation movement but when the Indian Army moved into Goa, she protested vehemently because it was not the Gandhian way of doing things. For some years she made her home in Paris and Israel. Despite her deep sympathy for Jews she did not accept their setting up a state by confiscating Arab lands. It was in Israel that she met the English photographer, Richard Lannoy, whom she married later. They travelled together extensively over Africa and India. It was not till she was 32 that she took to writing but with little hope of getting her works published. In a private journal she maintained she wrote in 1971:

"Where has my mistake been? In forgetting that one needs a community of people? In believing that man lives by ideas? That sincerity matters? Truth is in life, in the process of living; hence Chandidas: 'There's no truth higher than man.' In the vapid round of parties, in accepting people one despises? Social solidarity? At least they are saved from the sheer desolation of Midnight Cowboys.

Violet Dias is unknown because very little of her writing was published during her lifetime. She wrote one long novel, some novellas and short stories. Her Pears From the Willow Tree was published some years after her death

"The root of the trouble with me is that I want to write—and haven't succeeded...Writing is a way of life—like being the traditional story-teller—hit requires a certain personality, lifestyle and pace of living—can't sustain it while holding an alienating job in an alienating human environment (Nairobi, not Kenya)...The trouble with me is that I am only an aspiring writer—and so don't have the confidence of my position. Actually a failed writer. But my personality, the real me, still remains that of a writer, the outsider—that's my dharma...But I was not confident nor aware enough to turn to creative writing early on—too many layers of mediocrity in my background, as a Christian and a Goan—and a colonial subject: having to succeed in society and on the other hand scorning it."

Her last active years were spent in doing assignments for UNESCO, which took her to Kenya and Uganda. She was taken very ill and returned to England to be hospitalised. Her last visit to Goa was in 1972. She spent her time painting in the verandah of her parents' bungalow. It was there that she quietly faded into death. Following her own wish her body was cremated and her ashes scattered beside Old Goa's white cupolas and on Vagator Beach.

Violet Dias Lannoy's Pears From the Willow Tree may soon be published in India.

Sporting minister

A minister after giving away prizes at a football match made a hard-hitting speech: "Ladies and gentlemen, for the last one hour I have been watching the match. I am sorry to say that even after 43 years of Independence, the federation could provide only one ball to 20 players and the poor players were left with no option but to kick it from one side to the other. I would request the government to give a good grant to the federation so that they could provide one ball to each player so that they can play it the way they like.

(Contributed by Promode Kapoor, New Delhi) ●

Uttarakhand Jankaushal Vishwavidyalaya Library

The simplest, most profitable route to tax exemption on Capital gains.

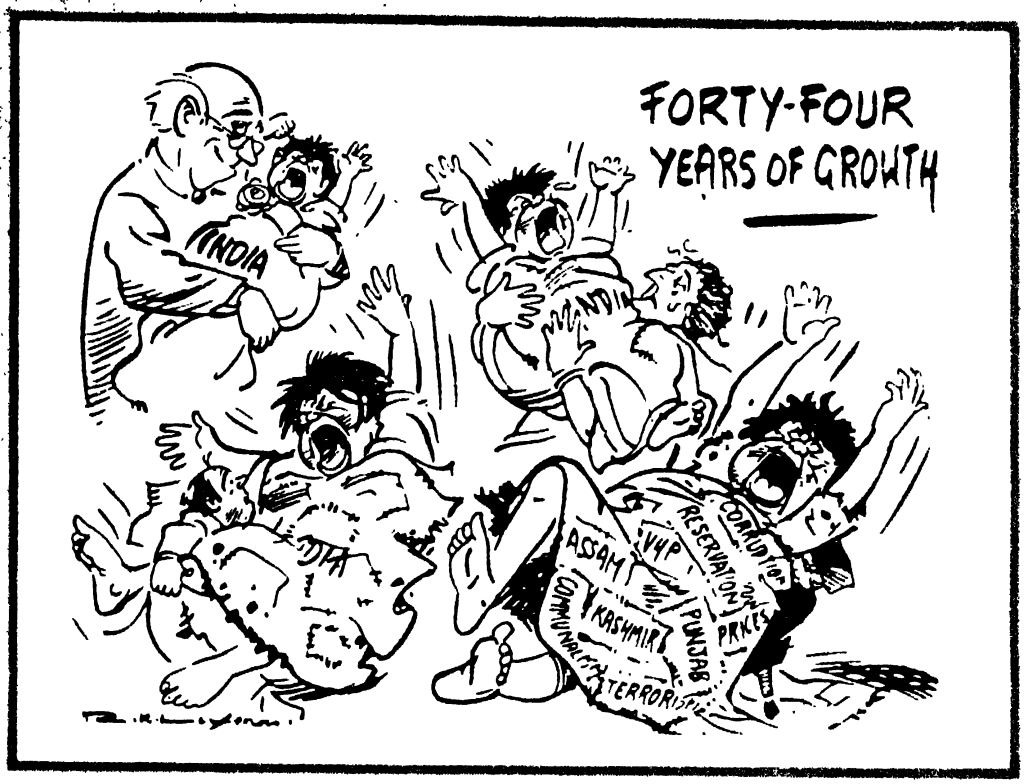
Get 100% tax exemption on your capital gains from sale/transfer of long-term capital assets such as land, buildings, shares and securities, jewellery, etc.

NHB 9% Capital Bonds have benefits in store for you – and your capital.

- Your investment earns 9% per annum payable on a six-monthly basis.
- Or, you can opt for advance payment of interest at the rate of 9% per annum for the full period of 3 years on a discounted basis, at the rate of Rs. 240 per Rs. 1000 invested, payable 3 months from the date of investment.

  This takes into account the interest for the intervening period of 3 months in full – so, you do not lose interest even for a single day.
- And yes, there is no deduction of tax at source on the interest earned.
- Exemption from Capital gains tax U/S 54E of the Income Tax Act, 1961.
- Exemption from Wealth Tax U/S 5(1)(xvic) of the Wealth Tax Act, 1957.
- Exemption of interest U/S 80L of Income Tax Act, 1961.
- Remittance charges borne by NHB.
- Available at par throughout the year. At more than 130 outlets all over the country.
- With NHB 9% Capital Bonds, you have this added satisfaction - your investment will contribute to the betterment of housing in the country.

Application forms available and accepted at:



National Housing Bank offices (Bombay & Delhi) • CANFINA offices • 125 branches of the six bankers to the issue: Allahabad Bank • Bank of Baroda • Canara Bank • Citibank (Sakhar Bhavan, Bombay) • Punjab National Bank and Vysya Bank Ltd.

Managers to the Issue: Canbank Financial Services Limited

NATIONAL HOUSING BANK
(Wholly owned by the Reserve Bank of India)

Opening New Doors On The Home Front.

National Housing Bank: Bombay Life Building, 3rd floor, 45, Veer Nariman Road, Bombay 400 023

R K. LAXMAN/THE TIMES OF INDIA

■ We will win Punjabis with love and defeat anti-Indians with the use of force.

V.P. SINGH, Prime Minister

■ Instead of working on plans to isolate him, attempts should be made to win him over.

MULAYAM SINGH YADAV, Uttar Pradesh chief minister, on Devi Lal, former deputy PM

■ Kashmir today gives the look of hell.

DR FAROOQ ABDULLAH, former Jammu and Kashmir chief minister

■ All citizens may be equal, but non-Hindus are more equal than Hindus.

L.K. ADVANI, BJP president, on what Indian secularism means today

■ You cannot keep all prices down when you have increased the price of fuel.

JYOTI BASU, West Bengal chief minister, justifying the recent hike in bus fares and transport charges

■ Our society seems to be degenerating to barbarism.

R. VENKATARAMAN, President, on the recent spate of violence in the country

■ You despise a politician, you have an ambivalent attitude towards him, yet you want him at your gatherings and functions.

I.K. GUJRAL, external affairs minister, commenting on politicians gracing social occasions

■ Their acts of killings and kidnappings do not project them as revolutionaries.

PRAFULLA MAHANTA, Assam chief minister, on the ULFA

■ Even though, I personally believe that people have the right to know, it is also not advisable to make people see ugly things taking place in the House.

H.A. HALIM, West Bengal Assembly Speaker, commenting on whether photography inside the House should be debarred

■ If you were to use everything he says it would create mayhem.

PRITISH NANDY, editor of The Illustrated Weekly, on Devi Lal

■ I like Bal Thackeray because he's a blunt man and says what's on his mind.

NANA PATEKAR, actor

■ Here, the emphasis is on glamour, not acting.

SRIDEVI, actress, on the Bombay film industry

VINOD MEHTA

Another Hitler?

It suits the West to portray Saddam Hussein as a dangerous lunatic to justify US military presence in the Gulf

"Butcher of Baghdad", "Middle East Hitler," "Sadist Saddam", "Third World psychopath"—the insults are coming in fast and furious as Western media sum up the President of Iraq. A quality London paper, The Observer went to the extent of describing Saddam Hussein as "mentally deranged", a person who frequently suffers from epileptic fits. Unfortunately, little medical testimony was provided to substantiate these conclusions.

Less than two years ago, this same Western press and these same Western leaders were privately and publicly patting the "epileptic," urging him to continue fighting Iran, thus keeping the communalist nordes at bay—of course then, Saddam was a paying customer and countries were lining up to sell him everything from howitzers to frozen food to uniforms. The Americans and the Europeans didn't seem particularly worried about "stability in the Gulf" as the Iranian and Iraqi armies massacred each other. No bombs were dropped on Baghdad when Iraq used poisonous gases on its adversaries. Certainly we had outrage, but it was entirely verbal.

The Americans need to fit Saddam Hussein into the dangerous lunatic mould if they are to achieve a long-cherished goal—a goal that was first enunciated during the Eisenhower era. Fifty per cent of American oil supplies come from the Middle East, so, understandably, the Persian Gulf is of "vital interest" to the United States. However, since the region is perpetually in turmoil, and could be taken over by hostile powers, the Americans have desperately wanted more than just a diplomatic foothold in the area. Until Iraq invaded Kuwait, the justification for that extra foothold was absent. The real "crime" of the Iraqi President, according to seasoned Levant-watchers, is not that he violated the territorial integrity of a friendly neighbour, but that he presented the Americans with an opportunity to establish a short and long-term military presence in the region on a platter.

I am not an apologist for Saddam Hussein. He is a deeply unattractive figure; a tyrant who by ruthless oppression has managed to retain and consolidate power. Amnesty International is wasting its time compiling human rights violations in Iraq. They are just too numerous and too routine for anyone in Baghdad to care.

But is he also a mad man? A Hitler out to conquer the entire Middle East? The West would have us buy this thesis, because unless Saddam Hussein can be portrayed as a crazy despot who will first gobble up Kuwait, then Saudi Arabia, then Syria, and then the smaller kingdoms, there can be no justification for injecting 250,000 troops backed by a mind-boggling array of naval and air power. I hope the editors of The Guiness Book Of Records are alert because the lightning speed with which the Americans managed to deploy their forces in Saudi Arabia may qualify for an entry into their hallowed tome.

Even after consuming reams and reams of newspages full of reportage and comment, I am unable to understand why Saddam Hussein began the admittedly bold, but eventually suicidal, invasion of Kuwait. If he merely desired a few billion dollars or a few hundred kilometres of disputed territory, it surely could have been arranged, courtesy the good offices of King Husain, Hosni Mubarak and Yasser Arafat. My own view is that Saddam Hussein miscalculated and, what was supposed to be bluster and bluff, escalated through unstoppable momentum into full-scale invasion. With most of the "civilised" White world led by the Americans ganging up against him, Saddam couldn't afford to back off.

We should be careful not to misread the reasons why King Husain and America made sure that even while President Mubarak was hosting a crucial Arab summit, its troops were moving into Saudi Arabia

Yasser Arafat have distanced themselves from moves to isolate Iraq militarily and diplomatically. Husain and Arafat have made it clear that they do not condone what Saddam Hussein has done, they do not want the annexation of Kuwait to be legitimised, but they deplore the fact that the Arabs were not given enough time to sort out their problems among themselves. Once American military presence was established within Saudi Arabia, there was no chance for internal Arab diplomacy to succeed.

All of which explains why the Americans were in such a tearing hurry to get into Saudi Arabia. If Arab efforts to talk sense into Saddam Hussein seemed to be making progress, the justification to militarily intervene would disappear. It was an opportunity no American President, especially one who has an eye on re-election, could miss. Accordingly, George Bush made sure that even while President Mubarak was hosting a crucial Arab summit, American troops were moving into Saudi Arabia.

Evidence is slowly emerging of a massive disinformation campaign orchestrated by the Americans to convince the Arabs in particular and the world in general that Saddam Hussein was amassing large forces on the Saudi border. There may have been some troop movements, but the Iraqis insist that they had no intention of invading Saudi Arabia or launching attacks from their side of the border. Would they, they ask, be crazy enough to open a second front when they had barely consolidated their annexation of Kuwait? Would they be crazy enough to give Washington an excuse to bomb Baghdad?

With Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, Saddam Hussein (right) has presented the George Bush administration with an opportunity to establish a military presence in the region on a platter

Saddam Hussein may suffer delusions of grandeur but, they emphasise, he is first and foremost a military commander well-versed in elementary tactics. These do not include hara-kiri.

The hypocrisy of the Americans is unconcealed. They are not concerned with stability in the region. If they were, they would not have been idle spectators to the decade-long carnage in Lebanon or the two-year intifada in the West Bank and Gaza. Arabs can butcher each other till Kingdom come (indeed a little warfare is good for business) and the US will not lift a finger, but if America's vital economic interests are in jeopardy, stability in the region becomes a sacred mantra.

India's response to the crisis has been both measured and sensible. We must not allow ourselves to be hustled by the Americans into supporting blockades, searches, sanctions and freezes. Support must be strictly within United Nation resolutions and only those measures which have the stamp of the Security Council should receive our backing. Already, there is deep disquiet in the UN over the manner in which the US is manipulating post-facto approval for unilateral actions. At some stage, the United Nations' diplomatic machinery will have to throw its full weight and majesty in order to get Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia to the negotiating table. India is ideally placed to play a helpful role in getting that machinery moving. The Secretary General of the United Nations must be desperately looking for mediators who the warring parties can trust. India is surely on top of that short list.

Although, apocalyptic visions of the tyrant raping the Levant are being sketched out in the West, my bet is that Saddam Hussein will withdraw very soon. The annexation of Kuwait will be annulled and the deposed Emir reinstated. Iraq might have to be financially compensated and the border might require new goal posts, but that is a small price to pay for restoring peace and normalcy. Whatever the terms, the Arabs must ensure that they are finally hammered out by the Arabs themselves with the UN possibly setting the pace for negotiations and providing the infrastructure for monitoring decisions reached.

Naturally, once they have established their presence, it will be difficult to get the Americans out of Saudi Arabia. Pleas for a residual or contingency force to be maintained (20,000 strong?) after the crisis has been defused will be strenuously made, and given the profound divisions among the Arabs, will find ready ears. The residual force may be in place for 5, 10 or even 20 years. The Arabs must resist these time bombs. There are enough disputes, wars, insurgencies raging in the region to last this century and beyond. Without exception, the presence of American troops is deeply resented throughout the Arab world, it is an affront to their sovereignty and growing sense of nationhood. All those who sincerely wish peace in the region must ensure that after Saddam Hussein packs his bags from Kuwait, not a single American soldier remains on Saudi soil. •

The friendly Man from Eureka Forbes is about to demonstrate the most convenient way to keep your home free of dust and dirt.

One of these days the friendly Eureka Forbes salesman will ring your doorbell and introduce himself with his identity card.

This man inspires confidence – which is only natural. Because he is a member of the largest, most successful sales organisation of its kind in India. Backed by dependable after sales service.

He will introduce modern home products to cope with today's problems – dust, pollution, contaminated water and the lack of domestic help.

He has two unique products to demonstrate: EUROCLEAN all-purpose cleaning system, which is much more than a vacuum cleaner, and AQUAGUARD on-line, water filter-cum-purifier.

EUROCLEAN removes minute specks of dirt and dust in your home effortlessly. Even dust you didn't know existed. AQUAGUARD gives you clear, safe drinking water on tap – at the flick of a switch – even if the raw water has high bacterial contamination.

The Eureka Forbes salesman will show you – in your own home – how these products can bring the advantages of modern cleanliness and hygiene to your family. Making it a cleaner, safer world for you.

You need not wait till his rounds bring him to your doorstep. Do contact Eureka Forbes at any of the following locations for an early visit. Or, write to Eureka Forbes Limited, P.O. Box 936, G.P.O., Bombay 400 001.

Euroclean Mitey Vac Sales & Service Centres are located all over the country. Check the list for the one nearest to you.

BOMBAY*: Head Office: Forbes Building, 4th Floor, Charanjit Rai Marg, Fort Tel 2047870 (5 lines) • DELHI*: 401/402, Archana Commercial Complex, Greater Kailash Part I Tel 6416143, 6463606 • CALCUTTA*: Priya, BD-9, 1st Floor Sector 1, Salt Lake City Tel 347799 • MADRAS*: Mount Chambers, Block No. A B, F & G, 1st Floor 758 Mount Road Tel. 8250854. • BANGALORE*: Parvathi Plaza, 204/205 Richmond Road. Tel 211738, 213125 • AHMEDABAD*: 15, Madhuban Society, Opp Gujarat Vidyapith, Ashram Road. Tel 446982, 466821, 465320. • ALLAHABAD: United Tower, 2nd Floor, 53 Leader Road. • CHANDIGARH*: Sector 7-C, S.C.O. No. 14, 2nd Floor, Madhya Marg. Tel: 26735. • COIMBATORE*: No. 61 West T.V. Swamy Road, R S Puram. Tel: 43180, 49648. • HYDERABAD*: 101 Kala Mansion, Sarojini Devi Road, Secunderabad. Tel: 844128, 840183, 840206. • JAIPUR*: 22-23 Central Market, Bapu Nagar. Tel 70205 • JAMSHEDPUR: Talwar Building, Flat D, 1st Floor, 1 Inner Circle Road,

Euroclean Aquaguard

EUREKA FORBES LIMITED

Pioneers in modern cleanliness and hygiene.

The all-purpose cleaning system which is much more than a vacuum cleaner.

On-line, water filter-cum-purifier.

Aquaguard is also available at the locations marked with an asterisk.

C Block, P.O. Bistipur. Tel: 24470, 25351. • KANPUR: 306/307, 3rd Floor, City Centre, The Mall. • LUCKNOW*: C-414 Sector B, Mahanagar Tel: 77296 • MANGALORE*: 3-33-2951/52 Pintos Lane, Kadri Kambla, Ground & 1st Floor. Tel: 32445. • NAGPUR: Paul Commercial Complex, 4th Floor, Ajni Square, Wardha Road. Tel: 533153. • PATNA*: No. 103 A/1 Ashiyani, Ground Floor, Off Boring Road, Nageshwar Colony. • PUNE*: Mubarak Manzil, 2nd Floor, 1 Dhole Patil Road. Tel: 667968, 668773, 667016

• RANCHI: Shyam Lila, 1st Floor, 59/B Circular Road P.O. Lalpur Tel: 27681 • ROURKELA: Ground Floor, Flat No. D 257, Koelnagar, Dist. Sundergarh. • SILIGURI: 521 Ward No. 16, Swami Sarani, 1st Floor, Hakimpara, P.O. Siliguri Dist. Darjeeling • TRIVANDRUM*: T.C. No. 42/88 Pankaja Bhavan Kalipankulam Road, Maracaud Tel: 79570 • VIJAYAWADA*: 33-13-14 Venegellavan Street Seetarampuram, Ground Floor, Tel: 475964 476742

everest/90/EFL213-CAL-SNL

Rallying the farmers

The Congress(I) makes a serious bid to woo the peasants

Has the Congress(I) been able to capitalise on the Janata Dal leadership's alienation from Mahendra Singh Tikait's Bharatiya Kisan Union (BKU)? How high is the party's stock among farmers today?

Take a hint. Of the 70-odd farmers' rallies former Union surface transport minister Rajesh Pilot—he is the Congress(I)'s answer to the likes of Devi Lal and Tikait—has addressed all over the country, as many as ten were held after his defeat in the Lok Sabha election from Bharatpur in November 1989. Four of these were in Haryana—in Sohna and Rewari (April), Gurgaon (May) and Faridabad (July)—two in Guntur and Krishna in Andhra Pradesh (July), one in Sawai Madhopur, Rajasthan (March), one in Kota, Rajasthan (June), and one in NOIDA, Uttar Pradesh (July). The latest of these was held in August at Mainpuri, Uttar Pradesh, where former Congress(I) MP Meera Kumari and former minister Mohsina Kidwai were also present. The crowd was close to 20,000—impressive enough for a sleepy small town.

Rajesh Pilot addressing a rally in MP: making a dent

The succession of Congress(I) farmers' rallies since 1988 has covered Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka, Tamil Nadu, Maharashtra, Gujarat, Bihar, West Bengal, Haryana, Uttar Pradesh, Rajasthan, Punjab and Madhya Pradesh. Almost all of them were well-attended. Among those who shared the dais with Pilot were Farooq Abdullah, Bhajan Lal and Narain Dutt Tiwari.

"Since farmers everywhere are rarely busy all the year round, what they need desperately is agro-based industries, which can provide them employment through a major part of the year when they have no work in the fields," Rajesh Pilot says. "This is what we talk about in our rallies." A regular monthly income from such industries could sustain them, and when they earned a bounty from a good harvest, it could go into better agricultural inputs, or be used for major expenses like studies, marriages etc. Also, Pilot points out, there is a dire need for better roads and communication links with rural areas. "Give a village a good road and proper transport and you will find the quality of life around it changing drastically," Pilot says. "People can sell their products more easily because of access to wider markets," he explains. "But this government is not paying much attention to these needs," Pilot claims.

Pilot and his men are now getting ready for two more rallies—one at Hindwa in Madhya Pradesh and another at Champaran in Bihar. The meetings in Haryana were a big success. The rally at Sohna, which drew a crowd of over 20,000, was addressed by leaders of the Disneyland Virodhi Morcha like Swami Agnivesh, besides Pilot. The villagers there decided not to allow any farmland to be acquired for former Haryana CM O.P. Chautala's "fun-city" scheme. The Haryana government now appears to be going slow on the acquisition of land, even though the notice to acquire some 36,000 acres hasn't been withdrawn. "But it was clear that the people have won the war against the Haryana government," Pilot says. The movement against the Disneyland project has given a tremendous boost to Congress(I)'s hopes in the state, where elections are due in 1992 but are likely to be held earlier.

Congress(I) leaders feel that owing to popular disenchantment with Tikait's confrontationist tactics and Devi Lal's ignominious ouster from the National Front government, farmers may want to side with the Congress(I). Prime Minister V.P. Singh announced from the ramparts of Red Fort on Independence Day that the Nineties was the decade of the farmer. But the government has failed to protect the interests of the farmers: it is only paying attention to the demands of rich farmers, not peasants and small farmers who make up a majority of the farming community. What is more, the present regime is actually spending less on agriculture and related sectors than the pevious government. And in Andhra Pradesh—where it is not in power—the central government has gone back on its commitment to help farmers and has refused to pay compensation for paddy demaged by the recent floods. Moreover, V.P. Singh was himself against the crop insurance scheme when he was finance minister under Rajiv Gandhi, and this is something many farmers are not willing to forget.

The Congress(I), however, has divided the farmers along caste lines. While Rajesh Pilot woos the Gujjars of western Uttar Pradesh, Rajasthan, Haryana and other states, former Speaker Balram Jakhar tries to project himself as a leader of the Jats.

Ultimately, the Congress(I)'s chances of providing a more stable—and credible—government is what will decide its rating among farmers. Both the rural rich and poor have realised that it is easy to make promises. What they will be looking for in the coming months from the National Front government is results. So far, the V.P. Singh regime has done precious little for them. •

Nirmal Mitra/New Delhi

"We will not yield to pressure"

Union labour minister Ram Vilas Paswan on the anti-reservation stir and the challenges before the government

BY NIRMAL MITRA

SUNDAY: The acceptance of the Mandal Commission report means that backward castes have been accorded the same status as Harijans and tribals. How do you justify this?

Ram Vilas Paswan: Under the Constitution, they have the same status. Constitutionally, the backward castes are treated as socially and educationally backward, just as the scheduled castes and scheduled tribes are. Only, while scheduled castes were treated as untouchables, the backward castes weren't. The Constitution itself provides for reservations for SC/STs. Later, several commissions were set up to go into the demand for reserving jobs and seats for the backward classes. There was the Kaka Kalelkar Commission. Later, the Mandal Commission was set up in 1977, and it submitted its report in December 1980. It said that backward castes formed 52 per cent of the population but it recommended 27 per cent reservations for them. Normally, reservations should be equal to their proportion in the population. But the Mandal Commission said it was suggesting 27 per cent reservations to prevent the commission's recommendation from being challenged in court, because the Supreme Court had laid down that more than 50 per cent reservations would be unconstitutional. However, nowhere has it been written in the Constitution that more than 50 per cent reservations were not allowed. Even today, Tamil Nadu has 69 per cent reservations. So the Mandal Commission's recommendations are perfectly in keeping with the Constitution.

Q: But the backward castes in Bihar and Uttar Pradesh are socially and economically stronger than the SC/STs. As a result of the Mandal Commission's recommendations being accepted, in many cases the landowner and the landless labourer will be on the same level as far as job reservations are concerned.

A: It is not a question of whether they are well off or not. The question is whether they are socially backward or not. If backward classes can enjoy reservations in states like Bihar, Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka and Tamil Nadu, why can't they have reservations in the central government jobs too? Besides, the Constitution does not mention economic criteria anywhere. We are not opposed to economic criteria. We are ready to provide jobs to economically backward people. And even if we enact a law reserving jobs for those below the poverty line, these anti-reservationists would continue is agitate. The reason is that none of them are below the poverty line. The anti-reservationists come from rich homes. They don't know what is economic hardship.

Q: But the government's decision to implement the Mandal Commission report has drawn widespread protests. Students and jobless youths are on the rampage, blocking and burning trains in Bihar. The trouble is bound to spread.

A: I find the destruction of railway property deplorable. But then, this is the fate of all bold government decisions. Interested sections will definitely resist them. But then, the agitators need to be told that they cannot deprive a section of the people of their legitimate rights by resorting to agitations.

Q: But in the years since Independence, caste has become a less important factor than class. What bothers people today is how much they can earn, not what caste they belong to. Isn't the Mandal report putting the clock back?

A: If caste is not an important factor, why are all these anti-reservationists protesting? This agitation is proof that the caste factor is alive. And, as I said, even if you apply the economic criterion, these people would agitate because none of them are from a poor background. It is people from lower castes who are poor, not them. I would like to mention another factor. The anti-reservationists have been saying that merit would suffer as a result of the fresh reservations. Why don't they hold agitations against capitation fee colleges and institutions, where rich people send their incompetent sons and daughters to become doctors and engineers?

There is no question of the government yielding to any kind of pressure. As far as the rights of the poor and the interests of the backward classes, scheduled castes and minorities are concerned, we are committed to protect them. ●

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

Independence Day blues

The adhesive that held the National Front government together seems to be coming unstuck

And so, we have scraped through the 43rd birthday party of Independent India. With a non-kisan unfurling the flag. The Tau, nevertheless, in attendance. And the longest-ever speech from the ramparts of the Red Fort by one who promises to be the shortest-ever lived Prime Minister of India. Truly, empty vessels make the loudest noise.

It was a brave effort, though. The costume stitched to perfection. The rose petals disposed around the shoulders with just the right touch of casualness. The gestures well-rehearsed. The dialogue delivered with panache ("Daata-paata ka naata", etc. Wah! Wah!). The matinee shot through with all the sincerity of repertory theatre. A sterling performance by a used car salesman. Not an Independence Day address to the nation. But an election manifesto of a government that has confessed to itself that it has not four years left to serve, but just four months left to run.

Like a chief guest distributing sweeties to the kiddies at a school function—one each for each child—the Prime Minister doled out one little goodie for each good little child: reservations for the backwards, reservations for SC/STs, reservations for women, reservations in Parliament for the poor (who, presumably, will cease to be poor the minute they draw their first month's salary as MPs!)—a government of reservations, over which all of us have our reservations! A compulsory holiday on the Prophet's birthday for the Muslims (who were, in any case, taking the day off all these years as a reserved holiday). A Decade for the Farmers (presumably to mollify the Tau while capturing his power base—in yet another delightfully honest display of the stiletto in the ribs by our most value-based practitioner of the art). A pie-in-the-sky promise for the youth of the country. And yet another promise of one rank-one pension for ex-servicemen (by a government already sinking under the fiscal burden of its populist follies).

I never thought the day would dawn when I would quote with approbation from the Indian Express. But Because The Truth Involves Us All, here goes. The Prime Minister, says the Express, "is now revealing an electoral strategy which is nothing but a cobbling together of sectional and parochial interests". Now? And what, might one ask, is so new about all this? When the caste groupings of the Lok Dal got together with the telephone tappers of the Janata Party and the defectors of the Jan Morcha to initially form the Janata Dal (JD), was it not then a "cobbling together" of "sectional interests"? And when they cobbled together the regionals and themselves into the National Front was it not then a pandering to "parochial interests"?

If, as the Express says, "what is being done is not just populism (and)

THE FOUR CIVIL WARS

MAJORITY VS MINORITIES

The Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid issue threatens to set the country aflame

THE CASTE WAR

V.P. Singh is now planning to out-Tau the Tau. The casteist cauldron is being stirred till it boils over not just electoral calculations (but) to give politics at the national level the parochial and therefore disastrous character which has brought Bihar and UP to the present pass"—that is all because, in nine short months, the National Front, with the BJP as midwife, has delivered the country to this pass. The original sin is not in the making now. It was present at the less than immaculate moment of conception of the National Front (NF). The JD and the NF were always a cobbling together of sectional and parochial interests. The chickens are merely coming home to roost.

The adhesive is coming unstuck—precisely because the only thing that held the JD/NF together was the coalition of sectarian and parochial interests. The countdown has now commenced. "Things fall apart/TheCentre cannot hold." The Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) has already withdrawn its support to the Mulayam Singh Yadav government in Lucknow and is in a rage over Laloo Prasad Yadav's bhaiyas having blackened the face of one of their legislators in Patna. (I'm neither speaking figuratively nor making that one up—it really did happen!) The BJP is ostentatiously distancing itself from the government at the Centre, recognising that any further tainting of its image through its continued association with the NF will only damage irretrievably its electoral prospects this winter.

The Mouse in Autumn nurses ambitions of becoming the Lion in Winter.

The crunch is over the precise location of Lord Ram's site of birth: a matter which L.K. Advani insists is not a question of fact but of faith (how electorally convenient!). With becoming generosity, Advaniji affirms that if the Vishwa Hindu Parishad's (VHP) claim to Ram Janmabhoomi is conceded without further fuss, he for his part, will magnanimously relinquish the Hindu claim to Krishna Janmabhoomi. The birthplace of Lord Krishna is thus, it would seem, a question of faction, not of fiction! Why such magnanimity is not possible in Ayodhya, we are not told. Unless it be that the BJP is so influenced by an alien monotheism that it prefers to take one God at a time, even as elections are taken one at a time. And thus the Krishna bhaktas are pitted against the Ram bhaktas, adding a fifth civil war to the four already launched by the Janata Dal, with the full (if, increasingly, less than wholehearted) support of the BJP and the Left Front.

And what are these four civil wars?

First, of course, we have the majority community being roused against the minorities—and all in the name of "positive secularism", which, it would appear, is unable to secure "justice for all" until it first gets "appeasement for none" on the road. On Vijayadashami Day, 29 September, lakhs of VHP-organised mashaal processions will start setting the country to the torch. To his eternal credit, my hamshakal, Mulayam Singh Yadav, has made it unambiguously clear that he will not permit the lawless pulling down of the Babri Masjid. Yet, the problem is not for the city police in Ayodhya or the district authorities in Faizabad or even the state government in UP alone to tackle. It is a national and nationwide problem.

Mulayam Singh Yadav is doing no more than his Congress predecessor, Narain Dutt Tiwari, did to preserve law and order in the vicinity of the Masjid/Mandir. It was what happened outside UP—in places like Khandwa and Indore in Madhya Pradesh and, above all, at Bhagalpur in Bihar—that last year's shilanyas processions led to mayhem and massacre. But at the shilanyas processions, it was only bricks that were sported. This time round, it is the lighted flame that is to be carried aloft. Not just around Ayodhya, but from lakhs of villages and thousands of towns all over the country. Last year, out of something like 2,80,000 processions—almost entirely in Congress-run states—it was the Congress commitment to secularism and law and order which ensured that all but a bare dozen or so of these lakhs of processions passed off without incident. Yet, just these half a dozen serious breakdowns of peace were enough to spell doom for the party.

Now the torchlight processions will pass through BJP-run Madhya Pradesh and BJP/JD-run Gujarat and Rajasthan. Those who incited the trouble last year are now in charge of confronting the incitement all over western and central India. How can the inciters possibly stop the incited? Either the minorities will cower in fright. Or they will stand up and fight. Either way spells disaster for communal harmony in the country. Therefore, some time between 29 September and 30 October, BJP-fomented communal strife in the country will

RURAL VS URBAN

This war is Devi Lal's invention. But Kisanistan is quite as dangerous as Khalistan

THE ANTI-ENGLISH BATTLE

Mulayam Singh Yadav continues his campaign to rid the country of one of its own languages force the cruel choice on V.P. Singh: to dissolve the Lok Sabha and go to the country or to wait till the Lok Sabha convenes for its winter session in early November for the BJP to withdraw its support to the NF government and force through a mid-term poll.

The second war is the caste war. It is the calculus of caste that sent the Index of Opposition Unity soaring. It is the politics of caste that brought the JD/NF to governance. It is the crisis of caste that now threatens the continuance of that government. For, it is pure Express illusion to believe that V.P. Singh would ever "address national issues from a national perspective".

The Chanakya of jaath-paath has a ready casteist lolly for every caste grouping. Tutored by the late Tau in the mechanics of cobbling together sectional and parochial groupings, V.P. Singh is now busily attempting to out-Tau the Tau. He has hung a portrait of Dr Ambedkar in Central Hall and declared his birthday a holiday. That he thinks brings on board his ship the Scheduled Castes. Islam doesn't permit the hanging of portraits anywhere, but it doesn't say no to holidays. So the Prophet is pressed into the cause. And the Muslims—so the theory goes—will also come on board. The backwards are not even identified—but assured that 27 per cent of government jobs are theirs for the asking. Campuses all over the country go up in flames And by the time the backwards get around to discovering that most of them are not even categorised as backward, and that, in any case, reservations amount to no more than a few hundred Class I and Class II jobs for the crores of backward aspirants, the elections would be over—and VP has never been one to be bothered by much other than the next election. Meanwhile, the Tau, not to be outdone, is rounding up his Jats against their Jats, while elsewhere the Jats slog it out with the Jatavs, the Thakurs take up cudgels against the Harijans, the forward backwards push back the backward forwards—and the whole casteist cauldron is stirred till it boils over.

The third war is Devi Lal's invention, now neatly pinched by his once-upon-a-time bhanja. Instead of stressing the rural-urban continuum which is the true reality of development, instead of reinforcing the sym-

The BJP is ostentatiously distancing itself from the government at the Centre. The Mouse in Autumn nurses ambitions of becoming the Lion in Winter biotic inter-dependence of town on country and country on town which is the essence of economic growth, instead of promoting urban agglomerations in every district to boost the rural economy and reduce the insane rush to the metropolitan cities, instead of facilitating the smooth transition of a labour force which is over-dependent on an under-productive agriculture from farm to non-farm occupations and from rural to urban employment, instead of uniting the kisar with the mazdoor and town folk with country folk, the Devi Lal School of Thought (new Principal Chowdhary V.P. Singh) has decided to pit rural against urban, create a conflict of interest where none exists between town and country, undermine all the linkages of modernity which bind village and mohalla in a common cause, and start a totally artificial and wholly unnecessary war between the rural and urban people of India. Devi Lal might resort to all the contortions he wishes in describing the urban poor as "rural". And V.P. Singh might get up to his usual conjuror's trick of pinching the other player's trumps and aces, but the fact remains that the rural-urban divide is quite as bogus a divide as the communal divide that plunged us into the vivisection of the country in 1947. Kisanistan is quite as dangerous as Khalistan.

And finally the fourth war: the authentic Lohia/Raj Narain destructionism of Mulayam Singh's campaign to rid the country of one of its own languages, English. The only root languages truly native to the soil of our civilisation are probably Brahui (spoken now only in pockets of Baluchistan and Sind) and its Dravidian sister-tongue, Tamil. Sanskrit was a foreign language imported into this country by the Aryan conquerors. Greek influenced the development of Pushto and Kashmiri. Chinese is evident in the dialects of much of the north-east. Urdu is the synthesis of Amir Khusro's Hindawi with Arabic and Persian. English is but the last of a long series of languages to lap the shores of our country from abroad. And so effectively have we mangled our version of the Queen's tongue that Hinglish is perhaps a more accurate description of the language that roughens the otherwise mulayam visage of the chief minister of UP.

But more dangerous even than the language of politics is the politics of language. Twenty-five years ago, Tamil Nadu almost broke away from the Union on the question of language. Now, as the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) takes over the sovereignty of the Tamil Nadu coast with the connivance of the Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK), any Indian capable of seeing that there is more to our country than Etah has to offer would recognise that this is the worst possible moment to restart a north-south war over language. Mulayam Singh might imagine that a few more of his kith and kin might get central government jobs if Hindi replaces English as the dominant language of governance. But if the minority of Indians who speak Hindi were to get an unfare dominance over the majority of Indians who don't, that is what could lead to the country being put to the torch.

The end is nigh. It isdarkest before dawn. We'll all be better off come the next Independence Day. For we can then celebrate the final triumph of the First War of Independence instead of worrying ourselves sick over the four wars after Independence launched by this lot in their last desperate bid to cling on to power at any cost. ●

(The views expressed in this column are those of its author and do not purport to constitute an official statement of the Congress party's position.)

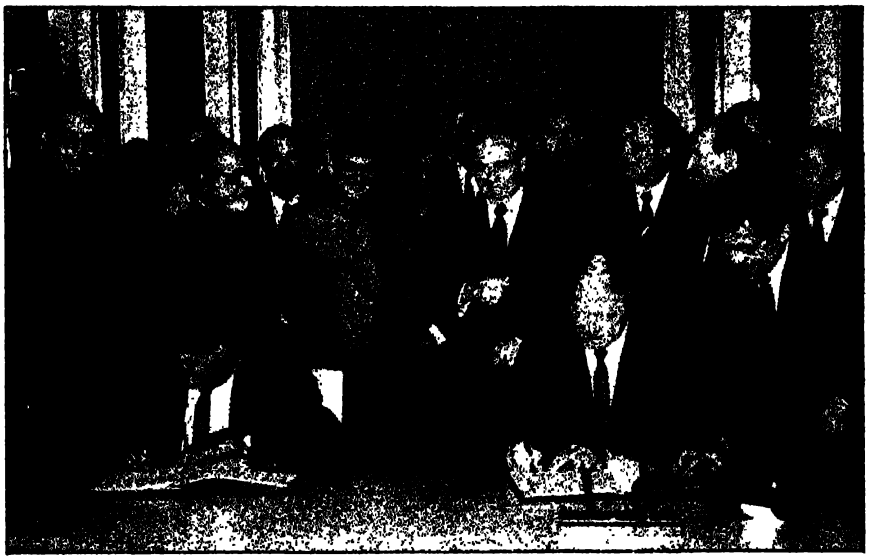
INDER MALHOTRA

Laid-back diplomacy

The Raja's regime has done precious little in the area of foreign affairs

For quite sometime now, South Asian experts the world over, most of them quite friendly to this country, have been moaning that India has practically disappeared from the world stage where it used to be so active for so long. Perhaps they are making their point a shade too strongly, but what they are saying is essentially true.

And the truth hurts the Janata Dal and its many supporters, who particularly resent the comparisons between the relatively withdrawn style of the V.P. Singh government and the high-profile diplomatic forays of the Rajiv regime. The contrast between the two situations is indeed conspicuous.



On winning his massive mandate at the start of 1985, Rajiv Gandhi lost no time in holding in New Delhi a summit of the six nations, representing all continents, who, under his mother's leadership, had taken the famous initiative for 'nuclear sanity'. And, thereafter, he did not let up. He travelled far and wide, making no fewer than four visits to Moscow and three to the United States. At a conference of the Commonwealth heads of government, he quarrelled with Margaret Thatcher over sanctions against South Africa. At Harare, he put forward suggestions for setting up the Africa Fund and at the 40th birthday party of the UN, he unfolded a three-phase plan for ridding the world of the menace of nuclear weapons by 2010. And so on.

During the nearly nine months since coming to power the Raja had done little in the diplomatic department. He has travelled only to the Maldives, Namibia (to celebrate its independence and the release of Nelson Mandela) and the Soviet Union. The only international gathering he has attended so far was the first meeting of G-15, the poor nations' answer to G-7, the club of the super-rich countries, which was formed, ironically, as a result of one of Rajiv's initiatives. The G-15 was held at Kuala Lumpur, where V.P. Singh cut a rather nice figure. But this did not earn India a place on the standing committee the G-15 chose to set up.

There are two important reasons for this unhappy state of affairs. One is that the Janata Dal government has got bogged down in internal squabbles sooner than might have been expected. Sadly, the Prime Minister could not get even the credit for his successful mission to Moscow because by the time his aircraft landed at Palam, the crisis created by the Tau had overshadowed everything else in this country.

Secondly, and this is in some ways more important, from the word go the Janata Dal government was determined to restrict its sights to India's immediate neighbourhood. It had been virtually forced by its several think-tanks into believing that it would earn a place in history by overnight transforming the strife-torn and tension-ridden South Asia into an "area of peace and cooperation". Pakistan converted this dream into a nightmare almost instantly. But the government does claim credit, with some justification, for having improved relations with other neighbours. Today's relative harmony with Bangladesh is due largely to Inder Gujral's strenuous efforts. But the sea change in the relationship with Nepal has been made possible only by the triumph of the democratic forces in the Himalayan kingdom.

The Janata Dal government was right to withdraw the IPKF from Sri Lanka on 31 March last. But its fond belief that this had solved the problem with its southern neighbour and ushered in an era of bonhomie between the two countries has been rudely belied. Refugees from the Tamil areas of Sri Lanka are again pouring into Tamil Nadu and this cannot but have disastrous consequences.

V.P. Singh in Moscow: a withdrawn style of functioning

All this is nothing, however, compared with the Indian government's prolonged inaction over the crisis in the Gulf and West Asia after the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait and the landing of US troops in Saudi Arabia.

No one should, of course, underestimate the Indian government's dilemma when the only Arab country to stand by us over Kashmir and in which our economic stakes are enormous, puts itself in the wrong and is sought to be penalised by the rest of the world united as never before. To take a clear-cut stand is not easy. But because the situation is so delicate and so vital to us is reason enough for a quick and imaginative action. ● for sale...

Dreams
OFFER OPEN

CANSTAR

Earn 50% or more return per annum for a lifetime on initial investment after 10 years

Canbank Mutual Fund has, since its inception, built up an excellent track record. The best of professional skills, financial acumen and intimate knowledge of the corporate world combine to bring to you high return, yet safe investment opportunities. Scheme after scheme, launched by us, has succeeded in turning market opportunities into lucrative returns. Look at the total payout of CANSHARE alone – over 100% in less than 30 months excluding market appreciation (Market price Rs. 22.50 as on 31st July, 1990).

HIGHLIGHTS

- A well established Mutual Fund with the largest investor base
- Professionally managed with proven track record of success
- Tax benefit under Section 80L of the Income-tax Act, 1961 upto Rs. 10,000/- or Capital Gains* benefit under Income-tax Act
- Easy encashability – to be listed on Bombay and other Stock Exchanges after one year
- Buy back any time after three years
- Easy Transferability

* Separate application forms available

Minimum Repurchase price for 1000 Canstars:

A. On completion of:

3 Years	–	Rs. 15,150
4 Years	–	Rs. 17,400
5 Years	–	Rs. 20,000
6 Years	–	Rs. 23,000
7 Years	–	Rs. 26,500
8 Years	–	Rs. 30,500
9 Years	–	Rs. 35,000
10 Years	–	Rs. 40,000

B. Option on completion of 10 years
Receive monthly income @ 12.50% p.a. calculated on accumulated amount
and
Receive an annual bonus/appreciation from the 11th year onwards

CANBANK MUTUAL FUND

Orient House, Adi Marzban Path (Mangalore Street), Bombay 400 038

Principal Trustee : CANARA BANK

Always a step ahead

Concept

BOMBAY DYEING

MID-TERM POLL?

Is V.P. Singh preparing to go to the country?

In the end, it was Vishwanath Pratap Singh who unfurled the tricolour from the Red Fort on the 44th Independence Day. All of Chowdhary Devi Lal's predictions that it would be the son of a farmer who performed the honours this year proved incorrect and scores of astrologers found that their crystal balls had let them down.

But it might as well have been somebody else who addressed the nation from the ramparts of that historic fort. Gone was the Vishwanath Pratap Singh who had won the nation around to his brand of value-based politics and sold a vision of a new India to an eager electorate.

In his place was the classic Hindi-belt demagogue. In a 75-minute-long speech, he used poetry, populism and platitude to dramatic effect; threw in references to the poor in every sentence; borrowed his rhetoric from Salim-Javed; and outlined a brand new scheme to seize the initiative from his rivals.

There were the predictable references to the Mandal Commission report and the bizarre—if not entirely unexpected—claim that the way forward for India lay in extending job reservations and ensuring that caste rather than merit became the basis for government recruitment.

But there was more. In the course of his speech, the Prime Minister pulled out a populist plum for nearly every section that had access to a ballot paper.

- The farmers were wooed rather blatantly with the promise of turning the 1990s into a 'Kisan Decade'. This apparently means that farmers will get remunerative prices for produce, loan waivers (though he cautioned that these had to be one-offs) and other incentives.
- Muslims were told that henceforth, the birth anniversary of the Prophet Mohammad would be declared a national holiday.
- Harijans were reminded that the National Front government had unveiled Dr Ambedkar's portrait in Parliament. Why, asked the Prime Minister significantly, had no other party done this before?
- Women were promised that legislation would be passed this year to reserve 30 per cent of the seats in panchayats for them. A commission would soon be set up to examine the lot of women.
- As for youth, this year the government had set aside Rs 265 crores for them. Of this, Rs 120 crores will be spent on loans to the educated, Rs 50 crores for educational loans, and Rs 70 crores for rural employment schemes. (This adds up to Rs 240 crores; he did not say what would happen to the other Rs 25 crores.)
- The backward classes (a Hindi-belt term for various politically-significant castes) had always had a bad deal, but now, after the Mandal Commission recommendations were implemented, the 52 per cent of the population that belonged to these classes would find it easier to get jobs.
- But the real lollipop was reserved for that ambiguously defined group: "the poor". Most governments treated poverty as an economic issue but, said V.P. Singh, he would make it a political issue. "I have the guts to give the poor real power." It turned out that this meant that he would reserve 40 per cent of parliamentary seats for them.

JAGDISH YADAV

And so it went, with promises being scattered in all directions and mawkishly emotional platitudes being hurled at the voters.

It was, by any standards, an astonishing performance. As even the Indian Express, the Prime Minister's strongest supporter in the media, editorialised the next day: "It is indeed sad that a leader who had been elected Prime Minister because it was perceived that he would address national issues from a national perspective is now revealing an electoral strategy which is nothing but a cobbling together of national and parochial interests."

That the Express—like the rest of the media—was appalled was clear. But more significant was its conclusion that the demagoguery only made sense if an election was on the cards. "But," it cautioned, "what is being done is not just populism. It is not just electoral calculations. It is to give politics at the national level the parochial—and therefore, disastrous—character which has brought Bihar and Uttar Pradesh to the present pass."

The Independence Day address provided the most compelling evidence to date that the Prime Minister was preparing to go to the country. But there had been other indications before that. There was, of course, the decision to accept the drastic—not to say, disastrous—recommendations of the Mandal Commission whose report had been gathering dust for around a decade. But there had also been attempts to cultivate Harijans through such gimmicks as the unveiling of the Ambedkar portrait and the launching of a drive to fill the Scheduled Caste quota in government jobs.

Moreover, V.P. Singh seemed to have also taken a decision to make a determined bid for the Muslim vote. Whereas earlier, he had vacillated on such crucial issues as Ram Janmabhoomi, he now seemed to be throwing his weight behind UP chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav's position that he would abide by the court judgement and not let either the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) or the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) proceed with the construction of the temple.

During the Independence Day speech, the Prime Minister reasserted this position, but his earlier statements had already made it clear that though the BJP kept his government in office, he was still going to aim for the Muslim vote.

All this made sense only if V.P. Singh was cobbling together a coalition consisting of the backward classes, the Muslims and the Harijans.

Traditionally, such a coalition—or, at least, some elements of it—has swung the election in the crucial states of Uttar Pradesh and Bihar. But while the Muslims and Harijans have usually voted for the Congress (with some notable exceptions), the backwards have been divided, with a chunk of their vote going to the Lok Dal.

Now, V.P. Singh hopes to construct his own vote-bank, comprising the backward classes, the Muslims and the Harijans. Traditionally, such a coalition has swung the elections in the crucial states of Bihar and UP

Now, V.P. Singh hoped to construct his own vote-bank, one that not only built on the Congress' traditional areas of support, but extended its boundaries by borrowing from the non-Congress parties as well.

It was an audacious strategy and one that seemed certain to cement his status as the Indian political phenomenon of his times.

If there is to be a mid-term poll, then what is the most likely date? Rajiv Gandhi told SUNDAY that the Congress expected one early next year. The BJP appears to be aiming for next summer. And both would probably be happiest with the autumn of 1991. But now, the initiative has been wrenched from them by the Prime Minister's new caste-based strategy. The timing of the next election, consequently, de-

THE MUSLIM VOTE

V.P. Singh seems to have decided to make a bid for it. He has now thrown his weight behind UP chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav on the Ram Janmabhoomi issue pends on Vishwanath Pratap Singh.

Some things, however, are clear. There can be no election much before November 1990. The process of raising money, strengthening the party organisation, etc., will take at least that long. But, on the other hand, if V.P. Singh intends to use the Independence Day speech as the blueprint for his electoral strategy, then he must go to the country within the next seven months. That calculation yields an outside limit of March 1991. The most likely date, according to Delhi's political pundits, however, is January 1991, just over a year after V.P. Singh became Prime Minister.

All this speculation leaves a crucial question unanswered. In many ways, V.P. Singh's government is no more unstable today than it was when it was first elected. So what would the Prime Minister gain by calling an election so early?

There is no single, simple answer to that question, but V.P. Singh does have many reasons for not waiting. Some relate to the state of his own party; others to the attitude of the Janata Dal's allies.

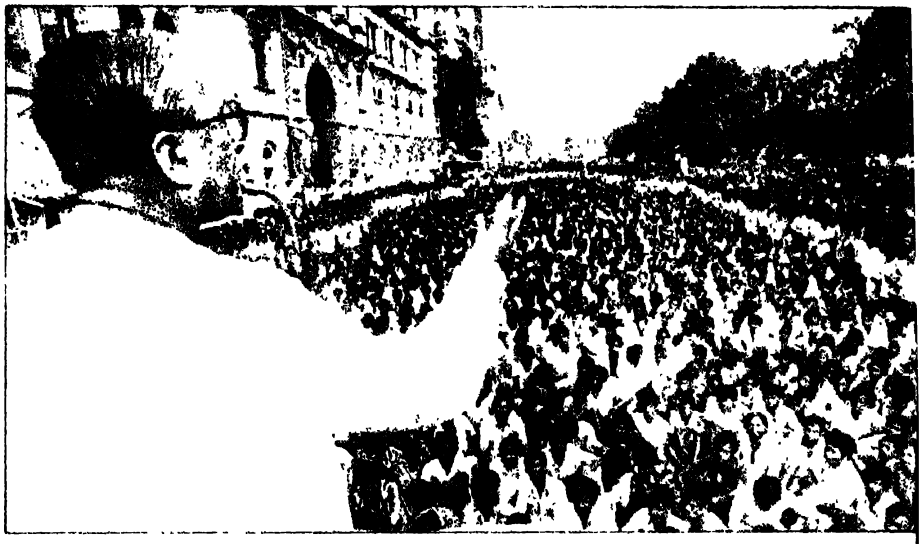
When V.P. Singh sacked Devi Lal, there was a chorus of approval from the press, but many of the Prime Minister's advisers warned that history could repeat itself: Morarji Desai had also won plaudits when Charan Singh left the government, but the end result was the collapse of the 1977-79 Janata experiment.

The Prime Minister knows that Devi Lal is a wrecker and that, given time, he will do his best to bring the government down. Moreover, the Tau has the support of at least three key chief ministers: UP's Mulayam Singh, Bihar's Laloo Yadav and Gujarat's Chimanbhai Patel. At present, none of them has come out openly in favour of Devi Lal, but in the coming months, it is entirely possible that one or more of them will break ranks and back the Chowdhary in public. Moreover, the national leadership of the Janata Dal also suspects that Orissa chief minister Biju Patnaik will form a regional party

Therefore, V.P. Singh really does not have much time. If he waits, the cracks will become apparent. If, on the other hand, he calls an election in the next few months, then everyone will fall in line.

There are problems too with the allies. During the last parliamentary session, the left parties demonstrated a notable unwillingness to come to the government's aid and since then, the CPI(M) has been even cooler in its attitude to the regime. There is no danger yet of the left withdrawing support, but V.P. Singh recognises that he can no longer take the communists for granted.

More crucial is the attitude of the BJP. While the two parties are allies in Parliament, they are also rivals throughout the Hindi belt. Consequently, the BJP has walked a tightrope between backing the regime and yet, consciously distancing itself from its failures. This state of affairs cannot endure. At some stage, the BJP will have to withdraw support. Presumably, it will do so at a time when the Janata Dal is at its weakest and the BJP is at its strongest if it is to be sure of ensuring gains in the election that must inevitably follow any such move. Realist that he is, V.P. Singh recognises that this situation is unacceptable: far better that he calls an election when the Janata Dal is ready and the BJP is still unprepared.



The betting in New Delhi is that the BJP may withdraw support over the Ram Janmabhoomi issue. The Congress has already indicated that it will launch a mass movement to counter the VHP's. Where does that leave the Janata Dal? It has two options. One: it can tacitly back the VHP in which case it will only strengthen the BJP. Or two: it can hope to wrest the Muslim vote away from the Congress. The latter is the more attractive option as many Muslims deserted the Congress at the last election any way and as Mulayam Singh Yadav has built up an impressive minority base for the Janata Dal in UP.

So, from V.P. Singh's point of view, it would make perfect sense to oppose the VHP over Ram Janmabhoomi, let the BJP withdraw support and then go to the country on a 'secular' platform.

The new Vishwanath Pratap Singh seems essentially different from the old avatar. Crucial to the Raja's success in the years since he left the Congress was the support of the middle class. Because he was perceived as an honest—if somewhat indecisive—idealist in the midst of a political system gone crazy with cynicism and opportunism, he also won the support of the media

But now, V.P. Singh recognises that the old avatar simply does not stand up to scrutiny. With the over-expectations created by the Bofors investigators rebounding on the regime, the Raja has stopped harping on corruption in his speeches. He has abandoned hopes of extending his popularity south of the Vindhyas (he has avoided addressing public meetings in the southern states since he became Prime Minister) and has recognised that while middle class support might flatter his vanity, it does not necessarily win elections.

The new V.P. Singh, however, is a formidable electoral entity. His calculation is based on the following factors:

- The Janata Dal cannot win the south, but over the last few months, the Congress(I) has lost support in Tamil Nadu and Andhra. So, the Telugu Desam and the DMK—both constituents of the National Front—will benefit.
- The Bharatiya Janata Party will do well, but it is unchallenged only in Madhya Pradesh and Himachal Pradesh: both states in which the JD is weak and the Congress is still to recover.
- In Gujarat and Rajasthan too, the Congress has still not recovered, so the real battle will be between the Janata Dal and the BJP
- The states that will decide the election will be Bihar (54 seats) and Uttar Pradesh (85 seats) which, between them, account for 139 seats.
- The Janata Dal's aim, therefore, must be to sweep Bihar and UP and to contain the BJP in Rajasthan and Gujarat. In these four states, the new

THE SCENARIOS ■ What could happen over the next six months

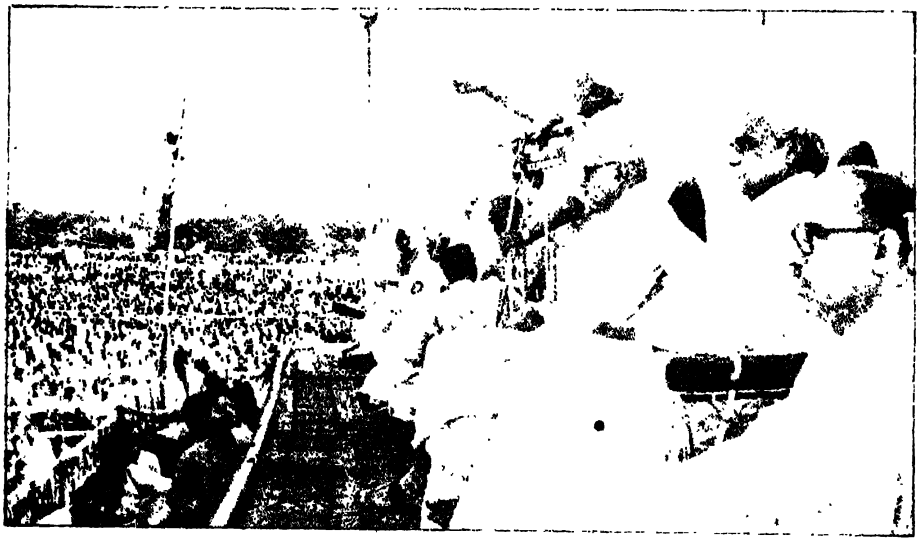
TRIUMPH

V.P. Singh calls an election on caste calculations and wins a majority



VICTORY

The Janata Dal improves its position and can form a government with CPI(M) support

DEJA VU

The results are the same as last year. So V.P. Singh continues in office

THE ALLIES

The PM has realised that he can no longer take the communists for granted. And the BJP, it is now clear, is bound to withdraw support sooner or later backward caste-minority coalition should prove unstoppable. Around 50 per cent of the population belongs to backward castes and another 16 per cent is Muslim. That alone gives the JD 66 per cent. Plus Rajputs, who identify with V P Singh, will also support the Dal.

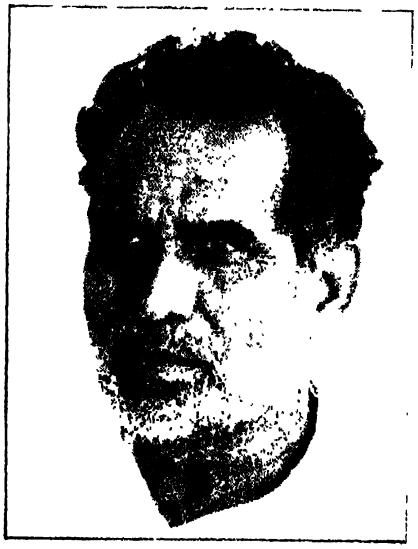
• The Harijan vote is also up for grabs. Last time, the Congress lost much of it to the Bahujan Samaj Party. Perhaps this time, some of it will come to the JD and even if it doesn't, it won't go to the Congress.

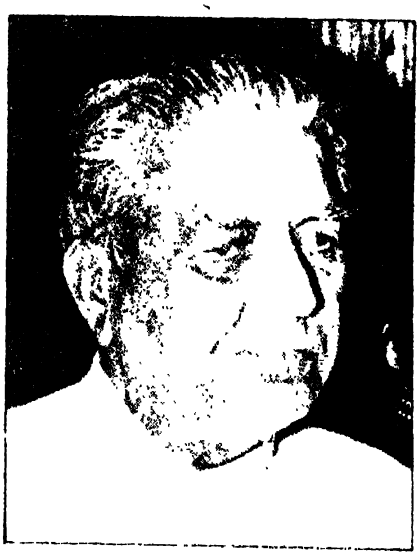
How foolproof is this calculation? Last week in New Delhi, there were many who believed that V.P. Singh had the next election all sewn up. Even the BJP was worried. Said a leading party MP. "We hope that there will be a Hindu wave over Ram Janmabhoomi, but after the Mandal Commission decision, we will be asking Hindu backwards to choose God over their wallets. Who knows which way they will turn?"



There was dismay too in the Congress camp, where dissidents whispered that V.P. Singh had proved to be the true inheritor of Mrs Gandhi's mantle. "In 1971, she projected herself as the hope of the poor. Now, the Raja is doing the same," noted a party worker. "Rajiv lacks the political savvy to recognise this."

But there were contrary views. Many people were unconvinced that the new alliance would sweep the country in the manner that V.P. Singh expected. Their objections were as follows

• Are general elections really decided on the basis of caste? All the psephological evidence suggests that the Indian electorate is now voting in a homogenous manner. For instance, the Congress lost as many Hindu votes in UP as it did Muslim votes.

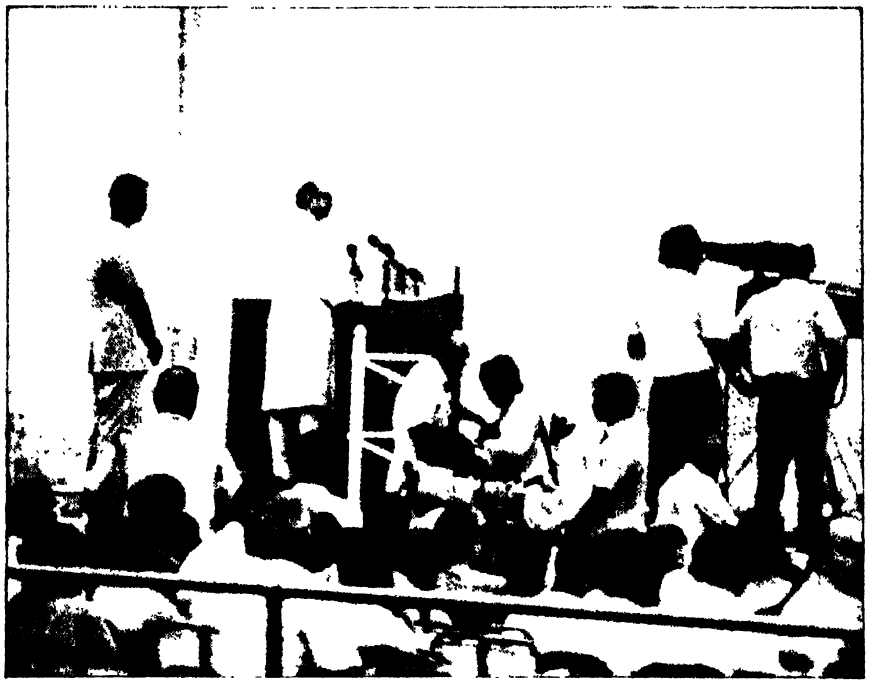


• All backward coalitions in the cow belt are vulnerable to the rigging factor. In 1980, the upper castes were so terrified of Charan Singh that they simply did not let the backwards vote.

• The politics of caste always leads to violence. Add to that the Hindu-

SPLIT

Shekhar and the Tau split the JD and form a government with Congress support



CRACK UP

The election goes ahead but the Tau's faction splits the Janata Dal

FIASCO

V.P. Singh's calculations backfire and Rajiv Gandhi returns to power on a split vote

THE INDEPENDENCE DAY ADDRESS

The Prime Minister pulled out a populist plum for nearly every section that has access to a ballot paper

Muslim factor over Ram Janmabhoomi and you have the makings of a mini-social war. Should violence break out, then the Congress, which harps on stability and the unity and integrity of India, could well benefit.

• Finally, two can play this game. The Congress plans to counter V.P. Singh's Ram Janmabhoomi strategy by declaring that Rajiv Gandhi will lead a march to Ayodhya to stop the VHP from constructing the temple. So, which side will the Muslims eventually prefer?

Shrewd politician that he is, V.P. Singh has worked all this out. But he knows that he probably has no choice but to take the plunge. If he waits till the middle of next year, prices will sky-rocket (particularly after the effects of the oil crunch are felt); the Congress may finally get its act together; his Teflon coating will begin to wear thin; and his administrative failures (Punjab, Kashmir, etc.) will catch up with him.

Consequently, he has resorted to gimmicks which he hopes will impress the electorate in the run-up to the election. The latest of these is the scheduled padayatra in Punjab at the end of which, he has said, he will either solve the Punjab problem or be killed, adding, in the finest traditions of Hindi cinema: "If I am killed, then my body should be kept in Punjab."

Rhetoric and demagoguery may be poor substitutes for action, but they might just pull off an electoral victory.

But can V.P. Singh call an election? As the leader of a minority government, can he demand that the President dissolve Parliament?

Most constitutional experts are agreed that he can't. All he can do is submit the resignation of his government. President R. Venkataraman is then obliged to ask Rajiv Gandhi as the leader of the Opposition if he is in a position to form a government.

Though the Congress(I) has 193 seats and could get enough support from its allies to raise the figure to 215, it is unlikely that Rajiv will agree to be Prime Minister with left support. So, the chances are that V.P. Singh will get his way and elections will be called.

In his old avatar, V.P. Singh depended on the middle class for support. But now, he has recognised that while this might flatter his vanity, it does not necessarily win elections

But there is one other scenario.

Few Janata Dal MPs want elections. At present, most are unwilling to oppose V.P. Singh openly. But, should he call elections, then many will find their voices.

Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal have both made it clear that they are not in favour of an early election. And Shekhar has said that he does not approve of the opportunistic caste politics that will be the basis of the Janata Dal's manifesto. Suppose they openly oppose the election proposal? VP could probably overrule them and go ahead anyway. But this leaves the Shekhar-Lal combine with two options, both of which involve splitting the party

In the first, around 70 MPs defect. The Congress backs them. And they form the next government with either the Tau or Shekhar as Prime Minister. Shekhar does not rule out this possibility.

In the second option, the Congress refuses to support them and elections are held. But because the party has already split, they fight elections separately. This would mean four-cornered contests in the Hindi belt, the Congress vs V.P. Singh's JD vs the Shekhar-Tau JD vs the BJP (which is unlikely to ally with anybody after Ram Janmabhoomi).

History demonstrates that whenever there is a multi-cornered contest, the Congress tends to benefit. After the 1979 Janata split, Mrs Gandhi returned with a landslide largely because Charan Singh's Janata(S) split the non-Congress vote. (In those days, today's BJP was a constituent of Janata.)

Should either of these scenarios come to pass, then V.P. Singh's elaborately constructed caste coalition could come tumbling down. At present, it looks as though Lal and Shekhar will oppose an early election, so the Raja's scheme could be in serious trouble.

But then, nobody predicted V.P. Singh's latest move. And given the Raja's track record, he obviously has a card up his sleeve, which will once again trump Shekhar and the Tau's aces. •

Rajiv Shukla and Seema Goswami/ New Delhi

"Devi Lal would make a better Prime Minister"

Chandra Shekhar hits out. And talks about V.P. Singh, Dhirubhai Ambani, Chandra Swami and the likelihood of an election

Over the last six months, Chandra Shekhar has been remarkably reticent about criticising the Vishwanath Pratap Singh government on the record. His reticence deepened after the telephone tapping controversy.

But last week, in a marathon interview to SUNDAY, Shekhar seemed suddenly to have shed his old reluctance.

NITIN RAI

The economy

SUNDAY: How do you see the economic situation?

Chandra Shekhar: The recent crisis in the Middle East will accentuate an already bad situation. The only hope is that the monsoon will be good and we will get the benefit of a good harvest.

The problem is that now India is regarded as a bad credit risk abroad and not many people are willing to give loans to us. And our debt servicing situation is critical.

Despite all this tall talk about austerity and cost-cutting, nothing much is being done. The people governing this country are not bothered about the seriousness of the situation and in certain areas, where it was possible to mobilise resources, nothing is done.

Q: What areas?

A: I can give you one example. Various manufacturers collect excise from the consumers and then they go to the court to avoid giving the money to the government. Finally, the excise thus collected is often refunded. It should be refunded to the consumers, but because they cannot be identified, the money goes to the manufacturers and traders.

Sometime back, in a case in the Bombay High Court, there was a dissenting note in the judgement and one of the judges resigned on this issue.

Last winter, the full bench of the Bombay High Court gave the verdict

Q If the government had been cheated of money by some people, shouldn't it go for these people?

that the money doesn't belong to the industrialists, but that it clearly doesn't belong to the government either.

The judge came to the conclusion that the money should go to the consumer wherever he can be identified. If the consumers can't be identified, then the government should think of instituting a consumers' welfare fund.

But in March this year, the government has issued a circular that this money should be refunded to the industrialists.

Q: It was probably a bureaucratic decision.
A: This matter was brought to the notice of the finance minister.

Q: How much is the amount involved?
A: A minimum of Rs 10,000 crores per year.

When this circular was produced before the Bombay High Court, the judge gave the opinion that if the government has no interest in the matter, then what can we do?

I'm sorry that this government is talking about small pay-offs when it is ignoring a sum of Rs 10,000 crores!

Q: If you are trying to allege corruption, I don't think the charge will stick because the finance ministry is run by an honest man.
A: But only the finance minister is not running the finance ministry (laughs).

A month back, Mr Madhu Limaye wrote a letter about this to Shri (Dinesh) Goswami, the law minister. Mr Goswami said he had referred this matter to the Prime Minister.

Two weeks ago—or maybe more than that—I wrote a letter to Dandavate asking: what are the circumstances? I have not got a reply.

Q: Have you brought this to the attention of the Prime Minister?
A: The judge who resigned has personally called on Dandavate and the Prime Minister. So the Prime Minister knows.

Q: Who does this decision benefit?
A: I don't know. But almost all the prominent industrialists are involved. You can find out for yourself who has benefited after March.

Q: Are you going to raise the issue in Parliament?
A: For what? You people are always saying that I am embarrassing the government. I've had these facts for more than a month. Let me wait for Dandavate's reply.

But I am surprised by this decision. You go on saying, "Our coffers are empty" and "Our situation is critical" and then the industrialists make Rs 10,000 crores!

I can't understand the logic.

Q: Can I come back to what you said at the beginning? Why is nobody willing to lend to India?
A: Just three days back, I was talking to some bankers and they said Japan was willing to give us a loan, but now they have said no ..

Because they have lost faith in our ability to repay.

Q: Why is that?
A: Two reasons. One is...I don't know what was the compulsion for the government to go on making this statement that we are without any money. Our coffers are empty.

It was good to criticise Rajiv Gandhi when we were campaigning for the elections, but after the elections, we can't hang on to that old thing without insulting India.

When you get power, you inherit everything. Not just the plus points. And if Rajiv had no minus points, then why did people vote him out of power?

We have to make the government correct those things. Not keep lamenting them.

Industrial policy

Q: Why are you objecting to the industrial policy?
A: Because I do not want that the area of decision-making for India should be

(V.P. Singh's) Red Fort speech does not make any difference. Speeches are made and reported every day. The Red Fort speech is also the same. It has had no special impact on the mind of the people

A It is legitimate, but at what level? It is the work of a police inspector; it is not the work of a political leader at our level abridged. Because I do not believe that our policy should be made in Washington by the World Bank. India should be run by South Block and North Block. And both of them can't fit into the World Bank office.

The World Bank says something in December 1989 and you don't even paraphrase it. You just copy the whole thing, para by para,and make it your own policy!

I pointed this out at my press conference. At least, they should have been clever enough to change the language a little.

Q: Do you really believe in this conspiracy theory?
A: You tell me, why is it that in all economic ministries all the economic advisers are from the World Bank?

Q: So what?
A: But why is it?

Q: Because the World Bank is one of the few places where well-educated Indian economists can get good jobs. That's all there is to it.
A: That is true. But why does our government believe that the best economists are from the World Bank? Is there nowhere in India that we can find economists?

Q: The chief economic adviser Deepak Nayyar is not from the World Bank.
A: Only one man And he has recently been appointed

All these people are not government officials. They have not competed for the jobs. They are appointed as advisers After some time, the case goes to the Union Public Service Commission and they claim, "The government can't function without them", and so they are regularised.

There is no dearth of brilliant people in the IAS. Do we need these people?

Q: Isn't your objection to the industrial policy political? Against people like Ajit Singh?
A: You are totally wrong.

All these policies were started by V.P. Singh when he was finance minister. What does Ajit Singh have to do with it?

At that time, Dandavate and others also opposed these policies, but said that they were Rajiv Gandhi's policies. When V P. Singh joined the Opposition, he also said, "It was Rajiv Gandhi's policy Not mine."

After becoming the Prime Minister ...the press goes on writing: "V.P. Singh is taking his policies as finance minister to the logical conclusion."

My only fault is that I go on reminding him that he had disowned those policies Everybody else—including Dandavate—seems to have forgotten.

Not only this. Take the National Front's election manifesto. I had no hand in preparing that. But in that you will read: "Rajiv Gandhi has destroyed the country by bringing multinationals." It is there. Read it para by para.

They have gone back on everything in it

Q: If you claim that even then V.P. Singh followed these 'unacceptable' policies, then why did you people welcome him into the Opposition in 1987?
A: That is a question that I would not like to answer.

Q: Why not?
A: Because you know my views on him. So, I would not like to repeat anything.

Q: That's not a good answer.
A: Even at that time I said, "Let us discuss the policies first." I said, "It is not just a question of trying to oust Rajiv Gandhi. Let us be clear about the policies." I am on record.

This is the first time that a minister (Devi Lal) has been dismissed from the Government of India...It creates problems not just for Devi Lal, but for all of us. We are setting records in political degeneration

Party programmes

Q: So what are the policies of your party now?
A: That you ask Bommai and V P. Singh. Our policies change all of a sudden. It is such a dynamic world that I can't keep up with them (laughs).

Q Would you like to be Prime Minister?

All I will say is that I believe in policies, not personalities. I am not one of those politicians who says I am a saint. I have never given the slogan of value-based politics.

Right from the beginning I have been saying that corruption is not the basic problem. It is a product of the system. And unless you change the system, you can't do anything.

I am not Mahatma Gandhi. And I can't go along with politicians who say that not only are they Mahatma Gandhi, but multinationals are also Mahatma Gandhi.

Q: V.P. Singh?
A: No, it is not personal. Why just V.P. Singh? I am not able to understand the stand taken by Mr Madhu Dandavate on certain issues.

This government is compromising the sovereignty of the country.

Q: Did the Rajiv Gandhi government do this too, because you say that it followed the same policies?
A: (Laughs) One day I met Mr Rajiv Gandhi at an official lunch for the Nepalese Prime Minister. By chance, we were sitting next to each other.

I said, "Rajiv, I congratulate you. What your advisers could not get done through your government, they are getting done through our government."

He laughed. But I feel sad about it. Did we fight all our struggles for this?

Q: Do you get on with Rajiv?
A: It is not personal. I have no personal grudge against V.P. Singh and I have no personal grudge against Rajiv Gandhi. Personally, Rajiv Gandhi has done nothing to me. He has never insulted me. He has never...I never had any personal grudge against Mrs Gandhi who sent me to jail.

This is politics. And politics is not for personal vendetta.

For personal vendetta, you can hire some goondas and take revenge.

People give you power to bring about change. If power is not used for this purpose, then I have very little interest in how many FIRs are instituted.

You may be very interested to get headlines that today an FIR was filed against three officers and two politicians, but it doesn't interest me.

FIRs/Investigation

Q: You can't say that. You supported the Shah Commission.
A: Even at that time I said don't do it. I said in Parliament don't expel Mrs Gandhi from the House. I am against this type of persecution, whether it is done by Mrs Gandhi or Rajiv Gandhi or Morarji Desai or V.P. Singh or by Chandra Shekhar.

Yes, if there are certain irregularities, the law should take its own course. But such things should not be handled at the level of the ministers and the Prime Minister, but by the law enforcement agencies. Such things should be left to the CBI and other officials.

Why should he (V.P. Singh) hold press conferences and say that we are charging this man and the Bofors names will be out within a fortnight? Where are the names, where are the culprits and what happened that fortnight, I do not know.

This kind of thing is ultimately self-defeating and can rebound on you. Also, it has a way of vitiating the political atmosphere.

Q: But you went into the election saying that you were going to find the names of the Bofors agents and root out corruption.
A: I have never mentioned Bofors in my speeches or spoken about corruption.

Q: Do you think the Bofors issue will boomerang on the government?
A: No, I don't think it will boomerang on the government. But it won't harm Mr Rajiv Gandhi either. Now I think even the people are not interested in it.

Q: Do you think the Congress will make it an issue?
A: Yes. And that might be a problem for us.

Q: But if the government had been cheated of money by some people, you don't think it was a legitimate activity on its part to go for these people?
A: It is legitimate, but at what level? It is the work of a police inspector, it is not the work of a political leader at our level. Political leaders should not reduce themselves to the level of a police inspector. This kind of thing is bound to have a political fall-out.

DURGAPRASAD

I know Chandra Swami since 1970. I am not embarrassed by my friendship with him

Dhirubhai Ambani/Chandra Swami

Q: Lots of people have been suggesting for a long time that you are an Ambani man. Is that why you are opposing V.P. Singh?
A: Chandra Shekhar does not have to clarify such matters. Both businessmen and politicians have at one time or another tried to spread such canards against me. But these allega-

A Of course, if I get the opportunity to implement ideas, yes, I would very much like it tions have never stuck. If they find such pastimes interesting, let them go ahead. I will never contradict them.

Tomorrow, if Ambani were to come and see me, I will meet him openly in the presence of cameramen. I am shocked and surprised that men like Ambani and Rajiv Gandhi don't want to meet in the open. I have met Ambani.

Q: Didn't you meet him at the Oberoi with Chandra Swami?
A: This is an old story. I'll tell you what really happened. Chandra Swami and I were supposed to attend the marriage of Chimanbhai's daughter.

So, I went off to Ritz Hotel (in Bombay). But the Express had already set up a man to follow us. When I reached Ritz Hotel, I got a ring from the Indian Express. I asked them how they knew about my whereabouts.

Then Mamaji, Chandra Swami's manager, called me to say that Swamiji wanted to see me urgently. I told him that we should be in the same place tomorrow, so what was the hurry?

But he insisted that it was very urgent. I had a dinner engagement to go to, so I tried to beg off. But he insisted that I wait for some time.

I said that I would come to the Oberoi and meet him and then go off to Jayant Malhoutra's for dinner. But no sooner had I reached the Oberoi than Ambani walked in. I met Ambani for the first time. No, once before I had met him at the Delhi airport, where he told me that he had sent some donation through some great leader of the Janata Dal, whom I don't want to name because I don't want to compromise his position.

Q: A minister?
A: Yes, a minister who talks a lot about public morality.

But I didn't know who this man (Ambani) was. Indubhai was with me, so I asked him who this man was, who was behaving so familiarly with me. Indubhai asked with surprise, "You don't know this man?" I said, "No."

Then Indubhai told me that he was Ambani.

By then we were in the bar where Ambani joined us again. And Indubhai is such an idiot, he told Ambani that I hadn't recognised him (laughs). So, I hurriedly made up a story, "You know we met for a minute there." That sort of thing.

But there are so many people who come up to you, particularly on flights, to say hello. You can't possibly ask them what, who they are.

So, that was my first meeting with Ambani. And then a year, two, three years later, we met at the Oberoi. But we didn't have a talk or anything. Chandra Swami had something to say to Ambani. But I was hardly there for ten minutes.

I just told Swamiji that I would meet him tomorrow in the plane. When I came down, there was this press reporter and photographer. I just got into a car and went off to Jayant's.

After that, we met once or twice at a couple of places, and I told him that before he was afraid of Rajiv Gandhi and now he is afraid of V.P. Singh. I wasn't afraid of either man. So, I asked him, "How can I possibly help you?"

I don't claim that I only meet saints. I meet all the people who come to see me. I meet everyone at...

Q: Value-based meetings?
A: Others may say so. But I do not think so. So, I am not bothered by any such talk. Let these people say what they want to.

Q: But what is the harm in meeting Ambani?
A: Exactly. That's what I am saying. What is the harm? But the unfortunate thing is he does not meet me. Once or twice I asked him why he was so hesitant.

Q: Did he send intermediaries?
A: No, he just does not want people to know about our meetings. I told him, "If I'm to be harmed, why are you worried?"

"No, no," he said, "you know how people are. There will be so much publicity."

Q: What about Chandra Swami? Is he a friend of yours?
A: Yes. I know Chandra Swami since 1970. He first came to Delhi around 1970-71. That time he was just a young man who was friendly with Indira Gandhi, Yashpal Kapoor and the rest of that gang. Mrs Gandhi was very fond of him.

Q: But the suggestion is that Chandra Swami has been preparing forgeries...
A: No, that I am not prepared to discuss. That is for the investigative agencies to find out. I do not believe that he is doing so.

MUKESH PARPIANI

What is the harm in meeting Ambani? But the unfortunate thing is he does not meet me

Zail Singh

Q: Giani Zail Singh, for instance, disclosed that Chandra Swami offered him money to dismiss the Prime Minister.
A: And he accepted the suggestion and did not take any action (laughs). I am not such a moral man as Gianiji,

Q Have they stopped tapping your telephone?

but I am amazed by people who talk about doing things in return for money – Rs 40 crores or Rs 40 lakhs.

I am not embarrassed by my friendship with Chandra Swami. I am not a moralist.

Let me tell you about a very close friend of mine, who has given me some money in every election, Rs 15,000, 20,000, 25,000, 50,000. In one of the elections, he came to my house, gave me Rs 25,000 and then added that his money should not be used in a particular constituency, where a Janata Party candidate was standing, but where he preferred the Congress candidate.

I kept quiet. But after he left my house, I sent the money back to him.

He came crying to my house again. But I refused to change my mind. I told him, "If you're going to decide whom I should help and whom I shouldn't, then I don't want your money. My acquaintance with you does not mean that you can take liberties with my political life."

This, despite the fact that he has been a very dear friend of mine for the last 30-35 years.

He apologised.

So, I am stunned when people in high positions say that they were offered Rs 30 crores or Rs 40 crores, and that they actually listened to these offers.

But I have nothing to say because Gianiji is also my friend.

The prime ministerial race

Q: There were reports that Ambani was behind your standing for the leadership of the Janata Dal.

A: I did not meet Ambani at that time.

Q: Why did you want to stand for election then?

A: I was opposed to a certain person becoming the leader.

Q: But you must have known that you would lose in a free and fair election.

A: Yes, I might have lost the election. Why should I assume that I would have won?

I don't know what may have happened. But what I fail to understand is why they were so scared of my standing.

Q: You insisted on standing despite the attempts to dissuade you. Why?

A: Look, if I don't consider you the leader of the party, it is my political duty to oppose you. It may be a symbolic or a self-defeating attempt, but it is necessary, so that tomorrow nobody can say that I supported you and am now backing out.

Q: Why did you agree to this deal then?

A: I didn't agree to the deal.

Q: Surely, you were told that a compromise had been worked out and Devi Lal would be Prime Minister. Why did you then agree to withdraw your candidature?

A: Because Devi Lal was acceptable to me in comparison with V P Singh. What is so mysterious about that?

In my opinion Devi Lal would have made a better Prime Minister than V P Singh. I still believe that.

Q: Why?

A: I don't want to go into the reasons.

Q: Is it because you believe that Devi Lal is his own man?

A: I don't want to go into that. You have to come to your own conclusion.

But take the career of Devi Lal. He has struggled long. Yes, he is not educated or sophisticated. In some matters he is not very reliable. But politically, he has always been a fighter, but a fighter for a good cause.

Q: You've always had a weakness for such people. You were the one who brought Raj Narain into the Janata Party.

A: I accept that. These are people who have made great sacrifices for the nation.

I have no personal grudge against Rajiv Gandhi. Personally, he has done nothing to me...This is politics. And politics is not for personal vendetta

A I have not checked. But when I made the allegation I was 100 per cent sure

Q: You are a great believer in the theory of the lovable yokel. He may be crude, unsophisticated, but he's basically a good chap.
A: Yes

Q. But is that enough to be Prime Minister of India?
A: No, but if the choice is limited what does one do?

Q: Everytime you are asked what your objection to V.P. Singh is you turn coy. Why is V.P. Singh not an acceptable Prime Minister as compared to Devi Lal?
A: Devi Lal wouldn't have taken such initiatives as the industrial policy

Q: He probably wouldn't have understood it.
A: That's fine. Sometimes people with understanding do greater damage than those who don't understand

So, if there is a choice between a person who is going to create problems for the nation because of his understanding and someone whose non-understanding will not create any problems, I will choose the latter.

Q: But what really happened? Were you told about the deal? Or were you lied to?
A: No, nobody told me anything. I would have never agreed to the deal. I was betrayed

Q: How come you forgave Devi Lal?
A: But what was the option? If I had created a scene, the party would have split at that very moment

The electoral verdict had been against the Congress. But even after the results, people were speculating whether it would form the government. At that time, it was not expedient, either for the Janata Dal or for me, to create problems. So, I just kept quiet in order to save the party from further embarrassment.

Everyone kept saying that Chandra Shekhar has been outwitted.

What do you mean outwitted?

If at that level you can reduce yourself to behaving in such a manner, if you can treat politics like a game, then I can only feel sorry for you.

But what about the role of the press at that time? Everyone knew what had happened, but apart from a few, nobody objected

Q: But at that point, Devi Lal did a deal with V.P. Singh...
A: I shall not say anything about Devi Lal or V.P. Singh. I just want to give my side of the story

Mid-term poll

Q: There is some talk of a mid-term poll. Would you support such a move?
A: That depends on the circumstances

Q: After the Independence Day speech, there is talk that the Prime Minister will stitch together a casteist coalition and go for elections.
A: I am against any casteist coalition. I am against any opportunistic move

Elections should only be held if they become imperative, unavoidable in implementing the programme we have set in our manifesto

Vinod Pande forgets sometimes that he is a bureaucrat. If he considers himself to be second in command, he will be in trouble

Q: But your government is not implementing that programme. So that is an irrelevant point.
A: Yes. And such governments also become irrelevant.

Q: So, isn't it a good idea to have an election?
A: Yes, then we should have an election. Then it becomes a choice between supporting the move to have an election or supporting the incompetence of my government

I don't support the idea of an election in January. If anyone has that idea he is living in his own wonderland. This will be of no benefit to the nation or the party.

Q:Do you think the Janata Dal will split in the event of an election?
A:I do not think that V.P.Singh is going to be so hasty as to announce an election.

Q:The general opinion is that the longer he waits the worse it is going to get.
A:Well, in my opinion, the sooner he announces elections, the worse it will be (laughs).

At this point the masses are in favour of neither party (Dal or the Congress). The ruling party has not gained any support, but neither has the Congress. So, if you hold elections there will be more confusion.

Even if you manage to win on the basis of caste combinations, how will you be able to manage? People tend to forget that Rajiv Gandhi with 400 MPs failed to manage things. So even if you get a majority of 300-odd seats, it will not improve matters.

The solution to our problems is not to get more seats in the Lok Sabha. The answer is clarity of vision and a clear idea of the destination to which you want to take the country

Q: But V.P Singh's Independence Day speech, with 52 per cent reservation being offered, seemed to indicate that a caste coalition was in the making.
A:Do you seriously think that everyone will hear that speech and join us? The Red Fort speech does not make any difference. Speeches are made and reported every day. The Red Fort speech is also the same. It has had no special impact on the mind of the people.

Q Can you say with confidence the party will never split?

Do you think people have forgotten that speech when he said that prices will come down within three months? And that within 15 days the Bofors names will be out? Before one month the Punjab problem will be solved?

Because of the Red Fort speech all these slogans have been forgotten by the people, no?

The PM's men

Q:There has been criticism of the PM's men...
A:Vinod Pande is just the cabinet secretary, but he forgets sometimes that he is a bureaucrat and that he has certain obligations to fulfil. If he considers himself to be second in command, he will be in trouble some day.

The man is talking like a fool, giving interviews to the press. Whether he gives the government 13 months or 13 days is not important. But if, with this interview, somebody gets up in Parliament, he will not last 13 days.

He might think that he is very important. But he is so insignificant that nobody is taking any notice of it. Only the Prime Minister has reacted, nobody else.

If anyone had taken serious note of it that man would have been in real trouble.

Q:Have they stopped tapping your telephone?
A:I have not checked. But when I made the allegation I was 100 per cent sure they were.

Q:Do you think you were the only politician whose phone was tapped?
A:No, there were others also.

Q:There is some talk that action may be taken against you for going to the Boat Club rally.
A:Who is going to take that action? Bommai certainly won't.

If somebody in the Prime Minister's secretariat is abusive, will Bommai take action against V.P. Singh (laughs)? Everyday the Prime Minister's secretariat briefs the press against me. All dirty, third-rate briefings without any substantiation. Will Bommai take action against V.P. Singh?

Q:Why is the Prime Minister's secretariat doing this?
A:I don't know. But what Pande—what's his name, Vinod Pande—has said in the interview is with the agreement of V.P. Singh. The incident that he has related ..

Q:About tapping, the suggestion is that the practice was prevalent during the Congress regime also. This government had not instituted the practice. It was just a routine thing the Intelligence Bureau (IB) had started a long time ago.
A: How can it be a routine thing? Every third month it is reviewed by the home ministry or the Prime Minister, whoever. I don't think the IB decides.

This is the preliminary thing the government does. If they are not conscious about their responsibilities...

Not only was my phone tapped, but my entire house was bugged. They posted people outside my house.

ASHOK VAHIE

Whether he (Mulayam Singh Yadav) calls me a saint or a devil, my assessment is political, nothing personal. He is doing very well

Q: Why didn't you mention it to the Prime Minister? He is your leader.
A:He is your leader. He is not my leader (laughs).

Devi Lal's ouster

Q:Do you think Devi Lal should have been fired? They could have asked him to resign.
A:This is the first time that a minister has been dismissed from the Government of India in the history of this country.

This is most humiliating. It creates problems not just for Devi Lal, but for all of us. We are setting records in political degeneration.

Q:Devi Lal also made it difficult by refusing to apologise. Don't you think he should have?
A:I don't know. That is for Devi Lal to say. Why should I comment on this matter?

Q:At the Cabinet meeting when the Prime Minister offered to resign, you asked him if there was a deal between him and Devi Lal.
A:No, I said there was a deal between them. If there wasn't a deal how could Chautala have become chief minister? How could Deepak become an ambassador?

They both kept quiet. I told them that they were both involved. That there had been some understanding between them. There is some misunderstanding in your understanding, so don't create a crisis for the party.

I told both of them. There is no secret about that.

Q: And did they say anything?
A: No, neither of them said anything.

Q: How are you sure there was a deal?
A: Because V.P. Singh himself told me. The only thing was that he was not so sure that Chautala would be appointed chief minister immediately. He thought there would be a gap.

But he has also said to you people (the press) that he thought Chautala's appointment was a matter for the MLAs.

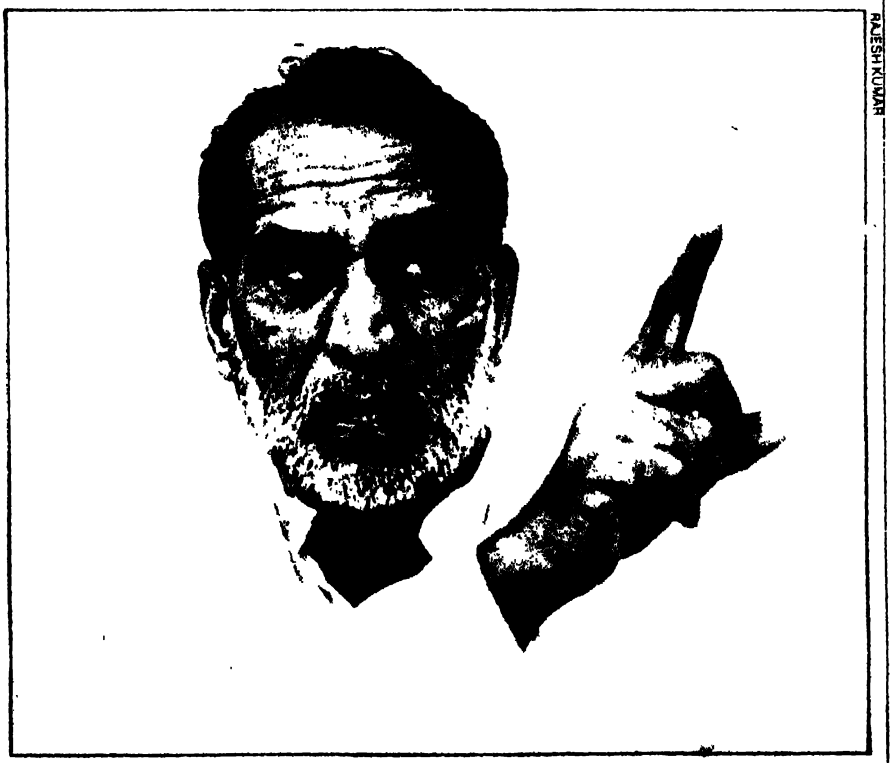
A Never, I can't say that. Who knows? But the Janata Dal has more resilience

Q: So you think he expected there wouldn't be a hue and cry about Chautala's reinduction?
A: I don't know. After Chautala's election, he said it is for the MLAs to elect the leader.

Q: What about Chautala? The perception is that you thought Chautala should not resign.
A: Now that is totally wrong. I was the first person to tell Chautala that he should resign...

Q: Really?
A: Yes, but I don't go to the press to humiliate our people in order to refurbish my image. I was the first person to suggest that he should resign. But, of course, I support that Devi Lal should not have been humiliated.

Uttar Pradesh



Q: Do you see any threat to Mulayam Singh Yadav's government?
A: No, at the moment, I don't see any threat.

Q: How do you find Mulayam Singh as chief minister?
A: Much better than anybody could have expected. Mulayam Singh's doing very well.

Q: Because he calls you a saint?
A: I don't know, because even before he did, I said that he's good (laughs). Whether he calls me a saint or a devil, my assessment is political, nothing personal. He is doing very well. He's firm, considerate and is sticking to certain principles.

Q: Then why has a signature campaign been launched against him?
A: This is part of the game.

Q: In case of a split in the Janata Dal, will he come with you?
A: (Laughs) Why do you people go on forecasting splits? There is no split in the Janata Dal.

RAJESH KUMAR

Ambition does not mean to be Prime Minister at any cost. If that had been my ambition, I would have been one long back

Q: Can you say with confidence the party will never split?
A: Never, I can't say that. Who knows? Can you ever say that a party will not split? But the Janata Dal has more resilience, they will accept any situation.

Ambition

Q: Would you like to be Prime Minister?
A: Of course, if I get the opportunity to implement ideas, yes, I would very much like it. But ambition does not mean to be Prime Minister at any cost or to be minister at any cost. If that had been my ambition, I would have been one long back. I would not have waited all this while.

Q: Were you, at any time, offered the post of deputy prime minister in this government?
A: It is known by all, why do you ask it? It (the offer) was there, but it is in a light vein, because anybody offering me anything does not mean anything. Why should I take it seriously? I have been offered so many things in the past...

Q: Such as?
A: No, I am not going to say anything about it...because this is not material.

Q: Of course, it is material. Because it suggests that V.P. Singh tried very hard to knit the party together, he even offered you the post of deputy prime minister...
A: No, I don't want to say anything. You go and ask V.P Singh and others this question. Why should you ask me?

Q: You have said a lot. Suppose they take any action against you, on this interview, like they did against Devi Lal?
A: What is there in this interview on which they will take action against me (laughs)? If they want to take action, they are free to take action. You don't bother about that part of it. You do your job, let me do my job. •

Interviewed by Vir Sanghvi and Rajiv Shukla/New Delhi

Badminton, anyone?

Sanjay Singh is stuck with the Syed-Amita rap

In life, Syed Modi attracted little attention The badminton champion was a shy, unassuming man, uncomfortable with English and happiest away from the spotlight.

Since his murder three years ago however, Modi's name has rarely left the headlines. It wasn't the gruesome circumstances of the killing that ensured that, but the fact that the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) decided that the murderer was Sanjay Singh, the flamboyant prince of Amethi.

By now, the outlines of the CBI's case are well known: Singh had an affair with Amita Modi, Syed's Maharashtrian wife. Modi found out and threatened to leave her. Panic-stricken that the affair would turn into a national scandal, Singh sent his goons to kill Modi.

Sanjay Singh will cope. He has switched sides effortlessly and fought a murder rap. When all else fails, it is the smirk that keeps him going

So far, the CBI has had little success in convincing the media that the case was not filed by the Congress regime to frame Sanjay Singh because of his Janata Dal connections. In recent weeks though, the Bureau has had a little luck in persuading the press that perhaps Singh and Modi were involved, though of course, this is by no means evidence of murder.

Singh has sensed the slight shift in the public mood. Last week, his lawyer went to court to complain about the press to allege that his client was being defamed.

Nevertheless, he continues to approach the case with exactly the same expression that he has maintained for three years: a smirk.

YOU FIND the smirk in pictures taken outside the courtroom. And you find it in video footage of the famous press conference at which Singh dismissed the confessions that implicated him in the murder. ("Give me Rajiv Gandhi for two hours and I'll get him to confess to his mother's murder," he bragged.)

And over the last week, the smirk has been Singh's way of responding to the uproar about him in Parliament. He knows that now that he has got into the Rajya Sabha (perhaps as part of the same deal that would have sent K.K. Deepak to the Seychelles and Chautala to Chandigarh), no amount of screaming by Congress MPs can deprive him of his seat. All it can do is embarrass him.

And Singh is not a man who is easily embarrassed.

Those who knew him in the Sanjay Gandhi days when he promised to deliver Amethi to the rising son are staggered by his confidence -and by the heights to which it has taken him.

In those days he was what the Doscos in Sanjay's crowd called a "ganwar" or a "bumpkin".

But if this was so, then he was an upwardly mobile bumpkin. Within months, the "ganwar" had taken to wearing safari suits and playing golf When Sanjay died and his snobbish Dosco buddies fell from grace, the man they had once dismissed, survived.

Of course, this had its amusing side. In his haste to ingratiate himself with Mrs Gandhi, he took to calling her "Mummy". (His guiding principle then was "Sanjay see Sanjay do".) She didn't really mind, but Congressmen still recall the time when he tried to introduce his adopted father, the Raja of Amethi, to Indira Gandhi.

"Mummy" he asked "Aap kabhi Daddy se milay hain?" (Mummy have you ever met Daddy?)

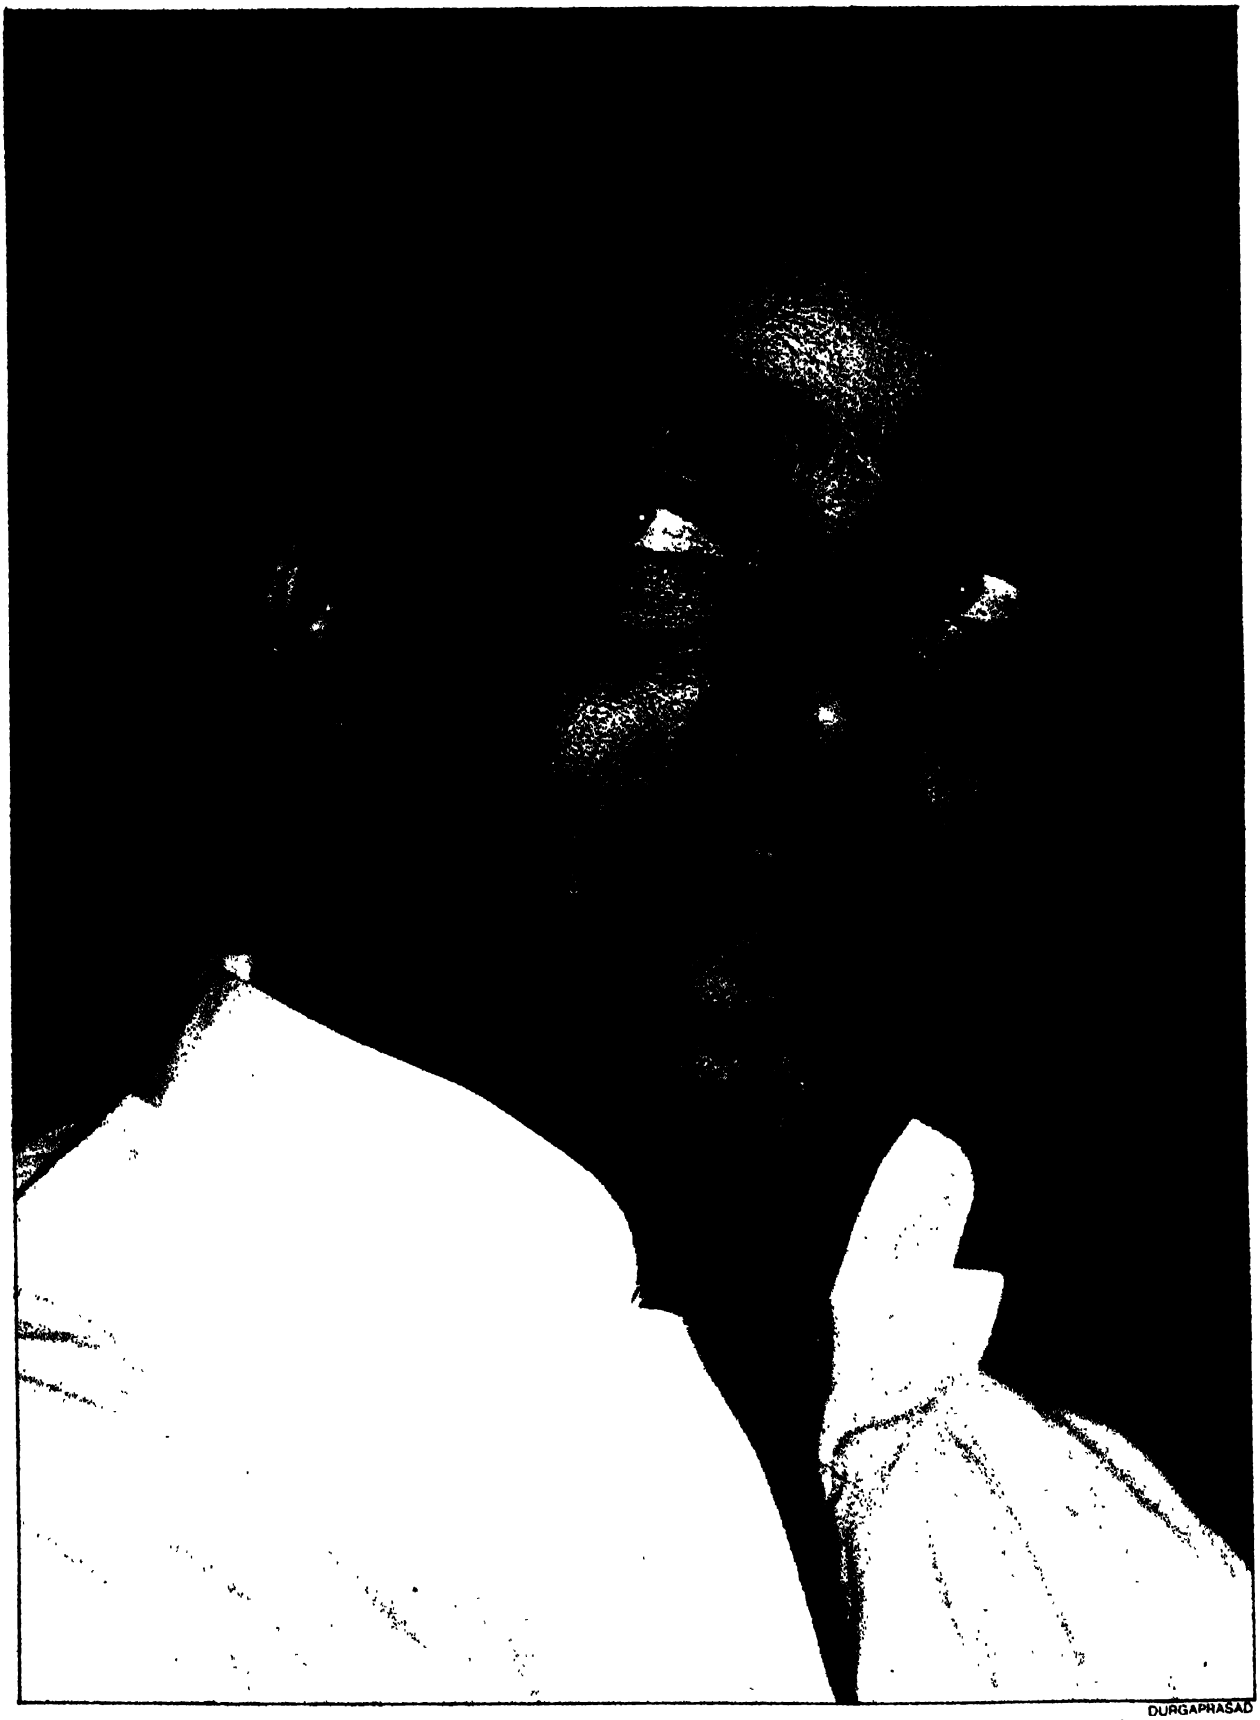
Even Mrs Gandhi had to giggle at that one.

WHEN SANJAY Singh filed his Rajya Sabha papers, it was regarded as certain that he would enter the Cabinet, perhaps as civil aviation minister

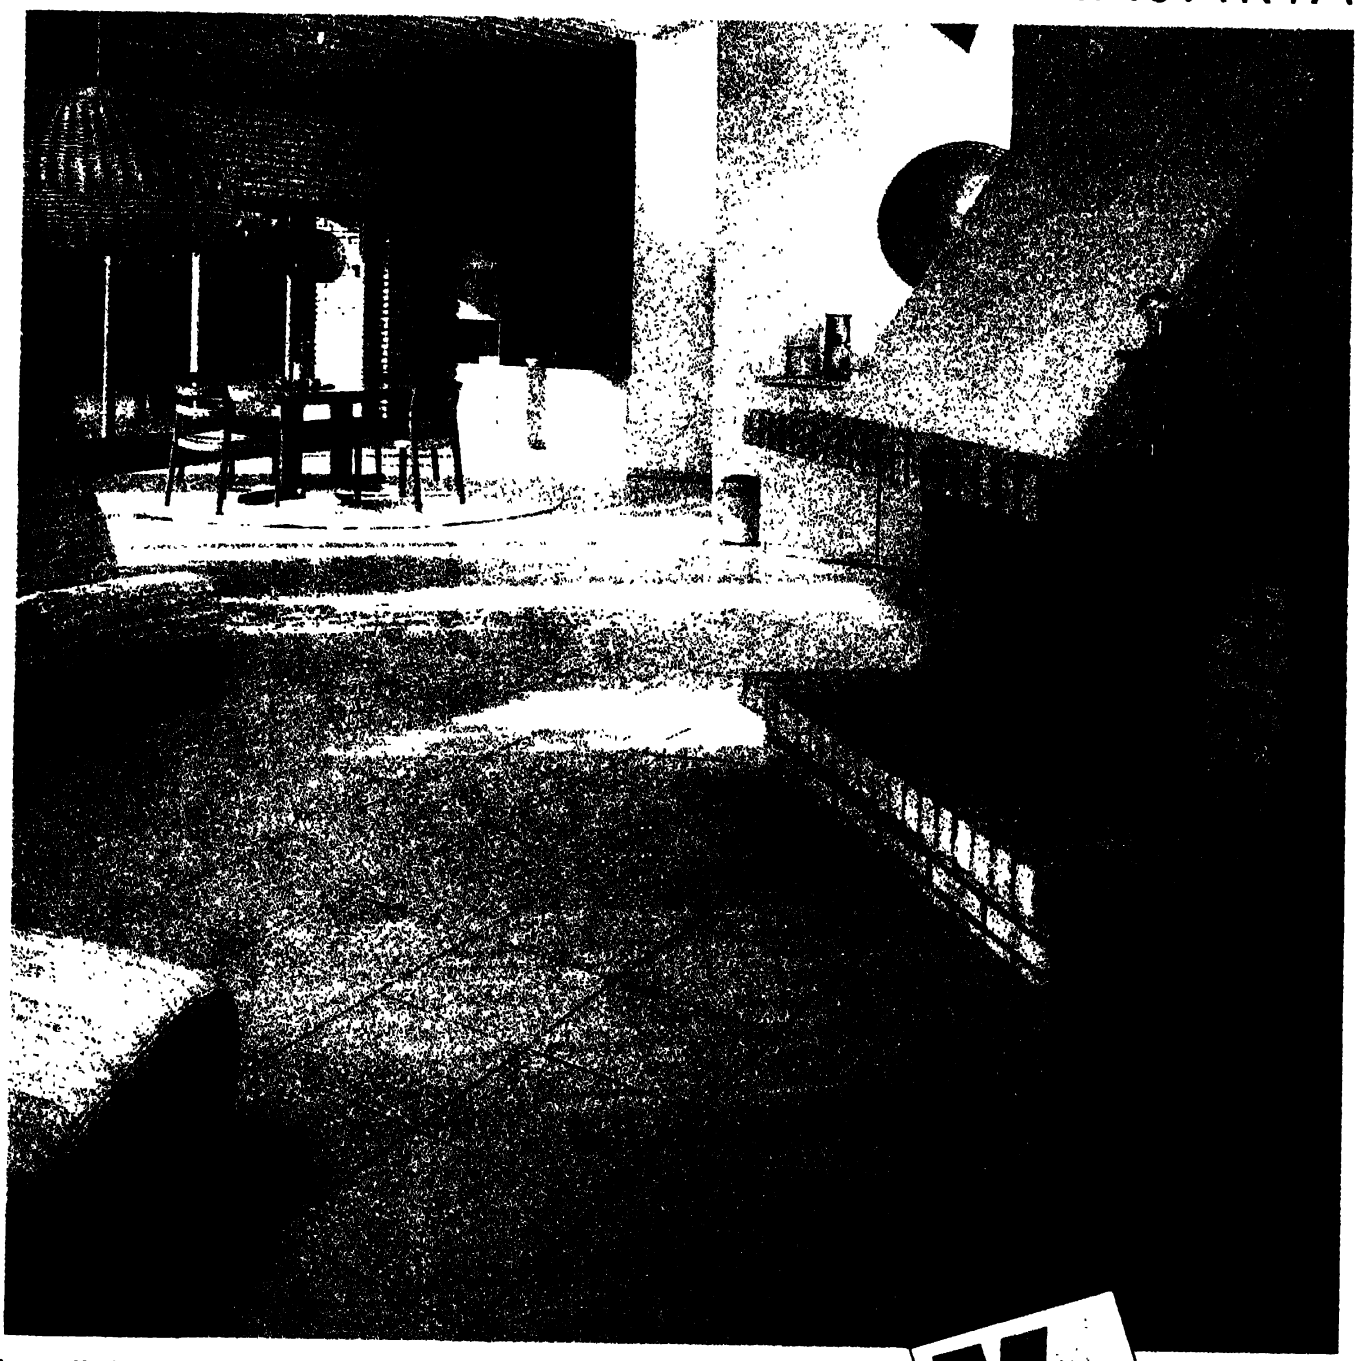
But this view ignored the Arun Nehru factor. Nehru and Singh have never got on. In 1986, he was the most vocal of Nehru's critics within the party and approached all of Rajiv's buddies with the same request: "Yaar, boss ko kaho ke is mote ko nikale." (Tell the boss to get rid of this fatty.) And he spread the Nehru-is-trying-to-topple-Rajiv theory.



In 1988, Nehru and Singh were briefly reconciled when the entire Opposition rallied to his defence over the Syed Modi case. But the patch-up did not last.

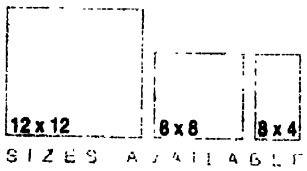
Today, Singh finds that he must contend with Mulayam Singh Yadav in UP and with Nehru in Delhi. Neither will let him rise. And as the Congress(I) continues to make an issue of the Syed Modi case, Singh finds that he is largely friendless.

Even that shrewd survivor V.P. Singh did not rally to his side in Parliament. As the Congress uproar continued, all the Raja would say was: "How can Sanjay Singh be my son-in-law when I don't have a daughter?" (He is, in fact, his brother's son-in-law and, contrary to rumour, neither VP nor Sanjay trusts the other.)



But Sanjay Singh will cope. He has switched effortlessly from Sanjay to Indira to Rajiv to VP; fought a murder rap; ignored gossip about his love life; and recovered from serious bullet wounds.

In the end, when all else fails, it is the smirk that keeps him going. •



DURGAPRASAD

12x12 FLOOR TILES FROM KAJARIA

in collaboration with TODAGRES Spain

PERFECT FLOORS

SIZES AVAILABLE

Kajaria

Kajaria Ceramics Limited

C-7, EAST OF KAILASH, NEW DELHI-110065.

★ WIDE RANGE OF COLOURS AND DESIGNS ★ MAINTENANCE FREE ★ SIMPLE TO LAY (READY FOR USE IN 24 HOURS) ★ DURABLE ★ EASY TO CLEAN ★ COST EFFECTIVE

Battle for Bombay

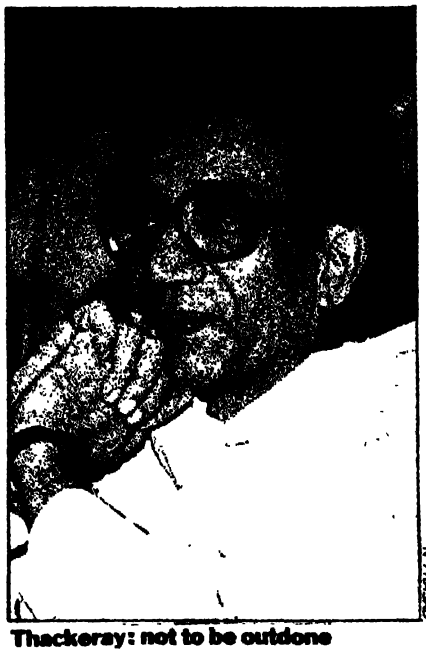
Campaigning begins for the prestigious municipal corporation elections

The battle lines are drawn for the control of the multi-crore Bombay municipal corporation. Even as the civic elections—scheduled to be held in September—approaches, chief minister Sharad Pawar is busy trying to tell the people of this metropolis that he really cares. And, not to be put down, the Shiv Sena is offering its own bag of goodies: they have promised to provide pucca houses to slum dwellers, rename the Sahar International Airport after Chhatrapati Shivaji and the Santa Cruz Airport after J.R.D. Tata, the pioneer of civil aviation.

Taking advantage of the mounting election fever, several hundred Shiv Sena activists and BJP volunteers courted arrest on 9 August as they took out a procession to the Sahar airport and placed a bust of Shivaji on a pedestal built for a statue of Jawaharlal Nehru. It was during Rajiv Gandhi's rule that the Centre had decided to rename Sahar airport after Nehru, a move that, predictably, drew loud protests from the people of the state. The Union government had even finalised plans to bring the statue from Delhi. The Sena supremo, Bal Thackeray, in one of his defiant moods, vowed to prevent the renaming of Sahar airport after Nehru. It is an emotive issue that even Pawar might find difficult to tackle.

The Maharashtrians also resent the naming of the new satellite port of Nahava Sheva after Nehru. They wanted it to be named Kanoji Angre, after the great Maharashtrian seafaring hero. An irate Thackeray, voicing the sentiments of the people, said at the Vidhan Sabha: "Bengal names their prestigious places after Subhas Bose, Tamil Nadu after Annadurai. It is only Maharashtra that has to have places named after Nehru, Indira Gandhi, and there is even a Sanjay Gandhi national park at Borivili. Enough is enough."

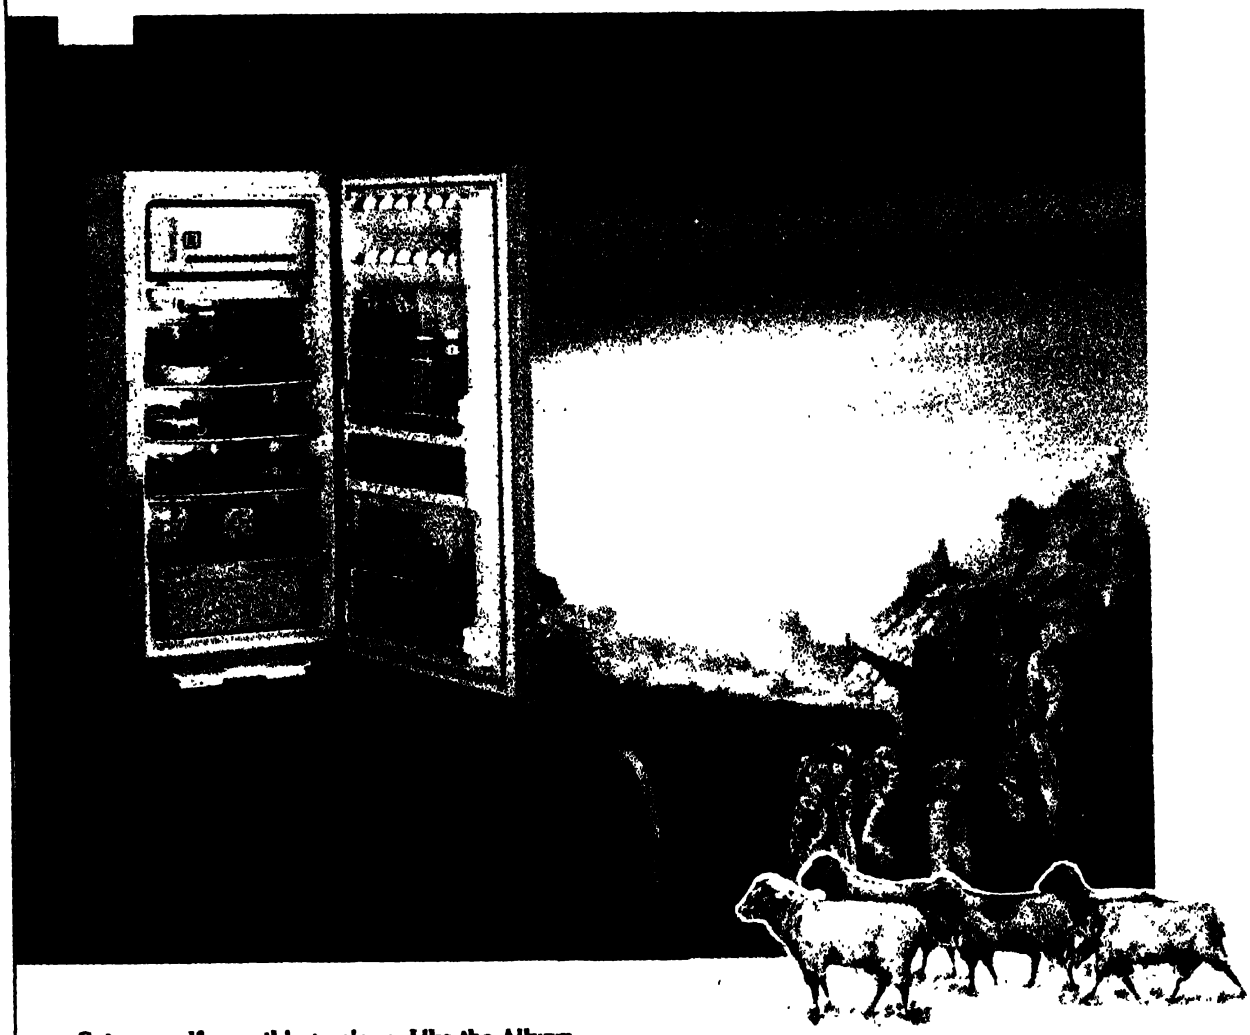
From the emerging strategies of the two sides, it seems that chief minister Pawar has the edge. An Act, reserving 30 per cent of the constituencies for women, is proving somewhat difficult —for both the BJP and the Shiv Sena, who have decided to fight the election in alliance—to cope with. While the Congress may be able to field suitable women candidates from its women's organisations for these reserved seats, no other party, except perhaps the BJP, which has a sprinkling of women cadres—has adequate strength to put up female candidates. And Pawar never misses an opportunity to harp on what his party has done for women. Incidentally, this Act has been passed only in Congress(I)-ruled states, as the directive came from the AICC(I) last year.



Pawar: ahead of the others

One aspect that is being emphasised by all the parties is housing. The chief minister is planning a scheme that will deal with dilapidated buildings. There are 19,000 such houses in Bombay, and Pawar has decided to take up a renovation programme under the aegis of the Maharashtra Area Development Authority (MAHADA). But the people have little faith in the MAHADA's ability to implement the project. Pawar, however, is depending a great deal on it and is banking on former minister Prabhakar Kunte, who now heads MAHADA, to see it through.

Not to be outdone, the Shiv Sena, too, has evolved an elaborate plan to house 40 lakh slum dwellers. Thackeray's scheme envisages taking over of land on which the slums are built and providing extra floor space index to encourage landlords to build multi-storeyed buildings and sell the tenements after meeting the requirements of the slum dwellers.



And even as strategies and counter strategies are being worked out, the Shiv Sena is trying to get the basics right. It is busy trying to woo all the Opposition parties to fight the Congress. Even though Mrinal Gore, president of the Janata Dal's state unit, is reluctant to enter into an alliance with the Sena, the latter hopes to convince the president of the Janata Dal, S.R. Bommai, about the need for an Opposition unity at this hour. The Sena has also held talks with the Shetkari Sanghatana leader, Sharad Joshi, who picked out the Sena for attack during the parliamentary and Assembly elections. Come September and the political climate is going to hot up. After all, a municipal budget of Rs 500 crore is at stake—some thing more than the total budget of many of the smaller states in the country. •

Thackeray: not to be outdone

Olga Tellis / Bombay

KEEP AWAY FROM THE HERD

Get yourself something unique. Like the Allwyn.
Quiet, sturdy and reliable.

Allwyn compressor with Hitachi technology for silent and trouble-free working. Tilting bottle racks for easy sliding of bottles. An efficient, quick and non-messy self-draining system of defrost. Leading to an automatic re-start.

Withstands a wide range of voltage fluctuations. (170V to 250V)

Allwyn- Pioneers of refrigeration in India. Available in 165 litres single and 165,300 and 380 litres double door models. Comes with a seven year warranty. And the choice of an additional seven year protection contract.

You can be sure now, that Allwyn will keep you away from the herd.

ALLWYN

QUIET · STURDY · FAITHFUL

Mudra : H : HAL

A crown of thorns

The Archbishop of Hyderabad is accused of entering into dubious land deals

When an Archbishop faces charges of corruption, does he say, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do"? Perhaps, if he is the Archbishop of Hyderabad, the Most Reverend Samineni Arulappa.

The Archbishop has been accused of selling church land, violating canonical law and turning a blind eye to shady deals that stuffed private pockets with church money. The leaders of the Catholic Action Committee (CAC) flaunt photocopies of sale deeds bearing the Archbishop's signature. The Archdiocese of Hyderabad received a gift of 90 acres of land from Ramalingeshwara Rao on 5 September 1973. And on 18 September 1989, the Archbishop sold the full 90 acres to a cooperative housing society.

The housing society, based at Barakatpura, paid Rs 67.5 lakh, and about 16 agents are to receive a commission of Rs 31.5 lakh. But, according to the CAC, the most conservative assessment puts the land value at rupees five crore. And since the area, Guttala Begumpet, is adjacent to Jubillee Hills, it has possibilities of becoming a 'posh' neighbourhood in the next few years and the value could easily touch Rs 10 crore. What makes the Archbishop's act all the more suspect is the power of attorney he gave to a court clerk to act as his agent. The photostat copy of the document, endowing C.R. Jaganathan with full powers to act on behalf of the Most Reverend Arulappa, shows that he was allowed "to lease out or sell the land by making plots or to mortgage the said land... to sign, execute all contracts, agreements, deeds, transfers, assignments..." It is not surprising therefore that Jaganathan and his relatives figure prominently in the list of beneficiaries of the Rs 31.5 lakh commission.

And this is not the only scandal the Archbishop is involved in. In a letter to him, Michael Frank, director, Madras zone, of Catholic Relief Services (CRS), refers to certain "illegal sales" where CRS funds had been diverted and warns His Grace that "any stonewalling or attempts to cover up would make matters worse and arouse increased suspicion". In an obvious reference to the Archbishop, Frank adds, "I hope we can settle it as humanely as possible without shirking our responsibility and duty to the donor and the beneficiaries."

And Rev. Arulappa figures again in the St John's Seminary land scam. The Catholic Bishop's Conference of Andhra Pradesh owns land at Ramanathpur, off Hyderabad city, where the seminary is located. As chairman of the committee in 1989, the Archbishop allegedly sold more than 13 acres to a private housing society and about 25 acres to Doordarshan. Leaflets advertising the new land layout are already doing the rounds.

In 1905, the Nizam of Hyderabad gifted over six acres to the church for charitable purposes. A home for the aged was set up. Apparently, the Archbishop coerced the Little Sisters of the Poor, who run the home, Snehalayam, to give up 4,500 square yards so that Snehalayam could set up a working women's hostel. There are two basic problems with this. First, the land was gifted for "charitable purposes" and running a hostel does not fall under that category. Second, the hostel is being run by a non-Catholic.

"The Archbishop has violated the Canonical rubric," says an incensed Saldanha, a former director general of police. Quoting from the Code of Canon Law, he says, "The canons are very clear about the role of the Archbishop. This man has not appointed a finance committee...The canonical law 1292 states that 'the Bishop acting with the consent of the finance committee, the college of consultors...needs the consent of the same persons to alienate goods which belong to the diocese'. As you can see, this man seems to be under the impression that the diocese is his personal fiefdom."

J. Reddy, a firebrand CAC spokesperson, depicts the Archbishop as a latter-day Mephistopheles. And the warring groups show no signs of cooling down. Last month the rebel priests held a protest rally. After a prayer and a service conducted by the rebels, the angry protestors marched to the Archbishop's house and gave him a memorandum.

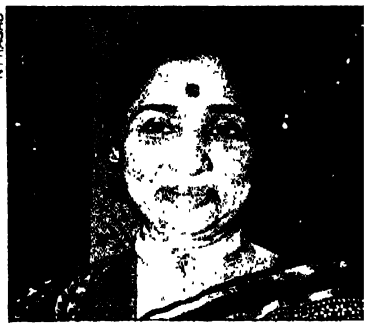
And in true Christian spirit, at the same time, a pray-in was being held at St Mary's Church—asking forgiveness for the rebels. •

Catholics protesting against the sale of church land: growing discontent

Jagadish Prasad/Hyderabad

KARMA COME ON

He's thinner now: the much-publicised heroin addiction has taken its toll. And those famous locks have been sheared away leaving him with a close-cropped, severe look.



But otherwise, George O'Dowd, better known as Boy George, seems much the same. The Boy is currently recording an album in Bombay as part of a new Indo/pop aggregation called the West India Company. (Geddit?)

Other members of the band are Asha Bhosle, her husband Rahul Dev Burman, percussionist Pandit Dinesh (formerly of Osibisa) and assorted session musicians from London.

Boy George: Hare Krishna, man!

N PRASAD

Asha Bhosle: mad about the Boy

The idea, says the band, is to fuse Western and Indian rhythms together and create a hybrid that will work as well in London and Los Angeles as in Ludhiana.

If all goes well, then the West Indian concept could spread to clothes (a range by Abu Jaani and Sandeep Khosla is rumoured to be in the works) and other marketable concepts. And there is talk of extending the fusion concept to include African

FAST FOR YOUR FIGURE

[redacted] So, Jindal's didn't work!

But the portly general secretary of the AIADMK is nothing if not resourceful.

Jayalalitha: tipping the scales

Last fortnight Jayalalitha declared that she would fast unto death if the key to the sealed headquarters of the AIADMK was not delivered to her custody at once. Nobody seriously believed that she would go through with it, but many wondered if the general secretary's frame would reflect the rigours of her starvation.

As it turned out, the fast lasted just two days. Jayalalitha did not get custody of the headquarters (and no, she's not much slimmer, either) but called the whole thing off in response to an "appeal" by Rajiv Gandhi.

So it's back to square one. And to Jindal's.

LIES, LIES, LIES

They are at it again. A few months ago, when Rajiv Gandhi went to Kashmir, he got into a flaming row with the then Governor Jagmohan. Rajiv gave his version of the argument to the AICC last month. Jagmohan denied it.

And so, Rajiv repeated it at length in his SUNDAY (issue dated 12-18 August, 1990) interview, adding that his

Rajiv: he said it, he said it

GAUTAM PATOLE

R.D. Burman: no more jhinchick, jhinchick singer Mory Kante whose Tama has been ripped off as Jumma chumma de de. (And whose album Akawaba Beach has just been released by Music India.)

But why is the Karma Chameleon here? What accounts for the sudden love of Indian music? Apparently, George has found solace in the Hare Krishna movement after his problems with heroin, Marilyn, Jon Moss, the fuzz and his solo career. And so, India makes perfect sense.

INDIA'S RAJIV RIDES AGAIN

You can't keep a good woman down! A year after she made India's Rajiv, a series of two TV documentaries, the indefatigable Simi Garewal is at it again.

Garewal's latest venture is another film on Rajiv Gandhi, focussing on the period in exile. She has already shot the leader of the Opposition's trips to various states and hopes to be allowed the same kind of access that she was afforded during the shooting of India's Rajiv.

Who knows, this time the timing might work to Garewal's advantage. Rajiv was released just as its hero was on the verge of losing the election. Perhaps this new documentary will be ready just as Rajiv is about to make his comeback.

Simi Garewal: celebrity mouthpiece

JAGDISH YADAV

Jagmohan: I did not, I did not

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

Aiyar: It's all in my notes

aide Mani Shankar Aiyar had a verbatim record of their conversation and that Jagmohan not only wanted to hand Kashmir over to the JKLF but also planned on appointing Shabir Shah as his chief minister.

Now, it is Jagmohan's turn again and he has promptly issued a denial through the Indian Express. Firstly, he said, Shabir Shah belonged to the People's Conference not the JKLF. And secondly, Aiyar had "manufactured" his account of what had transpired.

Your move, Rajiv Gandhi.

BATS AND BALLS

Yes, they still hate each other.

But no, they are not being as petulant as before.

Last week, feuding cricket personalities Bishen Singh Bedi and Bedi: cease-fire?

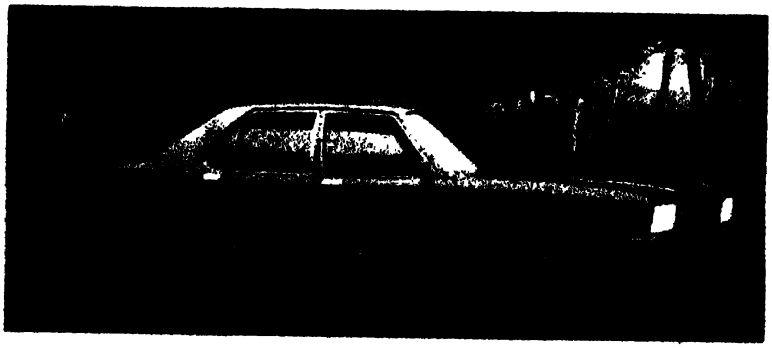
PHIL & GHOTA

Sunil Gavaskar finally strode on to a field together. At a festive cricket match organised by country squire Tim Hudson in Manchester both Bedi and Gavaskar shared bowling honours. The aggressive Indian manager took three wickets while the sulking master batsman took two.

And neither snarled at the other. ●



PRABHAKAR PAS

Gavaskar: end to hostility?

One of the few cars on the road that was

Contract HM 22148C

[illegible] shown in the picture
are not part of standard equipment.

A Limousine to every other car

never meant to compete in the rat race.

While the vast majority of people rush around in the frenzy of life, a few people don't.

They insulate themselves from the outside world. Using the Contessa as an effective barrier.

The moment its doors shut with a muted click, and they sink into the soft, non-slip upholstery, their Contessa becomes their sanctuary.

With a fuel efficient 1.8 litre Isuzu engine that effortlessly pulls them away from the hustle and bustle.

With 5 forward gears, including an overdrive, to smoothly place vast distances between them and everybody else.

With a suspension that gently hugs the road, and cushions them from rude shocks.

With an air conditioner that keeps them from getting all hot and bothered.

And with, of course, amazingly responsive steering and power disc brakes to keep them in complete control.

But there's really much more to the Contessa. So why not get in touch with us.

And take a closer look at a superior race of car.

Contessa
Classic 1·8 GL

As soon as we reach one summit, we strive for the next.

Century India's largest exporter of cotton textiles. Now also a leading producer of cement

From a modest beginning in 1975 Century has blossomed into India's largest exporter of cotton textiles Earning more than Rs 100 crore in hard currency in the year 1989-90

Over the years Century diversified into rayon yarn, tyrecord, minerals & chemicals cement pulp & paper and shipping In all these areas the Company has made its mark

In cement, the Company has achieved remarkable success in a short time Cement manufactured at its most modern plants CENTURY CEMENT, MAIHAR CEMENT, MANIKGARH CEMENT is now being marketed in almost all parts of the country

Century is now exploring new avenues to create more productive assets for the country, and more opportunities for our people to better the quality of their lives

CENTURY

300 years ago

The British Library holds an exhibition to mark Calcutta's tercentenary

"This day at Sankraul... (arrived at Chutanuttee) about noon but found ye place in a deplorable condition, nothing being left for our present accommodation and ye rains falling day and night."
Job Charnock.

Language apart, these words could have come from anyone landing in Calcutta in the month of August. Only they are from a 300-year-old diary, meticulously maintained by an Englishman, who was none too happy with what he saw of what is now called the port of Calcutta. But bleak or not, it was a momentous landing for Job Charnock: and one that would lead to the beginning of the British Empire in India.

Three hundred years later, the British—whose love for anniversaries stretches from people and events to cities and monuments—have not forgotten the city which was their first capital in India. And the moods and high moments of Calcutta—founded by Job Charnock in 1690 and consolidated and rebuilt by the British from 1773 to 1858—are captured in the exhibition "Calcutta City Of Palaces", organised by the British Library to mark the tercentenary of the city. The exhibition, inaugurated on 21 June, will remain open until September, reviving Raj nostalgia.

To those who associate Calcutta with overpopulation and poverty, the title may seem a bit of a misnormer. But exhibition organiser, J.P. Losty, of the India Office Library—who spent nine months organising the exhibition and has also written a book on Calcutta—says that he wants to portray the positive side of the city. "I have chosen all the paintings and documents which describe the beauty of Calcutta, the city that stood on the banks of the Hooghly," Losty told SUNDAY. "There was a grandeur about the city and that is what I have focussed on. Unfortunately, it is more the British administration and lifestyles that we have dealt upon, rather than the lives of the local inhabitants. But that is because we had more records about the British."

Paintings from that period by Bayly Daniel, Fraser and other artists depict scenes of colonial life. The minute attention to detail, the paintings of palaces, temples, sprawling greens and the tranquil river, all construct a beautiful and lyrical portrait of a thriving city. The exhibition features archival material from the India Office Library which has never been on display before.

Among the other exhibits are:

- The firman issued by Farrukh Siyar granting the East India Company the privilege of custom-free trade. The records interestingly describe Farrukh Siyar as the king of "Indostan".
- A diary of John Surman who lead the British delegation to the Mughal court in Delhi in the years 1714-17.
- The original letter patent dated 20 September, 1727, with the seal of George I introducing English law to Calcutta and authorising the Company to set up courts in Calcutta, Bombay and Madras.
- J.Z. Holwell's account of the loss of Calcutta to Siraj-ud-Duala and his engraving of the Black Hole (where British soldiers were imprisoned) in the London Magazine.
- The journal of Phillip Francis giving an account of the duel between Francis and Lord Warren Hastings.
- A copy of the first newspaper in India, The Bengal Gazette, which was published from 1780-82 by James Augustin Hickey, described as a "wild Irishman".
- A document in which James Princep announces having deciphered the Brahmi script in 1837. (The key to the script had been lost till Princep deciphered the inscription of Ashoka in Brahmi.)
- A document of the third anniversary discourse delivered to the Society by Jones in February 1786 where he puts forward the theory of affinity between Sanskrit, Greek and Latin. Says Jones: "No philosopher could examine all three without believing them to have sprung from some common source, which perhaps no longer exists." To this group he adds Gothic, Celtic and old Persian propounding the theory of affinity of Indo-European languages.

A View Of The Scotch Church* by Fraser: a bygone era

Among the more popular exhibits are the engravings showing the detailed plan of the city as it stood in 1825, by E. De La Combe. The India Office Library has an even more detailed map—18 feet long—which couldn't be accommodated for lack of space.

On the whole, the exhibition is a history lover's treat. A fitting tercentenary tribute to the City of Joy. •

Shrabani Basu/London

RAGHUBIR SINGH

ART IN THE TIMES OF DECAY

Three hundred years and still going strong. That's Calcutta's cultural history

Calcutta, 1942. The famous Roshanara Begum is singing at the Imperial Hall. The auditorium is packed despite the sombre times. The Japanese forces are knocking at the eastern frontier and their bombers have begun attacking the city. But at the Imperial Hall it is showtime. Until all of a sudden, sirens begin shrieking and the hall is plunged into darkness. It is an air attack. Japanese airplanes, unable to find their target in the blacked-out city, dump their bombs over Haathibagan and turn away. After a few minutes the lights come back. Outside, in the streets some people are screaming. Inside the hall, the temporarily stunned audience requests Roshanara to resume singing. And she sings. And sings. All through

RAGHUBIR SINGH

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

(Clockwise from left) Statue languishing in an old courtyard; Baul singer at a Calcutta art gallery; Shyamanand Jalan directing a play; browsers at a second-hand book shop: aspects of an effervescent culture

the long night till dawn finally breaks over the city.

The story sounds apocryphal. But it is as true as Calcutta's strange obsession with the arts. Today, the city is more ravaged than it was at the height of the Japanese attacks. When the humid, claustrophobic nights close in over the city, large areas are plunged into darkness. But the sirens have long fallen silent. Diesel gensets have taken over, chugging away defiantly against the onslaught of 'load shedding'. And the spirit of Roshanara Begum seems to be re-enacting her routine all over the city: in cramped studios where the painter never tires, in dank rooms where the wheezy harmonium still grinds out old tunes and in flea-ridden movie halls where the greats continue to be screened.

Whatever else might be dead or dying in Calcutta, the arts are not. When Job Charnock dropped anchor off the place that was to become Calcutta 300 years ago on 24 August, he had no idea what he was starting. At that time, not even the most inspired clairvoyant would have predicted that this mosquito-infested swampland would one day grow into the 'jewel of the British Empire', or that even in decay this city of dreadful nights would remain the cultural capital of an Independent India. Economic decline and the centuries might have eroded the city's edifices and washed away past glories, but nothing has been able to dampen the Calcuttan's obsession with the celebration of the arts.

Every weekend, thousands of Calcuttans still throng the theatres, often paying blackmarket prices for a seat. Equal numbers, unable to afford brand new books, spend hours at the second-hand book stores of College Street, browsing through dogeared copies of Kunderas and Dosteoevskys. The book fairs in Calcutta might not net as much in book sales as the ones held in other Indian metropolises but gate money collections are by far the highest here. Calcutta's music festivals, like the annual one held near Dover Lane, still remain the most prestigious of events for the country's best classical musicians. Similarly, the city manages to support, and idolise, scores of writers and poets. Novelist Manishankar Mukherjee, who writes under the name Shankar, is the country's highest selling living author. Many others consider Shakti Chattopadhyay as the best contemporary poet. Some of the country's most promising film-makers, not to speak of the already acclaimed Satyajit Ray and Mrinal Sen, continue to be spawned here. Even painters, who in the past had been disgracefully neglected by the city, today not only make a good living but also aspire to celebrity status. Art gallery owners estimate that at least 15-odd Calcutta painters, apart from the two major artists, Ganesh Pyne and Bikash Bhattacharjee, earn an average of more than Rs 5,000 per month. This decrepit city, burdened by crippling poverty and hobbling along uncertainly towards the 21st century, seems determined to prove that no matter what happens the show will go on.

This is most evident in the vibrant world of Calcutta theatre. Today, there are more than half-a-dozen major groups or producers regularly staging plays. Theatre halls are booked well in advance and successful plays run for months on end. Yet, it is not as if there is big money in it. There are only a handful of people who can make a decent living out of theatre, and all of them are big names, including actor-dramatist Utpal Dutt, Professor Rudraparasd Sengupta of Nandikar, Kumar Roy, who presently runs Bahuroopee established by the famous Sambhu Mitra, Bibhash Chakraborty, Arun Mukherjee, Ramaprasad Banik and Manoj Mitra. The overwhelming majority of theatre actors and technicians are part-timers. "They do it for the sheer love of theatre," says Shymanand Jalan, who runs a small theatre and dance group called Padatik.

TARAPADA BANERJEE

(Left) Ganesh Pyne; (above) one of his works: linked inextricably with Calcutta

Jalan, who takes credit for promoting the celebrated exponent of street theatre, Badal Sircar, and the Hindi actor, Kulbhusan Kharbanda, points out that Calcutta's theatre works against terrific odds. There is, for instance, a government-imposed ceiling on gate money (a maximum of Rs 15 as against Rs 40 in a good Bombay theatre like Prithvi). Moreover, in a city like Bombay, the commercial forces in operation have made the theatre something of a training ground for cinema. "Theatre in Bombay is often a vehicle for advertising talent," says Jalan. "There is intense competition because everybody wants to be noticed and eventually picked up by cinema." Nothing of that sort operates in Calcutta and those who persevere do not do it so much for material rewards.

Actor Kharbanda, for instance, would work in a factory, checking the arrivals of oxygen cylinders, and in the evenings spend time improving his dramatic skills. His big break came when Padatik staged Vijay Tendulkar's Sakharam Binder. The play was highly successful and was running to full houses when the theatre owners refused to allow it to be staged. The play, according to them, was vulgar and objectionable. Jalan then took the play to the annual festival, Bangiya Sanskriti Sammelan, where it was booed down. As luck would have it, Kharbanda's boss was among the audience and he was so outraged at his employee's theatrical performance that he sacked him the next day. A dispirited Kharbanda left for Bombay, where he eventually earned fame.

Collector Raj Kejriwal: the latest in a long line

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

Calcutta's cultural world is full of such tales, each one stranger than the other. The common theme in all the stories is the indomitable spirit of the budding artist. The fact that the arts flourish in the city is a tribute to those individuals who have struggled to find the courage and the means to express themselves in a milieu that either exhausts or overwhelms the average person. The story of Ganesh Pyne, who is today acknowledged as one of the country's finest painters, is a case in point.

Pyne turned to art because that was all he was good at. Right from childhood the ordinary slate to him was a magic board where every fantasy could come alive. While in school he had presumed he would become a botanist, but he had spent more time trying to understand Abanindranath Tagore, a painter whose works captivated him. "Understanding another artist is not merely understanding how he paints but matching his every nerve," says Pyne. "I never met him but I read everything he wrote and felt that I knew him and could visualise how he would behave in any situation." After school, on his uncle's advice, he enrolled with the Government Art College. His examiners were so impressed by his capabilities that they directly admitted him to the second year of the five-year art course.

Art, Pyne learnt, was almost like a science and possessed an intrinsic rigour he had never suspected. All the same, he graduated in a record four years and like all middle class young men began searching for a job. He gave innumerable tests and interviews but never got a job. In the meantime, he did several things to earn money, like designing covers for tin boxes (at

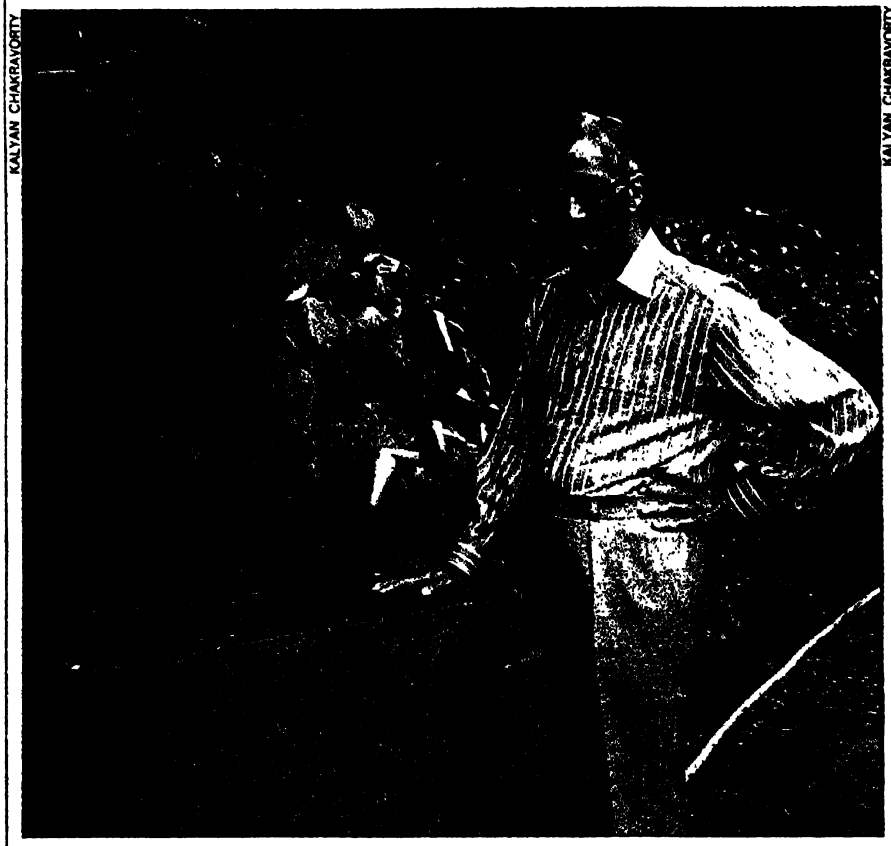
KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

(Left) Bikash Bhattacharjee; (above) one of his watercolours: "Calcutta is like a mother to me"

Rs 5 a design) and working on book illustrations. Two years after graduating, he took up a ill-paid, part-time job with Mandar Mullick, who was the pioneer of animation films in Bengal. "It was very laborious work but it taught me the virtues of patience and diligence," recalls the artist. During that period, he made an animation film for children called Kalo Beral (Black Cat), which today is filed somewhere in the Pune Film Archives. But the period from 1959 (the year he graduated) to 1979, when he first won recognition as a major Indian artist, were traumatic years for Pyne.

The stigma of being jobless, the constant search for money and the tramping down dismal streets, almost completely wore out Pyne's spirit. In 1978, in desperation he applied to the Kesoram Cotton Mills for a job as a textile designer. After he had submitted his testimonials and samples of his work, the man who would be his boss, Dr Vyas, called him and requested him to think twice before taking up the work. Dr Vyas told him that he was essentially a creative artist and the work as a textile designer would destroy him. The next day when Pyne decided against taking up the job, Vyas was thrilled and urged him to struggle on. That seems to have been the turning point in the artist's life.

"Painting had always been a very personal process for me," says Pyne. "I would paint during the period I never had money or a job, I would paint to forget the terrible world outside." As it turned out his paintings, once they were noticed, became more than one way of escape. With recognition came money. Today, a Pyne tempera painting sells for more than Rs 75,000 and there is a huge queue of collectors waiting to snap up anything he produces. Pyne, who is considered the least prolific of the major contemporary Indian painters, produces between 3-6 temperas and about 10-15 smaller works (ink, pastel, water colours etc.) every year. His patrons would, however, like him to work faster. He could earn a small fortune every year. "But I can't paint mechanically...I don't claim that I am completely free but at least I must try to be as free as possible," he explains. And Pyne's secluded life retains a storybook flavour: fame and the flush of wealth has hardly changed his lifestyle. He still lives in a joint family in one of the old lanes of central Calcutta, in a house with ancient mirrors and rexin sofas, serving tea when friends and wealthy patrons turn up. From the windows in the upper stories of his house, he watches a decaying Calcutta of monsoon-stained buildings sprouting peepul trees and knows that his dreamlike works could only have taken shape in the unreal world of this blighted city.



Poet Shakti Chattopadhyay: the best among contemporaries

RAGHUBIR SINGH

Virtually every Calcutta painter,

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

(Left) Industrialist B.K. Birla; (above) bhajan singer Vinay Bapna: art comes above money

film-maker, writer, poet and dramatist, no matter how much they might hate the city, cannot but acknowledge that their sensibilities have been shaped by the city. Just as Ganesh Pyne says that some enduring umbilical cord ties him to the city, painter Bikash Bhattacharjee declares that "there is no question of me leaving Calcutta". Bhattacharjee, whose paintings are a rage among art collectors today, admits that he has received many offers to live outside the city and that artists living in metros like Delhi and Bombay have a better chance of making it big. "But Calcutta, particularly north Calcutta where I have grown up, is the source of my creativity," he explains. "Had I grown up anywhere else, I would not have been myself. I would have been something else."

It is not as if artists like Bikash Bhattacharjee view the city with tinted glasses. Bhattacharjee, for instance, despairs at the continuous deterioration of Calcutta's civic services, the declining sense of humour of its inhabitants and the increasing doublespeak resorted to by the city's caretakers. "Whenever I return to Calcutta, I feel bad...the lights here seem to burn so dimly," he laments. He is equally indignant when he recalls how the city initially treated painters like himself and Pyne. "Nirode Mazumdar once called Calcutta painters a bunch of 420s (frauds)!" Bhattacharjee recalls with emotion. "And if people like me and Ganesh Pyne have made it, it is because we had faith in ourselves."

(Above) Suresh Neotia; (right) a music soiree at his residence: one of Calcutta's oldest patrons

At the same time, Bhattacharjee knows that there is much more to the city. There is, for example, a great heritage that the city preserves in its collective consciousness. "The influence of our literature, our great lyrical tradition and great filmmakers like Satyajit Ray have all helped us", he acknowledges. Filmmaker Goutam Ghosh adds: "Even the contradictions in this city enriches us..the city is possessed with an undefinable streak of wonderful madness." Ghosh says that Calcutta reminds him a bit of Naples and a bit of Manhattan, and all the influences that shape this crazy pastiche of a city seep into the artist to shape his consciousness.

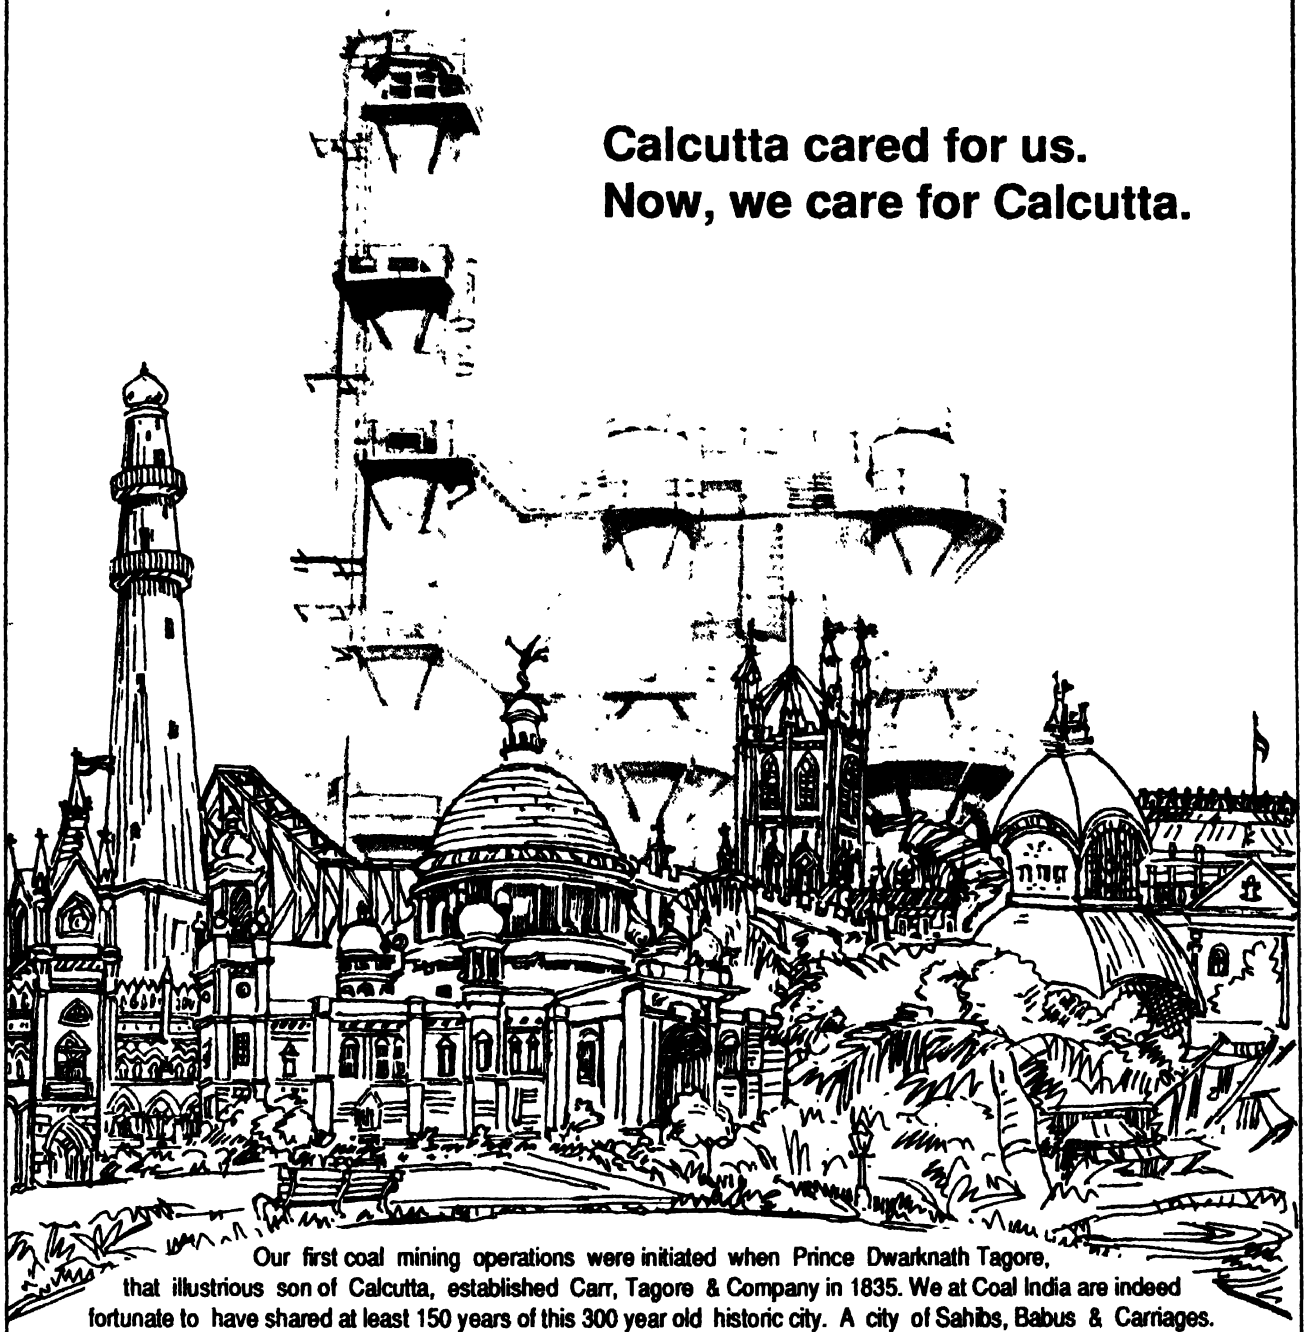
The culture that this city exudes is not confined to the practitioners of art but also the dabblers, the patrons and the charlatans who live in its penumbra. Vinay Bapna, a young and highly successful city builder, after making a fortune has taken to singing bhajans and has become well-known throughout the country, thanks to the patronage of Basant Kumar Birla, the Calcutta-based industrialist who happens to be the city's biggest patron of the arts. Bapna says it is impossible to be unaffected by the culture of Calcutta. "Today, it is cheap to talk about wealth, that is not what makes me proud," he says. Singing has given him far more prestige and personal satisfaction than all the money he has earned. "Now I understand why all the great musicians claim that the pleasure of performing in Calcutta is unparalleled," he says.

Film-maker Gautam Ghosh: "It is the memories that keep me going"

"There are more wealthy families in one colony of Delhi than in the entire city of Calcutta and yet artists are thriving in this city," says Suresh Neotia, one of the city's oldest art collectors. In the pre-independence period, the arts were patronised by foreigners and by rich zamindars. Today, the foreigners have departed and the zamindars have all but disappeared—the Mullicks of Sovabazar being one exception. Today's biggest patrons are big businessmen, inspired by a handful of Marwaris who began patronising Indian art from the 1950s and 1960s. One of the first to start was Basant Kumar Birla, whose residence in Birla Park is something like a museum with over 2,000 examples of ancient Indian carvings, Persian and Rajasthani miniatures, and bright contemporary canvases.



"Even five years ago painters in Calcutta found it hard to recover their money," says B.K.Birla, who started buying Indian paintings as far back as in the late 1950s. "But today everything has changed, paintings have become a status symbol, it has become a fad and there is a lot of corporate buying." Birla has a finger on the pulse of the art market and picks up scores of paintings and sculptures every year chiefly for Birla Academy, the art museum he has established in Calcutta. In early August this year, the Birla Academy exhibited 101 paintings on Calcutta by famous and by unknown Calcutta artists and over 12 of them were picked up at prices ranging from Rs 20,000 to over a lakh (for a painting of Bikash Bhattacharjee). Birla feels that Calcuttans tend to buy paintings more for the love of art than for commercial reasons. "One has to have a madness in whatever one does, whether it be business or collecting paintings, or it is not worthwhile," he declares, adding with great satisfaction that his grandson, Kumaramangalam, is possessed with a passion similar to his.

B.K Birla is justifiably proud of the fact that the trend towards collecting art objects was started by his father in the earlier part of this century. His father had inspired a few friends, like Inderkumar Kejriwal's father. For that reason, I.K.Kejriwal today has the largest collection of Rabindranath Tagore's paintings outside Vishwa Bharati University, priceless sculptures like the Gupta period Gajalakshmi and dozens of contemporary works. Inderkumar's son, Raj Kejriwal, has inherited both his father's collection and his passion. The enthusiasm of the Birlas and the Kejriwals is shared by scores of other Calcuttans, almost all of whom would not dare to compete with them. Yet, for the first time, even company executives are beginning to buy expensive paintings. ITC's Nari Narayan, Tisco chairman Rusi Modi, Sonodyne's Ashok Aikat and Tractor India's Abhijit Mazumdar are among the well-known executive collectors.

"Jamini Roy was the Henry Ford of Calcutta art. He wanted to make art affordable to everybody," says Suresh Neotia. Jamini Roy could not, of course, succeed but the idea in some form seems to have caught on. The middle class might not be able to afford to buy a Ganesh Pyne or even a Jamini Roy but they can afford prints, they can still buy books and on occasions hire a lesser-known singer to perform at their homes. Those who have the money can of course do it in style. Neotia, for instance, every year before Holi invites the country's best classical musicians like Bhimsen Joshi, Girija Devi and V.G.Jog to perform on the lawns of his sprawling south Calcutta residence. This has been going on for over a decade and every year as many as 1,500 people congregate at his place for the musical event.

"People have even started gatecrashing and I can do nothing about it," laughs Neotia. But then that is part of the spirit of Calcutta. "You cannot imagine anything like it in any other city," says Gautam Ghosh, who maintains an open house where even stran-

Calcutta cared for us.
Now, we care for Calcutta.

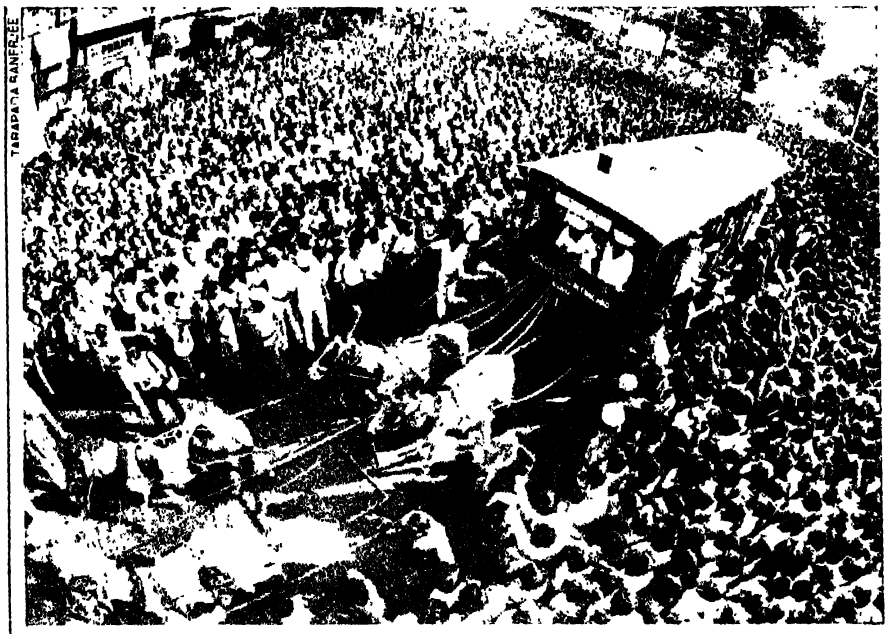
Our first coal mining operations were initiated when Prince Dwarknath Tagore, that illustrious son of Calcutta, established Carr, Tagore & Company in 1835. We at Coal India are indeed fortunate to have shared at least 150 years of this 300 year old historic city. A city of Sahibs, Babus & Carriages. Nationalism and Patriotism. Struggle and Freedom.

The pages of Calcutta's history are now getting blurred.
Pollution hovers like a killing spirit over the age-old city.

Dankuni Gas from Dankuni Coal Complex. Coal India's gift to the pollution stricken Calcuttans. To be supplied through pipeline to both commercial and domestic sectors. Supplemented by CILCOKE produced by the same complex. It replaces smoky coke for a cleaner environment of Calcutta.

कोल इण्डिया लिमिटेड
Coal India Limited.
(A Govt. of India enterprise)
10 Netaji Subhas Road, Calcutta 700 001.

INTERPUBCAL/CAL300/90



Coal India. In search of a breath of fresh air for Calcutta.

gers drop in for a chat. Celebrity status and humility go hand in hand. Even Satyajit Ray, till the time his health deteriorated, was easily accessible and Mrinal Sen remains approachable for favours and advice.

But as the city's tercentenary celebrations show, there is a smell of death even in Calcutta's cultural atmosphere. People are increasingly turning to the past for inspiration. Neotia's great tercentenary project, Homage, for instance, looks back at the ten great souls produced by Calcutta in the past. Bikash Bhattacharjee has been commissioned to do 20 paintings on people like Ram Mohun Roy, Bankim Chandra Chattopadhyay and Swami Vivekananda. The paintings will be exhibited all over the state to remind people of the city's past after which they will be auctioned off to big industrialists by chief minister Jyoti Basu. The proceeds, after deducting Bikash Bhattacharjee's charges, will go towards the creation of a square, along the lines of London's Trafalgar Square or a mini Hyde Park, for the benefit of budding artists. But the uncertain part is whether the cultural spirit of Calcutta will survive the depredations of contemporary realities.

For, at the end of 300 years of a chequered history, the city has grown increasingly schizoid: on one side, the city is being brutalised by poverty and politics, while, on the other, gra us patrons still organise art shows and music conferences. Many of the city's sensitive citizens are flabbergasted by the dichotomy. "The tercentenary celebrations are too vague, they don't make sense," says film-maker Gautam Ghosh. "They don't reflect anything. It's only an opportunity which the media and government are cashing in on." Painter Bikash Bhattacharjee is equally indignant: "Apart from ITC, which has built a lovely park near Birla Planetarium, none of these tercentenary projects have done anything for the city."

Almost every artist is particularly critical of the state government's meaningless programme's, like the tamasha involving a horse drawn tramcar or the use of a tercentenary logo designed by Satyajit Ray for trashcans that are hardly used. Painter Ganesh Pyne points out that not only has Calcutta very little left to be proud of but also that in all the years since Independence, the rulers of Calcutta have not been able to produce a single symbol that is not colonial. Even today, he says, the landmarks associated with Calcutta, like the Victoria Memorial, Howrah Bridge and the Octerlony Monument, are all British. After 300 years, Pyne concludes, the only things the city can boast of are antiques and ruins of old palaces.

TARAPADA BANERJEE

NIRMAL PADUCHATTERJEE

(Above) Calcutta's tercentenary celebrations get underway; (left) Utpal Dutt's drama troupe: glimpses of the Calcuttans' obsession with culture

Calcutta's obsession with culture seems to be a symptom of subconscious anguish. Some people lament that because Calcuttans are so absorbed in culture, they don't care for anything else. Not true. Calcuttans, like everybody else, want progress, the glare of neon lights and modern technology to transform their lives. Look how they revere the Metro. But all hope of a dramatically better future has almost completely been extinguished. Somewhere, a futuristic chime seems to be ringing the ultimate end of their little civilisation, established exactly 300 years ago by the swampy banks of the Hooghly, courtesy Job Charnock and company.

What is left is mainly nostalgia. "I remember how the streets used to be hosed every morning and evening," recalls film-maker Gautam Ghosh. "I remember the band playing every Sunday morning at the bandstand on Outram Ghat. I remember the immaculate streets and the gleaming cars and a Calcutta that had magic. Those memories keep me going. But everything is crumbling and today only some inner sparks remain. I suppose that too will die out." And then perhaps the only sound left will be of gensets marking time to a darkening civilisation. ●

Indranil Banerjie/Calcutta

Present tense

Only elections can end the phase of political uncertainty in Pakistan

The flag-hoisting ceremony on 14 August, Pakistan's National Day, was a solemn affair. The feeling of triumph of those gathered was tinged with uncertainty. The top echelons of the army and the bureaucracy may have wrested power from the democratically-elected government, pulling off a virtual constitutional coup, but they haven't yet secured their position. If the President keeps his word and holds elections on 24 October, those in power now will need the sanction of the people to continue.

Even as the world hotly debates whether or not the former Prime Minister, Benazir Bhutto, had been wronged or had merely paid the price for her mistakes in 20 months of office, the atmosphere of the Pakistani capital at the foothills of the Margalla Hills is charged with tension and uncertainty. The administration has virtually come to a halt as all important decisions have been put off until "after the elections". The newly-appointed Cabinet is now busy familiarising itself with the altered power structure.

Beneath the deceptively quiet anarchy that characterises the interim government's functioning is the feeling that the source of the so-called civilian government's strength is the army. That ultimately it is the generals who call the shots. "What remains to be seen is how far the army is willing to allow the democratic process to develop, and what opportunities the people will seize to ensure a better polity," says a senior member of the Combined Opposition Parties (COP). "The army may be a part of the reality in Pakistan, but if the people want it, they can achieve a great deal of freedom. Benazir committed political suicide," he adds.

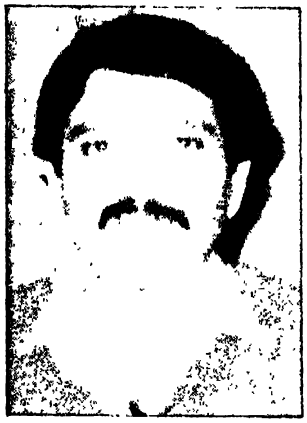
But while most of the world seems to think that even an inefficient Benazir Bhutto's was better than the rigours of martial law, the ordinary people on the streets of Islamabad and Karachi are hopeful that a free and fair election would allow them a chance to vote a popular government to power. But, understandably, many people are doubtful whether elections will be held on 24 October. There is a feeling that the interim Cabinet will eventually usurp all powers and the rulers will not risk going to the people. And there are enough reasons to be suspicious about the present government's intentions: after all, Benazir's ouster and the dissolution of the Assembly cannot possibly be hailed as the most democratic of actions. Members of the interim Cabinet, however, are trying hard to dispel doubts of this nature. "Inshah Allah, elections will be held on time," asserts Syeda Abida Hussain, the firebrand crusader of the Opposition who has been appointed information minister. "This is the firm and irrevocable commitment of the caretaker government," he says. "There is no question of postponing elections," affirms Prime Minister Ghulam Mustafa Jatoi. But, as a member of the Pakistan Peoples' Party (PPP) points out, "A country which has been dominated for two-thirds of its political life by army rule, the assurances of a pliable Prime Minister cannot be taken for granted There are earlier instances of election promises being broken."

The odds are weighed heavily against Benazir. Her party is divided, PPP workers are a disillusioned lot and the present regime seems determined to finish her off

But even if elections are held on schedule, what can Pakistan's fractured polity hope to offer the people? The country's politics has long been a web of intrigue, dominated by factors such as religion and regionalism. The present caretaker government, say allies of the former COP (now in power), comprises a motley group of ministers, many of whom were appointed only because they have at one time or another opposed Benazir—their track records are no better than their predecessors. "It is the system that has to change," insists Mumtaz Bhutto of the Sindh National Alliance. The composition of Jatoi's Cabinet, though it has a few ministers of the calibre and integrity of Syeda Abida Hussain, is essentially "old wine in new bottles", as one observer put it, and can hardly be expected to change the nature of Pakistani politics overnight.

President Ishaq Khan (left) administering the oath of office to PM Jatoi: in the shadow of the army

Political observers feel that it would be a blunder not to hold elections. For, this is the right moment to strike at Benazir



Take, for example, the two former PPP leaders who were rewarded for their anti-Benazir stand Rafi Raza, a close aide of Zulfikar Bhutto and a staunch US supporter, was in the political wilderness until his "research" on the previous government became invaluable to the present establishment. Ghulam Mustafa Khar, one of the key members of the present Cabinet, is as controversial as Asif Zardari. But those in power have chosen to turn a blind eye to all the charges against him -for the moment, at least.

Zia loyalists form another controversial group in the government—Elahi Baksh Somroo, who was a minister during the days of Matrial Rule but who lost the 1988 elections, and Senator Sartaj Aziz, a Pathan technocrat who was known for his loyalty to Zia, have all been accommodated in the Jatoi ministry.

The composition of the caretaker government shows that, for all practical purposes, the Islamic Jamhoori Ittehad (IJI), or the Democrat Alliance, has taken over the reins of power. And, significantly, giant hoardings displaying a smiling face of General Zia have come up in Islamabad and Rawalpindi. What is more, on 17 August, the Muslim League held a massive rally to commemorate the second death anniversary of Zia. The thousands of people who gathered at Rawalpindi's King Faisal mosque patiently listened to the speech of Zia's son, Ejaz.

The Zia factor may be important, but then the IJI is a divided house. In a way, this is a good sign for democracy—elections are more likely to be held if splinter groups vie for power. In the coming months, however, the caretaker government is likely to bury its internal differences and concentrate on destroying the PPP. The present government's two-pronged strategy to contain Benazir and her party includes a campaign to discredit her, while at the same time engineering defections from her party. Most experts believe that the dismissal of the PPP government may result in a virtual decimation of the party. Certainly, the PPP is faced with a bigger challenge than in 1988. Like Rajiv Gandhi, Benazir too was swept to power by a strong sympathy wave for her father. But much of the sympathy has vanished today—it has been replaced by a feeling of betrayal, that the daughter of the East had sold out to her husband's greedy designs.

Ejaz Haq, General Zia's son, delivered an emotional speech on the second death anniversary of his father. For the first time in two years, people were eager to listen to him

In a country where corruption is endemic, the current fuss about misusing powers seems geared wholly to discredit the previous regime, and ensure that the PPP is wiped out in the forthcoming elections. "We may have had corruption, but never at this level. Benazir's husband has surpassed the worst thugs in our society. He institutionalised corruption," accuses a senior lawyer.

General Zia-ul-Haq: his legacy has not been forgotten

Even if the army permits elections to be held in October, it seems unlikely that the generals will allow Benazir to come back to power. And one way to sideline Benazir Bhutto once and for all is to ensure that she is not allowed to contest the elections. Sources close to the former PM admit that there is a chance that this might even happen. "But this will only prove what we are trying to say: that the present regime is not interested in encouraging the democratic process," says a PPP worker. "Even Zia-ul-Haq kept postponing the elections on the pretext of accountability. But we will fight to ensure that elections are held on time. It seems a joke that these people should hold us accountable when they are so corrupt themselves."

But, giving the army and the establishment the benefit of the doubt, if there is a one-to-one contest, it seems unlikely that the PPP will get the better of the combined Opposition parties in the present scenario. Taking provincial factors into consideration, the PPP has a tough time ahead in both Sindh and the Punjab, and is unlikely to romp home even in the North West Frontier Provinces. The former Punjab chief minister, Nawaz Sharif, who was dismissed by Benazir, is likely to support the present regime. And with his clout, the present rulers will definitely gain some ground in Punjab. In Sindh, the caretaker government is headed by Jam Sadiq Ali, a PPP heavyweight who switched sides when it suited him. Already, the crafty leader has elicited the support of the extremist Sindhi and Mohajir nationalists as part of the strategy to isolate the PPP. According to political analysts, the polarisation between the rural and urban vote banks in Sindh is even sharper than it was during the last elections. The PPP's traditional stronghold has been the villages, identifying itself as it does, with the native Sindhis. But with Ali's defection, the PPP is threatened here too. What is interesting is that Ali has included in his Cabinet ministers who have openly advocated the cause of dividing the province. Ali has also included some affluent landlords in his ministry, and seems hell-bent on destroying the prospects of his former party. And with the implicit support of the powerful Mohajir Quami Movement (MQM) lobby, there is every likelihood that he will win.

Nawaz Sharif: crucial support

The Sindh National Alliance (SNA) has already announced its plans to contest the elections. Mumtaz Bhutto's Sindh National Front too is in the race. While it is premature to predict electoral alignments at this stage, the various anti-PPP groups are likely to get together on a common platform to make things difficult for Benazir.

In the Punjab, the PPP's chances are equally bleak. Here, the present alliance is expected to do better than it did in the previous elections, which it fought as separate parties. Moreover, the PPP is divided and sub-divided into warring factions in the state. And with Ghulam Mustafa Khar having crossed over, the PPP's chances of doing well in the Punjab are remote.

In Baluchistan, Akbar Bugti's National Alliance will side with the IJI in the forthcoming elections. In the North West Frontier Province (NWFP), the IJI combine is not on steady ground. With the Muslim League splintered and the Awami National Party virtually out of the race, the PPP might pose a real threat. Political observers point out that it would be foolish to underestimate the PPP, or to write it off totally. It would be a bigger blunder not to hold elections. For, the image of Benazir and the PPP is at an all-time low and party workers are a disillusioned lot. There couldn't be a better time to strike. ●

Shiraz Sidhva/Islamabad and Karachi

MANEKA VERSUS EVERYBODY

The green minister's problems have everything to do with personality clashes and very little to do with environmental issues

When Maneka Gandhi was first appointed minister, there was a general feeling that environment would be to this government what culture was to Rajiv's. And with the rapid degradation of our biosphere—denudation of forests, depletion of wildlife, pollution of waterways—we needed a strong minister like the other Mrs Gandhi at the helm.

But even before the green dream could flower, work at the environment ministry ground to a halt—because of the squabbling between the minister of environment, Nilamani Routray, and his minister of state, Maneka Gandhi.

The sagacity of Gandhi's environmental policy was never called into question. The minister's commitment to the cause and sincerity were beyond doubt. And because she came from the same cultural background as most of the media, Maneka received better press coverage than any other member of the government. Cabinet minister Routray, on the other hand, was an elderly person, who couldn't really relate to the media. So, there was a strong temptation to glibly portray him as a buffoon out to sabotage the environmental dream.

There can be no denying that Routray does not share Gandhi's commitment to the cause or know as much about the environment as Maneka obviously does. But the sad fact is that the problems that arose between the minister and his deputy had little to do with policy, and everything to do with personalities. Despite Maneka's attempts to claim otherwise.

Documents made available to SUNDAY reveal that friction existed not just between the Cabinet minister and his minister of state, but also between Maneka Gandhi and the bureaucracy—chiefly environment secretary Mahesh Prasad.

There was a time when Maneka swore by Prasad, who was said to be her greatest supporter within the ministry. But something went very wrong somewhere along the line, and in recent weeks the two appear to have fallen out fairly seriously. Predictably, Gandhi's friends in the media have taken to portraying Prasad as the tool of vested interests.

On 2 June, 1990, Prasad was annoyed enough at such press reports to write to Routray about it. Enclosing a news item about a rift between Maneka and Routray being fuelled by some key bureaucrats, Prasad wrote: "If MOS/MEF have any knowledge about the role being played by any official they may kindly let me know so that such officials may be suitably dealt with." Routray, who knew only too well where such stories were coming from, replied: "In these matters we should blame ourselves, not the bureaucrats."

The stories, however, continued. And the environment ministry continues to maintain an extraordinarily high media profile.

Problems between Nilamani Routray and Maneka Gandhi began over the distribution of responsibilities in the ministry. In the beginning all went well. In May, when Routray joined the ministry as Cabinet minister, he instructed his officials that all files for him should be routed through Maneka, who he said was like a daughter.

The daughter obviously had other ideas. On 24 May she sent a note to Prasad,

Maneka Gandhi: angry young woman

JAGDISH YADAV

"She wanted to do everything"

Nilamani Routray on Maneka Gandhi

SUNDAY: In the last five or six months the environment ministry has become very important. We all know how Maneka Gandhi has taken the initiative...
Nilamani Routray: I feel that the publicity has far exceeded the actual work done.

Nilamani Routray NITIN RAI

Q: You have been brought to the environment ministry. Was it because Maneka was creating problems, and you were needed to reorganise matters?
A: That was the choice of the Prime Minister. Why he sent me to this department only he can explain. He was also very eager to bring some kind of discipline...you must have read the papers...

Q: But why did you have to give the office order re-allocating work for Maneka and taking the bulk of it yourself?
A: She insisted on that. After some time she said that all the files were going to her...

Q: You mean she felt overworked?
A: I don't know what she felt. That was what she said.

Q: So you say that Maneka herself wanted to be relieved?
A: Yes.

Q: Then why did she make the wry comment that she was happy to be left just with the zoo?
A: Well, I allocated about 40 per cent of the work to her.

Q: And she wasn't happy with that?
A: No. She wanted to do everything. She wanted to exercise power...or something like that.

Q: Do you think her attitude towards the Tehri dam, the Goa beach or Karnataka will help the environment department?
A: No. That was not a constructive attitude. You see, we want the environment to be preserved. But, at the same time, there should also be developmental work. There should be no conflict between environmental aspects and economic development. There should be harmony between the two.

Q: Do you personally approve of the Narmada Valley Project?
A: We are insisting on proper rehabilitation of the people who would be ousted, on proper afforestation, catchment area treatment and all that.

Q: You had said, when you joined the department, that you look upon Maneka as your daughter...
A: Well... But, look what kind of behaviour I got in return!

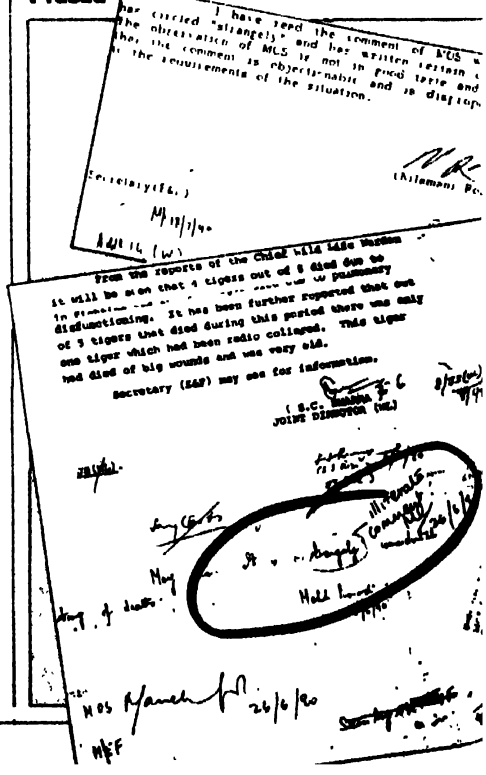
Interviewed by Shankarlal Bhattacharya/New Delhi

the environment secretary, saying that she had discussed the division of work with Routray and that it would now be divided as follows:

- Routray would have responsibility for the imposition of penalties, review of officers and answering questions in Parliament.
- Maneka would decide on policy matters, legislative proposals, promotions and then pass on the files to Routray.
- She would also be in charge of the administration of all the environment Acts, all international projects and the postings of forest service officers.

In effect, there was very little that Routray could do.

When Prasad got Maneka's note, he (not wishing to get involved in ministerial squabbles) forwarded it to Routray, who was obviously shocked.



On 28 May, Routray wrote on the file: "I am sorry. This was never discussed with me." The Cabinet minister was accusing Maneka of lying. Two days later, Routray did his own division of work. This time, he kept most of the major responsibilities and gave Gandhi the minor departments. An outraged Maneka then told journalists that she'd been turned into a minister for Delhi zoo and provoked a media storm.

In the process, the work of the ministry suffered: for reasons that had nothing to do with the environment and everything to do with ego.

Since then relations between Cabinet minister and minister of state have plummeted and serious differences have developed between Maneka and secretary Prasad. Gandhi has now taken to insulting Prasad on the files whenever possible.

In June, the ministry considered reports that tigers were dying in a Bangalore sanctuary because of a "radio-collar" project. In fact, the deaths may have been unrelated to any environmental project. But Prasad thought it was worth checking on. "It is a strangely coincidental string of deaths," he noted on the file on 8 June.

Photocopy of notes exchanged between the two ministers and environment secretary Mahesh Prasad

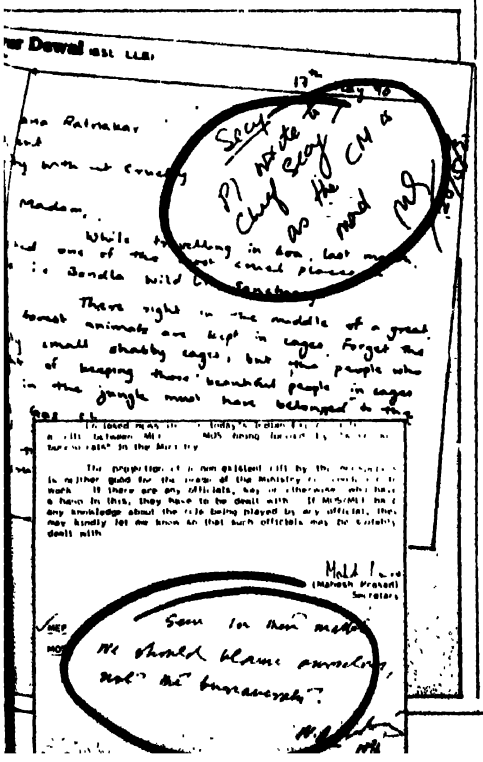
This was enough to set Maneka off. When the file reached her, she circled Prasad's observation and wrote: "Illiterate comment".

An outraged secretary sent the file to Routray, noting in classical bureaucratese: "MEF may kindly see and decide whether the severity of MOS's comments is not disproportionate to the requirements of the situation."

Predictably, Routray agreed with Prasad.

By now New Delhi was agog with stories of Maneka's unusual notations on government files. Last week, Eduardo Faliero laid a letter from a Maharashtra advocate to Diana Rutnagar, president of Beauty Without Cruelty. The letter dealt with conditions in a Goa sanctuary and had apparently been forwarded to Maneka by Rutnagar.

Gandhi was angered enough to scrawl on it: "Secretary. Please write to chief secretary as the CM is mad."



The issue, acording to the bureaucracy, is not one of an anti-environment lobby gaining the upper hand. The problem, say civil servants, relates to an immature minister giving vent to abuse on official documents and then portraying the insulted parties as enemies of the environment.

It isn't just the environment minsitry that is appalled by Maneka's manners. On 12 July, Muchkund Dubey, foreign secretary, wrote an official letter of protest to Mahesh Prasad about Maneka's behaviour.

Apparently, on 28 May, Gandhi's office phoned the foreign ministry to say that she would be going to Dudhwa National Park on 1 June. And that the minister would like to land the environment ministry's craft at Dhangadhi in Nepal, four kms from the park.

This was extraordinarily short notice. Moreover, the Nepalese never allow special flights to land anywhere other than Kathmandu.

Nevertheless, they were persuaded to grant necessary permission and even agreed to send several officials to the airport to receive her. They also sent a police escort for the minister. In fact, noted Dubey in his letter: "The

"When there are two people..."

Maneka Gandhi on the environment ministry

SUNDAY: How important is the environment ministry?
Maneka Gandhi: It isn't Maneka who is important. What is important is the growth of the environment movement in India. It is not just journalists or writers or people who have access to media who are concerned—it is thousands of people who have written letters, it is signature campaigns carried out by 15-year-old girls in Panchshil Park. Environment is the twentieth century obsession.

Q: People say that because of your rude behaviour, you are often at loggerheads with people...
A: That's really a popular misconception. I am not at loggerheads with anybody. For the first time this ministry is not a weak-kneed mini-ministry.

Q: Well, it didn't exist earlier.
A: No, it did. But it was used as a chhappa ministry. A businessman goes to the ministry, gets his chhappa, comes out, gets another chhappa and that's it. It's job was just to give a rubber stamp. It had nothing to do. And now I'm saying that it's not a rubber stamp ministry. Not just for clearances. What we will do is formulate policy for every other ministry.

Q: But there are some who feel you are going too fast.
A: That's because in India we are used to things happening very slowly. But we don't have the time! My son is ten years old. In ten years from now, he'll be 20. I don't have the time before he's grown up!

Q: You said in one of the interviews that a good minister is one who deputes his or her work to the people...
A: That was said in the context of the environment courts, where I said that a good minister is one who gives power to the people. That's what environment courts will be about, when the proposal comes through.

Q: People also say that you go against systems. But you have to accept certain systems and then work within it...
A: We do. But then, how do you work within a system that doesn't work?

Q: Are you optimistic from what you find here?
A: I'm very, very optimistic about India.

Q: Are there people in your ministry who understand your schemes?
A: Yes, there are people. The whole ministry was working beautifully. Otherwise I wouldn't have been able to achieve anything. But then, when you have two people saying different things...

Q: What have you achieved in the past five months?
A: Well, first, the new systems. Second, the depollution of 1,000-odd factories. Then, the re-look into Tehri Dam—this was reopened by me. And environmental safeguards. If the solar energy project comes through, it will take India out of the grid system and decentralise power. So, we won't have the problem of dams and hydel projects. That in itself is a new idea. Then, a statutory impact assessment is on the anvil—everything will come here before, not after. Then the one I failed in recently—the hotel thing—which I wept over...every beach in India is finished...

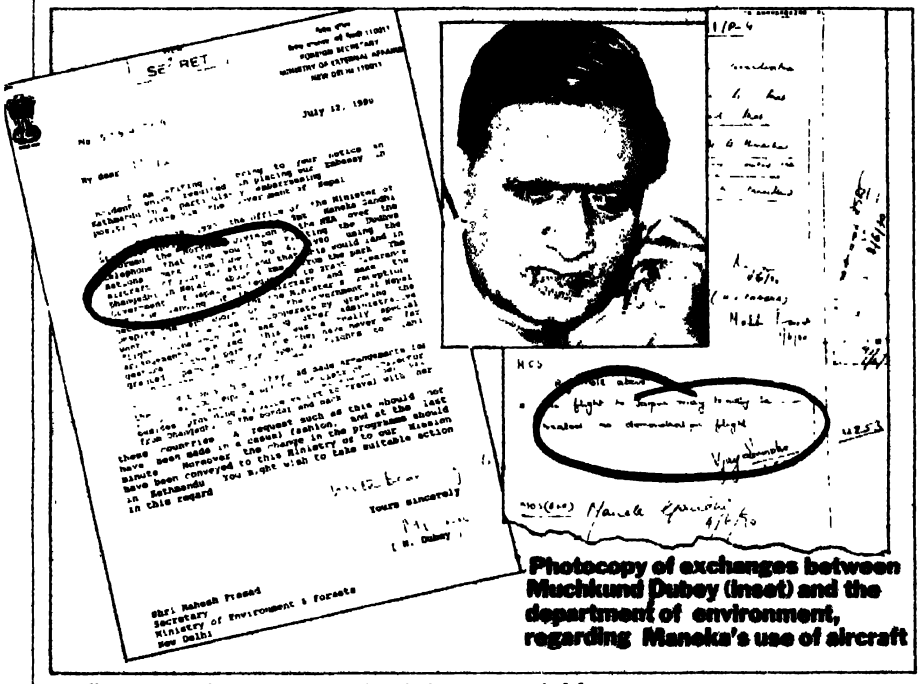
Interviewed by Shankartal Bhattacharya/ New Delhi

minister did not make this trip at all. No one from the ministry informed us that she would not be going. As a result, the full contingent of Dhangadhi officials led by the CDO (collector), waited for her from 9.30 am to 3 pm."

The Nepalese were livid, and so, in turn, was the foreign ministry. Noted Dubey sternly: "This kind of behaviour by us is attributed by our smaller neighbours to our big-country arrogance and does no good to our image."

The secretary forwarded the letter to Routray who wrote to the Prime Minister, attacking Maneka for her "utter carelessness in dealing with a neighbouring country which has led to a diplomatic incident and offended the sensibilities of our small neighbour".

Once again Maneka Gandhi found herself at the centre of a storm that had nothing to do with the environment.



By the time the Nepalese incident took place, Maneka was already rowing with Routray over the use of the ministry's plane (see Delhi Diary).

In May, Routray asked if he could take the ministry's Cessna to Simla. He was told he couldn't because the plane had been funded by a UN (United Nations) body and was meant exclusively for forest-fire control.

On 31 May, Maneka's additional private secretary wrote to Prasad saying that she wanted to use the plane to go to Jaipur on 5 June. The joint-secretary (forests) dealing with the project wrote back to say that while Maneka had been allowed to use the craft to go to Bareli, that was only because the town fell within the UN's project area. Jaipur, however, was not in that area. Further, Routray had been refused the plane to go to Himachal Pradesh on the same grounds.

Gandhi's office was unfazed. The additional private secretary wrote back: "The flight to Jaipur may kindly be treated as a demonstration flight."

Maneka agreed and signed the file on 4 May.

Photocopy of exchanges between Muchkund Dubey (inset) and the department of environment, regarding Maneka's use of aircraft

In June, the ministry decided it did not need the craft, after all. It cost over Rs 15 lakhs to maintain the planes and less than 10 per cent of their flying time was for fire-fighting purposes. An outraged Maneka wrote to the finance minister, Madhu Dandavate, complaining that a very worthwhile fire-fighting project had been needlessly scrapped. Dandavate replied that the project could be extended for six months.

Now it was Routray's turn to fly into a rage. On 13 July, he wrote to Prime Minister V.P. Singh, explaining why the project should have been cancelled. And complained: "However Smt. Maneka Gandhi directly intervened with the finance minister over my head to ask for the retention of these flying machines. I feel embarrassed to write to you that the aircraft has been extensively used by her in the past to make trips to Bareily an airport nearest to her constituency which is contrary to the conditions used by UNDP uder which the aircraft could not be used for non-project work.

The continued retention of these flying machines in our ministry and the concomitant expenditure is contrary to your austerity drive and economy instructions. I thought I should bring this to your notice relating to the surrender of these flying machines as this has been made an issue by Smt. Maneka Gandhi in her public tirade against me through the media."

Maneka was upset by Routray's behaviour and the rift deepened. Once again the reasons were unrelated to environmental concerns.

The dispute between Maneka Gandhi her minister and her officials continues. There are many other areas of conflict. Among them are the allegations that till a month ago Maneka had a record number of 31 persons on her personal staff and an unseemly row over the composition of the National Wastelands Development Board.

So far few of these disputes have reached the media, who have been content to buy Maneka's line that the problem must be seen in an environment versus vested interests context. But now her enemies in the ministry are beginning to go public with their versions. Documents are floating around Parliament's Central Hall. Routray is talking to the press. And questions are being asked about Maneka's apparent arrogance and carelessness.

Clearly much of the opposition to her comes from people who would happily sacrifice environmental concerns for the pursuit of the big buck. For, in Maneka India has its first genuinely green politician, who understands and cares about the fate of our biosphere.

It is sad, therefore that instead of pushing for environmental betterment, she has lost herself in squabbles about private planes, 'mad chief ministers', and 'illiterate secretaries'. As her opponents intensify their counter-attack, her image is certain to lose some of its lustre. And with it will go some of the new-found credibility that environmental concerns had finally gained.

In the final analysis, it would be a pity if the cause of the environment suffered because a minister was too busy being abusive. ●

K. Srinivasan/New Delhi

R.K. Lakshman

HOTELS

Exit Lakshman

The ITDC chief resigns after a memorable tenure

Is the V.P. Singh government becoming a stickler for rules? Going by R.K. Lakshman's experience, yes. On 10 August, the debonair chairman and managing director of the India Tourism Development Corporation (ITDC) resigned after receiving what is being termed a "measly" six-month extension when he turned 58. That wasn't unusual. After all, 58 is the official retirement age.

But, when Lakshman accepted the plum job of chairman and managing director of ITDC, a little over two years ago, he was apparently given a "strong verbal assurance that on retirement, a minimum extension of two years would be given.

So, the short, six-month extension came as a surprise to him. "Maybe, there is a change in policy or a change of heart," says Lakshman. "But, as I see it, I will not be able to achieve anything substantial in six months and decided to resign." He was hesitant to talk about the job offers he had at hand, only admitting that he would "remain in the country and would continue to offer his services to the tourism industry."

Since, there was no official response from the government regarding Lakshman's resignation till the last week of August, speculation was rife as to whether it would be accepted or not. The question doing the rounds was: would Lakshman stay back if he was given a longer extension? The ITDC chief executive was giving no answers at this stage. He was only willing to talk about the achievements of the corporation during his tenure. The public sector company made a 50.2 per cent record profit after tax in the year ending March 1990. Moreover, the group's sales turnover increased by 12 per cent. Two new hotels in Hyderabad and Bhopal have been commissioned and, for the first time, foreign exchange earnings of the corporation have crossed the Rs 50 crore figure.

So, it's not surprising that senior ITDC officials feel that if Lakshman leaves, a couple of on-going projects would receive setbacks. For instance:

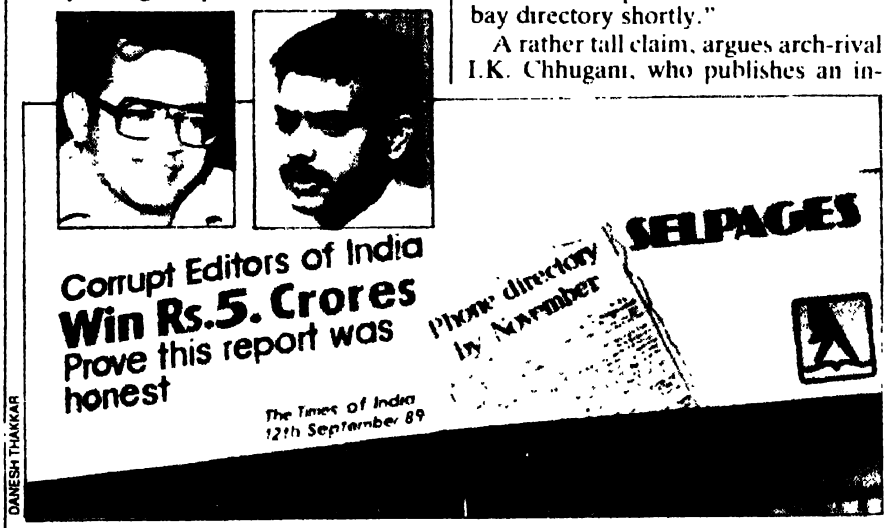
- The expansion of ITDC's operations in the Janpath, Ranjit and Lodi Hotels in Delhi.
- Extending ITDC's activities to foreign countries. The company is already running restaurants in collaboration with private firms in Hungary and the USSR.
- Getting the real spin-offs from the Radisson tie-up which the ITDC announced in July 1990. Lakshman was the prime mover behind the collaboration with Radisson and it was ITDC's answer to the private hotel chains which pose stiff competition. Among the spin-offs are the opening of Indian restaurants in hotels and motels run by Radisson worldwide.
- Completing the massive three-year programme of modernising ITDC's existing facilities. The project was conceived by Lakshman a year ago with a total outlay of Rs 30 crores.

So, Lakshman leaves behind a formidable legacy. And now the question is who succeeds him? SUNDAY spoke to Kachru, a senior-vice president of ITDC, who felt that the tenure of Lakshman was a period of "consolidation". The real problems faced by the ITDC, he feels, stem from complex segmentation and the diverse nature of its activities. "The ITDC has to take on the image of a two-tier chain (and yet) offer both five-star and low budget facilities. That will be the ITDC's major challenge for the Nineties," he says.

And as for Lakshman's successor, Kachru says: "If the government decides to bring someone from outside to head ITDC, he should be better than the talent available within the country." The government, has a tough task ahead. Even though, it is aware of the merits of employing professionals and has been talking about introducing a new work culture in ITDC, things may not be that easy. Because as in the case of Lakshman, by the time a competent professional has settled down, the government brings in rules and regulations and thinks it's time for him to move on. ●

Ritu Sarin/New Delhi

"If the government decides to bring someone from outside to head ITDC, he should be better than the talent available within the country," says Kachru



K.B. Kachru, ITDC senior vice-president

TELEPHONES

Cross connection

Bombay is still without an updated telephone directory

It is India's financial and industrial capital—the nerve-centre of the country's business activities. And a city which clearly sets the trend for the rest of the country. So, it's rather ironical that Bombay is still going without a proper and updated telephone directory since December 1988. Even more surprising since publishing and printing telephone directories for the city is big business with the print order usually running into nine lakh copies. The financial aspect is indeed impressive: it costs the present publishers, United Database India Pvt. Ltd (UDI), Rs 115 per set of three directories (3000 pages). But what is more important is that advertising revenue alone accounts for crores of rupees.

DANESH THAKKAR

A hoarding put up by Selpages chief I.K. Chhugani against newspapers which wrote that the UDI was bringing the Bombay telephone directory out in October 1989; (inset) UDI's Clayton Dias (right) and I.K. Chhuggani: arch-rivals

UDI bagged the lucrative contract for printing yellow pages for Bombay in 1987. Moreover, it also has to print the complete directory (the classified information has been provided by the Mahanagar Telephone Nigam Limited (MTNL)). But with 60,000 new lines and 80,000 telephone numbers being changed and re-changed, UDI obviously does not seem to be able to handle the task of printing a complete directory for Bombay. But the company denies it has any problems. Says Clayton Dias, sales manager Bombay: "We have brought out yellow pages for different cities. In the last seven months, we printed and published six yellow pages and distributed them in Hyderabad, Orissa Circle, Vizag, Madurai, Salem and Trichi. Earlier, we did the directories for Calcutta and Delhi. We hope to release the Bombay directory shortly."

A rather tall claim, argues arch-rival I.K. Chhugani, who publishes an industrial directory called Selpages, earlier with information up to October 1989, but they gave us just 8,000 copies which is not enough when the print order is nine lakhs."

Shoddy work and always behind schedule. UDI's performance so far has been bad. Little wonder then that its claims that the 1990 directory will be ready for distribution in September is dismissed by Kumar.

These problems apart, UDI has also to contend with a court case. The Bank of India has instituted a case in Delhi against UDI for the recovery of Rs 5.6 crores advanced to the company over a period of time. The bank has also threatened to initiate criminal breach of trust proceedings against Aruna Asaf Ali chairman of United Indian Periodicals (UIP), for having sold 48 per cent of UDI's shareholding to Ashok Advani of Business India Group.

And speaking of war, UDI's pugnacious competitor Chhugani has not given up yet. He has put up hoardings, informing the public of the court proceedings against UDI by the Bank of India. UDI promptly went to court and got a stay order against Chhugani resorting to such acts of adverse publicity. Not to be easily put down, Chhugani put up fresh hoardings in the first week of August displaying a news report which appeared in The Times of India on 12 September saying that the UDI phone directory would be out by November 1989. Chhugani's hoardings read "Corrupt editors of India, win Rs 5 crores. Prove this report was honest."

The Selpages chief blames the press for the Rs 10 lakhs of business he has lost. "Corrupt journalists believed whatever was told to them. The story that appeared in the report was false... Advertisers naturally believed what was in the newspapers. So, they took ads in UDI's yellow pages rather than in Selpages. Till today, there is no directory..."

One hopes for the sake of the Bombayite, Chhugani's words are proved wrong. And come September, they have their telephone directory. Because going by Dias's claim: "The directory will change the shape of communications as far as information is concerned and information marketing is an industry of the future."

If all goes well, Bombay could still be setting the trend for the rest of the country. •

Olga Tellis / Bombay

A city stalled

The Congress(I)-sponsored Calcutta bandh is total even as the party's leaders are attacked by CPI(M) cadres

WEST BENGAL

Except for their strident slogans, the Congressmen marching down a silent south Calcutta street on 16 August, were orderly, even decorous, but unaware that danger awaited them. Close by crouched over a hundred of the three lakh CPI(M) cadres, unleashed by the ruling Left Front, ostensibly to maintain law and order. As the procession approached, came the first war-cries. And then the cadres, led by Lallu Alam (brother of CPI-M leader Badshah Alam), armed with brickbats and wooden staves, pounced on the processionists. As the Congressmen ran for their lives, the cadres, some in helmets (their motorbikes were parked nearby), surrounded former MP Mamata Banerjee,repeatedly clubbing her. No one, not even newspaper photographers were spared that morning, as the CPI(M) storm-troopers beat up their unresisting rivals.

CPI(M) workers about to strike Mamata Banerjee (surrounded by her supporters): attempt to murder?

Only after the cadres departed were Mamata, her sari stained with blood, and other workers, taken to hospital.

Mamata, always an outspoken critic of the Marxists, was perhaps the primary target on the day of the bandh or general strike called by the Congress(I). Yet, on the injured list at the end of the day were INTUC leader Subrata Mukherjee, who narrowly escaped serious stab wounds, Pankaj Banerjee and Gobindo Naskar.

Never has a bandh called by the Congress(I) been so successful. "Chief minister Jyoti Basu should resign," said state Congress(I) president A B A. Ghani Khan Choudhury, claiming that the 12 hour bandh called in protest against the rise in bus and tram fares, the power shortages in the state, the widespread rigging in the 17 June Calcutta Corpration polls and the rise in prices of essential commodities had been a total success.

The city streets, normally a maelstorm of traffic, were nearly empty apart from the stray police jeep or the intrepid cyclist, the offices were deserted, and despite threats by toughs, shops in most areas, closed. Even the crematorium gates were closed, as a vibrant city of 10 million people remained in a coma for the day.

Even in the districts, escpecially Howrah, North and South 24 Parganas, Hooghly, Malda, Murshidabad, and Nadia, the story of Calcutta was repeated. The district Congress(I) leaders, taking their cue from Calcutta's frontline chiefs, successfully disrupted train services by sitting on railway tracks. For the exultant Congressmen, it was a moral victory. "We did not coerce anyone, we did not force shopkeepers to put down their shutters, we did not put up road blocks. The people voluntarily chose to stay at home, said former Union minister Pranab Mukherjee. "No amount of repression can silence the people. Police and party hacks can help to run buses. But you cannot force people to get on the buses," sneered Khan Choudhury.

As the Congress(I) leaders rejoiced after the Marxists grudgingly admitted defeat, "Normal life in the city disrupted", screamed Ganashakti, the CPI(M) newspaper, admitting that the three lakh party cadres had failed to maintain law and order. Less credible was chief minister Jyoti Basu's claim that the strike was a complete failure. It was only the Congress(I)'s terrorist campaign which kept the people indoors, claimed the red-faced Basu.

The transport minister's assertion that the people would accept the fare hike was negatived by the strike

But Basu was forced to admit that "anti-bandh supporters" (read CPI-M workers) had beaten up Mamata. Intransigent as ever, the 76-year-old chief minister refused to admit that the fare hike was a mistake. "The demand to review the increase in fares is illogical and irrational," he said while insisting that the demands by the undivided Communist Party to reduce bus fares when they were increased by one paisa in 1953 were legitimate and logical.

But it was Shyamal Chakraborty, the state transport minister, who was forced to eat humble pie. His assertion that the people would accept the fare hike was largely negatived by the strike. And even policemen claim that the cadres (it was Chakraborty's idea to employ the Marxist faithfuls to keep peace) only added to their problems.

Little support came from the CPI(M)'s Left Front allies. "The bandh was spontaneous," acknowledged state cooperative minister Bhakti Bhushan Mandal of the Forward Bloc—his statements, a quiet counterpoint to Basu's bluster. Skyrocketing prices and the persistent power cuts, which have made West Bengal an area of darkness, have infuriated the people, he believed. Nandagopal Bhattacharya of the CPI also admitted that the bandh was fairly successful, but blamed the Centre's economic policies for the discontentment.

All through the Eighties, during the state government-sponsored bandhs in protest against the slights (real or imagined) by the Centre, the Congress(I) was dubbed the enemy of the people. Today, as Mamata Banerjee lies in her hospital bed with severe head injuries, such perceptions are beginning to change. •

Srinjoy Chowdhury/Calcutta

Out in the open

The CPI(ML)'s Liberation Group decides to join the mainstream

COMMUNISM

Two decades and three years after the Naxalbari peasant uprising—a spark that lit a prairie fire in April 1967—another Naxalite group has decided to change tack and join mainstream politics. The Liberation Group of the Communist Party of India (Marxist-Leninist) (CPI-ML) led by Vinode Mishra, held a three-day conference in Delhi from 24 July, and announced that it would come "overground". The meeting was attended by 69 delegates from 12 states where the party enjoys varying degrees of support.

The turnaround is significant. For, the Liberation Group (named after its central organ, the Liberation) had for years doggedly adhered to Maoist fundamentals and tried to implant the Chinese model of revolutionary practice in India. But with the Liberation Group (LG) abandoning its secretive ways and shifting stress from armed actions to mass movements to the extent of participating in the parliamentary process, leftwing extremism is sure to undergo vital changes.

The LG was showing scepticism about the Maoist aphorism "power flows from the barrel of a gun" for some time past and finally dumped the old line at its Delhi conference. According to Shankar Mitra, spokesman of the LG's central committee, the changes were prompted by "both the absolute importance of launching an ideological counter-offensive against the growing anti-communist propaganda...and the urgent need for the politicisation of the widening mass influence of the party".

The special conference was followed by a special committee meeting in which the LG decided to usher in a few radical changes: among them the disbanding of the party's armed units and the winding up of its underground set-up. The LG has armed squads in every police station area in several districts of Bihar, where the party happens to have a strong base. The units comprise five to 10 people. Now, these bands are to be dissolved to form resistance groups involving the villagers to fight off attacks by landlords and the police. The usefulness of such vigilant forces was proved during the Assembly elections in February, when they successfully prevented the landlords from capturing polling booths and ensured that Harijans cast their votes.

The LG's theoretical organs—the Liberation in English and the Lokyudh in Hindi—will no longer be clandestinely published. This is in keeping with the party's strategy of emerging from the shadows. In its Fourth Congress held in January 1988, the LG had decided to open up gradually while the members of its central committee remained underground. But this time, even that guard has been dropped and the whole party is to surface lock, stock and barrel.

Soon after the Naxalite movement suffered a debacle in 1970 and its main ideologue Charu Mazumdar died in police custody, the CPI(ML) split into multiple factions, of which the LG was one. Through the Seventies it concentrated its activities in Bihar and managed to carve out its areas of influence in the plains of Bhojpur, Jehanabad, Aurangabad, East Champaran, Gaya, Nalanda, Samastipur, Bhagalpur and Muzaffarpur. During this period the party remained strictly underground.

Its experiment with legal forms of movement began in 1982 when it launched its mass platform—the Indian People's Front (IPF)—to garner more support. The very next year, the LG, in collaboration with the IPF, launched a massive demonstration against the Bihar Press Bill, introduced by the former chief minister Jagannath Mishra, to gag the press. The movement's success set Vinode Mishra and others in the central committee thinking about steering the organisation to more open pastures. And that search for new avenues finally led to the sea-change at the latest conference.

Why did it take the party so long to chart its new course? According to Kalyan Goswami, a party leader, the LG had been debating its strategy for about a decade. "Any restructuring or bringing about radical changes take time. We wanted to ensure that the entire rank and file remained with us," he says.

IPF leaders at a rally in Patna: emphasising mass movements

Naxalites feel that the new openness will help the CPI(ML) increase its mass contacts and formulate popular programmes

Party insiders expect the LG's activities to gain momentum because of its new orientation. Though it has strong bases in central Bihar, it failed to break through in tribals-dominated south Bihar or neighbouring West Bengal and Orissa, where situations are vastly different. The new openness, they feel, will help the party increase its mass contacts and formulate relevant action programmes.

The LG is one of the few communist organisations in India that has welcomed the changes in the Soviet Union and East Europe. It appears that glasnost and perestroika unleashed by Mikhail Gorbachev in the USSR to usher in a more humane form of socialism coincided with this Naxalite group's intense soul-searching. The party, which wanted to break out of its cocoon in Bihar and shed the claddings of outmoded theories, found that glasnost provided a justification for trying out new ideas.

One of the immediate fallout of the LG's new policy is that it has begun advocating united action with other left forces. The two communist giants—the CPI and CPI(M)—have at best been "guarded" in their responses so far. While the CPI is considering joint movements with the IPF in certain spheres, the CPI(M) is yet to commit itself.

But the CPI(M) leadership has not remained entirely impervious to the changes sweeping this major Naxalite group. The CPI(M) and the CPI(ML) which had fought each other violently in the past over ideological differences are now trying to build bridges. Lately, CPI(M) central committee members Prakash Karant and Sitaram Yachuri exchanged views with the IPF, of which the CPI(ML)'s Liberation Group is a guiding constituent. The CPI(M) general secretary, E.M.S. Namboodiripad, was also present at the meeting, for a brief while though. And, interestingly, the CPI(M) has agreed to exchange party documents with the LG via the IPF. It will now receive a regular supply of the Liberation, organ of the LG's central committee, which the Marxist big brother had always shunned. •

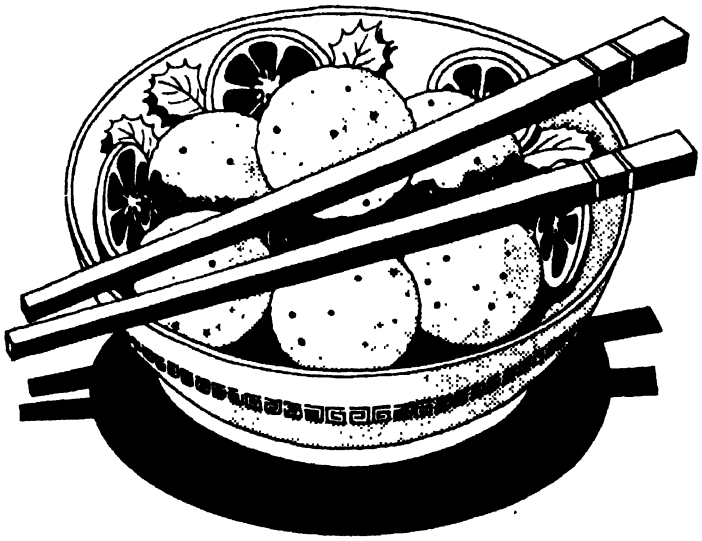
Pranay Sharma/Calcutta

Who cares?

A strike by Class III and Class IV employees paralyses the AIIMS

DELHI

The wards are empty. The corridors are strewn with filthy bandages. In every cabin, the air is dank with soiled linen. The taps are dry. And putrid sewage is spreading in parts of the complex. Unbelievable though it may seem, that's how the All India Institute of Medical Sciences (AIIMS), one of India's premier medical centres, looked as a workers' strike entered its tenth day.



About 5,000 Class III and Class IV employees of the institute went on an indefinite strike on 8 August to press their long-standing demands. At first, the health ministry put up a brave face by declaring that the hospital would function as usual. But it hardly took the workers three days to call the ministry's bluff. As the facilities collapsed, the hospital was closed down to stave off a possible epidemic.

The obvious sufferers were the thousands of patients who seek medical care at the AIIMS everyday. All the in-house patients in the 1300-bed hospital were discharged, including the critical ones, as it became clear that the strike was not going to end in a hurry. As a doctor in the hospital put it, "Referring them (the patients) to other hospitals in the city will not work in every case. Some of the critically ill patients are definitely going to take a turn for the worse. Not only because the other hospitals do not offer the same facilities, but also because it is very unsettling for the patient."

Besides the in-house patients, severely inconvenienced were also thousands of people who flock to the AIIMS from all over the country. Many from the rural areas, who do not read newspapers or stay too far away from Delhi to have heard about the strike, continue to show up for treatment. A good number of them are forced to camp in the open, as they are too poor to go back and return again.

Take Sunder Lal, for instance. A

If you think you're having Dim Sum at Holiday Inn, Beijing, you're thinking half a world too far.

Holiday Inn, Bombay, offers you the same international facilities as any Holiday Inn worldwide.

The food at Holiday Inn, Bombay, takes you on a gourmet voyage of the finest Holiday Inns the world over.

We offer fine dining, superior accommodation, conference facilities, inimitable service, and of course, the value for money you've come to expect from any Holiday Inn worldwide...

All the more reasons to choose Holiday Inn first.

Holiday Inn
Bombay
The World's First Choice

ARTIG-469-90

For information and reservation, please contact: BOMBAY: Holiday Inn, Balraj Sahani Marg, Juhu Beach, Bombay 400 049. Tel: 6204444/6202398. Tlx: 011-78411 HOLI IN/ 011-78404 HINN IN. Fax: (0091-22) 6204452 • NEW DELHI: Holiday Inn, Connaught Plaza. Tel: 3320101. Tlx: 031-61186 HIND IN. Tel: 3010211. Tlx: 031-65526 CLAR IN • BANGALORE: Tel: 77676/77931. Tlx: 845-8668/2354 MACH IN • CALCUTTA: Tel: 412009. Tlx: 021-5421 • AHMEDABAD: Tel: 448602 • PUNE: Tel: 661752.

clerk in a post office in Purulia, West Bengal, he brought his wife, a cancer patient. "I saved for months to get her here for treatment. The doctors in West Bengal have said that she has a few months to live," says a distraught Lal. And a few feet away was Shanti, her plastered leg soaked in rain, waiting for her next appointment with the doctor.

Defying the AIIMS director's order to report for work by 2.00 pm on 16 August or face termination of service , the belligerent strikers instead burnt copies of the notice and declared that there would be no negotiations until a "no victimisation clause" was incorporated. Besides, the strikers added two more demands to their original list: withdrawal of all cases against the workers and 10 per cent extra pay as is being given to the AIIMS faculty.

Significantly, the original demands of the employees had been accepted by the ministry as well as the hospital authorities long back. But, as it usually happens with every section in this sector (junior doctors, nurses and the service doctors), the agreements have not been implemented. The workers are essentially demanding better promotional avenues, granted to them by a cadre review and career development committee in 1988.

Explaining the employees' stand, union spokesperson V.P Arya said that the committee had guaranteed every worker a promotion after eight years of service. The authorities accepted the recommendations in part, depriving 1,400 workers of the benefits. This was followed by endless rounds of minor agitations and talks with the ministry. Six years later, in April this year, the authorities suggested a package, offering the workers a promotion with retrospective effect (1.4.86), but commensurate salaries only from 1.1.90. The workers agreed, but by then a new minister, Rasheed Masood, had taken over and discussions began anew.

The career development committee, on the other hand, had been set up by the AIIMS director. It suggested the first promotion after five years of service and three promotions during one's service tenure. The proposal was accepted by the institute's governing body headed by the health minister. But the health ministry has now sent the files to the finance ministry for approval, much to the chagrin of the workers. •

Minu Jain/New Delhi

Moon Moon Sen seems to have shifted, more or less permanently to Bombay. Like Rupa Ganguly, the Bengali sex-bomb has made the scene.

And like Rupa, she has few films on hand.

Spare a thought for Anil Kapoor!

Only six months ago, the hairy marvel was on top of the world expecting that his position as number one would go unchallenged for years to come.

Now, he's suddenly feeling very insecure.

The reasons are easy enough to see. Sunny (after Ghayal) and Aamir (after Dil) are now regarded as real contenders for the number one slot. And the fantastic initial response to Aaj Ka Arjun—perhaps the worst film Amitabh Bachchan has made in his life—suggests that the old boy's charisma is intact.

On the other hand, what has Anil got?

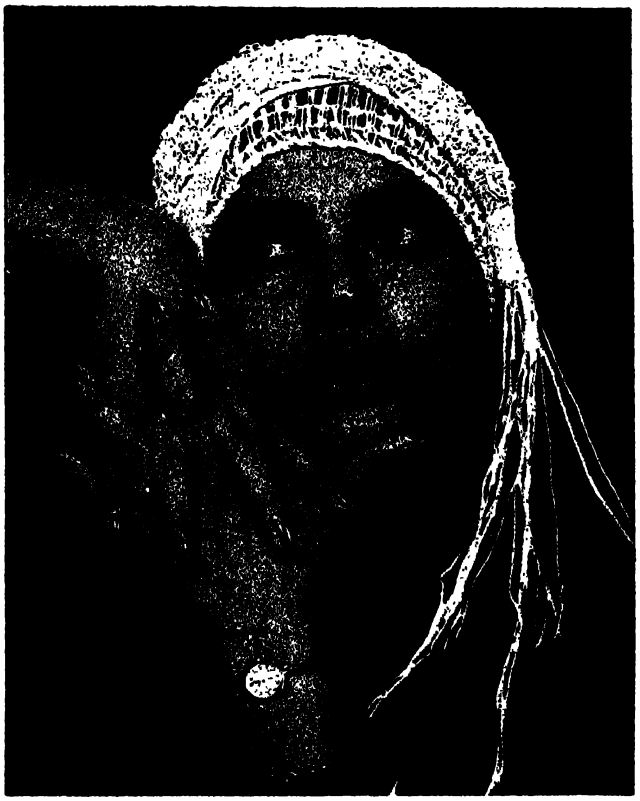
Neither Amba nor Jeevan Ek Sangharsh has ended up being the kind of hit that Anil's producers had expected.

If he doesn't come up with a bona fide hit soon then his number one slot will be in real danger.

Anil Kapoor: in real danger?

GAUTAM PATOLE

OK, folks, the crisis is over. Yes, Rekha and Mukesh Aggarwal have made up. There will be no divorce. She is not pregnant. And you can all stop worrying.



So was there ever a crisis?

Yes there was.

Apparently Rekha did not know Mukesh very well before they got married but was in love with the fact that he was so in love with her.

Chunky Pandey: protests too much?

Rekha: the crisis is over

Then, after she decided to spend time with him, she hoped that he would turn out to be sexy and exciting. Unfortunately, this was after they got married.

When she found out that he was boring, she thought seriously about calling the whole thing off.

Saner counsels prevailed however and it was explained to her that grown-ups do not terminate marriages for this reason.

So, she's laid down a few conditions. He spends most of his time in Delhi and she lives in Bombay. They meet a couple of times a month but not for long enough for her to get bored.

And all is well with the marriage.

And you thought this whole thing was just a stunt to get lots of free publicity for Bina Ramani!

Isn't it delightful how Chunky Pandey keeps telling everybody that he hates homosexuals, has never had a gay experience, and is totally, utterly and completely hetero.

We are sure he's telling the truth.

But why bother to keep repeating it?

The one Bombay star who counts for a lot in Delhi is Shatru. Not only is he a friend of Devi Lal's but he also retains the respect of V.P. Singh. After all, it was Shatru who first asked the government not to be vindictive before Arun Nehru, Jyoti Basu etc. all picked up the chorus.

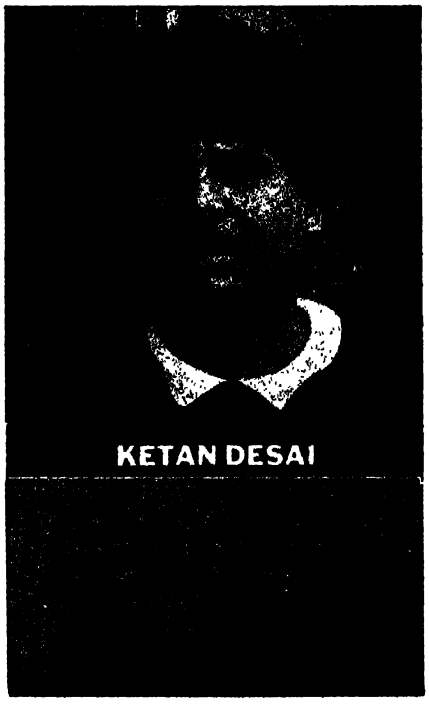
GAUTAM PATOLE

Shatrughan Sinha: hot favourite in Delhi

But as a consequence of this stand, Shatru is a great favourite of the Congress-wallahs as well. He gets a huge suite and VIP treatment at Lalit Suri's Holiday Inn, was wined and dined by the Hindujas in London and can get any Congress leader he likes on the phone. ●

Follow the leader

Celebrities queue up for advertising campaigns



Celebrity advertising is the "in" thing these days. Our filmstars are endorsing a range of products, so are our cricketers and musicians, hawking wares on the print and television media with a sincerity that would convince an Eskimo to buy a double-door refrigerator. From Bollywood there is a veritable queue: Sridevi, Dharmendra, Hema Malini, Dimple Kapadia, Zeenat Aman, Vinod Khanna, Jeetendra, Mithun Chakraborty, Jackie Shroff and lesser—but no less in demand—stars such as Shekhar Kapur, Sangeeta Bijlani and Saeed Jaffrey.

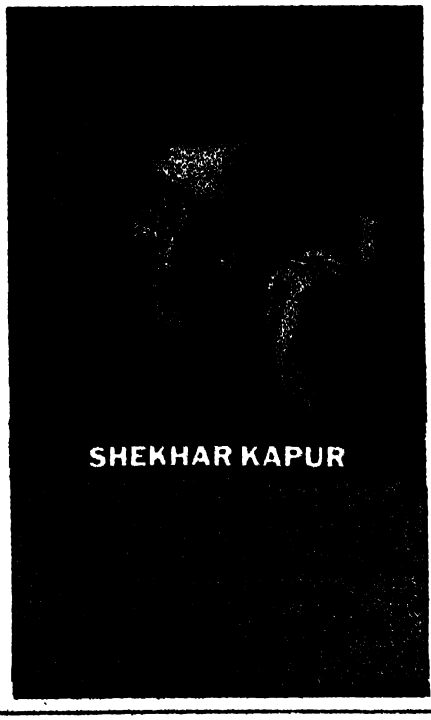
Ex-aces, the Nawab of Pataudi and Sunil Gavaskar, lead the cricketing crew of Kapil Dev and Krishnamachari Srikkanth. And from two ends of a spectrum: sarod maestro Amjad Ali Khan, tabla magician Zakir Hussain and Bombay pop star Remo Fernandes. There is a big draw for appearing in print ads, but by far the most popular medium with the star-folk is TV.

"Television as you know is a very powerful medium," says Shekhar Kapur actor, film director, ad-filmmaker and a rage as a Digjam suitings model, talking about his assignment by way of illustration. "Now they want a celebrity to do it, because then there is instant identification supported by the fact that people tend to look up to the celebrity concerned." People, continues Shekhar, aspire to be like the star, and "in their subconscious, that dream never dies. Everyone has this aspiration to stand on a pedestal...in a tightly competitive market, a celebrity does provide that extra cutting edge. By remembering the star people tend to remember the product."

For some celebrities, a little rattled on the publicity front as far as their professions are concerned, it presents an opportunity to look at their modelling assignments as a gateway in the battle to remain in the public consciousness. And often, being accepted as a model is an indication that there is still scope to carry on. Says Sangeeta Bijlani, once a full-time model and currently a fairly big name on the silver screen: "I think film stars appearing in ads is a very good sign. Ad agencies will not want to sign on a faded star."

And, as they have what the public—specifically, the consumers—may want, it is easy enough to cash in on fame. "I have often been asked why busy stars take time off and do a ten second commercial (for TV)," says Frank Simoes, who runs Bombay-based ad agency Frank Simoes Advertising and is one of the most respected names in the business. "Well, in the first place it is very good money and very little work. Secondly, the power of television keeps them in the public eye." Adds a top Bombay model coordinator, who declines to be identified: "What's wrong with a little extra pocket money anyway? And what is wrong with some nice exposure? Most stars are egomaniacs who live for publicity, so why shouldn't they grab a chance like this. And it's a profitable way of spending their free time."

It certainly is. Celebrities are reluctant to talk about their modelling earnings, but is easy enough to get estimates from industry sources. Vinod Khanna reportedly picked up over Rs 10 lakhs for his stint as the Cinthol Lime soap man, riding horseback along the beach. Shekhar got Rs 10 lakhs for each Digjam campaign. Dimple would easily pull off Rs 4 to 5 lakhs for the Crowning Glory soap shampoo ads. Even Shroff, a top draw name who does not quite draw a top film industry pay packet, received anything up to Rs 3 lakhs for a Red & White cigarette commercial. (Vivian Richards, who came to play in the 1987 Reliance World Cup cricket, ended up endorsing the company's Vimal fabrics and took home over Rs 8 lakhs for the effort.) "The money is good," says Bijlani, "very good."



Remo is supposed to have received Rs 1 lakh for a stint as the Raymonds man, and a similar amount for co-starring with Juhi Chawla in a Pepsi cola commercial. Industry insiders say that most celebrities today, all millionaires, demand half the payment in "white" and the rest in "black". Often, consumer items such as foreign refrigerators, video cassette recorders, and even real estate—Indian, till now. "If Amitabh Bachchan decided to enter the market," says Kapur, "the price that he would command would be enormous. I am sure, absolutely sure that Bachchan would get a minimum of Rs 30 to 40 lakhs for one campaign." And no one, he says, would even blink an eyelid to pay out.

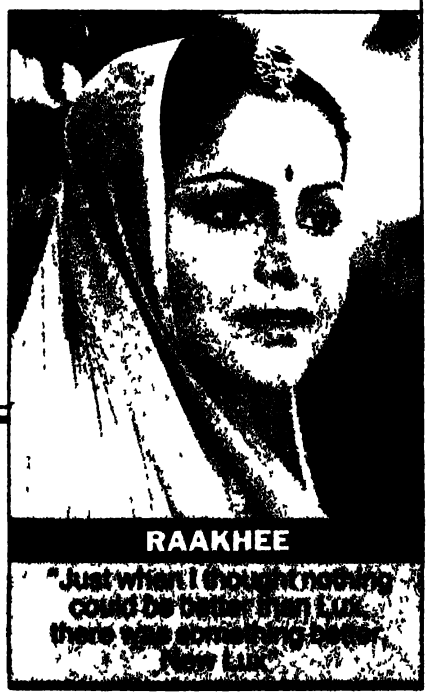
"As an ad-filmmaker I would definitely use stars although they demand a huge amount of money," continues Shekhar, who runs Quasar, an ad-film company. "But let us look at it this way. A star who commands and gets Rs 12 lakhs is worth it." He adds: "Take advertising budgets, some of them run into crores (of rupees). Now what is 12 lakhs on a budget like that? Peanuts." K. Ravi, general manager of Mudra Communications—the agency which roped in Richards, Shastri, and the recently beknighted Richard Hadlee for a Vimal campaign—agrees. "The money that you pay celebrities is worth it," he says. "In the first place, identification is instant where a really big name is concerned. And that is very good for the product."

No question there. Cinthol sales are up. As with Gwalior suitings—called 'Pataudi suitings' in many parts of India—and Gold Cafe, the two brands that Pataudi endorses with class and elan; that is why he was chosen in the first place. Cema light bulbs, Sridevi's baby, is so popular in the south that consumers go to the market and ask for Sridevi bulbs. Red & White has kept up its loyal line of smokers, first through a Raj Babbar catch the robber act, and now, with Shroff rescuing a waiter from a disastrous fairground fire. Another indication about celebrity being in great demand is the fact that big film making names have got involved. At the top of the heap is Ketan Desai, film director Manmohan's son. Ketan, who was a major Bombay producer-director till recently, is devoting all his time to making ad-films, with the elder Desai's blessings. For him it is not too difficult, the Desais know the big Bollywood names anyway. "I first did L&T Vision, an ad-film for Larsen & Toubro (before the company's Rs 820 crore debenture issue last year)," says Ketan. "I know Anil Ambani so I bagged the contract. Later, the Modis and Everest (Advertising) in New Delhi approached me to do the Red & White campaign...they wanted a celebrity. I jumped at the offer." Shroff would be the best bet.

Nothing could be better

Being the Lux dreamgirl is still a top draw



"Just when I thought nothing could be better than Lux, there was something better, New Lux," said film star Raakhee and millions believed her. As they did other stars who endorsed the soap, making it the only brand—worldwide—which has used celebrities, for every major launch event, from the film world, ever since it was launched in 1929.

According to Utpal Sengupta, general manager, Popular Detergents, the brand's New York advertising agency was asked in 1929 to prepare a campaign for Lux. A copy writer in Los Angeles, the film Mecca, had an idea: she suggested something on the lines of a girl who uses Lux becomes so beautiful that she is mistaken for a filmstar. The agency's bosses in New York took it a little further—they decided to use a real filmstar to endorse the product. Ever since, Lux has been advertised by stars in 76 countries.

Leela Chitnis was the first Indian filmstar to endorse Lux, in its 'pure white' incarnation. Later, stars such as Kamini Kaushal, Nargis and Meena Kumari became Lux stars.

In the 1960s, when Lux decided to go colour—in blue, green, yellow and pink—the top stars of the decade helped launch the soaps. Mala Sinha, Asha Parekh, Sadhana and Waheeda Rehman. Lux's 1969 relaunch was advertised by the next lot of film sirens, including Simi Garewal.

"In the 1960s," says Roger C.B. Pereira, who runs Bombay-based Roger Pereira Communications Pvt Ltd, "I had done a mini thesis on Lux. I met celebrities in India." Pereira says he discovered one thing: stars would "die to get into the Lux campaign. If a star was featured in a Lux campaign it meant: she had made it. The campaign was that big for them. A lot of Indian filmstars fought to get to Lux." However, he adds, once they made it big in the film world, they hardly touched the product. That may have been true of the 1960s. But today, the Lux allure still holds good for India's top female stars. And you can bet Simi Garewal would not mind being the Lux girl one more time.

"As an ex-model," says Shroff, who realises the power of advertising, "I must admit that television is not bad." However, he adds: "In future, I don't plan to do many ads, but if there is an interesting one, whose storyboard (script) is great, why not?"

Indeed. But as much as stars may be in demand, and, of course, however much money they may demand, just having a big name is not enough. Suitability for an ad is what matters even more than the star. Very simply: casting, in much the same way film stars are used to, and what lesser luminaries such as sportsmen and musicians have to cope with if they want to be hired as models. "Celebrity advertising must have a connection," says Simoes, the ad-man. "Suppose Satyajit Ray, the international master said in an ad 'From now on my films will only be shot with a Nikon 801 (camera).' That would be the celebrity ad for Nikon all over the world." Of course, he says, Ray will never do it, but this was just to illustrate the point that there is a direct connection between the product and the celebrity endorsing it.

"Or take Mithun and the National' (video recorder) ads," continues Simoes. "They have him in the right context, at the right place and at the right time. Mithun has the power, the charisma, he is a man of this world." In the same way, he says, Pataudi and his wife Sharmila Tagore are "perfect" for Gwalior suitings ads.

This is a crucial factor, how a star personality fits into an advertising role. Pataudi, for instance, comes across as classy in Gwalior suitings and Gold Cafe ads, but he would be a disaster in a tooth powder ad, say industry executives. A Deol or a Dara Singh might fit the bill better. "Now if you take me in a monkey brand matchbox advertisement," says Shekhar, for example, "it will not work. The mix of product and celebrity do not jell. There will be absolutely no believability."

However, sometimes when there is a sense of believability, as Shekhar calls it, it can actually affect a celebrity's real profession. And Shekhar is a good example. "Look what happened to me in Digjam. The exposure was so much that I as an actor began suffering. Even in a role in a film, people used to say 'Look, the Digjam man'. For an actor that is death."

Shekhar's colleague in the film industry, and even in the modelling trade, Sangeeta Bijlani, disagrees. Bijlani says she cannot figure out how an ad could damage a star and his or her film prospects. In fact, it can help fill the gap when film offers are few, or between movie releases. "There is nothing wrong with that," she says. Besides, she adds, refuting the claim of a celebrity overshadowing a product, the ad strategy is worked out to the minutest detail, keeping in mind the product, the positioning and the target audience. "An ad is presented for the product and not the star," says Bijlani. That certainly is the ultimate aim of all marketing men, but having a celebrity or two around to spread the message certainly helps. •

Godfrey Pereira/Bombay

DINESH MOHAN

Merchants of life

The finest hospitals in India send you home a pauper and the worst don't send you home at all

A few days ago a cousin of mine passed away — a road accident victim. He was in his prime but the injuries he sustained got the better of him. After many days in coma in the intensive care unit of a private hospital, he died leaving behind sadder (and much poorer) near and dear ones.

Mulling over the events following the accident I realised how negligent the medical profession has been in evolving a trauma-care system which suits the economy and culture of our country. The 'finest' hospitals in India send you home a pauper and the worst don't send you home at all.

This is not surprising. Data from the United States of America indicates that a typical trauma-patient bill amounts to about $13,000 (Rs 2 lakhs). Treatment of serious cases end up costing many times that amount. This is mainly due to the very high cost of medical technology. Therefore, even if we use low-cost doctors in India, the trauma-care costs will be unaffordably high for a vast majority of Indians. Most health insurance schemes do not cover costs more than Rs 75,000.

It is obvious that we will not be able to afford a replica of the American emergency room in every Indian hospital. Yet almost all our medical practitioners keep lamenting the fact that we don't have the latest gadgetry in our hospitals. None of them has been able to explain to me the mechanisms of fund raising which will enable every hospital in the country to install and maintain multi-crore complexes.

But this is less cause for concern than the lack of innovative thinking among medical practitioners. They just want to import the "best". There is little attention being given to studies indicating the very low cost-effectiveness of much of the latest equipment being used in hospitals abroad.

It is high time that trauma management is given a little more importance in India. A court ruling has established that treatment of accident victims is mandatory for all hospitals. If this is so, then we have to establish procedures and guidelines for equipping, manning and running emergency rooms in hospitals of different sizes.

Firstly, the medical community has to decide whether it wants to train super specialists in trauma management or whether it would be more effective to train existing specialists in diagnosis and treatment of external and internal injuries. In either case we have to develop training systems suitable for our environment.

Inside a plush hospital: expensive

Secondly, we have to design a workable system to transport the patient to the nearest hospital. In the absence of an adequate network of ambulances we'll have to depend on voluntary systems. We could make it compulsory for all professional drivers to undergo a one-day emergency-care course. Hospitals could also set up funds (with the help of donations, etc.) which could be used for reimbursing taxi drivers bringing victims to the hospital. They could even be paid twice the regular fare.

Thirdly, some guidelines have to be established for the standard equipment that must be available in all hospitals, irrespective of their sizes and expertise level. These guidelines should also prevent hospitals from purchasing expensive equipment whose usefulness is under question. We could even think of evolving a new paradigm for low-cost but effective trauma-care.

There are a few other matters deserving attention. For example, hospitals are often short of blood. This is because there are many prejudices prevalent in our society against blood donation. We must launch a long and sustained educational effort to destroy these myths.

The health insurance system must also be made more accessible. Every single individual not covered by his employers should be able to gain access to good medical treatment at reasonable rates.

Unless medical care is more easily available a greater proportion of our budget is spent on health care, and we establish more realistic and humane norms for running our emergency rooms, many more young men and women are going to die when they don't need to. But the pity is they won't even be given a fighting chance to survive like my cousin was.●

The author is a member of the Centre for Biomedical Engineering, Indian Institute of Technology, New Delhi

V. GANGADHAR

Serious reservations

The press unanimously condemns the Mandal Commission report

Mandal, the miracle worker! He has achieved the impossible. His recommendations on the reservation issue have managed to unite the media as never before.

'Ruinous; Disaster; Riding a tiger; Back to the past'are some of the editorial epithets hurled at the recommendations. The strongest comments are found in an editorial in The Sunday Observer headlined.'Butchers of India'.

Here it goes: "For India, the age of enlightenment, the age of the Mahatma and Jawaharlal, is over. The dark ages have dawned. The clock of history has been put back by a few centuries... And where will all this stop? Already caste-oriented political formations are taking shape. The 'Mandalisation' of society can only accelerate that process. No voices of sanity are left. There is no Mahatma who once undertook a fast to persuade Dr Ambedkar to abandon separate electorates for Scheduled Castes. There are no sage leaders like Ambedkar either. Instead we have political butchers who are only interested in having their pound of flesh. In this crass pursuit they have stabbed India and left it to bleed to death."

Even the establishment's own paper, Indian Express is not at all happy at the 'Mandalisation'. Calling acceptance of the recommendations of the Commission, 'crassly opportunistic', the paper even calls for a nationwide struggle against the recommendations. Of course, it has to be peaceful, but are agitations, under the present circumstances ever peaceful?

Politicians are always happy to ride the caste tiger. They do not seem to have learnt anything from the experience of the late Karpoori Thakur, who was ultimately swallowed up by the casteist populism which he himself had evoked.

Predictable reaction

Media reactions to the two major international events, the ouster of Benazir Bhutto in Pakistan, and the 'merger' of Kuwait with Iraq with the subsequent ominous developments in the Gulf region, are more or less predictable.

Quite justifiably Saddam Hussein, has been branded from a blackguard to a zombie, and some of our commentators are more militant than even the Western correspondents. Under the circumstances;G.H. Jansen's despatches from nearer the scene in Nicosia which appeared in The Times of India are illuminating. According to Jansen, Mr Bush, so long taunted as the 'Wimp' (I.K. Gujral, please note), is determined to get rid of Saddam Hussein because he is an uppity, insubordinate Arab and an inveterate enemy of Israel. The US scenario, argues Jansen, is to rush Saudi Arabia into becoming a participant in the American crusade by provoking or staging a supposedly hostile Iraqi attack against Saudi Arabia. Hence the cooked-up crisis being built on the fact that the Iraqi troops are now on the Kuwait-Saudi border.

What our political pundits seem to have forgotten is the fact that the massing of Western (particularly American) forces in the Gulf region has opened up an immense fissure within the Arab world. Jansen points out that the majority of the Arabs are extremely anti-American for its unswerving support to Israel, their bitter and historical enemy.

Everyone is talking about sanctions against Iraq for its illegal annexure of Kuwait. Going by the same standards, sanctions should also be applied against Israel for defying UN resolutions for refusing withdrawals from the West Bank, Gaza and the Syrian Golan Heights as well as from Southern Lebanon. And what about Turkey's flouting resolution 353 calling for the withdrawal of its 35,000 troops from Northern Cyprus. As G.H. Jan-

The Sunday Observer editorialised, "For India, the age of enlightenment, the age of the Mahatma and Jawaharlal is over....Already caste-oriented political formations are taking shape. The 'Mandalisation' of society can only accelerate that process "

sen puts it succinctly,"It all depends on who the invader is."

Benazir baiting

Somehow, I had expected the Indian media to be a lot more sympathetic to Benazir Bhutto on being removed from power. But most of our commentators seem to be a bit smug and gleeful at the ouster, looking at it as a kind of comeuppance for alleged corruption and misrule. The epithet 'Mr Ten Per Cent' about her husband has provoked our scribes even more and the general mood seems to be one of she-got-what-she-deserved. Not much seems to have been written about the constraints under which Ms Bhutto had to operate, the sinister role of the military intelligence and the link-up of the events in Pakistan with what is happening in the Gulf.

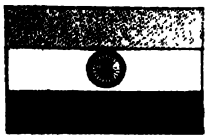
Surprisingly enough, some of the best coverage on the Pakistan crisis was in the Sunday edition of the Bombay tabloid, The Daily. While columnist Tavleen Singh shed no tears for Ms Bhutto, Inder Malhotra concluded that corruption led to her downfall (again a more sophisticated manner of looking at political happenings). But the most readable and objective piece was an interview with former foreign secretary, S.K. Singh who had functioned as our high commissioner in Pakistan.

Singh, who was made to resign from his post refers to the constraints under which Ms Bhutto had to operate. These compromises weakened her authority as the Prime Minister besides lowering her standing with her political adversaries. Singh made a telling comment on the future relationship between India and Pakistan, "Who are we to decide what the people of Pakistan should want? As long as they are able to produce a governmental system under which the people of Pakistan can be our friends, it should be all right with us."

Now, a word or two more about The Daily. Started by R K. Karanjia, the tabloid, despite a promising beginning, had been stumbling along. But the new management and the Rajat Sharma-Fatma Zakaria editorial team has jazzed up the paper quite a bit. The Sunday Daily, in particular, offers a wide variety of articles. The Daily would do even better if it regards itself as a Bombay newspaper with less emphasis on national politics.

The average reader of The Daily is certain to skip all that stuff on what is happening to whom in the Delhi bureaucracy and the relative positions of Deshmukh, Seshan, Mahesh Prasad or Shiromani Sharma in the power struggle. But they would definitely lap up stories like the success of the son of a port worker residing at a Sewri fish market chawl who is all set for higher studies at Dallas University in the US. The father, Mohammad Ali, had saved and sacrificed, working overtime whenever possible, investing everything he had to give his children a decent education.

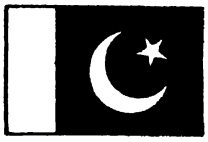
Inder Malhotra concluded that corruption led to Benazir's downfall—a more sophisticated manner of looking at political happenings



Pande-monium

On the subject of civil servants, the Vinod Pande interview to Kumkum Chadha has predictably raised a storm. Rajiv Gandhi (in SUNDAY), is not amused. "I think it is incredible that a cadre civil servant like the Cabinet secretary is writing off this government and giving it a deadline of 13 months! I've never heard anything like this before.

Pande's favourite journalist, Pritish Nandy, rushed to the defence of his hero in a front-page, by-lined article in The Independent. But the more interesting comments on the Pande interview came from Tavleen Singh in the Indian Express column. "Along with his bizarre political predictions, Mr Vinod Pande, also talked of love and women, and the level of his confessions, would be disturbing enough in an adolescent, leave alone in a man who should be thinking of more serious things than why he is cynical about women." Ms Singh suggests that Pande, for his next interview, chose either Savvy or Society and tell the readers whether he finds (like the BJP MP, Uma Bharati) Madhavrao Scindia attractive or not.



New columnist

I have to congratulate 'Dev Features'. In their latest recruit for syndication, P.C. Alexander, (former principal secretary to Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi) they have found someone who writes knowledgeably and with an easy, flowing style on his life and career. "Both Week magazine and Calcutta's The Telegraph are carrying detailed account of the present ('Lessons from Haryana') as well as the past ('How I was hounded by Morarji Desai'). •

WAR

An imaginative account of what might happen in the event of an India-Pakistan conflict

Over a year ago the Indian Defence Review (IDR) research team had predicted that Kashmir would go up in flames. At that time, the team's findings had largely been ignored. The IDR team had also suggested that the uprising in Kashmir had been meticulously planned by the Pakistani Military, and had sketched out a fictitious scenario called 'Operation Topac', which later generated a lot of controversy. Many defence analysts believed that Op Topac had been unearthed by RAW agents. The IDR team, however, insists that Op Topac was a fictitious scenario built up through analysis.

Now, the IDR team has come up with a second instalment of the Op Topac scenario. Their conclusion is that Pakistan and India are headed for war over Kashmir. But war is not going to solve any problem:

ISLAMABAD MARCH 1990

By the year 1990 the situation in Jammu and Kashmir (J&K) had been aggravated to a high pitch. The efforts of Pakistan to raise the Kashmir issue at the UN had not succeeded. The Islamic countries with the sole exception of Iran had NOT quite responded to the umma in danger angle. On the other hand, certain strong measures taken by India created problems for the militants and the third phase of insurgency as visualised in Op Topac. Ms Benazir Bhutto made some provocative statements and continued to assert her country's moral right to support the people of J&K, but did not seem quite sure how far Pakistan could covertly assist the secessionists. It appeared, rhetoric notwithstanding that she was keen that the situation should not escalate into a military conflict with India. There were other pressures however!

(From left) Pakistani armymen exercising in the Siachen area; Indian tanks

In early March 1990, when Ms Benazir Bhutto was received at the General Headquarters (GHQ) by General Aslam Beg, the morning was still misty and a chill wind was blowing from the mountains of Kashmir in the North-East. The briefing session which followed in the sanctum santorum of the dimly lit war room was attended by a small but select gathering.

No one, even in Pakistan, outside the Ops Room was quite sure what actually transpired that day. During a tea-break, someone mentioned the Strategy of Artichoke (an expression frequently used by Abraham Guillen whose notions are reflected in several terrorist operations. For reference: his book Urban Guerrilla Strategy in a lighter vein, meaning 'to eat bit by bit till you can swallow the whole'.

It is believed that the briefing although varied in nature covered the following:

- The current situation in Afghanistan.
- Internal situation in Pakistan with particular reference to Sindh and Baluchistan.
- The situation in J&K: this took the maximum time and seemed a cause of general satisfaction all round. Everyone agreed with the point of view that the Kashmiri Muslims have been completely alienated and have become markedly 'anti-Indian'. It was, however, expected that the struggle would be long and bitter.

Much else that transpired is not known. It is believed that Ms Benazir Bhutto was frank, forthcoming and exuded a lot of confidence. It is understood that her line of thinking was:

- She was not in favour of a war with India, as according to her, this would not solve any problem. If, however, a war is forced on Pakistan, she would not be found wanting in the state of readiness required.
- The problems in Sindh must be resolved with speed. If Muslims continue to kill each other in Pakistan, they can hardly expect the Arab world to condemn the oppression of the Muslim umma in Kashmir.
- The problems created by the continued and prolonged stay of Afghan refugees must be contained and curtailed as no speedy resolution of the Afghan problem was in sight.

ZARB-E-KAMIL AND OP MUSHTARY

In informal discussions during the Pakistan Ambassadors Conference held in the last week of March 1990, it was frequently asserted that unless the Indian Army was tackled, the struggle in Kashmir had no future. Many people felt that, in any case, the current situation would ultimately lead to a military conflict or showdown between India and Pakistan. The Pakistani Foreign Minister Sahebzada Yakub Khan, however, made a formal statement during the Iftar party hosted by Mr Meraj Khalid, the National Assembly Speaker, to the effect that, 'Pakistan will not be provoked into a war with India [as] it won't solve any problem. India also did not want a war'.

In another Iftar party held in a more informal atmosphere at the residence of a senior retired military officer, the trend of thinking, conversation and opinion was:

- Zarb-e-Kamil should go ahead full steam (Zarb-e-Kamil roughly translated means the final or the comprehensive stroke or blow).
- Op Mushtary should commence at the right stage, soon thereafter. 'A faint heart never won a fair lady', someone very important remarked.

A certain group of well informed persons in positions of authority were of the view that Op Mushtary, if not Zarb-e-Kamil, would lead to an all out war. Capture of lateral valleys to help Kashmiri insurgents or attacks on Soltoro Range under the present circumstances would not be tolerated by India. An all out war will be extremely risky for Pakistan—if Pakistan suffers major setbacks the 'movement' in Kashmir will also fizzle out—then 'would the game be worth the candle?' someone asked.

CURRENT INDICATORS

It was obvious from various trends, belligerent statements from Ms Benazir Bhutto and other military indicators, that Pakistan was likely to step up support to insurgency in Kashmir and terrorism in Punjab in the

Now it was only a matter of time before open hostilities would break out. Pakistan continued abetting insurgency in Kashmir and stepped up terrorist activities in Punjab. The situation therefore, deteriorated speedily

Delegations of non-political Kashmiri notables met the Governor and made it plain that this 'repressive' regime would invite full non-cooperation and worse, total cooperation with the militant groups coming years. At this rate, a point of no return in her relations with India would be reached very soon.

Zarb-e-Kamil—seems to pertain to the stepped up insurgency combined with civil disobedience and non-cooperation. The aims during this phase could be:

- To paralyse the civil administration completely.
- Establishment of a parallel administration in selected areas and collection of taxes.
- Use of land mines operated by remote control to make highways and movement of security forces unsafe.
- Establishment of guerrilla strongholds daring security forces to attack them.

Op Mushtary (Jupiter) will commence at a certain stage of Zarb-e-Kamil and is likely to take the following form:

- Extensive and continued firing, including artillery and mortar fire, all along the LC.
- Attacks on isolated posts on the LC particularly in remote and difficult areas.
- Capture of important but less defensible tactical features on the Shamsabari Range, Kargil, Shyok valley– Soltoro Range and in the Punch—Rajouri sectors.
- Concentration of forces opposite Amritsar, Gurdaspur, Pathankot, Jammu and Akhnur and tactical regrouping of forces in Pakistan Occupied Kashmir (POK).
- Increased Air and LC violations and visible movement of reserves opposite selected sectors.
- Increase in 'terrorism' in Jammu and Punjab, lines of communication and railways to be the main targets.
- Appearance of well organised guerrilla forces capable of pitched battles. These will be armed with sophisticated weapons which would include missiles, heavy mortars and Stinger missiles.

Pak jawans manning a base camp in the Siachen area

India's Reactions

Our reaction to Zarb-e-Kamil and Op Mushtary will be graduated but purposeful. Strong statements by the Prime Minister (PM) apart, India would mean business and aim at long term gains. This and the 'inflamed public opinion' in India, would ring alarm bells in Pakistan.

There are dangers lurking behind the current situation which could be disastrous for Pakistan, unless she relents and stops fuelling insurgency and terrorism in Kashmir and Punjab, and armed conflict may become inevitable.

Considering the current circumstances, likely developments could be.

- Concentration of forces and preliminary operations.
- Graduated escalation of hostilities in J&K leading to a military conflict which could remain confined to J&K for a while.
- Widening of the conflict into a fourth Indo-Pak war, with possible use of the nuclear blackmail card.

DRIFT TOWARDS BELLIGERENCE AND CONFLICT

By April– May 1990 strongly worded statements were being issued by the Prime Ministers of India and Pakistan. Some reports suggested that Pakistan's armed forces had begun tactical manoeuvres and hectic military activity in POK, indicating certain regrouping and an operational alert. Civil defence organizations were activated and even camouflaging of some installations was reported. Plans to evacuate civilian population from vulnerable areas were recently updated. Various statements were being made in Pakistan to prepare people for any eventuality.

The Prime Minister of India, Mr VP Singh, while intervening in the debate on the demands of the Defence Ministry for grants, asked the people 'to prepare themselves psychologically for a war which may be forced on the country by Pakistan'. He also made it clear, 'If a war is forced on us, we are not going to stop it till we gain our objectives'.

The Cabinet Defence Committee of Pakistan presided over by the Prime Minister met again, in the first half of April 1990, to review the recent events in Kashmir and Afghanistan. The four hour long meeting was attended by senior officials including the three Service Chiefs and the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff Committee. A joint strategy to handle the situation in Kashmir and Afghanistan was discussed. This meeting was a part of a series of such meetings held from March 1990 onwards.

With Zarb-e-Kamil and the advent of Op Mushtary, a war like situation developed in J&K. After repeated warnings, which went unheeded, India attacked certain insurgent bases in POK, across the LC. Hot pursuit of insurgents escaping to POK lead to some major clashes between Pakistani and Indian troops, both in the mountain and plains sectors of J&K.

After some more belligerent statements by various leaders of India and Pakistan, large scale movements and heavy concentration of troops was reported on both sides. Air violations increased steadily.

Now it was only a matter of time before open hostilities would break out. Veiled warnings and threats and a lack of support from either superpower held back the belligerents to an extent. Pakistan did not, however, cease her open abetment of insurgency in Kashmir and rather than decreasing, stepped up terrorist activities in Punjab. The situation therefore, deteriorated speedily.

In spite of severe economic constraints and against better counsel, India and Pakistan were drifting towards a war (fourth round) once again, in the nineties.

Activation of LC/Attacks on Lines of Communications

- Selected bridges or culverts on both National Highway IA and Srinagar—Leh road started getting destroyed.
- Significant infiltration commenced on Srinagar—Zojila—Dras—Kargil sectors leading to temporary halting of convoys. Zojila was given special attention by a complete infiltration group (code name—Zulfikar).

Firings and Patrol clashes increased dramatically all along the LC especially in Mendhar and Punch. All 'Azad Kashmir' battalions commenced using every type of battalion support weapons freely, culminating in heavy shelling of Punch and selected picquets all along the Jammu portion of the LC.

Very heavy troop concentration began to be seen opposite Uri and Tithwal subsectors. It became impossible to differentiate between 'Azad Kashmir volunteers', Afghan Mujahideen, Light Mujahid battalions of the Pak regular army, and Kashmir 'volunteers' who had crossed over and had been given training in POK and Pakistan.

Government officials and VIP's were selectively targetted including the Governor's House.

Siachen and North-East Ladakh

The daily artillery duelling ongoing for five years in Siachen increased dramatically. Searching fire came down on Siachen base for the first time during this period.

'Low Level' reconnaissance flights by PAF aircraft became commonplace in North East Ladakh. (Shallow but selective photo reconnaissance missions increased between Pathankot and Akhnur also. It encompassed all roads leading North.)

Non-Cooperation. At this stage, the few porters and graziers still cooperating with the Indian Army ceased to do so as some of their families were systematically butchered in reprisal. All porters ceased work.

Indian Reaction to Zarb-e-Kamil

India was forced into a steady reinforcement state by Pakistan's actions. It assumed massive proportions as preliminary actions of Zarb-e-Kamil forced such a move (Pakistan had already beefed up POK with a 'Mountain Division' and had brought in an ad-hoc Corps Headquarters controlling it's Force Command Northern Area (FCNA) and 12 Infantry Division to full establishment). The reinforcement of J&K consisted of tested counterinsurgency formations from the North-East. Reserve paramilitary forces in large numbers were lifted from the rest of the country leaving a 'police vacuum' in other sensitive flashpoints

Within the Valley and in selected towns and areas elsewhere, increasing cordon and search activities now found massive resistance from the locals. Delegations of non-political Kashmiri notables met the Governor and made it plain that this 'repressive' regime would invite full non-cooperation and worse, total cooperation with the militant groups. On being asked why the militants were being screened off and sheltered, these delegations gave a stock answer—"We have no choice in the matter, we are caught between the crossfire of the militants and the Security Forces". And either way, the Delhi regime had failed to protect what it called it's own citizens. The checks provided by private or public interest civil liberty groups were no longer effective in curbing government excesses. These groups, always quasi-political in nature, further marginalized known political personalities.

Indian armymen preparing for combat

The Security Forces continued to succeed in breaking up militant cells, but found that their organization was such that one cell had no knowledge of others. Major successes in neut-

International opinion disfavoured war as an option to be exercised by either India or Pakistan ralising top militant leaders found a second tier taking over without a break. There was no resistance to interrogation of captured militants. But weapons of Pakistani and Chinese origin continued to be captured and caches discovered (in fact many were pointed out by captured militants who mostly said, "we were forceably recruited").

The problem for the Army now became acute as local police information dried up. No matter what the quality of a police force administration is, they are the best informed agency, leaving intelligence services far behind. Security Forces within the Valley had by then developed their own scratch networks. A first order intelligence vacuum was slowly developing within the Valley.

OPERATION WARCLOUD

The Politico-strategic Dilemma

International opinion, especially those of the permanent members of the UN Security Council disfavoured general war as an option to be exercised by either Pakistan or India.

This had been made clear in unambiguous terms by both superpowers time and again. It was also made clear that the aggressor would invite sanctions other than stoppage of military—economic aid.

General war had other problems attending it also. These were:

(a) Clearly defined strategic aims and objectives were not forthcoming for India, whereas Pakistan's were clear—their objective was Kashmir, and complementary to it the declaration of 'Khalistan' in contiguous areas of the Punjab abetting Jammu province. Both these objectives as India saw them, were in fact one strategic objective for Pakistan.

(b) What was the strategic/operational limit beyond which the war itself would prove counter productive? In this, cases had to be built in with regard to demonstrative use of nuclear or chemical weapons by the adversary.

(c) Clearly a strategy of pre-emption favoured Pakistan, provided it restricted itself to the Jammu border all the way to Siachen. They could justify ingress into Northern Punjab only as a military necessity unless appeals went out from those areas asking for liberation, by say, a Khalistan government in exile. They could justify this in their minds at least as a reverse 1971 situation. The 'Beg Doctrine' posited absorption in one area, while counter vailing assets were grabbed in a far more politically sensitive area. This was the essence of the so called new doctrine (which was not new in the military sense at all). Pakistan's justification came from losses in sensitive Northern territories in Op Mushtary. Here the 60 year lease of this area to Britain was twisted and presented.

(d) Afghanistan had shown little interest during the Zarb-e-Kamil phase in activating Pakistan's Western borders. Later matters changed for the better for India.

(e) The 'Domino Syndrome. Indian planners had to contend with a possible break up in Pakistan's polity having a corresponding effect in North West and North East India.

Prayertime for a Pakistani jawan

CONCLUSION

The PAF did not have sufficient means to deploy assets simultaneously for all tasks demanded of it. It had to rapidly switch priorities depending on the ground and sea situation. However, it did manage to support fully, the main politico-strategic thrust of Pakistan's war plans. Their aims and objectives were clearer.

The Indian effort, large as it was, did not pay the dividends expected of a modern air fleet. The cause lay not in the equipment but in joint operations. It failed again, throughout the spectrum of the air battle. Procedures and methods were so wrapped in red tape, that the outstanding principles like concentration, flexibility, and economy of effort went abegging.

Many people felt that the current situation would lead to a military showdown between India and Pakistan. The Pakistani foreign minister, Sahebzada Yakub Khan, said that 'Pakistan will not be provoked into a war with India as it won't solve any problem'

Navy

This time round, the PN was not bottled up in the harbour. Its task forces, a complementary mix of small missile armed craft operating with larger surface combatants, and supported by a reasonably good Maritime Reconnaissance effort remained near their continental shelf with enough sea room Southwards to await the IN's initiative. Their submarine arm ranged out into the South Arabian sea and tied up assets (It was meant for that) of the Indian Eastern Fleet in the Bay of Bengal.

The IN efforts at bringing the Pakistani Navy elements to battle proved difficult as the PN would not accept these engagements. The country was to learn not to be plunged into gloom every time a ship was lost. Maritime air effort proved inadequate in numbers. The IN did try to draw away the PN at least upto the limits of maritime strike aircraft range but the latter would not budge. This certainly helped in both blockade and contraband control when and where applied. For the first time, a comprehensive warning was sent out to international shipping of all registry not to approach within 150 to 200 nm of the 700 km Pakistani coast. At one stage, four Western Navies had deployed elements on the outer arc stretching as it did from the Iranian coast to Kutch.

Karachi's port facilities were heavily damaged again by air and long range missile action and this had an enormous political impact in Sindh province where a feeling arose that because of 'what the west Punjabi's had started—we are getting the big stick'. A seaborne raid in strength, West of Karachi got entangled with American assets leading to a major diplomatic furore. The amphibious raid would have been more successful if extrication had been planned properly.

A geographically compact country, underdeveloped economically, militarily aided far beyond its intrinsic ability to sustain, has both enormous advantages as well as disadvantages especially in a long drawn out conflict of attrition. Pakistan, one such country, was able to derive psychological advantage out of pin pricks applied far away, whereas India had to show concrete and solid results with assets bought the hard way.

EPILOGUE

Military

Compared to the losses in material and manpower casualities, the stalemated Op Warcloud managed to produce virtually no results worth the effort. It is emphasised again, that a compact, relatively smaller nation is not necessarily a weaker nation. This is specially true for limited duration or limited war. Total war has not been in vogue, at least after the Second World War. Depending on the reader's viewpoint, total war has not visited any political entity since Carthage.

The main aspects of Ops 'Mushtary' and 'Warcloud' are:

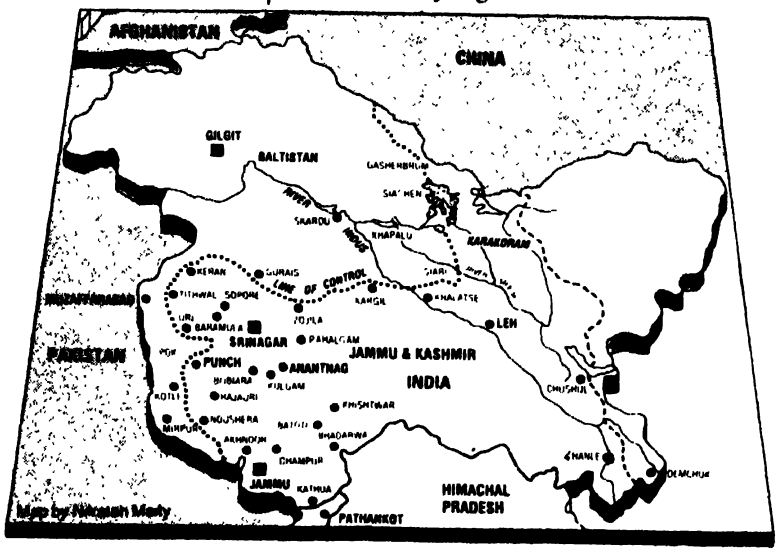
Territory

Pakistan. On the day an interim ceasefire came into force, both India and Pakistan were holding precariously on to areas South West of the Soltoro Ridge. Who had captured what and held it in sufficient strength became debatable. Pakistan still held Khapalu, and while Indian forces were sitting on their Line of Communication, near Jaurian, Akhnur, Jammu and Samba, she still held very small lodgments.

In the Gurdaspur sector, between Dera Baba Nakak (Jassar) and Pathankot she had fallen back on the River Ravi holding her own enclaves across the river. The destruction in this district especially of irrigation assets was enormous. For instance, whole lengths of flood control embankments had been bulldozed away, and canal linings ripped out. In the armoured—artillery battles whole villages had been razed to the ground. In Sind, she did lose territory in the deep South. She gained



Benazir was not in favour of a war with India, as according to her, this would not solve any problem. If, however, a war is forced on Pakistan, she would not be found wanting in the state of readiness required

Shahgarh bulge and a small piece on the Gujarat—Rajasthan state boundary.

India. Her main gains on the Saddique line of canals now became a contentious issue. Pakistan's holding corps penetrated in a narrow front had not disintegrated on the flanks. Both the strike corps mechanised forces were mixed up in great details over a 600 sq km area. Who held what, became the question since no specific 'Line' had been reached and consolidated. Pakistan had to admit the loss of approximately 300 sq. km where an expanded bridgehead and corridor remained firmly in Indian hands. India thereafter gained a small bit North West of the Tanot bulge, and much wasteland in Southern Sind reaching out to Umarkot.

Material

Pakistan. Very high material losses were imposed on her, depleting her mechanised forces and their war reserves. Her Airforce losses was heavy mainly because of overuse. She was down to two depleted sqadrons from an original three. In Kashmir and the Sind, mechanised battle casualty rates were very high. Material losses were heavy enough for Pakistan regrouping armour, armoured infantry and air defence assets immediately awaiting further accretion from abroad. At the end of the hostilities (officially speaking) she was in the position of reconstituting her strike reserves as one full and other 'Light' capable of limited offensives only.

Map showing the strategic points in the J&K areas

In the final analysis, the main political and strategic objectives remained unattainable at the end of the war. Pakistan could make no headway in India. India too failed to defeat Pakistan

India. Tank and aircraft losses were heavy in absolute terms. The more you use, the less you lose is a correct idiom if concentration is achieved. This was not the case, even though belated efforts were made to reorganise armour into independent bridges before the commencement of Op Warcloud.

Reserves. Wastage rates were higher than twice the figures catered for.

Cost. When a war is to be fought, either do not count the money involved or fight it on the diplomatic front. There is no other way. The armed forces are not a commodity taking up warehouse space. Yes, modern war does cost money. Its returns are seen politically in our context, since reparations or capture of territory in lieu, does not form part of the strategic calculus.

Political Effect

In the final analysis, the main political and strategic objectives remained unattainable at the end of the war. Pakistan could not make any headway in Kashmir or elsewhere. India too was unable to defeat Pakistan conclusively. "However, the setback to their respective economies made them more dependent and vulnerable to outside influences.

The balance sheet at the end of Op Warcloud showed that this war too was a costly waste of effort, resulting only in human suffering and colossal material damage without solving any of the basic problems between the two countries. All this has several lessons and points to certain alternatives.

Pointers for Pakistan

- Kashmir cannot be annexed through a war, be it low intensity or conventional. So why not seek realistic alternatives through negotiations.
- The bogey of ummain danger hurts Kashmiris and the majority of the ummain India, which resides outside the Kashmir Valley.
- Discussions and negotiations within a South Asian economic federation like the South Asian Association of Regional Cooperation (SAARC) and a genuine no war agreement, within the subcontinent, would be more likely to open up Kashmir for Pakistan rather than any conflict.

Pointers for India

- Advocate peace through a South Asian economic forum or some such arrangement, in which Pakistan has a prominent position and a major role.
- Discourage, talk of war and advocates of arms race, particularly those who seek the so-called nuclear deterrence. Instead, bring Pakistan to the negotiating table for a Nuclear Proliferation Treaty (NPT) and troops reduction talks.
- An autonomous Kashmir region including POK within the Indian Union with soft borders with Pakistan may provide a solution.

Conclusion

Op Zarb-e-Kamil, Op Mushtary and Op Warcloud are fictitious scenarios but have been based on existing probabilities and realities on the ground. The acutal 'thrust lines' may differ in reality but the net result will be strikingly similar, to the one depicted here, if anything resembling these scenarios are enacted in the 1990s. ●

Excerpts from the Indian Defence Review, July 1990

MUKUL KESAVAN

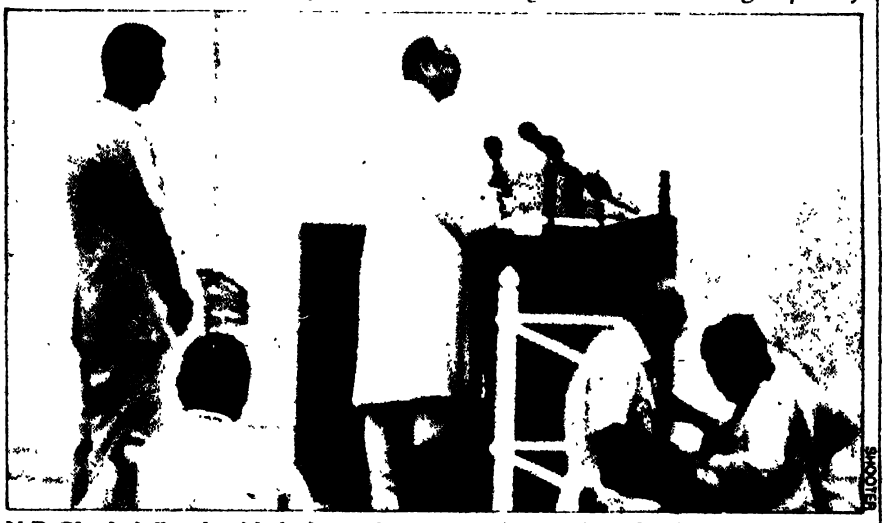
The direct look

Indian politicians don't realise its importance on TV

There were two notable television commercials in mid-August: the Pepsi launch and the Red Fort speech. There were some important differences: one was longer and the other was better produced, the Prime Minister was peddling the common touch while Remo and Juhi were selling the exclusive cachet of stardom, but both sales pitches told us a great deal about their intended audiences.

The Pepsi commercial was aimed at the new middle class, that wonderful mongrel jointly sired by Jackson and Jalota. It was all very nicely Calcutta—a Goan rocker and a filmi heroine, Indian dance steps to Western rhythms, a multinational brand name gone breezily native (Lehar Pepsi).

Juhi Chawla and Remo Fernandes made a direct pitch to camera: they gave it all they had—eyes, teeth, smiles, joie de vivre, everything. V.P. Singh never so much as looked at Doordarshan's lenses. He knew that he had a nationwide audience on network television—his speech mapped the Indian electorate segment by segment. But in the manner of his address, he made believe that he was talking to the invited audience at the Lal Quila.



This could only happen in India. I once sat for a whole afternoon in the visitors' gallery of the American Senate. It was a slow summer afternoon—there were barely a dozen Senators present. But the senior Senator from Maine, undeterred by the meagreness of the physically present, spoke with a rhetorical passion worthy of the Ram Lila Maidan or the Boat Club. Throughout his speech, he never once looked at his colleagues in the House : his gaze, his eloquence, his entire being was focused on the little glass lens beyond which sat the nation, mute before its telly screens.

In India, television audiences don't like being addressed directly. We assume that television is a window on the real world, the world out there. We see ourselves as curious pedestrians or casual passers-by, watching accidents happen and traffic flow past. So, the idea of being directly addressed, of being the primary audience for a speech, is as unsettling as the possibility of a road accident being staged for the benefit of the man on the pavement. Which is why, even in the darkest days of the Emergency, Mrs Gandhi was always shown haranguing someone else. More recently, with the grotesque K.K. Tewary at the helm, Doordarshan had Rajiv on our screens continuously, but he spoke to us indirectly via rallies and conferences. For the same reason, when he spoke on 15 August, V.P. Singh pretended the cameras weren't there.

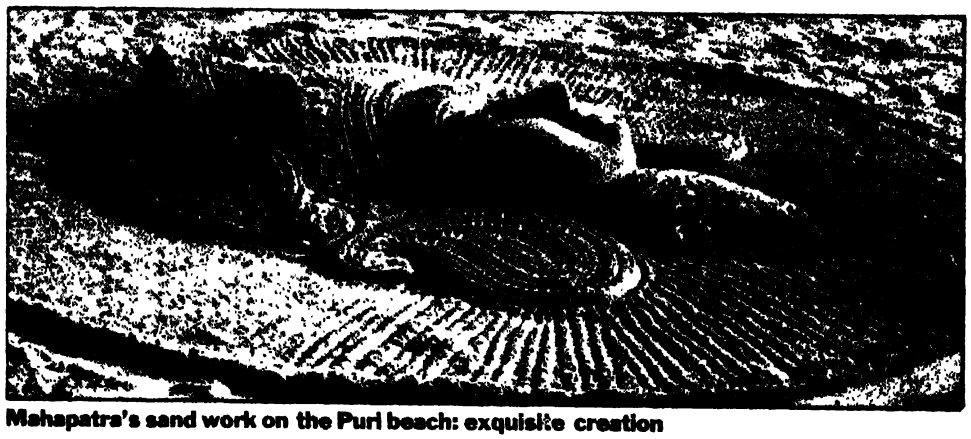
But it's only a matter of time. I remember how disconcerting it was when Doordarshan's newsreaders began using the autocue. I didn't mind them looking up occasionally from their scripts, but looking directly into my eyes for minutes on end seemed presumptuously intimate. Besides, it didn't seem authentically the news without the authoritative presence of the script. It felt as though they were making it up.

But I and everyone else got used to it in time. Now I feel impatient when Ms Albequerque's eyes lose the autocue and dart downwards. It seems very like incompetence, where once it had been the most normal thing in the world. I've grown to value the slick illusion of directness.

It is partly because commercials, as they get better and better, are remaking our attitudes. We aren't spectators any more—we're customers. We've grown used to being explicitly courted and wooed. We mightn't succumb, but we expect performers on the box to try to seduce us. Remo and Juhi do their best.

V.P. Singh delivering his Independence day address: ignoring the camera

So give it a few years and the Prasar Bharati Bill and perhaps it won't seem bizarre that at election time, American politicians buy television time for campaign commercials. Or that the electorate takes such advertisements seriously. After all, British MPs took lessons in deportment when cameras were let into Parliament. Perhaps five years from now, on Independence Day, V.P. Singh will speak his whole speech into the television camera with a picturesque detail of the Red Fort in backdrop for tradition's sake. He'll look into our eyes and we will look into his and India shall be one for those minutes—a nation in electronic communion. Franchised by our screens, we shall be sovereign. We, the people....●



ODDS AND TRENDS

What's the tab?

■ It's being billed as India's first English tabloid on films. Lehren Cine Tab, priced at Rs 3, hit the stands last week and joined the mob of film mags and rags on display. Edited by Bharathi S. Pradhan, the tabloid was launched at a star-studded function. Multichannel, the group that pioneered video advertising in India, is behind the tabloid. The inaugural issue has an interview with Meenakshi Seshadri and exposes the secret love of Aamir Khan, besides the usual starry stories peppered with gossip.

There's more to sand

■ Manmohan Mahapatra is a sculptor with a difference. His exquisite figures are not made of metal or clay, but sand. And his workshop is the beach at Puri. For 13 years he has experimented with sand art to gain near perfection—the beautiful figures testify to his creativity. In 1977, Mahapatra got the idea of making sand models while watching children build sand castles on the beach. After ten years of hard work, he established the Academy of Sand Art Culture on 25 December 1987. By then Mahapatra and his art had caught the local imagination and there was no dearth of students. But Mahapatra, not content with just local recognition, wishes to popularise this new art form on the national level and, if possible, spread it beyond India as well.

Mahapatra's sand work on the Puri beach: exquisite creation

Born in a family that boasts of an artistic tradition, Mahapatra says he has never had any formal training. It's his inherent skill, interest in his "hobby" and his family background that have helped him perfect his art. And he is determined not to let all this hard work go to waste. Plans are afoot to open a branch of the Academy of Sand Art Culture in Calcutta (if funds permit that is, says Mahapatra) and maybe elsewhere too.

SEPARATED AT BIRTH?

Nazia Hassan

Maneka Gandhi

MILESTONES

Died: Krishnan Nair, noted Kathakali exponent and Padmashri winner, after a prolonged illness in Thiruvananthapuram on 15 August.

Scored: Sachin Tendulkar his first test century at Old Trafford in England on 14 August saving the match for his team in the second test match between India and England.

Appointed: Ratan Tata as a director of Haldia Petrochemicals Limited with effect from 1 August.

Dismissed: Four Haryana Cabinet ministers, Hira Nand Arya, O.P. Bhardwaj, Maha Singh and Balbir Singh Saini on 10 August for rebelling against the chief minister, Hukum Singh.

Adjourned: The hearing of the US $470 million Bhopal gas disaster settlement case on 10 August till 28 August by the Supreme Court.

Resigned: R.K. Lakshman, chairman and managing director of the India Tourism Development Corporation (ITDC) on 8 August, five months before the end of his extension period.

Died: Dr Gopal Singh, former Governor of Goa and Nagaland in New Delhi on 8 August, due to heart failure.

Sworn-in: Dr Sanjay Singh, as a member of the Rajya Sabha on 7 August.

Dismissed: Benazir Bhutto, Prime Minister of Pakistan, by President Ghulam Ishaq Khan on 6 August, who accused the PPP government of nepotism, corruption and inability to control deteriorating law and order situation.

Invaded: Kuwait, by neighbouring country Iraq on 2 August.

BEGINNING 26 AUGUST 1990 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (21 March—20 April)

This is a week of changes. Your drive and ambition are going to help you to implement your plans. But your professional success could cause jealousy among your relatives. Secret associations will be helpful.

Good dates: 26, 28 and 1
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: West

TAURUS (21 April—20 May)

The domestic front will remain peaceful and be a source of joy for you. This is an excellent week for romance, courtship and marriage. Professionals are likely to receive transfer orders

Good dates: 28, 30 and 31
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 6
Favourable direction: South

GEMINI (21 May—20 June)

The stars will favour you this week. But do not be over-confident. Romance is in the offing. For others, this is going to be a hectic week. Your social engagements will keep you busy. Friends will call upon you.

Good dates: 27, 29 and 30
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: East

CANCER (21 June—20 July)

This is a very good week for you. Difficulties may arise on the professional front but they will be sorted out. The period is favourable for romance, courtship and marriage Consult your elders before taking a decision.

Good dates: 26, 27 and 29
Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: North-west

LEO (21 July—20 August)

Keep an eye on your health this week Businessmen should sort out their differences with their partners. A fairly good week for romance. The domestic front will be peaceful.

Good dates: 30, 31 and 1
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 9
Favourable direction: North

VIRGO (21 August—20 September)

Professionals will be very busy this week. A promotion is in the offing. This is an excellent week for romance; you will be successful in finding a partner for your life. Pay attention to your family this week.

Good dates: 28, 29 and 31
Lucky numbers: 5, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: West

LIBRA (21 September—20 October)

There might be a few problems for you. You are advised to pay attention to the minutest details of your work. Property matters may cause concern to you. Keep an eye on your health. The time is not ripe for romance.

Good dates: 27, 30 and 1
Lucky numbers: 6, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: South

SCORPIO (21 October—20 November)

Your intuition will help you to tide over your problems Your efforts may not bear fruit. Do not be disheartened and avoid taking hasty decisions Keep your cool. Avoid taking unnecessary risks.

Good dates: 26, 29 and 31
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 8
Favourable direction: North-west

SAGITTARIUS (21 November—20 December)

This is not a favourable week for you. Be cautious on the domestic front. However, keep up the good work you have been doing. Be careful with your finances. Contractors will be successful.

Good dates: 28, 30 and 1
Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 7
Favourable direction: South-east

CAPRICORN (21 December—20 January)

You will make remarkable progress this week Those in service will be praised by their seniors. Financially, this is going to be a lucky week for a windfall is in the offing. But check extravagance.

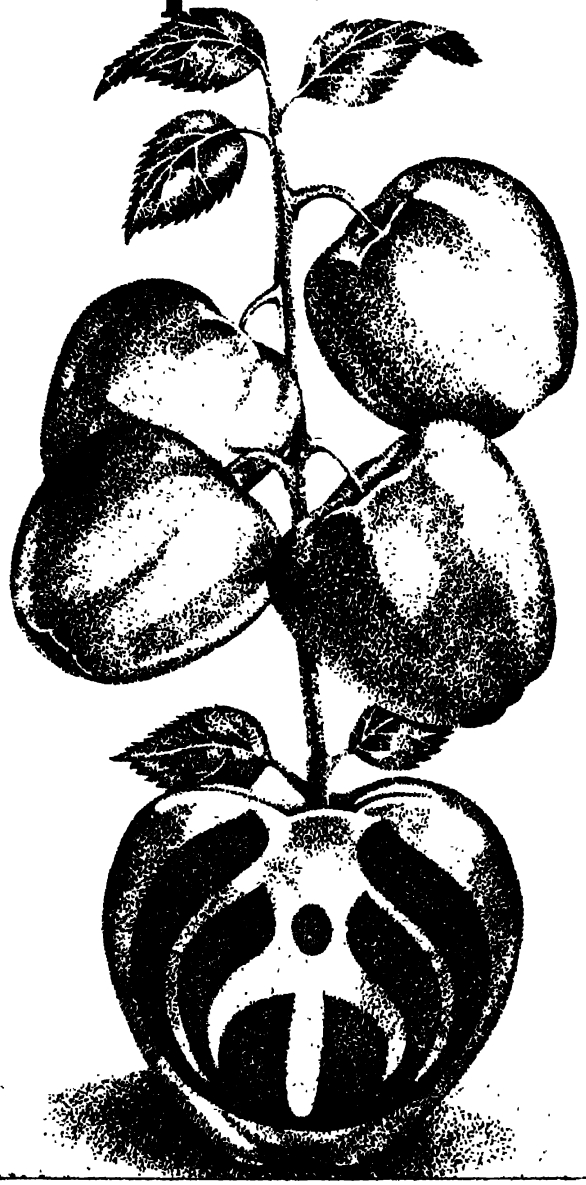
Good dates: 29, 31 and 1
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: West

AQUARIUS (21 January—20 February)

A moderately favourable week for you. But you are likely to have some financial problems. Do not be disappointed. Patients in hospitals will show remarkable progress. Take care of your health.

Good dates: 26, 28 and 30
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: North

PISCES (21 February—20 March)



Businessmen will be successful. Avoid unnecessary risks. This is a good week for romance but it is not the right time for marriage. The domestic front is likely to pose a few problems.

Good dates: 27, 29 and 1
Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: East

STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—CAPRICORN

The Scorpio woman's need for peace and security draws her to the Capricorn man who believes her to be a strong, uncomplicated woman. He might, however, be proved wrong and should respect the intensity of his partner's emotions. ●

IDBI Capital Bonds
An attractive instrument for exemption from Capital Gains Tax.

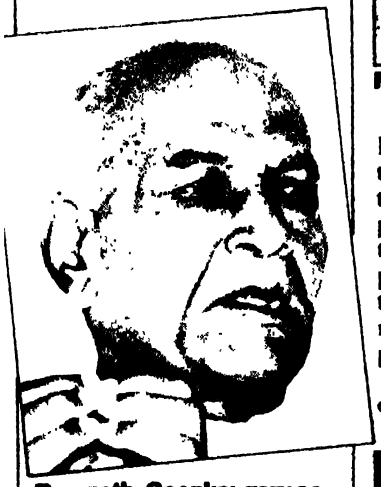
- Available at par throughout the year.
- Exemption from Capital Gains tax under Section 54E of the Income Tax Act, 1961.
- Exemption from Wealth tax under Section 5(1) (xvie) of the Wealth Tax Act, 1957
- Income tax benefit under Section 80L.
- Interest at 9% p.a. payable half yearly.
- At the investor's option, interest for the full period of 3 years can be paid in advance on discounted basis.
- No deduction of tax at source.
- Outstation cheques accepted and cost of collection will be borne by IDBI.

For further details contact the nearest IDBI office or write to Manager

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK OF INDIA

IDBI TOWER, Cuffe Parade, Colaba, Bombay 400 005.

Sohagya-B/IDBI/89



Off with the Dal, on with the BJP

Is the Indian Express planning to change its editorial position? The pro-BJP/RSS, anti-Congress position, that is.

In the last few months the BJP has been left at home while the Express leader-writers flirted with the V.P. Singh faction of the Janata Dal.

But it now looks as if the Express has rediscovered the virtues of fidelity. In a recent interview to a New-York based newspaper, Ramnath Goenka proclaimed support for the BJP-RSS line, reasserting his pride in Hinduism.

At the same time, the Express has launched unprecedented attacks on the new caste coalition that the Raja is hastily cobbling together (see Coverstory) to win the election.

Ramnath Goenka: garv se kaho, hum Hindu hain

This suggests that the Express will not be able to support the Janata Dal. And the BJP may be the net gainer.

Fly by evening operator

The government's behaviour, apropos the Syed Modi case, gets curiouser and curiouser.

On the one hand, the Raja assures Parliament that justice will be done in the case and reinstates the private counsels. But on the other, Sanjay Singh the prime accused is nominated to the Rajya Sabha, and remains the PM's favourite person.

The Uttar Pradesh government also seems to be following the Raja's lead in this regard. So, regardless of the fact that the state is fighting the case against the princeling of Amethi, Mulayam Singh Yadav sent the government plane over to Delhi to fetch Sanjay Singh's lawyer, Ram Jethmalani to Lucknow.

The craft arrived at 11 in the morning, but Ram Jethmalani was busy in Parliament all day. So, the plane stayed in waiting until late in the evening, awaiting the intrepid lawyer's pleasure.

HEARD IN CENTRAL HALL

Devi Lal is one of the great minds of the 16th century.

A DISGRUNTLED JANATA DAL MP

Ram Jethmalani: hang on, I'm coming

THERMOMETER

BJP decision-makers—the second rung

- S.S. Bhandari: Most policy decisions are taken after consulting him. He would like Advani to continue as party president and is therefore opposing the candidature of M.M. Joshi.
- Ashwini Kumar: Fund collector of the BJP, he is on M.M. Joshi's side. But his advice is being taken only in Bihar and UP.
- Gobind Acharya: Pretends to be a second-rung leader. But his influence is stronger than his profile suggests. He is Nagpur's man in the BJP.
- J.K. Jain/Sardar Angre: Have risen on the Scindia network. But now both have emerged as powers in their own right. Jain is extraordinarily connected and Angre runs Madhya Pradesh.

Khullar Liberation Front

The last time the country went to the polls, journalist-turned-politico Inderjit convinced Subash Ghisingh to field him in Gorkha territory. And thanks to the Gorkha National Liberation Front network, the mediaman managed to win the election.

This time, however—assuming that a mid-term election iscalled—Ghisingh is unlikely to be quite so cooperative. So, Inderjit has turned his eye to more promising pastures.

Inderjit: BSP zindebad!

The Bahujan Samaj Party (BSP), in other words. He has taken on the role of adviser to Mayavati, a senior BSP leader. And spends all his time in Parliament, briefing her on various issues and preparing copious notes for her.

The modus operandi is simple. If the Lok Sabha is dissolved, as may well happen, Inderjit will not go to the hustings. Instead, he will prevail upon the BSP to get him a Rajya Sabha nomination.

And going by his success with Mayavatiji, this plan may well work. ●

Super Steno strikes

Has anybody noticed the transformation of Dhawan from Super Steno to Parliamentary Figure? Last week, the safari-suited factotum rose to his feet and demanded to know from V.P. Singh, why a man who is facing criminal charges had been appointed to a high office in government.

The Raja retorted that he would be better placed to answer this question if the raven-haired MP could tell him who the man in question was.

"Why should I tell you? You find out," said Dhawan triumphantly.

R.K. Dhawan: playing riddler

But when he's not playing the riddler, RKD is busy encouraging his protégés S.S. Ahluwalia and Ratnakar Pandey to leap up and down and wave their arms in the air, while screaming "V.P. Singh, resign. Resign."

The Congress' official parliamentary leadership is appalled by this demonstration of loutish (even by Congress standards) behaviour but is powerless to stop RKD's cronies from making Colo because of the Super Steno's proximity to the Congress president.

HEARD AT CENTRAL HALL.

Rajivji hasn't come to Parliament because he has a bad throat.

A CONGRESS(I) MP

Why? Has he put his foot in his mouth again?

A JANATA DAL MP

Nilamani Routray (left): clipping Maneka Gandhi's wings

Choppy waters

The on-going battle in the environment ministry between Nilamani Routray and Maneka Gandhi gets more and more farcical with every passing day.

The latest row centres on the helicopters owned by the ministry. The minister is hell-bent on surrendering them, on the grounds that his department has no use for them. But his minister of state thinks differently.

According to Maneka, the task of safeguarding our fragile biosphere will be severely curtailed if the choppers are given up.

BAROMETER

The coterie at 5 Race Course Road

Sanjay Singh: A member of the family, is at the Prime Minister's residence every evening whenever he is in Delhi. The Raja's wife and children are frequent visitors to the house.

Som Pal: The middleman between VP and Devi Lal. Flew to Bangalore to negotiate that disastrous deal with the Chautharys. Now Chautala's gone, the Tau's gone, Ranjit is in limbo and Sanjay Singh bears the brunt of a new attack. But Som Pal, he thinks getting stronger...

Santosh Bharatiya: Nobody can quite work out why the bearded MP cum journalist is no longer a frequent visitor. Outwardly appears to retain the Raja's trust but the socialising has been curtailed.

Raj Bahadur: His political career seems to be going the way of the film career. Useful sycophant who's (when he chooses) a witty conversationalist. Sanjay Singh has been showing signs of getting tired of him.

What the other MPs of Tau's tie-mates is that she won't be able to pay flying visits to her constituency either.

Put him through, at once!

After his interview to SUNDAY (see issue dated 27 May—2 June '90) in which Shatrughan Sinha told Amitabh Bachchan that he disapproved of the government carrying on vendettas against its foes, the Bihari babu found himself in disgrace. The Raja refused to see him, while Janata Dal workers acted as if he had a communicable disease.

Shatrughan Sinha: back in favour with the Raja

Things seem to be changing for the better now. Not only did the Prime Minister grant an appointment to Sinha, he also spent close to an hour with him, with only minister for state for home affairs Subodh Kant Sahay in attendance.

The Raja has also issued instructions to the A.K. that Shatrughan is to be put through at all times, unless [illegible]

The Indian Rope Trick. As performed by a 12 month old.

Some years ago, the textile industry in India brought in highly sophisticated, high-speed airjet and projectile weaving looms. This meant the industry needed top quality, zero-defect yarn.

Yarn that's electronically cleared, spliced, knot-less and contamination-free. Yarn that slides through the shuttleless looms, enhancing both productivity and quality of fabric.

Yarn spun on the very finest in machinery including the latest generation Autoconers 238 and Two-for-One Twisters.

Yarn manufactured by Indo Rama. A company that, in its very first year, has won the hearts of all leading fabric manufacturers in the country, and has exported over 50 percent of its production to the fashion capitals of Europe.

And as the top weavers in India and Europe wonder at the Indian Rope Trick, we allow ourselves a small smile.

After all, we have the entire future to look forward to. And many more yarns to spin !

INDO RAMA SYNTHETICS (I) LTD.

We/have/only/scratched/the/surface

B.V. SWAMY/IRS/5858 R

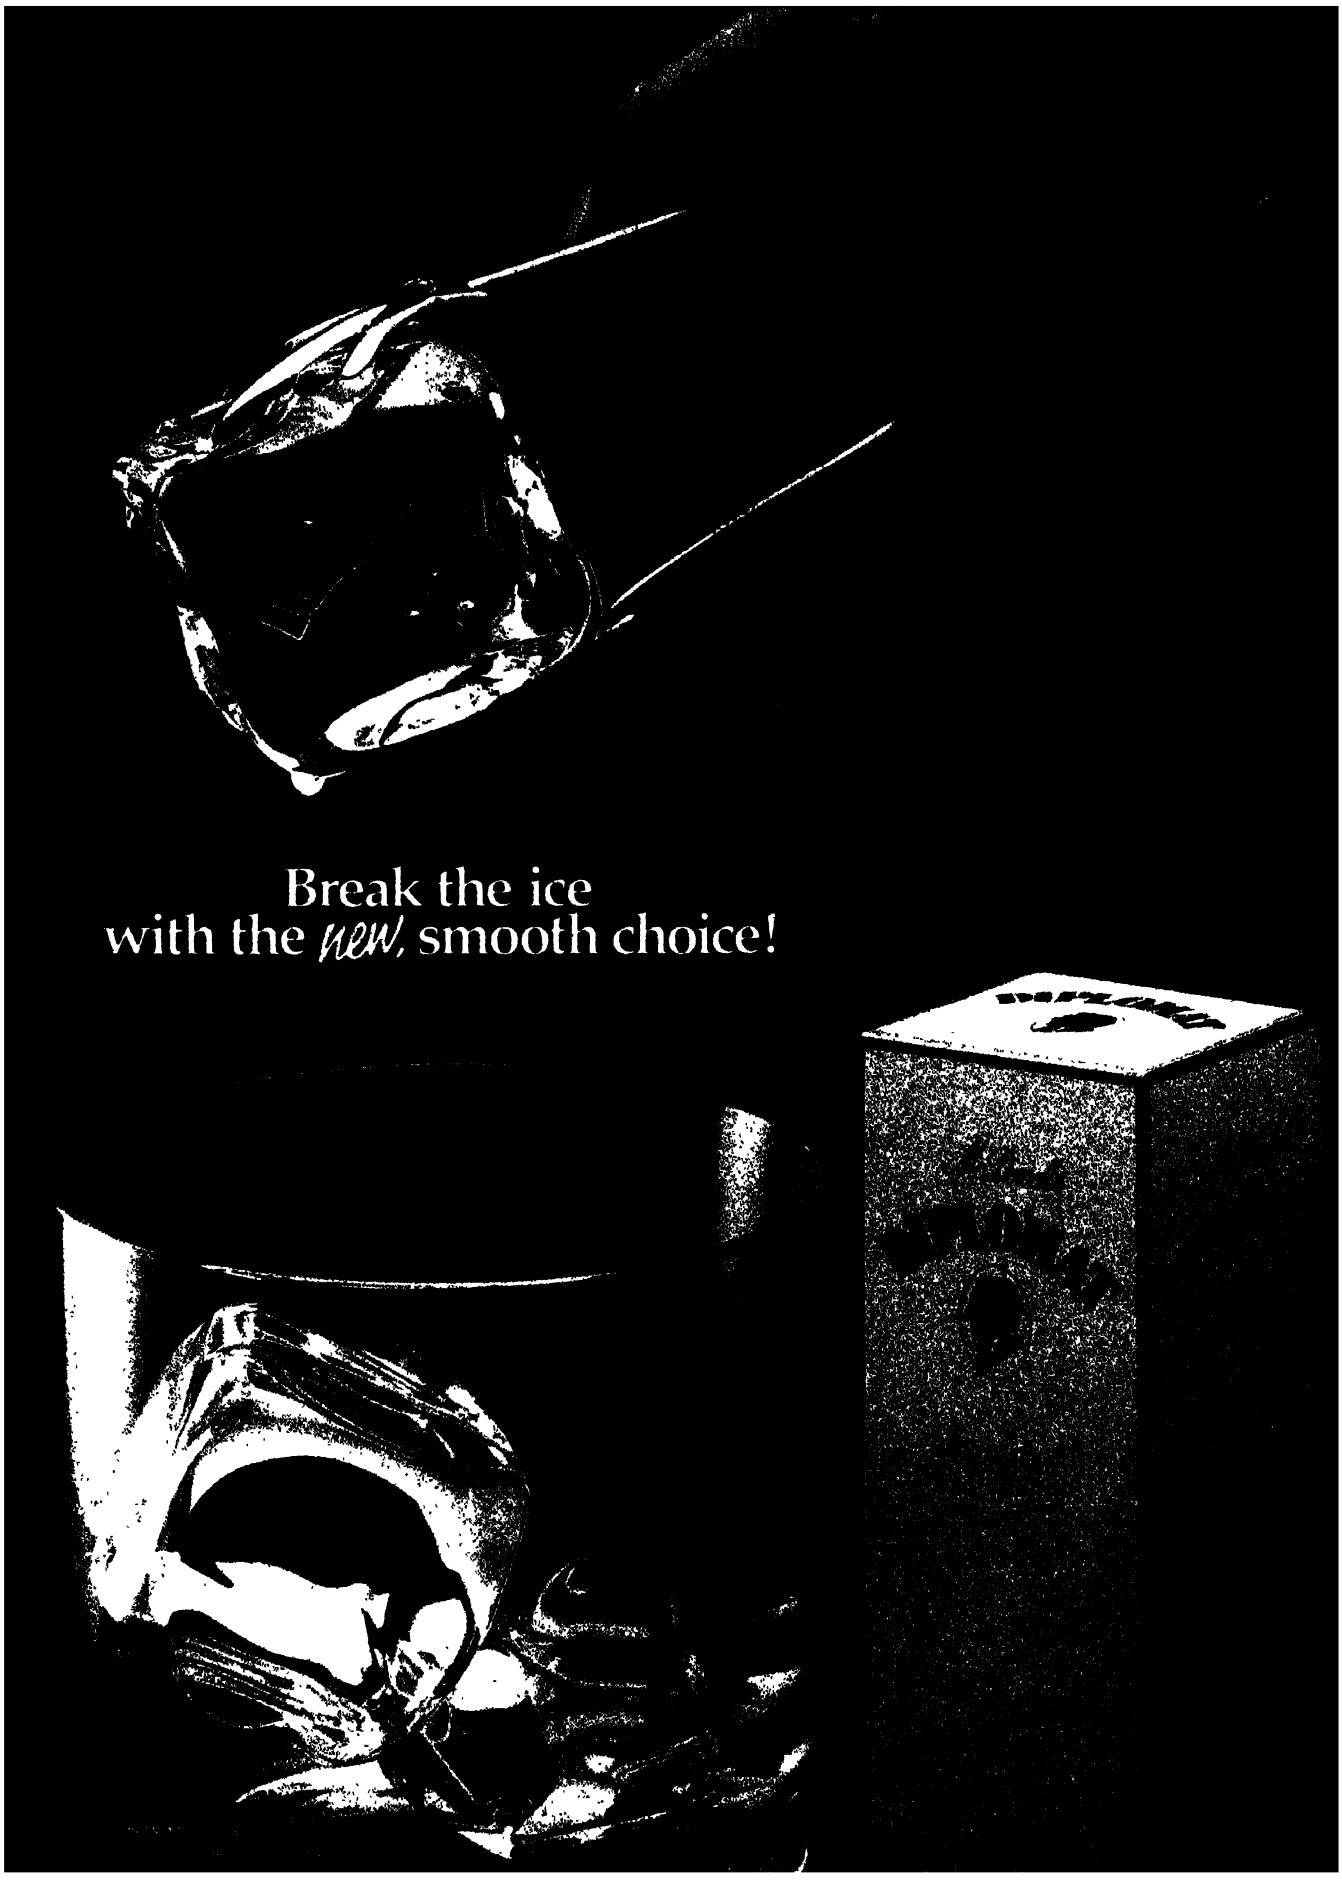
The Silk People. He loves designer drapes. She loves daydreaming. Their walls love Luxol Silk.

Silk sheen ... silken feel

Drape your walls with Luxol Silk — the richest emulsion in the world.

BERGER Luxol Silk

BERGER PAINTS



LINTAS (CAL)/BP/LS/P2/2619

ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION ☐ RS 7.00

V.P. SINGH: VANISHING OPTIONS

SUNDAY

Break the ice
with the new, smooth choice!

CONTENTS

SUNDAY
VOLUME 17 □ ISSUE 35 □ RS 7 00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION
2—8 SEPTEMBER 1990

35
COVER STORY

End of the Gulf dream

Thousands return in poverty from the Middle East. And the oil crunch will definitely jack up prices in India. A report on the fallout of the Gulf war.

10
TELEVISION

Doordarshan Pvt. Ltd?

Allowing private enterprise into television may be the only way out.

14
SPECIAL REPORT

Cadre raj

Jyoti Basu's Red Brigade rules West Bengal.

22
NEWSWATCH

Pulling a fast one

Jayalalitha turns the tables on her party rebels and the DMK government.

27 POLITICS

Chameleon

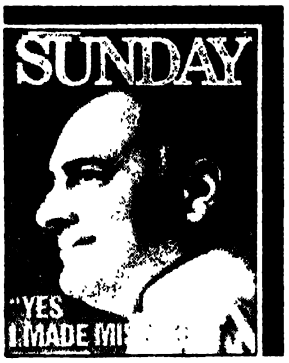
V.P. Singh recasts his image and dumps the middle class supporters.

62
DE JURE

Leaks, plants and lies

Mahesh Jethmalani defends the Bofors investigators in a hard-hitting essay.

67
TRENDS



Country pleasures

Rural retreats are the latest craze in Bangalore.

LETTERS 4
SIGHT AND SOUND 7
COUNTERVIEW 8
GOSSIP SWEET AND SOUR 13
BODYLINE 18
CAPITAL MATTERS 43
SPOTLIGHT 44
PROFILE 48
Joan of Arc
BUSINESS/FEATURE 50
MANI-TALK 56
FOCUS 70
Right on target
KHAAS BAAT 72
NEWS 74
CONTROVERSY 80
Culture vultures
MEDIA MUSINGS 82
SPORTS 84
ASTRONOMY 86
Jesus Christ, B.C.?
THIS INDIA 87
SUNDAYWEEK 88
RANDOM NOTES 89
DELHI DIARY 90

Cover transparency:
Gautam Patole

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu and edited by Vir Sanghvi from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for Srinagar ex-Delhi and Tripura: 20 paise; North-eastern states: 30 paise

A late realisation

The interview with Rajiv Gandhi (Time to be frank, 12—18 August) was excellent. It seemed as if the former Prime Minister is no longer complacent and is ready to accept that both the Congress party and his own image need to be refurbished, if he wants to make a comeback.

Most Congressmen have realised that whatever be his shortcomings and drawbacks, Rajiv Gandhi still remains their greatest asset. Given Rajiv's fame, his background and his own image—there is no one in the party who can pose any serious challenge to his leadership. Though he is in an unenviable position, he cannot afford to take things for granted. So what is required is a definite programme and direction in order to win over the masses.

Manoj Kumar Jain, Serampore (West Bengal)

■ The first formal interview of the former Prime Minister showed Rajiv Gandhi in a new light—relaxed, unassuming and happy to be away from the glare of publicity. The conversation was really free and frank, as a result of which a lot of confusion has been cleared.

Rajiv was really candid enough to admit the organisational failures of his party in the last parliamentary elections, which was responsible for his downfall. Therefore, it is high time that Rajiv started setting his house in order.

Pranab Hazra, Bankura (West Bengal)

■ Rajiv Gandhi was very frank and forthright in his interview. He has acknowledged his mistakes as the Prime Minister and as the Congress party president. So if he makes a comeback, he is bound to be much better than what he was. Therefore, given the chance, Rajiv might prove that he can really rise to the occasion. But first, he should weed out all the undesirable elements from the party and revamp the organisation and its image.

K.V. Rajagopalan, Madras (Tamil Nadu)

■ The cover story on Rajiv Gandhi shows that he has woken up a bit too late. His mistakes have caused the nation great hardships. He left Punjab in a mess and since then the situation has turned from bad to worse.

In Kashmir, Rajiv made a grave mistake by supporting the then chief minister Farooq Abdullah, whose credibility was nil. The common man felt alienated with Abdullah's style of functioning while the terrorists took over the administration in the Valley.

Rajiv was also not firm enough to tackle the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid issue. He needlessly exploited it for political gains and blew it out of proportions. Now it threatens to tear apart the social fabric of the entire nation. The Rajiv era should be forgotten as a bad dream and we should look forward to a better future under the National Front government.

Rohit Das, Bangalore (Karnataka)

Rajiv Gandhi: admitting his mistakes

Om shanti! Om

The article (But Angre is cuter, 5—11 August) was absolutely shocking. I deny that I have ever used the kind of words you have mentioned as uttered by me about Madhavrao Scindia.

I am not used to this kind of language as I come from a very religious background. I am always for the downtrodden people, and whatever little I can do I do for them. I am really hurt by the write-up.

Uma Bharti, Member of Parliament, New Delhi

Gearing up for the polls

The cover story (Biding his time, 5—11 August) was interesting and comprehensive. The Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) is in an enviable position at the national level.

It is a very organised party, has disciplined cadres and its leaders are relatively honest. But it is hard to imagine that the BJP will be in a position to rule the country. Their weakest point is perhaps their current strength in Parliament. By playing the Hindu card, it has managed to increase its tally in the Lok Sabha from two to 84 seats. But the party's theory of a Hindu nation—whether we like it or not—cannot succeed in India. The Congress has ruled the country for more than 40 years on the plank of secularism. And a serious deviation from this is bound to hurt the national pride.

L.K. Advani: going it alone

If the BJP is supporting the National Front government, it is only to forge a marriage of convenience. What is holding them together is the prospect of keeping Rajiv away from capturing power.

Krishan Kalra, New Delhi

■ The BJP seems to be right in its assessment of the present situation in the country. L.K. Advani's disillusionment with the Janata Dal and V.P. Singh is complete. So he feels it is wiser to distance itself from the National Front. L.K. Advani feels that he can go it alone if a mid-term poll is held. His view that he can form a government at the Centre with the help of regional parties sounds incredible. But this should not be scoffed at, for he is a matured politician with vast experience.

Amitava Ghosh, New Delhi

Good riddance

The dismissal of Devi Lal (How now, Tau?, 12—18 August) from the Cabinet has shocked many people and aroused sympathy among his supporters, especially in Haryana. But what perplexed everyone was the way he championed the cause of his eldest son Om Prakash Chautala. Ultimately the charges he levelled at some of his Cabinet colleagues

Devi Lal: cornered, at last boomeranged on him.

The Prime Minister should be congratulated for taking the bold step of sacking his deputy. By doing this, he has not only saved the National Front from grave crisis, but has also managed to boost the image of his government in the eyes of the people.

S. Bachan Jeet Singh, Hyderabad (Andhra Pradesh)

■ The article on the dismissal of the Tau, was timely and impressive. V.P. Singh was correct in his decision to get rid of Devi Lal, who was causing immense problems for the National Front government. Lal was arrogant, selfish and power-hungry. His only aim was to promote his eldest son Chautala and his cause. Therefore, his ouster was justified and good both for the government and the people.

Bhupen Bose, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Temple politics

The Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) has taken a rigid stand to start the construction of the Ram Janmabhoomi temple (The gathering storm, 12—18 August) at Ayodhya on 30 October, ignoring any judicial dispensation.

Whether the Muslims will accept the VHP's decision is extremely doubtful. The National Front government has been absolutely non-committal. And a satisfactory court verdict seems to be an illusion.

In the meantime, political forces are being polarised over the temple issue with the BJP expressing its support for the cause and the leftists declaring their opposition to the construction plan. The conflicting stands of the erstwhile allies of the National Front have put the latter in the horns of dilemma.

Manoj Kumar Jain, Serampore (West Bengal)

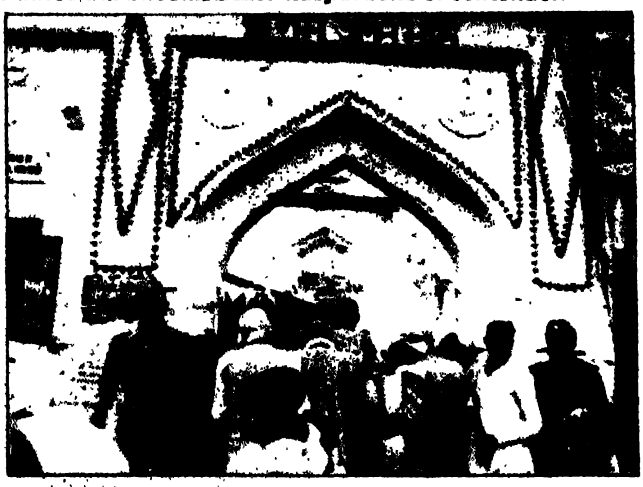
■ The VHP's activities regarding the construction of the Ram Janmabhoomi temple at Ayodhya have placed the National Front government in a piquant situation. The BJP which is supporting the VHP's cause, should realise that it must work to preserve national unity and integrity, as it is a partner of the National Front government at the Centre.

Samir Marx Mahajan, New Delhi

Masjid, not mandir

The report (Temple or mosque?, 5—11 August) is full of inaccuracies, presumptions and contradictions.

The reporter says that recorded history offers very few dues as to what it (the structure) really says: mosque or temple. On the other hand, the historical facts are well established on the basis of contemporary inscriptions, describing the structure as a mosque and naming Mir Baqui, an officer of Babar, as the builder. And, this was vouchsafed for by none other than the government of UP in its official affidavit of 1950, which is part of the official records. The correspondent himself cites the VHP claim that Babar tore down Vikramaditya's temple and built a mosque, which was named after him. Now, how can they turn around and in the same breath say that there is nothing to suggest it was a mosque save a mildewed dome. If indeed the disputed monument is a temple, why this hue and cry over pulling it down to renovate it? So much for the Hindu version. The reporter's own account is full of unchecked myths.



First, the conflict of 1855 was not on the question of the possession of Babri Masjid but of a masjid adjacent to Hanumangarhi, about a kilometre away. The Muslim title remained unchallenged upto 22 December, 1949. Moreover, Amir Ali was not the Sultan of Amethi but a man of piety.

There is no historic record of the supposed agreement between the Sultan and the Raja to pray in different parts of the building or the Hindus to "take over the shrine when the Muslims were given an alternative plot of land to build the mosque". Will the correspondent quote a contemporary record?

No ban was imposed on the Muslims by the British in 1930. In fact, the British administration had the mosque repaired after it was damaged in the riots, and the Muslims continued to offer regular prayers right up to 22 December, 1949 and the mosque was under the management of the UP Sunni Wakf Board. The Imam who led the prayer is still alive and lives in Ayodhya.

Syed Shahabuddin, former member of Parliament, New Delhi

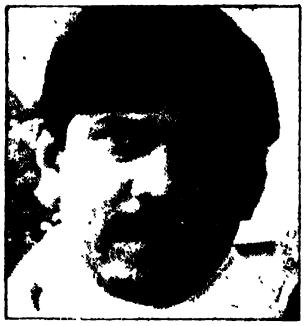
Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid: bone of contention

Sunny stroke

The write-up (Thanks! But no thanks!, 12—18 August) was a nice piece. Sunil Gavaskar has done the right thing by refusing the MCC membership. Henceforth, the MCC will be more careful in their behaviour with cricketers. India's former opening batsman has executed a masterly stroke in teaching them a good lesson, which they will not easily forget in the distant future.

V. Deolkar, New Delhi

Fact and fiction



Jaswant Singh

Kidar Nath Sahni

Jagmohan

Saifuddin Chowdhury

M. Farooqui

For keeping the record straight, I must once again deny what Shri Rajiv Gandhi has attributed to me in his interview (Time to be frank, 12—18 August).

As already reported in the press, leaders of other political parties present at the Srinagar meeting on 8 March have vehemently denied Shri Rajiv Gandhi's version. And I quote from their statements as published in the Indian Express of 24 July, 1990:

Mr M. Farooqui, senior CPI leader, said; "There is no love lost between us and Mr Jagmohan. But, in my opinion, Mr Gandhi has misquoted Mr Jagmohan. So far as I remember, what Mr Jagmohan had said at that time was that the state administration had been taken over by the terrorists and, therefore, paralysed. He had also said that his first task was to rebuild the state administration. What he said about the National Conference and the Congress(I) was that they had become irrelevant and a new political force would have to be rebuilt. Mr Jagmohan did say that you had to make a distinction between the Jamat-e-Islami and the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front (JKLF). The Jamat is for integration with Pakistan and the JKLF is for the liberation of the state."

Mr Saifuddin Chowdhury of the CPI(M) said: "I cannot remember the exact words used by the Governor. But the impression that the Governor gave was that the Congress(I) and the National Conference had become irrelevant and a new force had to be developed."

Mr Jaswant Singh (BJP): "It is perverse misquotation...a figment of Mr Gandhi's over-active imagination."

Mr Kidar Nath Sahni (BJP): "It is a m[illegible] statement, distortion [illegible] facts...playing the same game which Mr Gandhi tried to play in Srinagar on the day of the meeting."

Even Shri Rajiv Gandhi, who was otherwise critical of me in his talk with the press after the meeting on 8 March, did not make any such accusation. Presumably, Shri Mani Shankar's records had not been manufactured by that time. There should be some limit to disinformation. At first they tried to portray me as anti-Muslim; now they say that I was pro-JKLF. Are these two faces of disinformation reconcilable? Mani Shankar, perhaps, does not know that JKLF, Hissab-ul-Mujahideen and such other subversive organisations were banned by me. Nor does he know that Shibir Shah is not even a member of JKLF.

The fact is that in the Srinagar meeting, I had analysed the nature and potency of the political, social, economic and religious forces operating in the Valley. This I had done at the suggestion of the members and on the assurance that the meeting was for evolving national consensus on Kashmir and nothing that was said during the course of the discussions would go out of the room. I had also indicated that my foremost task was to dismantle the network of terrorism, rebuild the administration and assert the authority of the state which was non-existent at that time. I also stressed the need for setting up of a just and fair system of administration and pattern of development which were people-oriented and not elite-oriented.

Regarding the conditions prevailing before imposition of Governor's Rule, I would just let a contemporaneous document, a representation of Kashmir Sabha, given to my predecessor, General (retd) Krishna Rao on 16 January, 1990, speak: "It is the militants who are the de facto rulers in the Valley today. The murders of Mahant Keshav Nath, Tikka Lal Taploo, N.K. Ganjoo, Prem Nath Bhat, Ajay Kapoor and others, were to create scare and awe among the minority community to force them to leave the Valley. The pace of exodus has further accelerated now...It is a sad commentary on the present administration that not even a single assailant of the minority leaders and others has either been identified or apprehended by the police till now...Fully Pakistan-trained underground elements who are armed with modern weapons openly engage in battles with the security forces."

I have no doubt that oral disinformation cannot stand the heat of truth; it would soon melt into nothingness. Hard facts and documents would show that Kashmir was snatched back from the clutches of pro-Pakistan and anti-national forces after 20 January, 1990.

Jagmohan, Rajya Sabha member and former Governor of Jammu and Kashmir

R.K. LAXMAN/THE TIMES OF INDIA

■ I am not taking any message, I'm not a messenger. I am going to Iraq if I do at all—only because our people are held up there.

I.K. GUJRAL, external affairs minister

■ If Iran and Iraq who fought a better war for over eighty years could bury the hatchet, why can't India and Pakistan do so?

C.P. Singh, Prime

■ He is the Prime Minister of the country, but he is not my Prime Minister.

R.K. DHAWAN, Congress(I) MP, on V.P. Singh

■ Because of it this government will be remembered whether it lasts or not, or whether V.P. Singh or Ram Vilas Paswan remain or not.

RAM VILAS PASWAN, labour and welfare minister, on the Mandal Commission Report

■ Did he? Well, it is his prerogative. But let us have it clear, I am not interested in that post at all.

CHANDRA SHEKHAR, senior Janata Dal leader, on being informed that V.P. Singh had justified in an interview the need of a deputy prime minister in his Cabinet

■ They should not criticise the government they are part of. Let them resign, become politicians and then point fingers at the government.

G.C. SAXENA, Jammu and Kashmir Governor, on some dissatisfied officials of the J & K cadre who have sent a memorandum to the UN protesting against army excesses

■ The guns could not silence the people of the state. What was needed was good-will, love and affection.

DR FAROOQ ABDULLAH, former Jammu and Kashmir chief minister

■ In economics we call it diversification. In this case, it would be diversification of alcohol from drinking to technology.

PROF. MADHU DANDAVATE, finance minister, on a suggestion that more research should be conducted into conversion of alcohol into fuel in the face of the oil crisis

■ Where did they find stones in that area? Perhaps they bought them from home in their bags.

JYOTI BASU, West Bengal chief minister, condemning the Congress(I) agitation

■ Success is so anti-creative. I wanted to do something creative.

SHEKHAR KAPOOR, film director

VINOD MEHTA

Manch ado about nothing

Blame the moderators of Khula Manch, not the organisers

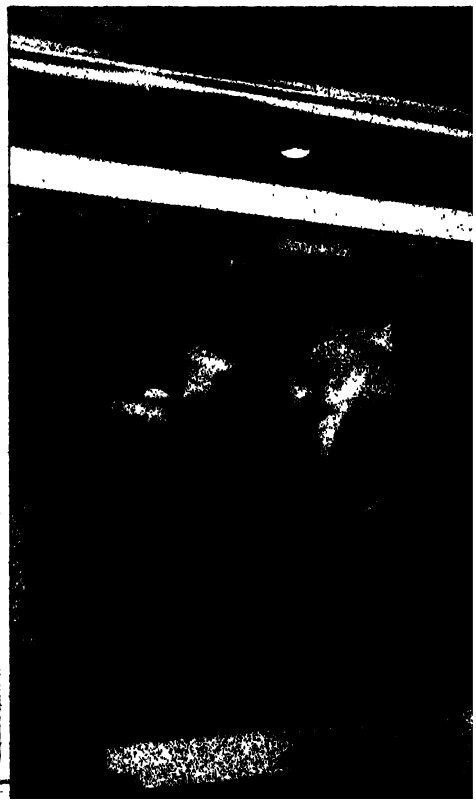
On 22 August, if the Press Trust of India is to be believed, two Congress members of Parliament, Dinesh Singh and M.J. Akbar, sought to move a privilege motion against the information and broadcasting minister. The charge? Doordarshan, according to them, has been turned into a "propaganda unit" of the National Front government. Very interesting. Since wire agencies studiously avoid colour reporting, we were not told whether Messrs Dinesh and Akbar kept a straight face while pointing the accusing finger.

Politicians, of course, are completely humourless. Their trade also demands partial amnesia while irony is definitely taboo. Otherwise, how could those close to the previous regime hope to make such a preposterous charge stick? After all, they were part of the machinery that attempted blatant, crude and round-the-clock news management between 1985 and 1989. If Doordarshan is a "propaganda unit" now, the English language is inadequate to describe what it was 12 months ago.



Controversy is the lifeblood of public affairs, but has there been anything more bogus and self-serving than the hue and cry over Khula Manch? I missed the first episode, graced by Madhu Dandavate, that hit the headlines not because the finance minister dropped a brick, but due to Mandi House's inability to produce a full-time farmer (surely Mr Devi Lal would have helped if approached). One would have thought that this was the stuff that diary items in the press are made of, but the republic's loyal and diligent Opposition was on its feet insisting on the resignation of P. Upendra for perpetuating a "fraud" on the people of India. Again, there is no information whether those demanding the minister's head were rolling in the aisles while raising the serious point of order.

I did catch George Fernandes on Khula Manch having earlier been alerted by the Indian Express that sparks had flown during the programme. No sparks flew during transmission time, instead one was pleasantly surprised to see how mellow and statesman-like our George has become. The burdens of office,. no doubt. Alas, despite its noble intentions the programme itself was rather weak: poorly constructed, badly conceived, erratically compered. (Mr Karan Thapar, a pleasant new face on our screen, has a synthetic combativeness coupled with a tendency towards populism—seeking a vote on the Mandal Commission; asking for an apology from the guest; gimmicks snatched no doubt from David Frost—that must be curbed if the programme is to make any headway.)

Moreover, the pursuit of free and frank dialogue between audience and guest was inhibited by the presence of print journalists, whose attendance gave Khulq Manch the routine question and answer context. The programme, I thought, was devised along the lines of its distinguished predecessor, Janvani. Ministers would be quizzed by the ordinary public while the moderator's role would be clearly restricted to maintaining a modicum of discipline in the studio and ensuring that ministers were pinned down to specifics. Unfortunately, Khula Manch to date has achieved few of its ambitions. It has, of course, received lots of undeserved publicity in the press, much to the delight of the producers who must now feel that they have a winner on their hands. Mr Thapar's numerous interventions amplifying and explaining the censorship charge can only add fuel to the controversy. Meanwhile, the producers will be lulled into the belief that their programme needs no refining. My advice to everyone connected with Khula Manch is to stop giving interviews to the press and to concentrate on tightening the format of what is, by and large, a promising effort—promising by the standards of what we currently see on our screens.

The charge of censorship, nevertheless, is too grave to ignore, especially since Mr George Fernandes has now joined the chorus declaring that "the editing of the programme was not necessary". Thus, an examination of the 18 minutes that were allegedly scissored becomes imperative. Mr Fernandes states that the edited film had his views on Kashmir, Pepsi Cola, the Mandal Commission and the new industrial policy. Mr Thapar sheds more light. He told an evening paper in Bombay that the chopped-off portions "contained some of the most electrifying scenes ever seen on Indian TV. There was so much aggression, quarrels, interruption, heat, excitement... Absolutely riveting".

Well, I am not sure if heat, interruption, quarrels, aggression are essential ingredients for a meaningful encounter during which an invited audience gets cogent replies to pressing daily problems. Mr Thapar must learn to distinguish between knock-about television, which is a variant of the soap opera, and serious television which is usually long on content and short on heat.

I can understand George Fernandes's ire. He is a naturally garrulous man with a wide range of interests and prejudices. Indeed, reserved compartments, platform tickets and rolling stock are probably at the bottom of his intellectual priorities. But that is the job he has been assigned, and by all accounts has thus far acquitted himself with distinction. On Khula Manch, it must be stressed, he was appearing as the minister for railways and he should have restricted himself to that portfolio. Mr Fernandes was not giving a press conference, neither was he participating in a debate on the state of the nation. He had been invited, as had the audience, to answer queries and complaints on the work of his ministry. Any views he may have on the soft drink industry in India or five-star hotels or terrorism in Kashmir were outside the mandate of the programme.

Actually, the responsibility for the digression lies only partially with George. The major share of the blame rests with the producers and presenters of the programme. They should have ensured that all the questions were screened, and those not germane to the Indian Railways barred. I suspect that the producers encouraged the provocative digressions in their eagerness to make sparks fly. If Khula Manch hopes to fulfil any useful social purpose beyond mare-mari, some ground rules will have to be quickly formulated and strictly implemented. After the George Fernandes fiasco, I was glad to see an announcement requesting the public to send in only those questions that fall within the official domain of the person sitting in the hot seat.

P. Upendra may not have been an unqualified success as a minister, but his mischief in Mandi House has been greatly exaggerated

The National Front government has had a terrible beginning. However, its handling of media has been exemplary. The Congress has been circulating all kinds of stories suggesting continuous interference in Doordarshan by P. Upendra. From quietly slipping in NTR films to arbitrarily transferring producers, he is supposed to be the main culprit. The Telugu Desam MP may not have been an unqualified success as minister, but his mischief in Mandi House has been greatly exaggerated. From what one sees on the screen, Doordarshan remains its shoddy self—unprofessional, dull, inept, unimaginative and monumentally boring. However, the kind of distortion, suppression, embellishment and daily PM-darshan, conspicuous during Rajiv Gandhi's reign, is missing.

If anything, the government can be faulted for being too open. Ministers, including the Prime Minister, err on the side of excess when affording access to journalists. I remember the song and dance that was made before an interview with the PM was granted when Sharda Prasad, G. Parthasarthy and Mani Shankar Aiyar used to call the shots. Questions were submitted in advance, meetings were arranged aboard airplanes, cuttings were required to establish credentials, promises of good subsequent behaviour were extracted.

The government is bleeding all over and it gifts new vulnerabilities to the Opposition almost on a weekly basis. With such an embarrassment of riches on hand, it is baffling why Rajiv Gandhi's MPs waste their fire power on non-issues. No Indian voter within reach of a television set is going to believe that P. Upendra and his henchmen are discreetly, but devotedly, turning Doordarshan into a house magazine. As the Devi Lal saga demonstrated, they are letting it all hang out on the screen. You cannot, if you have any sense, accuse the National Front, in the Lok Sabha, of perverting the electronic media when in that very session of Parliament the same government is piloting a bill to free Doordarshan and Akashvani from official control. •

On Khula Manch, George Fernandes was appearing as the minister for railways and he should have restricted himself to that portfolio. But, the responsibility for the digression lies only partially with George. The major share of the blame rests with the producers and the presenters

Doordarshan Pvt.Ltd?

Allowing private enterprise into television may be the only way out

"What you need here is to open up TV broadcasting to private Indian channels...In fact, I have forced an amendment in the Prasar Bharati Bill to bring this about."
Rajiv Gandhi is an interview to SUNDAY.

It was as though Che Guevara had started selling T-shirts in Connaught Place. After years of singing the praises of the public sector and reasserting an obstinate determination to retain governmental control on television, Rajiv Gandhi suddenly did an about turn last month.

In his now-celebrated SUNDAY interview, the former Prime Minister not only declared that he would free Doordarshan from governmental control but also made the extraordinary assertion that he would open the air waves to private enterprise if he had his own way.

Proof that Gandhi was serious came when P. Chidambaram introduced an amendment to the Prasar Bharati Bill, that aimed to translate his leader's rhetoric into reality. Because the Congress(I) does not have a majority in the Lok Sabha, few people expected the amendment to go through.

But Gandhi's resolve was more important as a statement of intent. The Congress(I) is now committed to privatising television if it returns to power—a prospect that nobody can rule out.

It was the introduction of Direct Broadcast TV which prompted Rajiv's announcement. With a direct broadcast satellite scheduled to be stationed overhead in the next year (some satellites are already operational) or so—on which Pakistani interests have bought time—the danger from motivated telecasting is very real. All viewers need in order to watch these programmes is a dish antenna which now costs an exorbitant Rs 1 lakh (approximately) but may soon be available for as low a price as Rs 500.

Doordarshan, according to Gandhi, lacked the credibility to counter the propaganda which would be beamed into Indian homes country-wide. It thus became imperative to open up television to private industry, which would be far more effective in projecting an alternative view.

The reaction to the Congress(I) proposal was muted. Doordarshan producer Vinod Dua, who now works for an Ambani-owned television company, was sceptical about the possibil-

By George!

The censoring of the Khula Manch episode featuring Fernandes draws flak

The idea was to telecast a current affairs programme on the eve of the Prasar Bharati Bill that would beat both Janvani and Newsline. But Khula Manch—the fortnightly interface between a minister and the public, touted out to be the ultimate proof of the Dal government's commitment to television autonomy—turned out to be a complete farce.

Controversies began from the first episode itself featuring finance minister Madhu Dandavate. It was alleged that one of the participants was an actor masquerading as a farmer. Dandavate, however, said that he was satisfied with the way the programme had worked out.

But with the second episode, featuring railways minister George Fernandes, things got worse. Exercising his writ as information and broadcasting minister, P.Upendra gave instructions to hack the programme from the proposed 45 minutes to 30 minutes, giving the go by to Doordarshan's tight scheduling. That the kendra itself was taken by surprise was obvious from the fact that programme listings had been sent out with Khula Manch scheduled for telecast at 10.00 pm and the next programme (the National Programme for Music and Dance) at 10.45 pm.

What made matters particularly suspect was that the crucial 18 minutes edited out contained all the potentially embarrassing questions—on the Pepsi deal, the Mandal Commission and the Kashmir issue—that the outspoken Cabinet minister had chosen to answer. With only 48 minutes shot, leaving three minutes for editing, the viewers were thus left with 30 minutes of questions on the railway ministry alone. In fact, P.Upendra exercised his powers as 'editor' and even hacked questions on the railways, including one asking Fernandes whether he would allow Pepsi to be sold on railway platforms.

Co-presenter of the programme and executive producer of Hindustan Times Television (HTTV), Karan Thapar, said that the minister got in touch with them only on Saturday night, one day before the programme was due for telecast. He cited three reasons for 'editing' the programme: that these shows were designed to be restricted to a ministry; that other ministers might take offence at somebody else commenting on their area of responsibility; and that if every minister was to answer questions on general importance, the programme might as well finish with the first minister. Hence, when Upendra saw the programme one day after it was shot, he, reportedly, brought it up at a Cabinet meeting.

Rajiv Gandhi: advocating revolutionary changes

Ironically, even though the minister was "very agitated" that questions other than those pertaining to railways had been asked, all his queries were discussed before hand at a pre-recording meeting arranged by Doordarshan officials. Yet, Doordarshan's Sarla Thapar and Mrinal Pande, and two other journalists. In fact, veteran journalist Kewal Varma, who was one of the participants in the show, had clarified to Doordarshan that he would be interested only if questions not strictly related to railways were asked. In a letter to Upendra after the telecast, Verma wrote, "I was assured that it was precisely because of that they were inviting me." Despite such assurances, all of Verma's questions were edited out and in a gesture of protest, he returned his cheque of Rs 750 (for appearing on the show) to Doordarshan.

Anchorperson Thapar, while emphatically stating that HTV had nothing to do with Khula Manch beyond presenting the show and advising Doordarshan on the format, said that the participants were justified in "making the boat"

Vinod Dua (right) was sceptical about the possibility of private channels being sanctioned in the near future. Producer Ashok Raina also had his reservations ity of private channels being sanctioned in the near future. Producer Ashok Raina also had his reservations. "It is uncertain whether the Congress(I) will regard private producers as production houses or transmission houses. It is a change of laws for transmission of programmes which is urgently required," he said.

But nobody really disputes that the danger from Direct Broadcast TV is very real. The Asia Satellite I, owned by a Hong Kong company, has already Says Thapar: "For instance, I think that it is perfectly legitimate to ask George Fernandes a question on Kashmir even if he relinquished charge two months ago."

Others obviously feel the same way. In the face of Upendra declaring that he had only edited the programme, not censored it, his Cabinet colleague, George Fernandes went on record to ask that the "whole programme be shown for what it is worth". He added that he had repeatedly told Upendra that the programme should be telecast in its original form. L.K. Advani, BJP supremo, was more emphatic and declared that the entire episode was "absolutely indefensible".

Even while the controversy raged, however, everyone agreed that the programme had enormous potential. "That such a programme has taken place at all is welcome. Even if they have botched up a splendid opportunity," said presenter for countless current affairs programmes on TV, Vinod Dua.

Mandi House: ready for the changes?

Cautioned former I&B minister V.N. Gadgil : "While demanding private channels we have to be alive to its implications. In the West, independent broadcasting has affected the reading habit..."

been commissioned (in April 1990) and covers India, China, Thailand, Pakistan, Korea and Hong Kong. It has as many as 24 responders. There is also the Soviet satellite named GORIZONT, with Asia as its target, which is transmitting CNN (Cable News Network) programmes. Yet another satellite, ARABSAT, is soon to be commissioned.

Indian enthusiasts have already begun beaming in foreign programmes by investing around Rs 1.6 lakhs in a dish antenna. The Hindustan Times Group, the Taj Mahal Hotel and Maurya Sheraton Hotel in Delhi are among those who use this facility. Even in faraway Sikkim, the ruling party uses the antenna to watch foreign shows.

Says Vinod Dua: "There could be developments similar to what happened to radio broadcasting. The introduction of audio cassettes ruined the future of the Vividh Bharati channel within a year. Similarly, Doordarshan will soon face a serious danger from Direct Broadcasting."

Adds Ashok Raina: "The difference is that in the case of radio the signals can be blocked. However, TV signals cannot be jammed and there is no way of stopping foreign programmes. But during the Janata Dal period there is little hope of private channels coming in, if the rigid control over programmes like Khula Manch is any indication."

What contributed to the widespread scepticism was the disappointing nature of the Prasar Bharati Bill. According to the long-awaited autonomy Bill the broadcasting corporation would be totally funded by the government; the existing staff of Doordarshan would continue its employment; and most important, the transmission rights would remain with the government. A far cry from the sky-high expectations that the Dal's post-elections media hype had raised.

But while most private companies are—understandably—enthusiastic about the privatisation proposal, others are more wary. S.S. Gill, former secretary of information and broadcasting, for instance. "Political parties make such promises only when they are out of power," he says. "But it should never be done in India. It will devalue the whole system and will inevitably lead to a commercial mess."

According to Gill, the threat from satellite broadcasting is real, but the exorbitant cost of the antenna will ensure that it never really assumes gargantuan dimensions. "At best, after a few years the cost of the dish would come down to $500. Not any less," he says. "And not too many Indians could afford that price."

Some Congressmen, too, were less than enthused by the way their leader had jumped the gun yet again. Cautioned former information and broadcasting minister, V.N. Gadgil: "While demanding private channels we have to be alive to its implications. Television is a double-edged sword. Even in the West, independent broadcasting has affected the reading habit and the art of conversation and drastically changed social intercourse and the art of political campaigning."

But such fears are not immediate, for the pace at which the Janata Dal government is moving on the matter of television autonomy is sluggish at best. Besides, any privatisation move would involve the amendment of the Indian Telegraph Act, according to which the right of transmission is restricted to the government. According to legal experts, the monopoly the government enjoys over the electronic media would not stand the scrutiny of a court of law. But a major change as this will require time.

Also, the private channel producers would face a tremendous paucity of software and hardware. It has been calculated that if the government conceded to the demand of opening second channels all over the country, the project would consume the entire budget of the information and broadcasting ministry for the next five years. So, the expense incurred in setting up private channels would be prohibitive and it is far more clear whether the private sector would be willing to put in the required resources. Going by the rigid control the Dal government exerts on such current affairs programmes as Khula Manch (see box) it is unlikely that it will be willing to subsidise private enterprise.

So, the Congress(I) remains the best bet for private industry. For, if Rajiv Gandhi does return to power in the mid-term poll everyone is speculating about, he promises to usher in open television. As distinct from the Raja's open government. •

Ritu Sarin/New Delhi

KHUSHWANT SINGH

Afro-Asian saga

In the spring of 1970, I spent a fortnight in Uganda and Kenya at the invitation of a Sikh organisation based in Jinja. Milton Obote was in power. He was said to be a friend of the Asian community but had made it clear to it that they must accept Ugandan nationality or quit. They could not make up their minds. It was a difficult decision to make. Some families had been there for four generations. Almost all the business was in the hands of Asians. Many like the Madhvanis and the Mehtas had become multi-millionaires owning sugar and textile mills, real estate including hundreds of square miles of forest and agricultural land. My host Channan Singh had risen from a carpenter to owning his own spacious bungalow, three cars and a few servants. His friend, Sardar Inder Singh Gill, the richest Sikh in the country, had a mansion overlooking the source of the Nile. He flew me in his own aircraft to see Murchison Falls. They had their own schools, colleges and hospitals. The Aga Khan's followers had their own townships, the neatest in the East African states. The majority of Indians were Gujaratis; the next were Punjabis. There were Hindus, Sikhs and Muslims of different sects: Ismailies, Bohras, Manon, Ithnashas, Shamsis. Though on reasonably friendly terms with each other, there was little real mixing between them. On Guru Nanak's birthday celebrations at Jinja, the procession was led by the Ismaili girls schoolband. The Partition of India had divided the Indian community: Hindus and Sikhs regarded themselves as Indians; Muslims, though the vast majority came from Kutch, felt more sympathetic towards Pakistan. At one point they were of the same opinion: they would not side with the blacks and integrate themselves in African society. I met a couple of young men, born of Indian fathers through black maid servants; they were treated as pariahs. An educated Sikh woman who had taken on an African lover was ostracised by the entire Asian community. The younger lot had started leaving for England, Canada, United States, Australia or New Zealand. Their elders were taking whatever they could out of the country. Many shops in Jinja and Kampala had notices of closing sales; there were few takers for houses and properties owned by Indians—Africans knew they would soon be theirs without having to pay for them. And so it came to be. While Obote was away in Singapore, Idi Amin grabbed power. The first thing he did was to order the Asians out of Uganda. They were lucky to get away with their lives before the blood-thirsty tyrant launched the mass killings of rival tribes and cannibalism. Today, little or nothing remains of the Asian presence in Uganda. The sorry tale is being slowly repeated in Kenya, Tanzania, Zambia and and Mozambique. The Asians of East Africa are now to be met in different parts of the world once again rebuilding their fortunes.

The story of the settlement and diaspora of Asian immigrants had to be told. It has been in an unusually moving saga by one M.G.Vassanji in his first novel, The Gunny Sack. Forty-year-old Vassanji was educated at the Aga Khan Schools in Dar-es-Salam and Tanzania before joining the MIT and later the University of Pennsylvania. He now lives in Toronto. teaching and writing.

When Idi Amin grabbed power, the first thing he did was to order the Asians out of Uganda. They were lucky to get away with their lives from this blood-thirsty tyrant Vassanji is a Shamsi, a small Muslim sect from Kutch still heavily influenced by Hinduism,as names in his family tree and other kinsmen show: Dhanji Govindji, Mitha Kanji, A.A. Raghavji, Ji Bai and others. He starts with his ancestor, Dhanji Govindji who arrives in East Africa before World War I when Germans, Portuguese, Belgians are busy carrying up the African continent between them. Dhanji has a wife away in another town but in order to keep himself warm on winter nights takes an Africal slave girl, Bibi Tarahbu to bed. The author is the great grandson of this Afro-Asian liaison-progeny. The scene moves through different African cities, Mumbasa, Zanzibar, Dar-es-Salam, Nairobi and smaller towns. The Shamsis multiply, make money in their small dukans, which are periodically looted by Africans. And start all over again. The last part tells of the author's attempt to integrate. He joins a volunteer corps. Falls in love with a black girl Amina, a communist who ditches him for a yank. On the rebound, he marries a girl of his own community Zuleikha. They have a child he names Amina after his African sweetheart. Then ditches his wife and child to migrate to the United States, where the African Amina has a jon with the United Nations.

This is an unfairly short summary of a truly great novel written by a gifted writer who combines lyrical descriptions of the countryside with a cartoonist's skill in portraying characters, humour with pathos and tragedy. I haven't read anything so moving in the last many years.

Haryana versus Bengal

Devi Lal's son-rise
Nearly caused V.P.'s fall;
But Jyoti Basu's son-rise
Makes no difference to West Bengal.

(Contributed by Reeten Ganguly, Tezpur) ●

A DANGEROUS PLACE

The CPI(M) brings violence to the streets of Calcutta

So, even Jyoti Basu, West Bengal's bhadralok chief minister, lied for the sake of his party and government. On the evening of 16 August, Basu told stunned newsmen that the 12-hour bandh called by the Congress(I) that day to protest against a sharp hike in transport fares, power cuts and rise in the prices of essential commodities had failed. And, even without batting an eyelid, he went on to congratulate the people of the state for defeating the Congress move.

The perplexed reporters rushed back to their desks and when the dailies front-paged Basu's ridiculous observations, people at first did not know what to make of it. Even the die-hard supporter of the Marxist regime knew that the bandh had been total—that office-goers had not ventured out that day, shops and business establishments remained closed, that empty state transport buses guzzling precious fuel raced along the main thoroughfares while the deserted sidestreets were taken over by children.

Not that Jyoti Basu was unaware that the state was paralysed for 12 hours on 16 August. But he said what he did because he had few other options. The Calcutta bandh, total by any standards, was a blow to his personal prestige. Moreover, it was the first real rebuff the party had received from Calcuttans during its 13 years of uninterrupted rule in the state.

While the success of the bandh jolted the ruling Left Front as a whole, it was a moral defeat for the CPI(M) in particular. The party thought that it would coerce the people into submission by unleashing 3 lakh cadres in the city and its suburbs to keep things moving. But by 9 in the morning of 16 August it became clear that only the CPI(M)'s workers were at large, while the people responded to the Congress(I)'s bandh call and remained indoors.

It is this Red Brigade—like Chautala's Green Brigade—that is proving to be the CPI(M)'s undoing. When it dawned on the comrades that the bandh was going to be a success and that the Congress(I), unlike on previous occasions, had decided to maintain peace, the CPI(M) workers became desperate. They attacked peaceful Congress processions and beat up several Congress(I) leaders. Of them, the assault on Mamata Banerjee, a former MP, was brutal and murderous. The vociferous former MP repeatedly clubbed on the head by baton-wielding CPI(M) activists till she collapsed with blood gushing from her split scalp.

VIVEK DAS

Jyoti Basu: presiding over violence and lawlessness

Not far away, in another south Calcutta area, INTUC chief Subrata Mukerjee was chased by CPI(M) workers with lethal weapons. His bodyguard, a plain-clothes policeman, told newsmen later that the attackers would have killed Mukherjee had he not brandished his service revolver. In fact, the policeman regretted that no cops in uniform came to his help.

And the ritualistic beating up of photographers continued. Four lensmen who tried to click Mamata Banerjee being assaulted were thrashed up. Of them, Tarapada Banerjee of Anandabazar Patrika had to be hospitalised with multiple fractures.

ASHOKE MAJUMDAR

ASHOKE MAJUMDAR

'adre raj: Mamata Banerjee being assaulted by Laloo Alam and his men; (top right) CPI(M) cadres and policemen n the streets of Howrah on the bandh day; (below) armed Marxist cadres intimidating voters during the municipal polls

The only saving grace was that Jyoti Basu was honest enough to admit hat CPI(M) workers were behind the iolence. But not all his party colleagues were as candid. Minister for nformation and cultural affairs, Buddhadev Bhattacharya, for instance, vas conspicuous by his absence at the ress conference Basu held at the end f the day. The minister, who many eel is being groomed as Basu's successor, is usually by the chief minister's ide whenever Basu meets the press, nd rumours doing the rounds is that Bhattacharya was against owning responsibility for the violence. He vanted the attacks on the Congressnen, particularly that on Mamata Banerjee, to be portrayed as inter-arty clashes so as to shift a part of the lame on the Congress(I)'s shoulders.

Basu expressed righteous indignaion over the acts of violence. "The olice should have arrested the culrits at once," he said, even while knowing full well why they didn't. The chief minister, who holds the home portfolio as well, is aware that the police force in the state has been thoroughly politicised with the seniors taking instructions from Alimuddin Street, the CPI(M) party headquarters in Calcutta. In such a state of affairs, it would be ridiculous to assume that the cops would lay their hands on ruling party activists.

What is striking is that days before the attack, Mamata Banerjee had told people that a conspiracy was being hatched to kill her. She had incurred the CPI(M)'s wrath by organising agitations, which often took a violent turn, against the rise in bus and tram fares in the state. She said she had even been cautioned by a police officer to be on her guard.

Soon after the bandh, Calcutta Police sources said that there was indeed a method in the madness and that the attacks were all pre-planned. The simultaneous assaults on different Congress(I) processions in various parts of Calcutta and the calculated way in which the leaders were isolated from their supporters and made the targets, could in no way be coincidental.

Given the CPI(M)'s remarkable ability to brush things under the carpet, the culprits this time too may have gone undetected and the police would have made things appear to be in order by making a couple of routine arrests. But such possibilities were frustrated by lensman Parthasarathi Sengupta. Almost all leading dailies of the city published his photographs the following day, clearly identifying the attackers.

And one of those who brutally assaulted Mamata Banerjee was the CPI(M)'s dreaded muscle-man, Laloo Alam. He is the brother of the party's Calcutta district committee member Badshah Alam, a protege of information minister Bhattacharya.

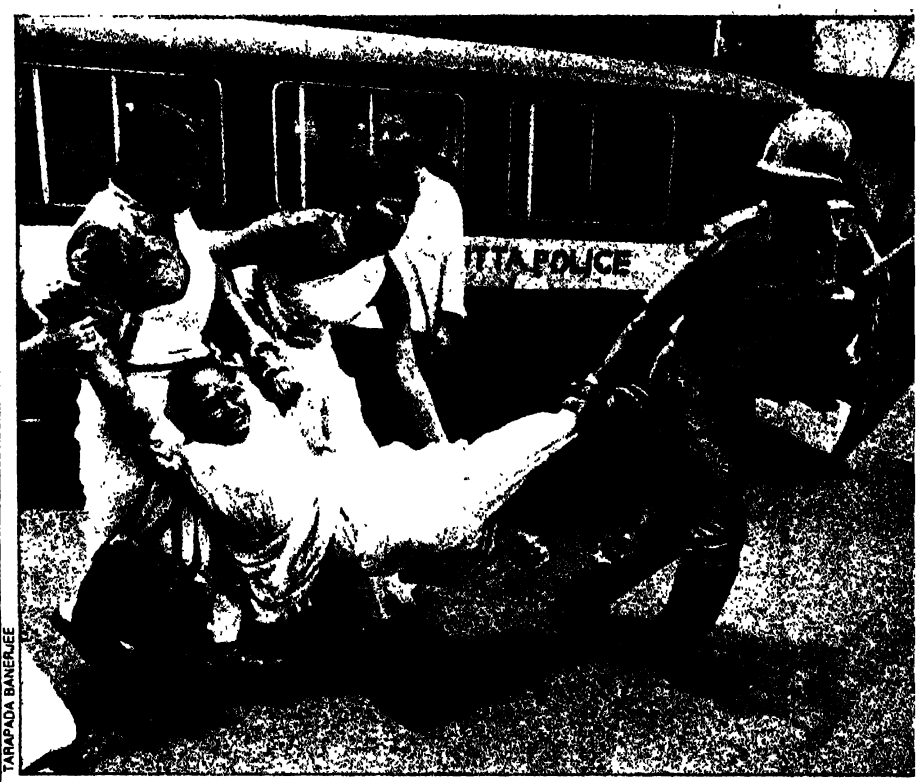
This time there was no way the CPI(M) bigwigs could call the photographs "doctored" or "rigged" as they had done after newspapers published pictures of toughs romping about with daggers and revolvers during the Calcutta Municipal Corporation elections in June. Non-partisan observers felt that the election was largely rigged, but the CPI(M) daily, Ganashakti, created a gaffe by identifying the men in the photographs as Congress(I) workers, and even printed their names and addresses. Ultimately the move backfired.



There was no way out for Laloo Alam, a man who epitomises the present-day CPI(M) cadre. On 17 August, he was arrested on charges of attempted murder and held in police custody. Laloo Alam, alias Mehabublal, is well-connected. By virtue of being the brother of Badshah Alam, who happens to be the son-in-law of the veteran CPI(M) leader Sadhan Gupta, Laloo claims personal links with the party's top brass. He shot into prominence during the parliamentary elections last November. On the day of polling, Laloo was out on the streets, preventing voters from approaching a polling booth in a south Calcutta constituency.

The voters appealed to the police for help, but the cops looked the other way. Naresh Chaturvedy, the then special secretary, department of home, was witness to the goings-on. He lodged a strong complaint and an indignant Basu ordered Alam's arrest. But he successfully eluded the police. Later, a CPI(M) leader admitted: "When we came to know that Jyoti Basu was making enquiries about Laloo, we helped him to go underground."

Ironically enough, Laloo started his career in politics with the Congress. In the infamous 1972 Assembly elections in which the Congress, under Siddhartha Shankar Ray's leadership, staged one of the biggest electoral farces in independent India, Laloo was a seasoned Congress campaigner.

In 1987, he decided to don new colours. The Congressman became a comrade, realising that the CPI(M)-led Left Front wouldn't be easily dislodged. Since then, Laloo Alam gradually emerged as the CPI(M)'s most dependable stormtrooper in south and central Calcutta, where his name became synonymous with terror.

No one would say what Laloo's fate within the party would now be. Even Young Turk Biman Bose, the party's conscience keeper, would not commit himself on the possibilities of Laloo's expulsion. But Badshah Alam was livid with rage when he heard that his brother was arrested. On 18 August, Badshah went to Bhawanipore police station and threatened the officer in charge with dire consequences.

TARAPADA BANERJEE

Popular stir: cops drag away a Congress activist in Calcutta: (right) violence during the Calcutta civic polls

RASHBEHARI DAS

Buddhadev Bhattacharya: differences with the chief minister

The police could have arrested Badshah Alam under Section 506 of the Indian Penal Code for threatening a government servant. But they wouldn't dare to do such a thing. As a district committee member of the CPI(M), Badshah was too powerful and therefore perhaps above the law. Calcutta's police commissioner, B.K. Saha, who has perfected the art of seeing nothing and hearing nothing, said that he had no knowledge of Badshah's malevolence. But the home secretary, Manish Gupta, sought an explanation from the police, wanting to know why Badshah wasn't arrested. Political observers believe that Gupta's action followed the chief minister's directions, because the home secretary would not have dared to suggest police action against information minister Bhattacharya's blue-eyed boy.

But perhaps it is beyond Basu's power to stem the rot any more. The party, it seems, has drifted far too much from its ethical and ideological moorings to care for political civilities. At the grassroots level, it is the likes of Laloo Alam who are in command. It is they who are responsible for preserving and expanding the party's vote bank, and ensuring victory in electoral battles. In return, they are given a free hand to 'tax' the people in the best manner possible.

The truth is that the power centre is shifting from Writers' Buldings—the seat of the government in West Bengal—to the party offices and it is the local toughs who are increasingly moulding the party. There was a time when ministers dispensed favours; now a cadre does the same thing, thanks to the CPI(M)'s way of decentralising power.

Today, a party activist can achieve the impossible and it is him one must approach to get things done. He can make files move in government offices, arrange for beds in overcrowded hospitals, secure bank loans, procure permits, shield rapists, murderers, hoarders, blackmarketeers and can even help you to jump the queue at the crematorium. But he charges a price for everything he does and makes sure that he gets what he wants in cash or kind. But cadres—as Biman Bose reminded the city people—are "disciplined party workers". And just as well. He doesn't work entirely to line his own pocket, but shares the spoils with the party, which has become conspicuously rich over the years it has been in power.

Initially, Jyoti Basu himself was averse to unleashing cadres to counter the Congress(I)'s bandh call. When transport minister Shyamal Chakravarty mooted the idea, Basu dismissed it, arguing that the challenge would be tackled administratively. But pressure from his partymen made him go along with the majority decision.

The Left Front's other partners—the RSP, CPI and the Forward Bloc—had also opposed the idea at a meeting of the Front. They feared that the move would be construed as an administrative failure and spark off widespread violence. But having committed himself to his party, the chief minister refused to change his mind. And, when his allies persisted, Basu, in a fit of anger, declared: "As long as I am here the cadres will be used."

The unseemly incidents on the bandh day indicated that the CPI(M)'s tactics were flawed. On 18 August, Basu held a meeting with the party's district committee secretaries of Howrah, Hooghly, North 24-Paraganas and Nadia where he admitted that people's discontent was increasing and suggested that the party must do some soul-searching to understand the causes of the popular disaffection. While Biman Bose and the CPI(M) state secretary Sailen Dasgupta openly condemned the attack on the Congress(I) leaders by their own boys, Jyoti Basu warned that it would be difficult for the Left Front to return to power in future if the CPI(M) failed to heed the warnings.

With the events on the bandh day proving them right, CPI and RSP leaders renewed their criticism of the CPI(M)'s policies. In an unprecedented move, the CPI called for a bilateral dialogue with the CPI(M) to air its views on the state's problems, for it felt that the Front's meetings had been reduced to a "farce". On 22 August, the party's state unit virtually assumed the role of an Opposition party by submitting a memorandum to chief minister Basu, detailing the causes behind the people's growing disenchantment with the Left Front.

Perhaps it is beyond Jyoti Basu's power to stem the rot any more. The CPI(M) has drifted far too much from its ethical and ideological moorings to care for political civilities

With the CPI daring to speak up, the RSP followed suit. Debabrata Bandyopadhyay, the RSP minister in the state Cabinet, met Basu on 23 August to say that there were gross anomalies in the fare structure of buses in the districts and that the people had genuine reasons to feel sore.

While the Left Front's misadventure with cadres has virtually put the Marxists on the defensive, the Congress(I) has bounced back into reckoning. The party had been slowly emerging from the cold since the district civic body elections in May, in which it bagged far more seats than was expected. Then came the Calcutta Municipal Corporation polls in which the party acquired a martyred image following allegations that the elections were heavily rigged by the Marxists. But what really breathed life into an organisation that till recently looked moribund was the hike in the transport charges. While agitations launched by the Congress(I) and some left forces outside the government such as the SUCI, the IPF and several Naxalite groups had failed to cut much ice in the past, this time around they appear to have touched the right chord.

An emboldened Congress(I) has, therefore, planned a major show of strength in early September. Around the second week of this month, the party plans to carry out what it calls the "siege of Writers' Buildings" by bringing in about ten lakh supporters from the districts. Throwing a challenge to Jyoti Basu, state Congress(I) president A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury said: "An awakening of the people has begun in the state. If Jyoti Basu has the courage let him seek a fresh mandate on issues like the fare hike, rising prices, atrocities on women and the growing clout of anti-social elements. If the elections are free and fair, we'll know what the people want."

So, come September and Calcutta might be rocked by another bout of violence. But, hopefully, the next time the CPI(M) will have the gumption to rely on the administration and will not let lose the Red Brigade on its political adversaries.●

Anish Gupta/Calcutta

RAVI SHANKAR

"Sometimes the best kind of party is when the guest list totals two."

DIGJAM
Suitings for the Connoisseur

Pulling a fast one

Jayalalitha turns the tables on her party rebels and the DMK government

Jayalalitha Jayaram has the uncanny knack of bouncing back just when her critics tend to write her off. Ever since the death of her mentor, M.G. Ramachandran, the AIADMK has undergone numerous splits, Jayalalitha has threatened to quit politics at least twice and the Assembly elections last year all but sealed the fate of a party that was once considered invincible. But just when the AIADMK had been relegated to the footnotes of history, Jayalalitha struck back in style. Of course, the ruling DMK government has to a large extent contributed in keeping the Jayalalitha factor alive in Tamil Nadu politics.

Only recently, the lady was in the dumps. Party rebels led by the fiery Thirunavukarasu had come out strongly against her leadership. The group even managed to wean away three MLAs from the Jayalalitha camp, stripping the AIADMK of the status of the main Opposition party in the state Assembly. Emboldened by their success, the rebels tried to attempt something adventurous, which ultimately proved disastrous.

Claiming that they now represented the "actual" AIADMK, Thirunavukarasu and company tried to storm the party headquarters in Madras on 12 August. The operation was reminiscent of the one attempted by Jayalalitha in January 1988, when the lady along with her followers tried to wrest control of the building from the Janaki Ramachandran faction of the AIADMK. Incidentally, Thirunavukarasu was in Jayalalitha's camp at that time.

The operation was meticulously planned this time. But as luck would have it, Jayalalitha's supporters got wind of Thirunavukarasu's plans and jammed the party building from the morning of 12 August. A large posse of policemen were also present. The rebels came in a group and were startled to find Jayalalitha's men blocking the entrance. A free-for-all followed. At the end of it all, over a dozen members from both the sides were injured and around 50 supporters from either side were detained by the cops. Later, Jayalalitha alleged that Thirunavukarasu was helped by the police all along, who had orders from chief minister Karunanidhi to side with the rebel AIADMK group.

Such an allegation wouldn't have gone down with the people had the DMK kept out of what was surely an internal matter of the AIADMK. But the ruling party seniors were bent on teaching Jayalalitha a lesson. Soon after the scuffle, the police sealed the AIADMK party headquarters and handed over the keys to an executive magistrate, who was asked by the government to examine the claims of the rival groups.

From then on, it was Jayalalitha's show all the way. Immediately after hearing that her party members had been arrested by the police, she drove to the police station and demanded that they be released. "I will not move from this place until you release my men," she told the officer on duty. Realising the gravity of the situation, the police officer got in touch with the city police commissioner, Rajasekhar-

MUTHU KUMARAN

Crowds outside Jayalalitha's Poes Garden house: back in the limelight an Nair. "I will have to consult my superior. I will get back to you in ten minutes," Nair told the AIADMK supremo over the telephone. An outraged Jayalalitha shot back: "Yes, I can see that your inspector wants to consult you and now you want to consult someone else. I know who that someone is. He is the chief minister. You can do as you like but till then I am not moving from here."

MUTHU KUMARAN

By then, hundreds of Jayalalitha supporters had gathered outside the police station. The crowd even stoned several state transport buses and many shops in Madras promptly downed their shutters. Nair soon contacted Jayalalitha and informed her that the police were releasing her supporters on bail. Jayalalitha returned home—triumphant and satisfied.

The matter did not end there as Jayalalitha would not let the opportunity go by to launch a comeback. On the evening of 12 August, she announced her decision to go on a fast-to-death till the keys of the party office were returned to her. "There is a Supreme Court interim order which gave me possession of the building. By attempting to break into the office, Thirunavukarasu and his men have committed contempt of court," Jayalalitha thundered, adding, "The DMK government should also be punished because their police helped the rebel group to break into the building and for arresting my supporters."

Interestingly enough, the government as well as the AIADMK rebels seemed ignorant of the Supreme Court interim order. On learning of it, the police commissioner issued a statement saying that it was not the cops, but someone else who had actually locked the AIADMK party office. Since in the confusion it was not possible to find out who had actually done it, the keys of the building were handed over to a magistrate. Thirunavukarasu, too, promptly changed his stance. On 12 August, he had alleged that he and his men were beaten up by Jayalalitha's supporters while attempting to enter the party headquarters. Now, he said that the scuffle actually took place outside the office premises. Countered a Jayalalitha faction leader, "Everyone present there at that time saw what happened. The rebel group did storm into the building and clash with us." Whatever be the truth, the fact remains that Jayalalitha did manage to exploit the controversy to her advantage. And by the time she called off the hunger strike precisely 36 hours after she started it, Jayalalitha had managed to discredit both the DMK and her party rebels.

But the Thirunavukarasu group did make a last ditch attempt to save the day. During all this drama in Madras, S. Madhavan, a Rajya Sabha member and a prominent leader of the Jayalalitha faction, was significantly absent from the scene of action. The rebel group quickly made an issue out of this. Its leaders organised press conferences where they asked: "Why was Madhavan absent? Has he run away with the money paid by Karunanidhi?"

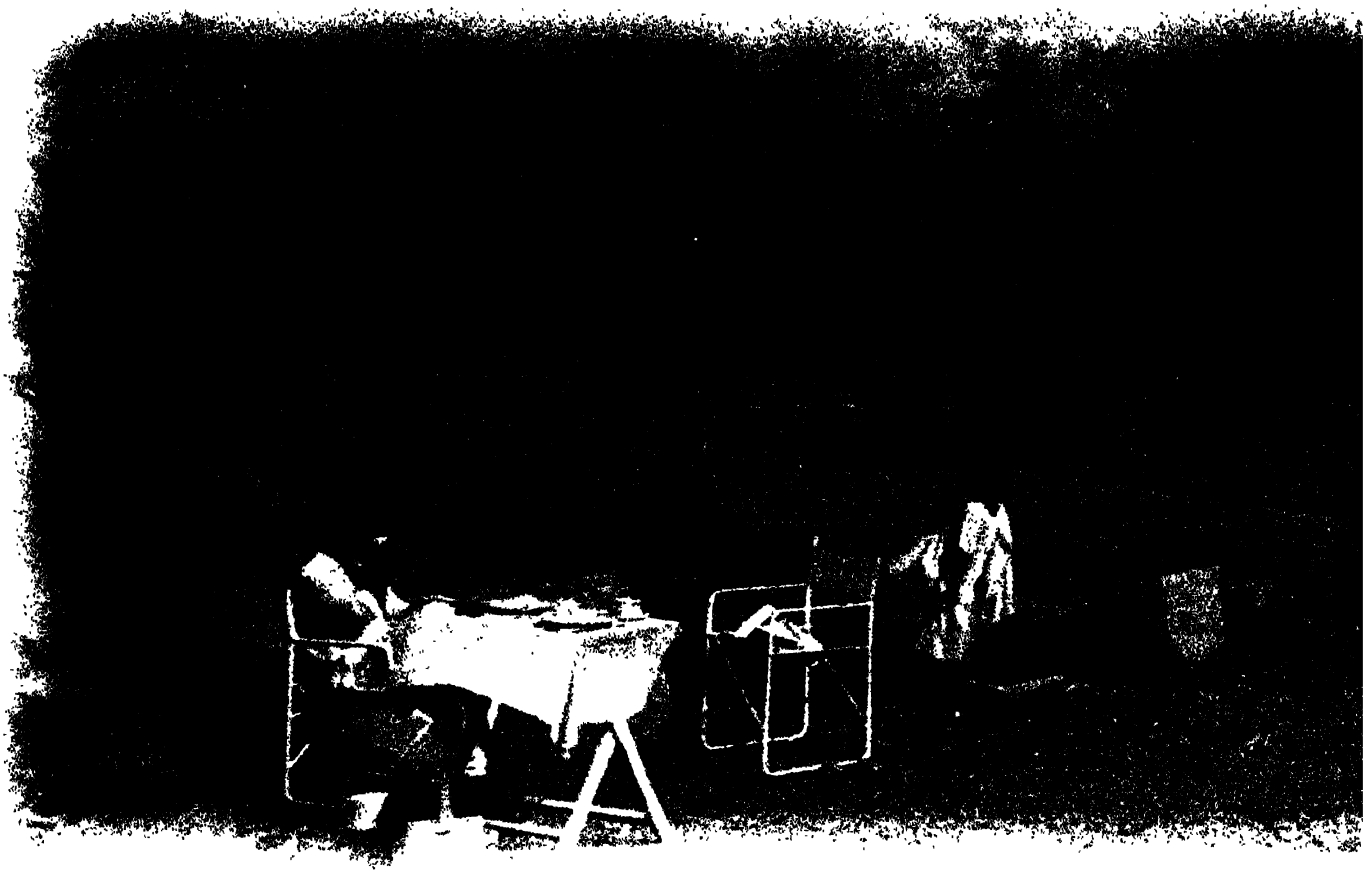
The rebels followed this up with another round of fasting, ostensibly to focus public attention on the party office dispute. The crowds that watched Thirunavukarasu lying on a bed was nowhere near what Jayalalitha managed to attract.

As for chief minister Karunanidhi, he must be cursing himself for getting involved in the AIADMK party affairs. Sources close to veteran DMK leaders said that many partymen had advised Karunanidhi not to get into a confrontation with Jayalalitha unnecessarily and had even told him to buy peace with the AIADMK chief. Their argument was that Jayalalitha was a spent force and would fade away soon. But the chief minister obviously wanted to demonstrate his might—and in the process revived Jayalalitha's sagging political fortunes.

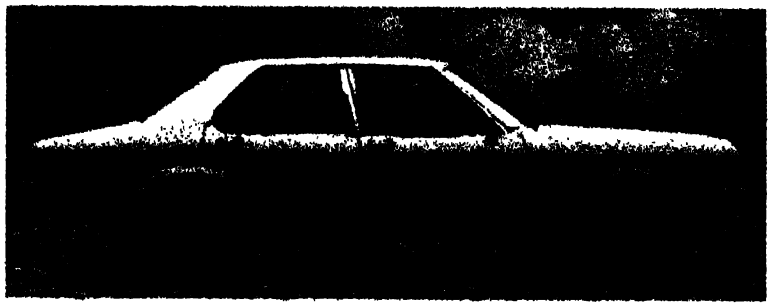
On earlier occasions too, it was the DMK which helped Jayalalitha to remain on the centrestage of the state's politics. In 1989, at a time when the lady was sulking, DMK members assaulted her inside the Assembly—something which brought a divided AIADMK solidly behind Jayalalitha. The Congress, too, sided with the AIADMK on the issue, greatly embarrassing the DMK.

The mood at Jayalalitha's Poes Garden residence is upbeat. And the lady is smiling these days. •

R. Bhagwan Singh/Madras

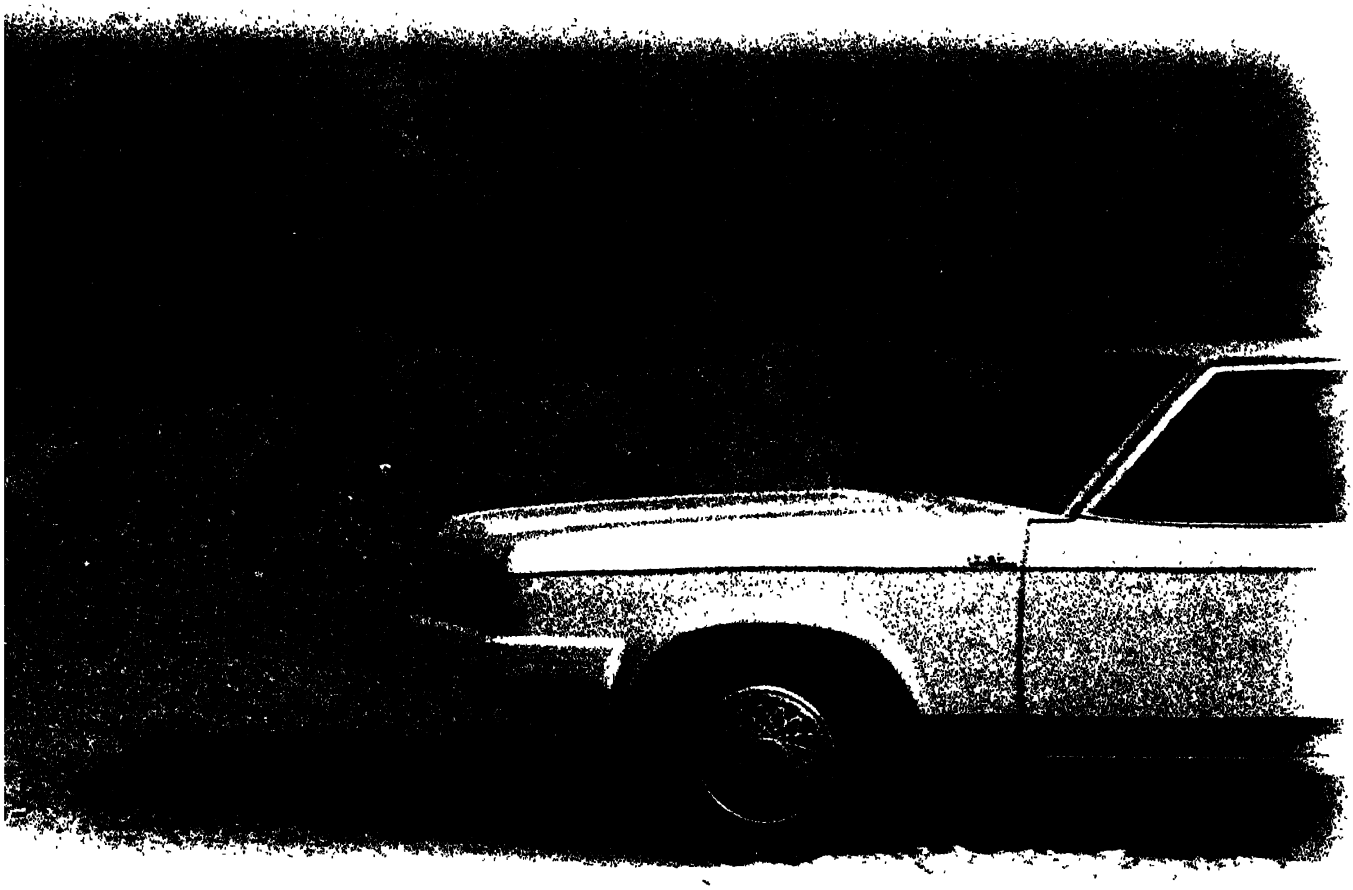


Jayalalitha fasting to protest against the DMK helping her party rebels: a huge success



Chief minister and DMK supremo Karunanidhi wanted to demonstrate his might but ended up reviving the sagging political fortunes of the AIADMK chief, Jayalalitha

A car for those who have outgrown the



Contract HM 22160A

Accessories shown in the picture
are not part of standard equipment.

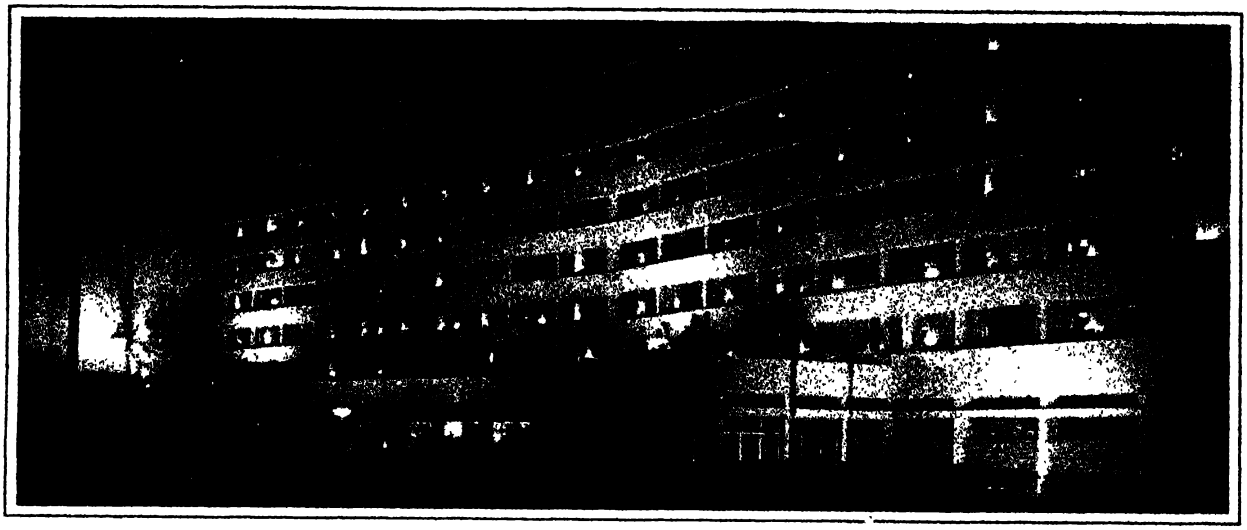
A Limousine to every other car excitement of touring the cocktail circuit.

To people who are a trifle bored of clinking glasses, and making polite conversation, the Contessa Classic offers an intoxicating escape route.

A fuel efficient 1.8 litre Isuzu engine helps place vast distances between them and the maddening crowd.

Five forward gears, including an overdrive, smoothly raise the speedometer to 120 km per hour.

An impressively responsive steering places them in complete control of any situation.



Power disc brakes help stop them in their tracks — safely and smoothly.

And, of course, a plush interior, an independent suspension and air conditioning are enough to give you a high of a totally different kind.

But there's really much more to the Contessa. So why not get in touch with us.

And taste a heady mix of refined luxury and raw power —poured into a car.

Contessa
Classic 1·8 GL

Ashok and Radisson offer you new standards of world class hospitality at Bangalore

Radisson Hotels Corporation with its dynamism, its philosophy 'Yes I can' is the fastest growing hospitality group in the world, with hotels at 240 locations.

Ashok now joins hands with Radisson to bring you the finest international hospitality at Bangalore and three other places in the country. With a new work culture, a new ethos to ensure even greater consumer satisfaction.

Other Ashok Radisson Hotels: Ashok Hotel, New Delhi, an affiliate of Radisson Hotels Corporation; Ashok Radisson Lalitha Palace Hotel, Mysore; Ashok Radisson Beach Resort, Kovalam.

Ashok Radisson Hotel, Bangalore

Kumara Krupa High Grounds,
Bangalore 560001 Tel: 269462, 269482
Cables: ASHOKOTEL Telex: 0845-2433 ASOK IN
Fax: 260033

VISIT INDIA
YEAR

AKSHARA/ITDC 210

INDIA'S HOST TO THE WORLD

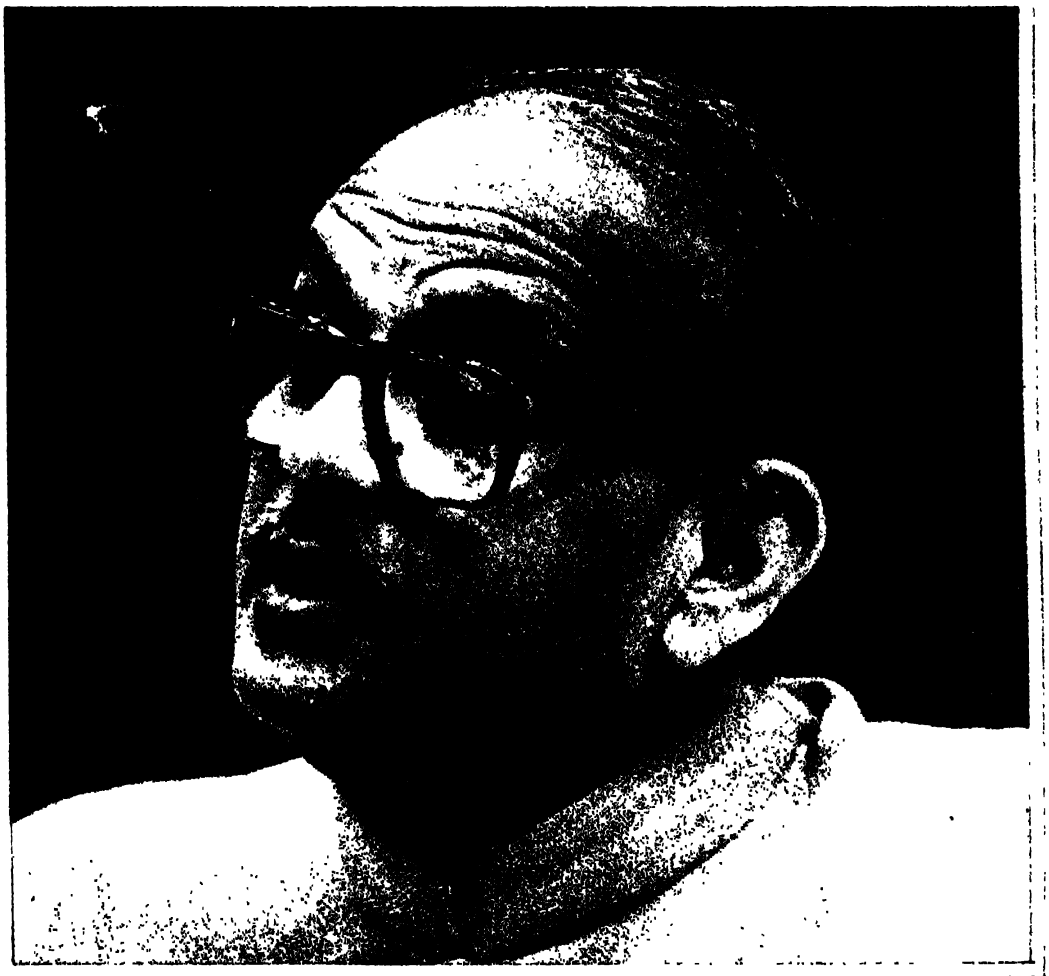
CHAMELEON

From Mr Clean to Mr Caste in four easy weeks

It was Winston Churchill who when asked about the shifts in his political career blustered: "Consistency is the virtue of donkeys." But the slogan could fit Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh's style just as well.

Eight months into his term, the Raja has revealed himself to be a radically different person from the man who went before the country last autumn and asked for a mandate against the corruption of the Rajiv Gandhi regime.

The V.P. Singh of 1989 was the Great Conciliator, a leader who was determined to knit every opposing faction into a patchwork coalition that would provide the country with a unique brand of consensus politics.



When he was insulted—as he frequently was, by the likes of Chandra Shekhar—he would turn the other cheek. When his critics alleged that he had no clear-cut policies, he would say that contradictions had to be managed and that complex problems required complex responses. If he was asked to take a decision he would ask for time to consult his colleagues.

For the first few months of his reign, Vishwanath Pratap Singh the Prime Minister was not very different from V.P. Singh the Opposition leader. He still talked in terms of consensus argued that the solution to such problems as Punjab was a dose of love and affection, and hammered away at the corruption issue on which he had made his national reputation.

But then, around four weeks ago, he suddenly had a change of heart. Gone was the dithering, spotlessly clean consensus manager of old. In his place stood the classic cow-belt demagogue.

It is fashionable now to claim that V.P. Singh shed his skin on nationwide television during his Independence Day address at the Red Fort. But the change had begun even earlier.

Ever since Devi Lal resigned over Meham I, the Raja's cheer-leaders in

Even if the Raja thinks better of going to the country, there is no way his government can survive beyond 1991. And by the end of that year, his reputation is certain to be in tatters

MID-COURSE CORRECTION

THE OLD V.P. SINGH

THE NEW V.P. SINGH

Idol of the middle classes.	1	Supports reservation, an idea hated by the middle classes.
National leader.	2	Concerns limited to the Hindi belt.
Ambivalent on Ram Janmabhoomi.	3	Backs Mulayam Singh's anti-VHP position.
Obsessed with corruption enquiries.	4	Does not mention them now.
Fought for liberal industrial policy.	5	Now backs a regressive caste-based reservation scheme.
Seen as weak and indecisive.	6	Acted firmly in dismissing Devi Lal.

the media had urged him to fire his deputy prime minister. Such a move, they argued, would demonstrate that he had the strength to face down an obstreperous colleague and therefore, win him the renewed admiration of the nation.

V.P. Singh refused to take their advice, believing that to do so would be to divide the party. So, a compromise was engineered and Devi Lal withdrew his resignation. Then, far from facing him down, V.P. Singh actually negotiated a deal with the Chaudhary that guaranteed both men a quiet life and gave Om Prakash Chautala a second shot at the chief ministership of Haryana.

When the deal came unstuck (largely because of Arun Nehru), V.P. Singh once again refused to take on Devi Lal and instead of asking for his deputy's resignation, volunteered his own. The National Front presidium was convened again, like some jet-set village panchayat, and the Prime Minister and his deputy reconciled with the commerce minister.

So when Arun Nehru forced a new confrontation over Devi Lal, the betting was that V.P. Singh would manipulate his way towards a compromise. The Raja did everything to encourage that view. He told the Janata Dal's Political Affairs Committee (PAC) that no "precipitate action" should be taken and urged restraint.

Five hours after that PAC meeting ended, he dismissed Devi Lal. The President was informed that the Prime Minister did not want the Tau in his Cabinet and the Chaudhary was not even allowed the honourable option of resigning, he was sacked.

That—and not the Independence Day speech—was the first sign that V.P. Singh had changed his style.

Why did V.P. Singh do it? Surely, he must have known that no government could hope to last for five years with such powerful enemies as a bitter Chandra Shekhar and a wounded Tau?

The only answer that makes any sense is this: he knew that he only had a few months to go before he called an election. While it is folly for a Prime Minister who hopes to last the full stretch to antagonise Devi Lal, it makes perfect sense for a political leader who wishes to go to the polls to indulge in a crowd-pleasing display of political muscle. Compromise is the way to survive in the long run; confrontation is a means of seeming decisive in the short term.

Everything V.P. Singh has done since then has tended to confirm this impression. The decision to implement the Mandal Commission report came as a total surprise, there had been no mention of it in the Dal's manifesto. The Raja must have known that it would lead to blood in the streets and to social war. He is bright enough to also recognise that the way ahead for India in today's fast moving world does not lie in playing caste politics in the cow belt or in reserving

If V.P. Singh doesn't call an election now, Rajiv Gandhi will find the time he needs to get his comeback organised. With the Raja abandoning corruption as an issue, Rajiv's position is bound to get stronger more jobs for backward communities.

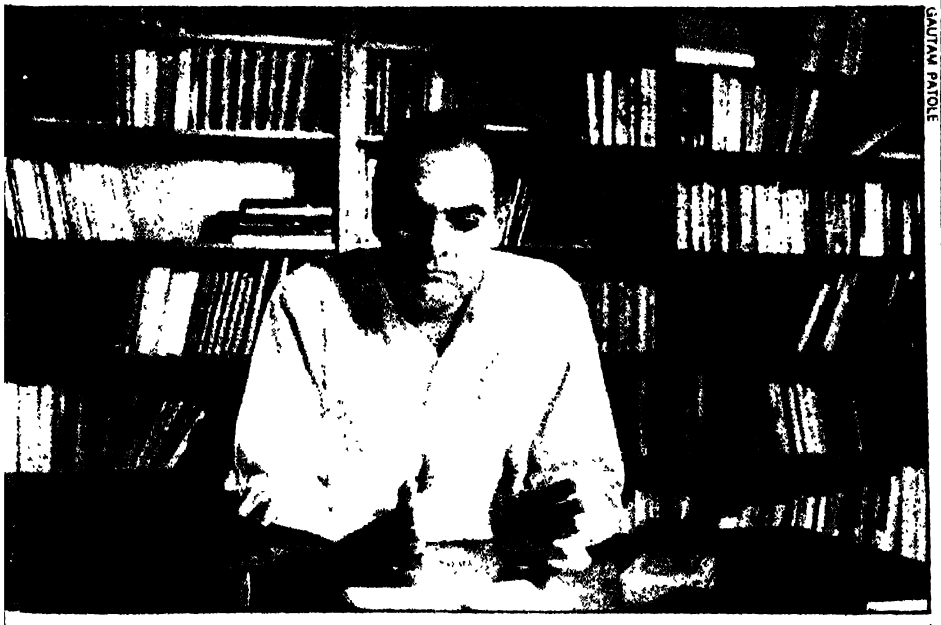
Once again, there can be only one reason for going ahead anyway: as an election stunt. In January 1991, nobody will have had to face the disastrous economic consequences of the Mandal recommendations and in the short term, V.P. Singh will -if his reasoning holds- have emerged as the champion of the backward classes.

So, by the time the Prime Minister arrived at the Red Fort for his Independence Day speech, he had already transformed himself. He had abandoned the moral high ground he had occupied during the 1989 election and had bolted towards the ballot box

Why has V.P. Singh dumped his old middle class constituency and recast himself? Nobody really understands the labyrinthine workings of the Raja's mind, but the following reasons must have had something to do with it.



- Inflation still rages unchecked. With the oil crunch, it will get worse. Rising prices tend to anger middle class voters, so V.P Singh would probably have lost a large chunk of this segment anyway.
- Corruption is a vote-winning issue only when you are in the Opposition. The Raja had counted on dramatic revelations that would destroy Rajiv Gandhi's political career. These have not been forthcoming. So, V.P. Singh would have had to find a new issue to court the middle class with. And there aren't too many of those around.
- Central to his appeal to the middle class was his image as a saintly, other-worldly figure. Over the last few months, he has faced an unpleasant trade-off. To keep the Janata Dal intact, he needs to manipulate. But to retain middle class support, he must pretend to be uninterested in power.

It is, therefore, much simpler for him to dispense with middle class support entirely and to revert to the image he had before 1985: as an ambitious, Hindi-belt politician.

- There is no way the Dal government can last its full term. The allies will not let it survive that long and its internal tensions will pull it apart anyway. So, it is much better to go for a poll before one is forced on the regime. And as the old slogans about corruption won't work this time, he needs a Unique Selling Proposition.

V.P. Singh's supporters feel that he now has Bihar and UP wrapped up. They think that the National Front will probably gain an overall majority on its own.

In fact, this is less than certain. The key assumption is that the backwards in those two crucial Hindi-belt states (Bihar and UP) will vote solely on the basis of the Mandal Commission proposals. But in the run-up to the election, much else could happen. If the law and order situation continues to slide out of control because of Mandal-related violence and if Mulayam Singh Yadav's anti-Vishwa Hindu Parishad stand leads to riots over Ram Janmabhoomi, then the Congress might well make stability its election plank. With Punjab and Kashmir in flames, a retread of the 1984 election

GAUTAM PATOLE

V.P. SINGH IN THE EIGHTIES

More avatars than caps

1980-81

Sanjay-man: Candidate of the Thakur lobby as chief minister of Uttar Pradesh.

1981-84

Indira loyalist: UP CM/commerce minister/UPCC chief. Played the party man.

1985-87

Mr Clean: Rajiv Gandhi's right-wing, super honest finance minister.

1987-89

Leftist crusader: In Opposition, he called the left his natural allies and campaigned against corruption.

Dec. 1989-July 1990

National leader: For eight months, played the great reconciliator and managed the Janata Dal's contradictions.

Aug. 1990—

Cow-belt demagogue: Pins his hopes on a caste-coalition in the Hindi belt.

Over the next two months, Devi Lal intends to tour the country to whip up Jat/kisan support and remind his supporters that their loyalty is to him personally and not to the party he is a member of at present campaign might well lead to a significant increase in the Congress vote.

Moreover, there is still the Chandra Shekhar factor to contend with. As our interview with him (see box) indicates, he is unwilling to rule out a deal with the Congress. Even if a breakaway Dal faction does not form the next government and Parliament is dissolved, Shekhar and the Tau might decide to fight the election on their own. That would almost certainly split the Dal vote in UP and Bihar and might give the Congress the edge, particularly if there are no seat adjustments with the BJP.

As is obvious from the interview, Shekhar hates V.P. Singh. He will do anything to stop him.

Even, let Rajiv Gandhi in.

Three months ago, SUNDAY called V.P. Singh the Indian political phenomenon of his generation. We listed his many successive avatars and commented on his ability to spring surprises. He was, we suggested, the X factor in Indian politics. A man whose actions were so unpredictable that all rational expectations were undermined by his manoeuvrings.

The decision to recast himself as the champion of the backwards tends to prove the point. At a stage when the old avatar seemed to be running out of time, V.P. Singh has suddenly changed the rules of the game.

But will the gamble work? There is

"V.P. Singh is either a hypocrite or a dunce"

Chandra Shekhar on the prospects of a split in the Janata Dal

SUNDAY: Let me tell you about a scenario that is being talked about in Delhi. V.P. Singh announces election; then, 70-80 MPs say they don't want an early election and approach you to become Prime Minister...

Chandra Shekhar: In that case, there can't be any election

Exactly. But because the PM has already resigned in anticipation of an election, the President calls the leader of the Opposition to see if he can form a government. Rajiv Gandhi says no, but agrees to support a ministry headed by Chandra Shekhar.

Let such a situation arise, then I will answer that question. If the leader of the Opposition makes such a suggestion, then I will give my reaction to that.

This is all speculation.

So you are not ruling out that scenario?

But there is no compulsion on me. I see no reason why I should answer this question.

I can't answer questions where the moves of a hundred other people are involved.

I'll rephrase the question. Would you agree to become Prime Minister if you were elected leader of a faction of the Janata Dal and were then supported from outside by the Congress?

But I haven't been elected leader of such a party. So how can I presume?

So you are going to avoid ruling out this scenario?

The leader of the party is not elected by surmises.

Suppose you became the leader of your party and had to face elections. Would you raise the money that was required from industrialists?

No, that's not necessary. I would just turn to the middle class. There are thousands of people in this country who would give donations of a few hundreds

RAJESH KUMAR

But is it possible in today's political system for a politician to survive without taking money?

That is true. I said that in 1977-78.

Nobody can give more than Rs 100 unless he has black money. But who can contest an election with Rs 20,000 or Rs 30,000?

Even today, however, the minimum election cost is in Ballia (Chandra Shekhar's constituency). The people there don't know how to use money (laughs).

Doesn't this constant raising of money make it difficult for a politician to remain entirely clean?

If you take small amounts, then it is all right. It is taking large amounts that is bad.

Like if you take Rs 20,000, 50,000 or even a lakh, the man will not expect that he can dictate to you. But if you take Rs 50 lakhs or a crore, then you are in trouble.

But the Janata Dal does raise money. Take the expenditure on the Allahabad byelection, for instance.

I don't want to comment on that.

Why not? Everybody agrees that a lot of money was spent.

But he (V.P. Singh) insists that he does not know how much money was spent (laughs).

All I can say is that he is either a hypocrite or a dunce!

not only no unanimity over the accuracy of his caste calculations, but there is also some doubt as to whether he will call an election after all.

Over the next two months, Devi Lal intends to tour the country whipping up Jat/kisan support for his cause. The Tau wishes to remind his supporters that their loyalty is to him personally and not to the party he is a member of at present. It is easy to see what he plans to do. In the event of a split, he wants his own organisation in place.

With Devi Lal and Shekhar ready to split the party, can the Raja afford to call elections? He could take the line that Shekhar and the Tau are yesterday's men and will not attract any votes (this view is the prevalent one in the V.P. Singh camp) and risk a split. But it is still a gamble. In the end, his Janata Dal could end up losing more seats than it can gain through his caste calculations.

But V.P. Singh's problem is that having made the transformation from Mr Clean to Mr Caste, his options are severely limited. If he doesn't call an election, then he faces a year of chaos and anger.

- There is no solution in sight to Punjab or Kashmir.
- Inflation could reach 1973-74 levels.
- Devi Lal will make the normal functioning of the party impossible.
- The social war that is the inevitable result of the Mandal Commission recommendations will rock the Hindi belt.
- Rajiv Gandhi will find the time he needs to get his comeback organised. With the Raja himself abandoning corruption as an issue, Rajiv's position is certain to get stronger.
- The allies will make their disillusionment with the government public and may even withdraw support.
- Through all this chaos, V.P. Singh will find that he has alienated the middle class and antagonised the press.

So, even if he thinks better of going to the country, there is no way his government can survive beyond 1991. And by the end of that year, his reputation is certain to be in tatters.

The Raja is, therefore, in a situation in which he may have to take a risk: his options are limited. He might lose an early election but equally, his caste formula might just tilt the balance.

It is still not clear what he will do, but his record suggests that he has always gambled. He resigned as UP chief minister against Mrs Gandhi's wishes at a time when to do so meant instant excommunication. The gamble paid off and he returned in a blaze of glory to the central government. In 1987, he took another risk, walking out of the Congress (by asking to be expelled), despite warnings that all those who leave the Congress either fade away or return with their tails between their legs.

That gamble also paid off.

But now Vishwanath Pratap Singh may have to plan his grandest gamble. It is not just his own career that depends on it. Because, if he does win an early election, then the India he will be obliged to create will be a very different place, full of Kurmi-appeasement, Yadav-quota and cow-belt casteism.

It is a gamble that will shape our future. And the future of our children.

Vir Sanghvi

Look back in anger

The anti-reservation stir sweeps the country

V.P. Singh: under attack

The protests and demonstrations were spontaneous. And they spread like wildfire throughout the country, plunging state after state in turmoil. Soon after the National Front government announced its decision to implement the contentious Mandal Commission report, students took to the streets, blocking traffic, stoning vehicles, burning railway property and even gheraoing ministers and senior government officials. Never before had the students got together to launch such a determined agitation. And never before had the government appeared so helpless in the face of a popular stir.

Understandably, the protests in Bihar were the most violent and widespread. A state where caste factors play such an important role, it was but expected that the Mandal Commission's report would evoke such strong reactions. As soon as the Hindi TV bulletin on 7 August declared that the Centre would implement the Mandal Commission recommendations extending 27 per cent reservations to a number of backward castes, Patna erupted in flames. Youths took over the streets in a spontaneous gesture of protest and brought life to a standstill. The following day, students of the Patna University, the hotbed of students' activities, went on the rampage. They ransacked the office of the vice-chancellor and set fire to a number of buildings. Trouble soon spread to other educational institutions as well. A panicky Patna administration ordered all the schools and colleges of the capital city closed and ordered the police to vacate the hostels.

The high-handed attitude of the state government only incensed the anti-reservationists further. Their numbers swelled and the targets of attack were government offices and railway property. Groups of lathi-wielding students even attacked ministers and senior officials. For over a week, trains approaching Patna station were stoned and several bogies set on fire. In some parts, the agitationists blew up railway tracks, throwing the state's transport system completely out of gear. And on 13 August, the police fired on a group of students in Madhubani, killing one of them. Despite the elaborate security arrangements—the paramilitary forces were also called in to assist local administrations—the agitation continued unabated, with violence gripping more and more areas of the state every day.

Chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav promptly blamed the Congress for instigating the students. But the truth was that though most of the political parties, including the communists, solidly backed the movement, none of them helped the students in any way: for a change, this was one uprising that was spontaneous and enjoyed the support of all concerned.

In the past too, Bihar has seen violent protests over the question of reservations. Once, Karpoori Thakur, the firebrand Opposition leader, even forced all legislators to resign from the Assembly in protest against the Centre's decision to reserve a percentage of government jobs for backward classes.

But Uttar Pradesh was surely a let down. For, nine months ago, when the V.P. Singh regime had announced, soon after assuming office, that the existing policy on reservations would continue, UP was the first state to react to the Prime Minister's statement with anger. Naturally, this time too the state was expected to lead the anti-reservation stir in north India. Moreover, this time round, a rejuvenated Congress party, a number of upper caste leaders within the state Janata Dal and, most important, kisan leader Mahendra Singh Tikait -he is upset with the UP chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav -were all expected to stand by the agitators.

UNI

But the stir proved to be a non-starter. First, Tikait told the students that he had nothing to do with the agitation. Moreover, the UP government had announced recently that it would recruit around 20,000 personnel and naturally the students were too busy preparing for the examinations.

But that did not deter anti-reservationists to voice their protest against the Mandal Commission report. And expectedly, the banner of revolt was first raised in Kanpur, the centre of student politics in the state. On 19 August, a powerful bomb exploded at the Chumganj police station, injuring five people. The other target of the agitators was the Kidwainagar branch of the Punjab National Bank.

Like Kanpur, Allahabad too is a nerve-centre of students' movements. But this time, the police reportedly came down with a heavy hand to deal with the agitation. On Independence Day, students of the Allahabad University hoisted a black flag. Later, when they brought out a procession, the police allegedly beat them up with lathis, forcing the protesters to retreat to their hostels. Surprisingly, Lucknow University, which remained unaffected by the anti-reservation movement last time, experienced more than its share of campus violence this time. The fillip was said to have been provided by the visit of Sanjeev Shankhdhar, a member of the national coordination committee of the Anti-Mandal Commission Forum, to the university. He camped at the university for four days and in one of the public meetings that he addressed, Shankhdhar termed Mulayam Singh Yadav as "anti-students". He also appealed to the students to resort to peaceful means of demonstration. But soon after his departure, a bomb exploded inside the office of the deputy registrar (examinations). The students also set ablaze furniture belonging to the Hindi department. But once the police moved in, the stir subsided.

VIJENDRA TYAGI

Delhi University students form a chain around Parliament: an angry lot

Students of the capital have in the past remained more or less unaffected by movements sweeping other parts of the country. But this time it was different. And, 24 August was a day of spectacular protests all over Delhi. Most of the 10,000-odd students who had assembled on the lawns of the Boat Club on the morning of that day had nothing to

K M KISHAN

(From far left) Students demonstrating against reservations in Delhi; protesters on the streets of Patna; (above) B.P. Mandal: a popular movement

SECRET EYE

Police burst tear gas shells to disperse agitators in Delhi: strong-arm tactics

do with politics and had perhaps never participated in demonstrations before. But the jeans-clad youths were determined to form a "human chain" around Parliament as a mark of protest against the government's decision to accept the Mandal Commission report. For, once implemented, the report would negate the whole purpose of education and would disqualify most of them from entering government services.

The administration was also prepared in full force to tackle the situation. The Parliament was cordoned off, and when the students attempted to march towards the Lok Sabha, the police, armed with canes, shields and tear gas, chased them away. There was total confusion everywhere and the cops had to burst as many as 50 tear gas shells on Parliament Street to disperse the crowds. In another incident, hundreds of students of Deshbandhu College in south Delhi fought a pitched battle with the police for over an hour. The cops stormed the college and beat up the agitators, injuring even the principal, Balbir Singh.

Another target of the students was the new Congress(I) headquarters, Jawahar Bhavan on Raisina Road. The Doordarshan centre was also stoned. Traffic on all the four bridges across the Yamuna came to a standstill, resulting in chaos on the roads linking east and central Delhi. Students deflated Delhi Transport Corporation (DTC) bus tyres and shattered their window panes. The youths grew so militant that when a senior police official suggested that a student delegation meet the Prime Minister, they shouted back: "The Prime Minister will have to come out and meet us." What emboldened the students was the public sympathy the agitation generated. On Parliament Street, for instance, employees of the Reserve Bank and Bank of India came out in support of the demonstrators.

The protests in Delhi were impressive by any standards, particularly because the students had staged the demonstration without the help of their unions and were virtually leaderless. They had been let down pretty badly by the powerful Delhi University Students' Union (DUSU) in particular, which, because of its links with the ruling regime, had refused to launch a movement against the Mandal Commission report.

But that didn't prevent the students from taking to the streets on 24 August. Preparations for the massive demonstration had begun weeks in advance with students taking out processions within the campus of Delhi University, the Jawaharlal Nehru University and the Jamia Millia Islamia University. The youths had hoped that these would force the government to reconsider its policy on reservations, but when nothing of that sort happened, they went ahead with the 24 August programme.

Students throughout the country resented being labelled "anti-reservationists". In all public meetings they said that they were fully in support of reservations for scheduled castes and scheduled tribes, members of whom were participating in the present movement, the students claimed. But they all were opposed to extending reservations for backward castes, who didn't deserve the crutch of "social justice" that SC/STs did. By extending reservations to backward castes, the students argued, the quota of reserved jobs would be as high as 49.5 per cent. But what is really disturbing is that the country would be divided along caste lines. VP could reap political advantage from this, but what about the future of the nation? •

Nirmal Mitra/Delhi, Subodh Mishra/Patna and Radhika Rameseshan/Lucknow

Violence in Patna: the anti-reservationists had their way

K.M. KISHAN

The oil crunch

The problem is not supplies, but the price

Most Indians have never heard of Saddam Hussein. But what the Iraqi leader does over the next few weeks is going to determine the way of life of millions of Indians over the next few months. For, Saddam Hussein has everything to do with oil—and oil is literally what keeps the Indian economy going.

Ever since Iraqi tanks rolled across the desert into Kuwait, international oil prices have gone through the ceiling, precipitating yet another crisis for Indian economic policy-makers. India just does not have enough foreign exchange to pay the higher oil prices. Moreover, the central government is all but broke and has been slashing spending across the board. If oil prices stay high, the government will have to make drastic moves, such as cutting back on public sector investment, imposing import curbs and going to international bankers with hat in hand. And that can mean only one thing: general economic downslide.

Saddam Hussein: his imperiousness could prove costly for India

Faced with this disquieting scenario and extremely limited means to deal with it, Prime Minister V.P. Singh's economic managers do not seem to know quite what to do. So far, they have reacted in a most predictable manner and are clinging to the hope that the Gulf crisis will end soon. As a first step, officials have been despatched to every corner of the globe in search of assured oil supplies; excise duty on cars has been hiked by ten per cent in the somewhat absurd hope that people will buy fewer cars and thereby consume less petrol; government cars have been ordered not to ply on Sundays, and Union ministers have been told to cut their consumption of petrol by 20 per cent. The idea, according to Union finance minister Madhu Dandavate, "is to reduce the consumption of petrol immediately". Speaking in the Lok Sabha, he urged: "I would like the general public, business, industrial and other establishments to voluntarily give up the use of their cars for one day of the week."

If the finance minister seriously believed that these measures would help reduce India's oil import bill by any significant amount, he was barking up the wrong tree. For, petrol is the least of the problems. The major consumers of oil products are not car owners, but the railway's diesel engines that pull goods trains, the country's truck operators who haul millions of tonnes of goods across the highways and the urban poor who depend on kerosene to cook their meals and light their homes. There is no way the consumption of petroleum products by these sectors can be significantly reduced in the short term. The finance minister's moves, consequently, can hardly be construed as a serious fuel conservation drive. In fact, Union petroleum minister M.S. Gurupadaswamy admitted that the petrol rationing drive since June this year had managed to cut consumption by a paltry one per cent. The country was continuing to guzzle more fuel than it could produce.

The government's political opponents, of course, feel that the latest oil crisis demonstrates just how incompetent V.P. Singh's ministry is. Former Union petroleum minister Brahm Dutt declares: "In my opinion, the petroleum sector has been completely neglected by the National Front regime." The government, he argues, should have anticipated that trouble was going to break out between Iraq and Kuwait, both of whom supply crude oil to India. "Had the government purchased large stocks of crude when the price was U.S $11 to $12 a barrel, this crisis might have been averted."

But that is being a little unfair. Not even the most clairvoyant of governments could have anticipated that Saddam Hussein would send his army into Kuwait and precipitate a global oil crisis in the process. If anything, the present government should be commended for taking early action to keep down oil imports. Initially, it had been estimated that the country would require over 60 million tonnes of crude oil and petroleum products during the current (1990-91) financial year. But given the extreme shortage of foreign exchange, with which petroleum has to be bought, the government decided to clamp down on consumption and hiked the prices of pe 'eum products by 15 per cent in this year's budget

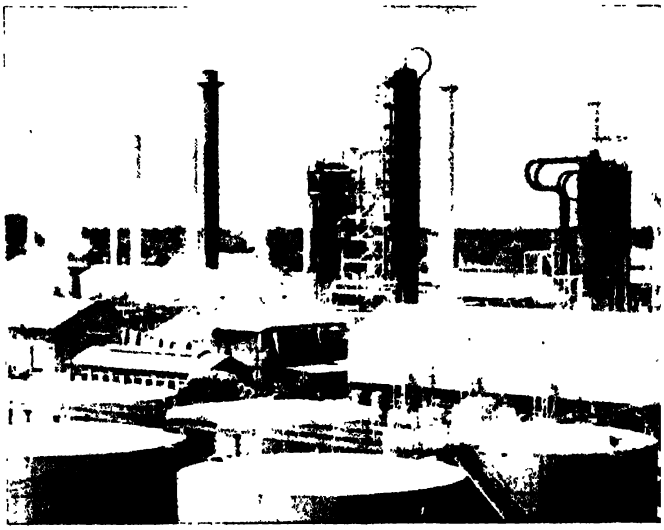
"The process of correction, which we initiated and for which we took a lot of flak, began with the budget presented in March this year," points out finance secretary Dr Bimal Jalan "We created an awareness of the problem and had we not taken those steps, today we would have been compelled to adopt crisis measures " In June this year, the petroleum ministry also announced a package of measures designed to curtail petroleum consumption. Moreover, the country' foreign exchange reserves have actually recorded a marginal increase since 1 January this year due to a number of government decisions. Because of all this, the country can absorb a certain degree of shock on the oil import front. But if the situation in the Gulf continues to be as bad as it is and, most important if the blockade of Iraq continues and the price of a barrel of oil touches the doomsday level of US $40 a barrel, there will be nothing which even the most astute of economic managers can do.



The government has estimated that even after the consumption curbs, the country will require a total of 58.9 million tonnes of finished petroleum products during 1990-91 This amount of end products (which includes naptha, gas, diesel, petrol,etc.) is procured through a variety of means: direct imports and by refining crude oil acquired both from domestic sources and through imports Matters are further complicated because India cannot refine all of the crude it produces and has to export it. This year, total domestic production of crude will touch 35 9 million tonnes and we will need to import about 18.5 million tonnes of crude. Apart from crude oil, India needs to import an additional 12 million tonnes of finished petroleum products.

Traditionally, India secures about 80 per cent of its crude oil supplies under contractual terms from selected countries. The remaining amount is purchased from the spot market where ruling prices have generally been below OPEC (Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries) levels. This year, India had planned to import 14.25 million tonnes of crude from seven countries. Soviet Union 4.5 mt, Saudi Arabia 3 mt, Iraq 2.25 mt,

INVASION: Ever since Iraqi soldiers occupied Kuwait, international oil prices have gone through the ceiling, precipitating yet another crisis for Indian economic policy-makers

INFLATION: Inadequate domestic production necessitates imports. To meet demands, India would have to pay an additional Rs 4,400 crores at today's prices—an impossible burden

V.P. Singh's economic managers do not seem to know quite what to do. So far, they are clinging to the hope that the Gulf crisis will end soon

Kuwait 1.5 mt, Iran 1.5 mt, UAE 1 mt and Malaysia 0.5 mt. The per barrel cost of imported crude till the Iraq crisis was about US $14. However, the government's economic analysts had predicted a hardening in world oil prices and had suggested that the finance ministry be prepared to buy crude at an average of US $18 during 1990-91. This suggestion had been accepted and a total outlay of Rs 6,440 crores in foreign exchange been earmarked for oil imports.

For the first four months of the current financial year, matters were proceeding as planned. In fact, the petroleum ministry even saved about Rs 300 crores because of oil prices prevailing at levels below the expected one. Moreover, the petroleum minister M.S. Gurupadaswamy told the Rajya Sabha that the country would be able to save another Rs 910 crores due to the curbs on petroleum consumption introduced by the government. But, with oil prices climbing to US $29 per barrel in the international markets, the government's plans have been completely wrecked.

The assured supplies from Iraq and Kuwait have completely dried up, at least for the moment. Of the 14.25 mt of crude contracted for, more than 8 mt (including the supplies from the Soviet Union) was to have come through Iraq and Kuwait. By the end of July, about 3.5 mt of this oil was fortunately lifted, but what is going to happen to the remaining amount is not known. Indian officials have approached virtually every major oil producer and most of them have promised to help. The problem so far, however, is not the supplies but the price. For every US dollar increase in the per barrel price of crude, the finance ministry estimates that the country will have to fork out an additional Rs 400 crores in foreign exchange.

At today's prices, which are about 11 dollars more than the anticipated price of US $18 for every barrel, the country will have to pay a total of Rs 4,400 crores extra. This clearly would be an impossible burden given that the government had earmarked a total of only Rs 6,440 crores for total petroleum imports. As it is, the country continues to be in the grip of a chronic balance of payments problem with imports far exceeding exports. Currently, the country's foreign exchange pool is enough only to finance about 42 days of imports. Should the crisis in the Gulf continue, India will be forced to spend more and more on oil imports. This would either mean drastically cutting down on imports in the short run or taking a foreign loan.

Neither of these alternatives is attractive. For, lower imports would affect investment and thus the growth rate. On the other hand, any increase in foreign debt would increase the debt servicing burden and, in the medium term, leave less money for capital goods imports. The government's economic managers are, however, hoping that oil prices will stabilise at around US $25 a barrel, which, together with the consumption curbs announced, will keep the additional foreign exchange requirement to a still tolerable level of Rs 2,000 crores or less. But that depends entirely on what the Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein decides to do.

The tragic part is that the domestic crude production situation only further exacerbates the present crisis.

CRISIS MANAGEMENT: Excise duty on cars has been hiked by ten per cent in the somewhat absurd hope that people will buy fewer cars and thereby consume less petrol

AASU AGITATION: The students have been picketing oil refineries and other installations in Assam, blocking oil flow out of the state and exacerbating the present oil crisis

The biggest problem back home is the continued interruption of oil supplies from Assam. All Assam Students' Union (AASU) activists have been picketing oil refineries and other installations in Assam and have successfully blocked oil flow out of their state. Crude oil production in this state accounts for as much as ten per cent of the country's annual requirements. Brahm Dutt feels that a political solution to the Assam students' agitation has to be worked out on an urgent basis. For, picketing oil refineries in Assam has become something of a legitimate method of protest since the ruling Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) leaders had themselves used this technique during their agitation in the early Eighties.

Bijoy Chakravarty, an AGP MP, laments: "This is a legacy of the Assam movement. It is a dangerous trend and a lot of damage has already been done. The young men involved in the movement should be taken into confidence and told to stop contributing to the fissiparous tendencies in the north-east." The AASU, the students' wing of the AGP, is, however, not terribly concerned about what happens to the national economy. It is demanding that the government implement the Assam Accord and stop constructing the 'loopline', which is being built to allow the Assam pipeline to operate more efficiently. The students, despite assurances and explanations, have chosen to continue their oil blockade, forcing two of the state's four refineries to shut down and inflicting a loss of 49,000 tonnes of crude worth Rs 16 crores. By the end of August, a total of 1,07,000 tonnes of crude would be lost to the nation if the agitation is not called off.

Should the crisis in the Gulf continue, India would either have to drastically cut down on imports in the short run or take a foreign loan. Neither alternative is attractive

MADHU DANDAVATE
(Finance minister)

"I would like the general public, business, industrial establishments to voluntarily give up the use of their cars for one day of the week"

BRAHM DUTT
(Former petroleum minister)

"Had the government purchased large stocks of crude when the price was US $11 to $12 a barrel, this crisis might have been averted"

BIMAL JALAN
(Finance secretary)

"Had we not taken those steps (in this year's budget), today we would have been compelled to adopt crisis measures"

What the government really needs to do is not throttle the demand for petroleum products, but initiate measures that will make the economy less dependent on petroleum in the medium and long terms. The government's present efforts to cope with the oil shortage, experts believe, will not suffice. What is needed, they feel, is a thorough review of both the energy scene and the automobile policy. Several agencies have carried out studies to show how the government would have to tailor its policies to encourage coal-based energy, thermal power and even nuclear power in order to make the country less vulnerable to unpredictable developments in the Gulf. The casualness with which OPEC was recently able to raise crude prices is a grim pointer to the times ahead.

Said Oil and Natural Gas Commission (ONGC) spokesman, Dr Reena Ramachandran: "Energy has be given the same status as environment." Just as environment, energy too must be conserved and its wastage would ultimately have to be made punishable. For this, it is necessary to frame an Energy Conservation Act, set up energy conservation boards as watchdogs for the implementation of the Act and also form an energy advisory council headed by the Prime Minister to take charge of all policy matters. It is pointless depending on abstractions like 'public awareness' to curb petrol consumption. The country will have to operate more fuel-efficiently in every sphere.

In the area of oil production, former minister Brahm Dutt feels that production from new oilfields like the Krishna Basin must be encouraged. But officials say the government should also give a better deal to public sector organisations like the ONGC, which have been producing crude at prices fixed in July 1981, when oil was $13 a barrel. The government will have to understand that if oil has to be found and drilled, it can only be done for a price. For there is no greater peril for a country on the path of rapid development than being hobbled by the lack of energy sources. If the government can put together a comprehensive long-term package for developing indigenous energy sources, then Saddam Hussein would actually have done India a favour. •

Nirmal Mitra and Indranil Banerjie/New Delhi

GAUTAM PATOLE

The scene at Bombay Airport: returning to chaos

End of the Gulf dream

Thousands return in poverty from the Middle East

They had gone searching for the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. But all they got was gunfire, Iraqi tanks and the end of a dream. And the Indian expatriates returned home from the Gulf with little more than the clothes on their backs. Their savings left behind in Kuwaiti banks, with little hope that they would ever see their hard-earned dinars again, the evacuees were left with what they had started out: nothing. And—to make matters worse—had to put up with an absolute lack of sympathy from the authorities.

The fate of the 377 passengers of the Air India Boeing 747, which landed in Bombay on 19 August, was a case in point. They arrived, confident that the government would take care of them. Only to find that no arrangements had been made for them by the authorities. Instead, a private organisation, the Shri Nagardas Dharsi Bhutta Charities had set up a transit camp for their benefit at the Bhutta High School in Andheri. Ramniklal Bhutta and Chimanbhai Seth of the charity took the evacuees to Andheri, where they were housed and fed free of cost. The government showed little interest, other than offering them rail tickets back to their homes.

The new arrivals—refugees in their own country—sat around in stupefied silence. And spoke only to relate their experiences during the Iraqi invasion and their fears about the future.

While Doordarshan had been trumpeting the 'fact' that all Indians were safe in their homes in Kuwait, the truth was that many of them were languishing in a prisoner of war camp in Baghdad, for 18 days. Workers of the Kuwait Gulf Links Transport Company, the Kuwait Drilling Company and the Kuwait Building Company were among those placed under arrest. Says Ismail Jamail, one of those imprisoned: "The Indian embassy did not even know where we were so how could it help us? Even when we landed in Bombay nobody cared. I don't know what they've been saying on television but we had a terrible time."

The workers were herded out on the morning of the invasion and asked to get into military trucks, leaving all their belongings behind. Francis Souza remembers that horrible ride: "There were about a hundred of us in that truck. It was as dark as hell and I was sure that we were going to be shot." After a never-ending ride, the workers arrived in Baghdad.

Here they were taken to a military camp, along with prisoners from such countries as Pakistan, Bangladesh, Syria and China. Recounts Mohammad Mohiri: "The situation was desperate. There were 400-500 people in the camp, all of whom were nervous, so trouble was bound to erupt. Moreover there was an acute shortage of water and food. Nobody could have a bath and the smell of human bodies

The politics of evacuation

The heat is turned on the Kerala and Union governments

When the Gulf crisis erupted, everybody who had friends and relatives in Kuwait was reasonably confident that no harm would come to them. Doordarshan contributed to this feeling by reiterating that Indians in the oil-rich kingdom were safe and that efforts were on to evacuate them.

But when these assurances failed to materialise, worry and anxiety turned to anger; directed at the central and Kerala governments. An association of the relatives of those trapped in Kuwait staged a dharna outside the Raj Bhavan in Trivandrum while in the central Travancore area the agitated people squatted on the railway tracks, to protest against the authorities' inaction.

Resentment against V.P. Singh and E.K. Nayanar's state government increased when restrictions were imposed on the exchange of Gulf currencies. Says Thampi Malaikkal, a spokesman of the Indo-Gulf Welfare Council, Thiruvalla, "The Gulf NRIs brought in crores as foreign exchange. Yet the government clamped down on the currency the moment the heat was on. If the north Indian politicians can spend crores on Kashmir and Punjab, why can't they pay us at the old rates?"

Nayanar: trying to cope

When news of the acute water and food shortages in Kuwait came, the pressure on the government increased. The Nayanar regime responded by setting up three special cells at Cochin, Trivandrum and Calicut, in collaboration with the Union government, to provide information on those who had been stranded in Kuwait. Nearly 20,000 queries were received at these centres, and says Kumardas, regional passport officer at Cochin, "The information given by relatives on printed forms was passed on to the special cell for Kuwait at the external affairs ministry in Delhi."

But these special cells weren't much help, either. No information was received from Delhi in response to any of the requests sent from Kerala. Maintains Thampi Malaikkal: "The Kuwait cell is an open fraud by the government. I had gone to the Cochin and Trivandrum cells seeking information about my family but I got the stock reply: every Malayali in Kuwait is safe."

And K.P. Unnikrishnan, in what was projected as a "confidence-building talk" over Trivandrum Doordarshan, claimed that he could not get big enough passenger ships to evacuate all the Malayalis

GAUTAM PATOLE

The evacuees: an uncertain future in the camp was terrible. There were bitter fights for water, in the course of which one Indian worker cracked his skull."

Others were luckier. K. Kakkar, for instance, who was divested of his Rolex watch by one of the guards. Egged on by his fellow-prisoners, he complained to the sergeant. It worked. He got his watch back. And he never saw that soldier again.

For breakfast, the prisoners were given a slice of bread and a plate of dal. Lunch comprised some rice and dal, with ten people eating from one plate. At night, the inmates of the camp got a slice of bread and some mutton. Everyone went hungry, but kept quiet for fear of being killed.

But there was only so much they could take. And when things became unbearable, the Indians decided to go on hunger strike. Fortunately for them, the Iraqis turned sympathetic, and they managed to forward a letter to the Indian embassy. The embassy intervened and on the 18th day, the Indians were told that they could leave. They were put on a flight to Amman, from where they flew to Bombay, still wearing the clothes they were arrested in.

Despite the fact that they had sweated blood for at least a couple of years in Kuwait, most of the workers were destitutes when they landed in India. Explains G.S. Ghai, an in-flight supervisor, "Everyone in Kuwait avails of the ATM (automatic teller machine) system in banks, and they withdraw about 40 to 50 dinars every week to take care of their living expenses. Now, with the attack, all the dinars they had earned over the years have simply vanished. Presently, there is no food shortage among the Indians, but as time passes, and with all their money locked up in the banks, in Kuwait!

The Congress(I), aware that it was on to a good thing, began a series of protests, including a mass fast outside the regional passport office in Cochin, which has a Kuwait cell. Later MPs from Kerala observed a day-long fast at the main gate of Parliament House in Delhi, with K.V. Thomas, MP, declaring: "The Centre has failed along with the state government to take firm action. As leader of the Non-Aligned Movement, India should have taken a firm stand."

Nayanar, at least, got his act going, sending his PWD (Public Works Department) minister T.K. Hamsa to the Gulf, to expedite the evacuation of the Keralites. The chief ministeralso suggested that a fund be set up to reimburse those returning from the Gulf to the tune of 15 per cent of their deposits in the Middle East. Nayanar also took up the cudgels on behalf of the evacuees with the Prime Minister. He wrote to the Raja: "The refusal of the nationalised banks to exchange the Gulf currencies is extremely cruel. An enquiry should be ordered into this and remedial steps taken immediately."

But by then, the credibility of his government had already been damaged.

Sreedhar Pillay/Trivandrum

GAUTAM PATOLE

Back from Kuwait: encountering apathetic officials things are bound to get difficult."

Even those who have managed to get out in time are pretty badly off. Subramaniam Surendran, a worker at the Mina Abdula refinery, had to leave sophisticated hi-fi equipment and all his savings behind and estimates the loss at Rs 5 lakhs. Others like Deepak Mehta and Jude de Souza had paid fantastic sums to agents to get jobs in the Gulf. Mehta has yet to repay the loan he took to make the payment, while de Souza, who sold his wife's jewels, now has no way of recompensing her.

Nobody has much confidence in the government's ability or inclination to rehabilitate them. Says N. Radhakrishnan: "In the end we will have to fend for ourselves. The government should remember that we have helped India all these years by sending foreign exchange. But I am sure that nothing will be done for us, like nothing was done at the airport when we landed here." Or at the Victoria Terminus station, from where the workers were to take the Dadar Madras Express back home. All 55 of them were handed Rs 25 each for the return journey. An old man of 50, who'd worked as a mason in Kuwait, broke down completely. "What state have we been reduced to?" he cried. "Everyone is making a big noise about the Air India crew coming back, but what about us? Are we not Indians? While the Air India crew was staying in a five-star hotel, we were in jail in Baghdad."

Most of the workers were forced to go around with folded hands and tears in their eyes, begging passers-by for some money so that they could go back home.

As usual, the officials were difficult to locate. In the end, help came from three members of the Young Women's Christian Organisation, who collected some money and gave each of the passengers the Rs 10-15 they needed. Complained I. Hussain: "The attitude here seems to be, 'Get the hell out of here and do not come back. You people went to the Gulf to make money and now that it hasn't worked out, it is your problem.' We are fools to even expect help."

Even the Indians in Kuwait seem to have realised that self-help is the best way out. Writes Agnes Fernandes from Kuwait: "Every day at lunch or dinner time around eight to ten families meet, each bringing a little something. In this way we manage to save food. I have heard that the banks may open soon. But many of us plan to stay here until things get really bad. I hope it never does."

Things have begun to get out of control in Kerala, whose economy depended on the Gulf remittances. Also, an exodus from the Gulf will increase the number of unemployed in the state

But things have already begun to get out of control in Kerala, whose economy depended on the Gulf remittances. With banks refusing to deal in Gulf currencies, the Malayalis returning home found that their savings were not worth the paper they were printed on. Later, under press-

The invasion

A first-hand account

Commander Prakash Pant of Air India was in Kuwait when the Iraqis took over the country. He remained in Kuwait along with his 14-member crew for three weeks until they were finally evacuated. This is his story.

I woke up around 5.30 in the morning at the Sheraton Hotel to the sound of machine-gun fire. Going to the balcony I got the shock of my life. There were tanks rolling on the streets and men in army uniforms running wild. Something was, obviously, terribly wrong.

Soldiers stopped all the cars and made their occupants lie flat on the road, while the poorer people were held captive on the pavements. The cars, including such expensive makes as Mercedes Benzes, Rolls Royces, Toyotas and BMWs, were left lying on the road until the tanks ploughed right through them, with the hapless owners looking on.

Prakash Pant: a harrowing experience

The army moved on towards the palace, and appeared to be in a hurry. But we still didn't know which army it was.

Around seven am, the hotel manager knocked on the door to inform me that Iraq had invaded Kuwait. We should all, he said, go down to the basement. By this time the rest of the crew were up and around ten, we went down into the lobby.

Only to get the shock of our lives The army had taken over the place which now looked like a military camp. The glass doors lay smashed; the soldiers had literally bulldozed their way in.

Meanwhile, the sound of gunfire continued. I think the soldiers were just firing in the air. But it was a good psychological weapon, for the Kuwaiti soldiers simply disappeared. The only public building they damaged apart from the palace was the television station. Otherwise they simply walked through, almost as if they were on an exercise. By the afternoon all communication with the outside world was cut off.

One Indian national was shot during the first couple of days, but we were told that it was a case of mistaken identity. But tension ran high as we did not know what would become of us. The thought that the Third World War would break out and we would be caught in the middle of it was our greatest fear. We were aware of the massive arms build-up through the American news network, and we had heard Saddam Hussein's speeches.

During my stay I never noticed any Kuwaiti nationals on the street.

Finally the external affairs ministry ordered our evacuation via Baghdad. At Baghdad we met Mr I.K. Gujral, who wanted feedback on the situation in Kuwait as he was scheduled to meet Saddam Hussein the next day.

From Baghdad, Air India put us on a flight to Amman and from there we flew back to India.

As related to Godfrey Pereira/Bombay ure from the E.K. Nayanar government, the Reserve Bank of India (RBI) instructed the State Bank of India to allow conversion of Gulf currencies to the maximum limit of Rs 5,000 per person.

But what will become of the families dependent on regular NRI remittances? According to estimates, as much as Rs 4,000-5,000 crores used to come in from the Gulf every year, mainly through havala payments. With that income gone, the state, with no agriculture or heavy industry to speak of, is bound to be plunged into a serious economic crisis. Also, an exodus from the Gulf will increase the number of unemployed, which already stands at 32 lakhs.

A pall of gloom has already decended over Thiruvalla, 135 km from Trivandrum, where most of the rich Syrian Christians and Nairs have relatives in the Gulf. Says C.T. Titus, whose brother-in-law M. Matthews has worked in Kuwait for 32 years: "His gratuity alone would have been more than Rs 1 crore, which he now stands to lose." In Thiruvalla, hundreds of NRIs had invested in Kuwaiti dinars as it was one of the strongest currencies in the world and banks there gave better interest rates. Now they stand to lose all that money.

Chavakkad boasts of all the lower level workers who went to the Gulf. But even here there never used to be a dearth of money. All that has changed now Says a doctor, who had a flourishing practice: "I used to make Rs 30,000 a month before. But now that the Gulf crisis has erupted all these people have started going to government hospitals."

At the Chavakkad fish market, wholesale dealer Abubacker says: "The price of marine delicacies like pomfret and sear fish has crashed. Now people only want common fish like salmon." T. Thomas, who owns a department store in Thiruvalla, says: "The day after the Iraqi invasion my sales came down." Kochuman, who used to drive a tourist taxi, rues the fact that everyone has switched to autorickshaws. "If by the end of the month the situation becomes worse, I will also sell my taxi and go in for an auto," he says.

In Cochin, there is an acute shortage of gold; the entire gold market in Kerala depends on smuggled Gulf gold. Now prices of gold have gone up in the Gulf as well and so the supply has dried up. According to Babu Alappat of Fashion Jewellers, Cochin: "By the end of the month, the price may touch Rs 3,000 from Rs 2,480 a sovereign."

Most people, however, are convinced that the present crisis will pass and it will soon be business as usual. The version that the Gulf dream is over, bar the mourning, has few takers. ●

Godfrey Pereira/Bombay, Sreedhar Pillay/Cochin, Chavakkad and Thiruvalla with reports from Chhaya Balachandran

ANURAG MATHUR

The foreign hand

It is much sought after for it offers a lot

Delhi is host to a large number of foreigners and they affect the city in various ways. Everybody who comes in contact with them reacts in different ways, but no one is untouched.

First are the diplomats. Delhiwallas look on them as providing access to a host of duty-free goods besides foreign liquor. They are therefore highly popular and much sought after. Unfortunately, the diplomats are quite aware of the reason for their popularity and are consequently extremely wary of being milked.

Next are the staffers of various UN bodies, who are slightly below in terms of desirability, but they too have access to foreign goods. Third are the executives of different multinational companies' who are not very high on anybody's list since they lack the diplomatic stamp and the same degree of access to foreign brand names.

The extremely desperate Delhiwalla is not even averse to latching on to the odd tourist. However, he has to be a visibly affluent tourist and not one of the sort who sits in Connaught Place with a can in front and a sign that says, "Passport and money stolen. Please help."

The point is that foreigners in general are sought after, at least by a section of the city. But the game has become more complex than in the past when you merely looked for a white skin and were assured of having your prayers for genuine Wrigley's chewing gum answered. The Nigerian embassy used to be fairly high on the popularity list, particularly among businessmen, because it provided opportunities for doing substantial business with Nigeria. Later, of course, it lost out because of Nigeria's financial problems but no doubt it will recover. Other African embassies are also high on the popularity chart because their countries need to import a wide range of goods and India is in a position to supply them.

The Arabs occupy a peculiar position in that they are so much like us that a certain amount of familiarity breeding contempt has become inevitable. Their embassies are often crowded, odorous, and staffed by rude and indifferent personnel. But they are forgiven everything because their countries are still a virtual El Dorado for an ambitious businessman or even a professional aspiring to emigrate. In that sense, the motivation for cultivating diplomats has changed from merely seeking consumer goods to seeking large business opportunities.

However, the people who have surged ahead in popularity in the recent past in a steady way are from the countries in the Far East, especially Japan and South Korea, though others like Singapore and Thailand also do surprisingly well for themselves. From a time when they were barely visible they have progressed steadily until they are very much in the forefront of not only diplomatic groupies but the government itself.

The extremely desperate Delhiwalla is not even averse to latching on to the odd tourist. However, he has to be visibly affluent and not one who sits in Connaught Place with a sign that says, "Passport and money stolen. Please help"

But despite this, the colour complex remains. It still remains easier for a West European country to attract groupies than it is for others, except of course the North Americans. Interestingly enough, the East Europeans, despite being white, never attained the same degree of popularity. Perhaps their preferred form of government coloured them all in red. Now, however, the situation is likely to change.

So that is how the position stands today. There are a plethora of foreign hands, most proffered in friendship rather than balled in a fist, which was the original meaning of the phrase. The situation is infinitely more complex today than what it was in the simplistic days when the foreign hand was seen behind every problem. Overall it has been a change that is much more to India's advantage than it was in the recent past.●

Vijayalakshmi Pandit: a personal milestone

HAPPY BIRTHDAY TO YOU!

It was, perhaps, the most exclusive 90th birthday party ever held, with entrance restricted to members of the Nehru-Gandhi family. And they turned out in full strength to greet their oldest living relative, Mrs Vijayalakshmi Pandit at her Chakrata Road bungalow in Dehradun.

In all, there were 32 Nehru-Gandhis in attendance, among them Rajiv and Sonia Gandhi with daughter Priyanka, Arun and Subhadra Nehru with daughter Avantika, and minister of state for environment Maneka Gandhi. But according to Mrs Pandit's daughter Nayantara Sehgal, "Nobody talked politics, it wasn't the occasion."

Apparently all the invitees—including Rajiv, his portly cousin Arun and estranged sister-in-law Maneka—met Mrs Pandit individually to extend their greetings. Said Sehgal: "My mother was more interested in how the kids of the family were coming up and what they are doing."

But then Vijayalakshmi Pandit has always had a special pride in family. A pride shared by her cousin B.K. Nehru, former J&K Governor, with whom she spent most time with on her birthday. They discussed their Anand Bhavan days over lunch, comprising rumali rotis, methi rotis, bhuna chicken, mutton curry, dum aloo, mushroom with peas and pulao.

All in all, a successful birthday bash, which left Mrs Pandit far too exhausted to meet the press the day after.

Among the invitees: (from left) Rajiv and Sonia Gandhi, Arun Nehru and Maneka Gandhi

RAKESH SAHAI

RAJESH KUMAR

BLOW YOUR MIND

She is top of the pops as far as the Indian government is concerned. First, Sharon Prabhakar was chosen over the likes of Alisha Chinai and Parvati Khan to perform as the country's official crooner, belting out Tracks of friendship at the Asian Track and Field Meet in New Delhi.

T.N.N. PRASAD

Sharon Prabhakar: wowing the Japanese

And now Prabhakar has been selected to represent India at the Asian Music Festival in Tokyo.

Sharon is all set to wow the Far East, with her distinctive brand of Hindi pop and a splendidly-choreographed show, complete with high-tech equipment (laser beams and the like). Her repertoire will include at least two numbers from her forthcoming release Blow Your Mind.

And if she manages to blow the minds of the Japs, international stardom may be only a couple of albums away.

A scene from the Mahabharat; (inset) B.R. Chopra: the saga continues

MAHABHARAT, THE PLAY

Grant this to B.R. Chopra: he knows a good thing when he sees one.

What's more, once he realises he's on to a good thing, he refuses to let go.

The Mahabharat, for instance. Not content with the long and popular run his serial enjoyed on television, Chopra first commissioned a documentary on the making of the magnum opus. And now, the filmmaker has abridged the 93-hour serial into a three and a half hour stage-cum-video show, the world premiere of which was held on 26 August at the Birla Matushri Sabhagar, Bombay.

After that the show will go on the road, with performances scheduled in New Jersey and Chicago (USA). On completion of the American tour, Chopra will come back to Bombay to make a film on the Mahabharat, and—if things work out fine—an English version of the serial for the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC).

So, you haven't heard the last of the Mahabharat as yet Not by a long shot.

INDIAN STOOGE? WHO, ME?

So, all her strident anti-India rhetoric didn't work. Not only was Benazir Bhutto fired from her job as Prime Minister but Pakistan Television (PTV) Corporation accused the Mohtarma of staying on in office with the help of the Indian government.

Quoting a Bombay-based magazine, the news bulletin reported that Bhutto had asked for assistance from across the border when the going seemed to be getting tough.

Benazir was livid. And served a legal notice on PTV through her counsel Aitzaz Ahsan, demanding an unconditional and unqualified apology and a retraction within two days. If PTV failed to comply with this demand, Bhutto threatened to sue the network to the tune of Rs 10 million, on the ground that the news report had been intended to lower her dignity and was "false, scandalous and highly defamatory".

Much like the reports about her husband's corruption, in fact.

Benazir Bhutto: apologise or else...

SHIRAZ SIDHVA

TRASH DOESN'T WORRY HIM

The ban imposed on the Pakistani bad taste film on Salman Rushdie, International Guerillas, had become a cause célèbre with the Muslim community in Britain. If Rushdie's The Satanic Verses hadn't been banned, they argued, the British censors had no business keeping International Guerillas out of the theatres.

Predictably, the ban on the film was lifted. But not because of the pressure exerted by the mullahs at Bradford. It was Rushdie who managed to make the censors see reason.

Salman Rushdie

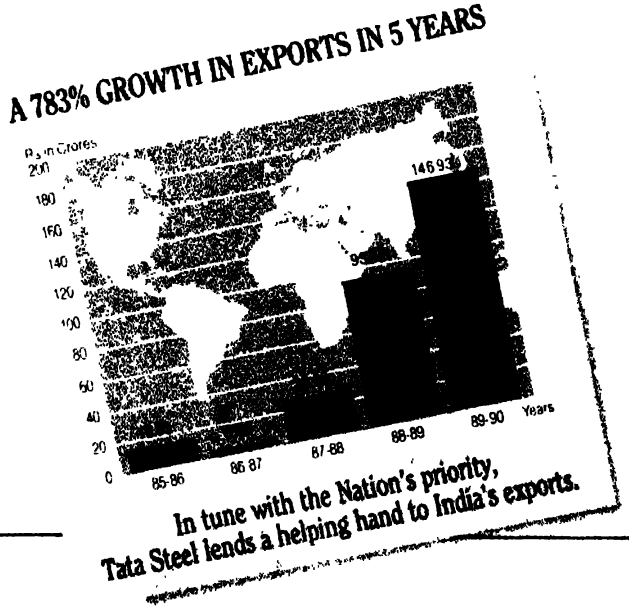
Condemning the ban on principle, Rushdie announced that he didn't want the "dubious protection of censorship". The ban should be lifted for the audiences to recognise "this film for the distorted, incompetent piece of trash it is".

Brave words, which threw those clamouring for his head completely. Though they did recover soon enough to call his stand "courageous".



It is, of course, another matter that they attended an anti-Verses rally the very next day. ●

In the Gulf, we've to take a little pepper while having a lot of wire rods

Not only in the Gulf, in the USA and in Australia, in Japan and in New Zealand, in Bangladesh, in China and West Germany and in many other countries, Tata Steel, today, is exporting a wide range of products.

The objectives are evidently clear. To ensure foreign exchange earnings, which are a national priority, and to establish a long-term quality leadership for the Company and the country in the global market.

In just six years, Tata Steel (with a turnover of Rs 146 crore) has become one persuaded people

of the country's largest exporters. Its range not only covers engineering goods and raw materials but also commodities such as black pepper, coffee and black tiger shrimps. In spite of its large imports of equipment and raw materials for the on-going modernisation drive, Tata Steel, today, is a nett exporter. For 1985-86, the Company won the prestigious National Award for Exports.

Today, Tata Steel is spreading all its pioneering expertise and experience across the seas to build a long term base for India—all over the world.

Tata Steel Exports:

Steel and Steel-based engineering products	- Wire rods, re-inforcing bars, structurals, tubes, wires, bars, cranes, rolls, bearings, etc.
Raw Materials	- Chrome ore & concentrates, manganese ore, ferro-manganese, ferro-chrome, charge chrome, refractories, etc.
Commodities	- Black pepper, coffee, black tiger shrimps.

Discussions that are opening up new markets in the Gulf

TATA STEEL

DECADE OF EXPORTS

1990 2000

TATA STEEL

The first and still the foremost

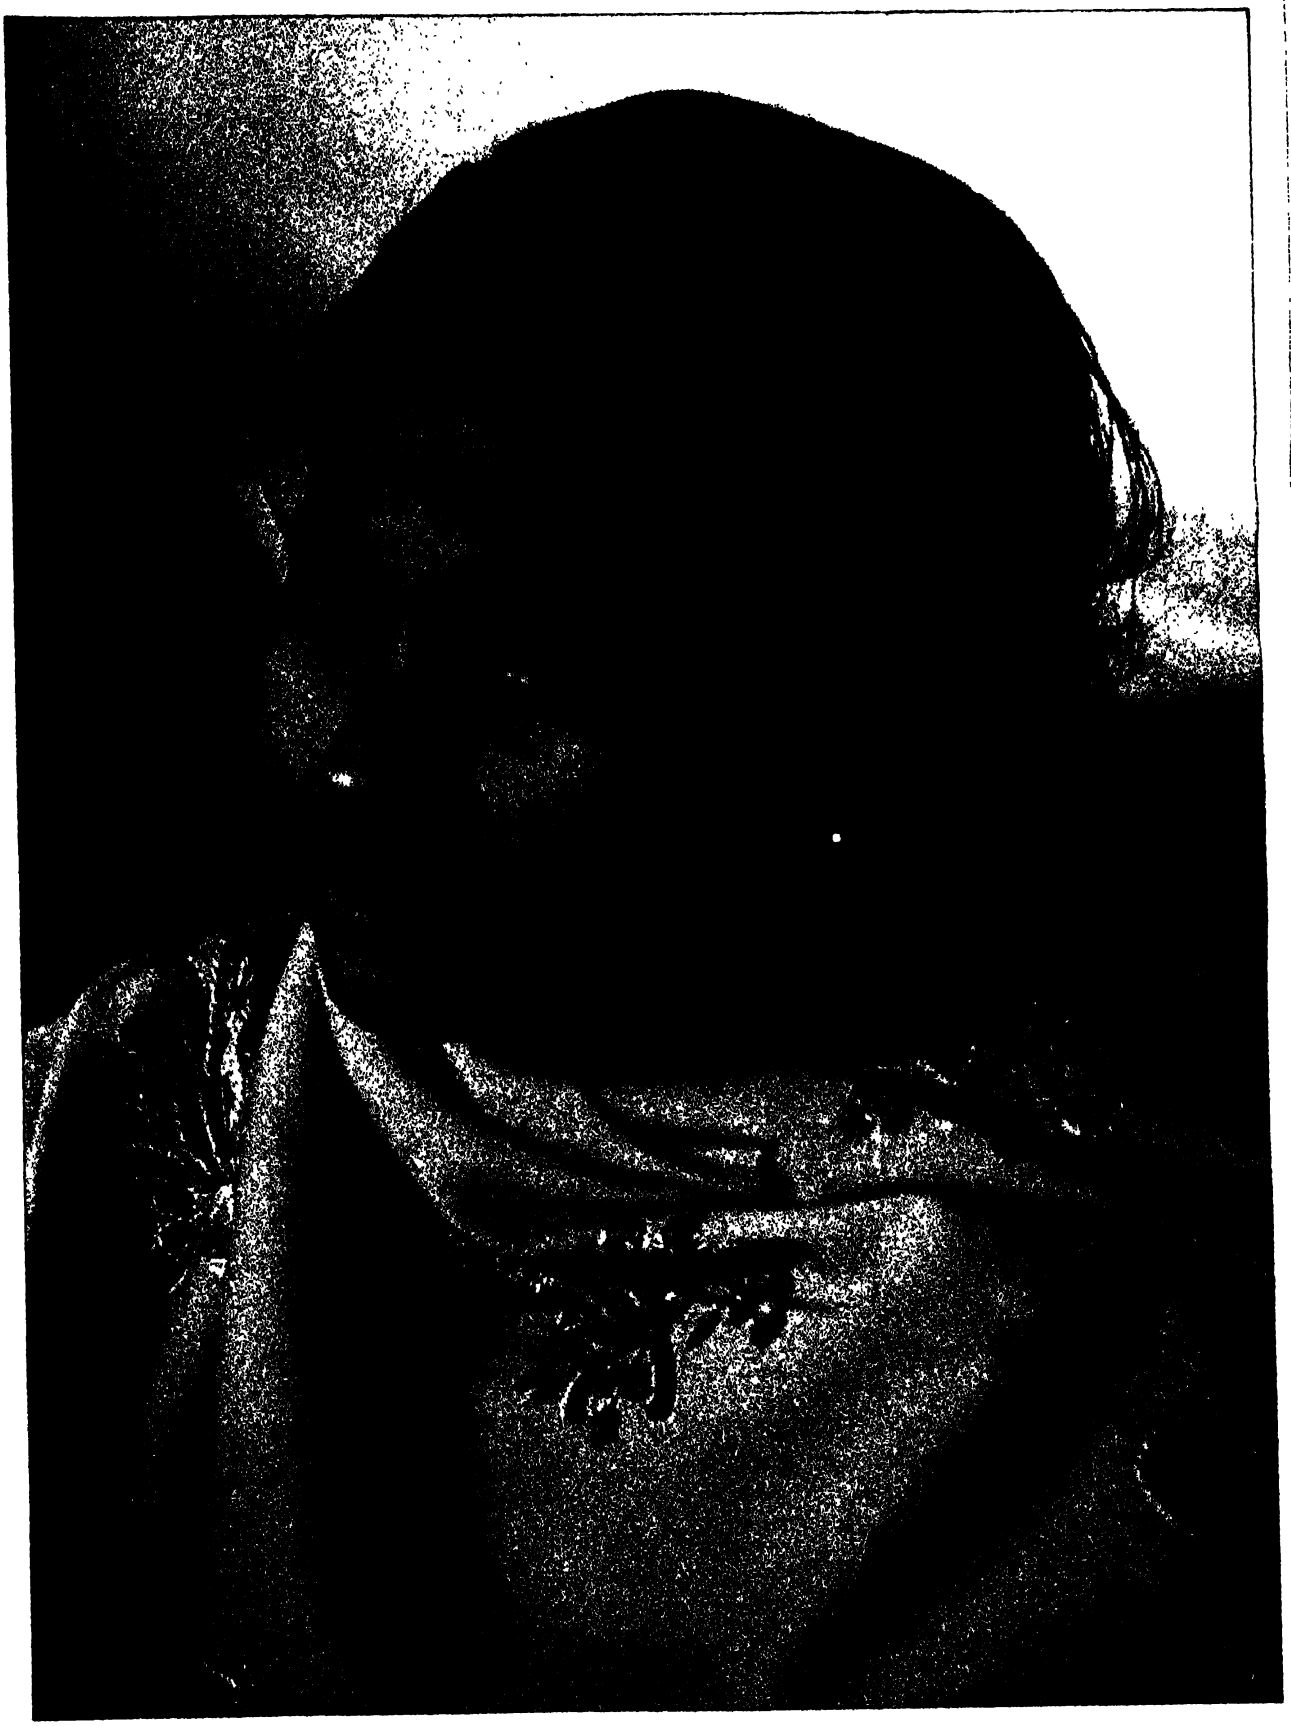
Joan of Arc

Why the CPI(M) assaulted Mamata Banerjee

When Marxist hoodlums brutally attacked former Congress(I) MP Mamata Banerjee at a Calcutta street crossing in broad daylight on 16 August, they knew what they were doing. For, Mamata currently is easily the most active Congress(I) leader in the state. At a time when her party colleagues are busy squabbling amongst themselves, she alone has kept up the fight against West Bengal's ruling leftists. Her battle instincts, grit and singular resolve have been winning her more and more admirers. Calcutta's Marxists know that if any Congressperson is fast emerging as a grass roots leader in the state, it is Mamata Banerjee.

This 34-year-old, street-fighting politician is threatening to bring down the Marxist citadel in Calcutta. She is directly challenging the communists' claim to be the defender of the common man and questioning their right to continue dominating the city. The Marxists have been holding on to Calcutta through political machination and muscle power. The city is a prestigious prize which the state's rulers just cannot afford to lose. So, when the Congress(I) called a bandh on 16 August and Mamata came out on the streets to rally Congress(I) sympathisers, a bunch of killers owing allegiance to the Communist Party of India (Marxist), decided it was a bit too much.

The procession led by Mamata Banerjee was stopped at a street crossing and the ex-MP attacked by a group of CPI(M) supporters led by Lallu Alam, the brother of the CPI(M) leader Badshah Alam, who had unsuccessfully contested the Chowringhee seat in the last Assembly elections in 1987. The assailants, wearing police helmets, first struck her repeatedly with lathis and then went in for the kill with a knife. The policemen present on the spot intervened only when it was evident that Mamata was being murdered. She was admitted to a hospital where she was treated for multiple fractures and a severe head injury. In fact, the scalp had virtually been split open. Press photographers who had tried to photograph the attack were themselves beaten up—one of them, Ananda Bazar Patrika's Tarapada Banerjee had his arm broken.



It was a shameful episode. And the public outrage against the ruling Left Front was loud and predictable. For, in Calcutta women have always been treated with great deference. The Marxists had sinned by attacking a defenceless woman just because she happened to be a political rival. Mamata might have been ignominiously struck down on a Calcutta street but the ultimate victory might well be her's. For, if there is any Congress leader in West Bengal who just cannot be cowed down, it is Mamata.

POLITICS HAS been one long battle for Mamata. She started off as a small time student leader in south Calcutta's Jadavpur University. Those were the wild days. She is reported to have been a spirited girl, ever ready to snipe at her leftist rivals. She remained on the fringes of state Congress(I) politics till Subrata Mukherjee, a party MLA and trade unionist, took her under his wings and began promoting her as a youth leader. She got her biggest break when her party leadership chose her to contest the 1984 Lok Sabha elections against the veteran CPI(M) leader Somnath Chatterjee in the red stronghold of Jadavpur. At that time, virtually no one expected the young Mamata to put up a genuine fight against Somnath Chatterjee. Her unexpected victory, with a whopping margin of about 48,000 votes, made her an overnight celebrity in Bengal.

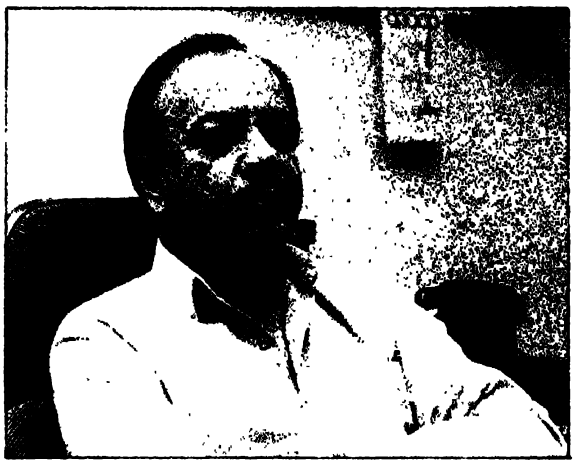
Most of the Congress(I) candidates who had been elected to Parliament in December 1984, thanks to the so-called "Indira wave", did little to promote their constituents' cause. But not Mamata. She emerged as the most vocal MP in the Lok Sabha, constantly raising even the insignificant of her constituency's problems. She incessantly petitioned ministers in New Delhi and followed up hundreds of requests from her supporters. On one occasion, she even spoke against the Congress(I) government at the Centre for not helping industries in West Bengal. This attitude won her supporters cutting across wide political barriers. The people of the Jadavpur Lok Sabha constituency began to grudgingly admit that this lady meant business and whatever else she was, first and foremost she was their true representative.

THE REPORTS of Mamata's burgeoning popularity worried the Marxists no end. They knew that if Mamata was allowed to continue, she would destroy their base in Jadavpur, which has traditionally been the fortress of the leftists in Bengal. During the 1989 general elections, the Marxists instead of fielding Somnath Chatterjee, put up a lady professor Malini Bhattacharjee against her. The political battle, however, took an entirely different turn. The Congress (I)'s national level politicians blundered by allowing the shilanyas ceremony near the Babri Masjid at Ayodhya and succeeded in completely alienating the Muslim voters. A large chunk of Mamata's supporters were Muslims and by the end of November 1989 the overwhelming majority of them had decided to vote for anyone but the Congress(I). And, Mamata lost.

She was down but not out. Unlike other defeated poll contestants, she refused to give up her constituency. From time to time, she organised rallies and street-corner meetings in the Jadavpur and Behala areas. She continued to offer her services to the people. At a time, when a debilitated state Congress seemed to have sunk into manic depression, she alone kept on protesting against the injustices committed by the Marxist government. In the end, she could not but be admired. If she went down under the blows of her leftist assailants, it was because she stood up to fight in the first place. A hospital ward is a lonely place but Mamata Banerjee fortunately will not be there for long. She is destined for a place amongst the multitudes.●

TAPAN DAS

MARKETING



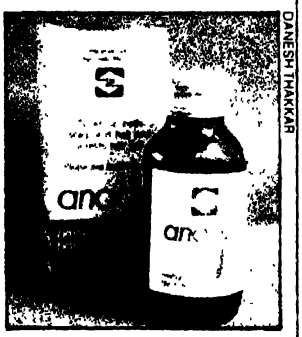
Head for success

Godrej Soaps begins to market the controversial Anoop hair oil

A bald fact. Soon, the streets of Bombay will display ads which read: "Godrej brings you Anoop the much-acclaimed hair oil from Kerala."

The giant family-owned business house, Godrej Soaps has tied-up with Kerala's Gopalakrishnan Nair, the maker of the controversial Anoop hair oil. Apparently, Godrej Soaps beat a number of multinationals which vied to market this product. Says the company's spokesman, Pratap Roy: "It was a simple exercise and all over in a month. Nair is not one for intricate legal details and agreed to market his home-grown product through Godrej."

Last year, after Anoop hit the headlines in Kerala's number one daily, Malayalam Manorama, it became a rage. The oil sold at Rs 75 per bottle; in the black market as much as Rs 300. Reports had it that the oil was a surefire cure for baldness and Nair was acclaimed a 'miracle' man. But soon overnight success attracted controversies and detractors. Complaints began coming in that the hair oil was nothing but a hoax and Nair a fraud. And in August last year, a writ petition seeking a stay on the sale of Anoop was admitted by a Kerala High Court. The petition followed investigations made by a consumer's group. The state health ministry also instructed a director at the Central Council for Research on Ayurveda and Siddha (CCRAS) to submit a report on Anoop's hair-raising facilities.



DANESH THAKKAR

Godrej spokesman Pratap Roy: "Marketing Anoop will synergise with our personal care products"

But, obviously, all this has not put off Godrej. Says Roy, "There was no untoward finality in people's accusations. We made enquiries and got a good feedback about the credentials of Nair's oil and so started talking to him." He adds: "Through our normal marketing intelligence, we found that marketing this oil would synergise with our personal care products."

Suitability aside, Godrej will have to cope with a different kind of problem. Nair alone knows the hair-raising formula, which he says contains—apart from coconut oil, goat's milk etc.—over 50 herbs. As some of those herbs are seasonal, production is severely curtailed. At best, he can manufacture 25,000 to 30,000 bottles a month. Moreover, Godrej also has to risk depending on just one man for the produce.

But, Godrej seems more than willing to take the chance. Says Roy: "We are not making any tall claims. We are selling it as an ayurvedic hair oil and not a miracle." In fact, Godrej is not even altering the original packaging. Perhaps, it will be glossed up a bit, say company insiders, but, it will be as simple as an ayurvedic product should be. And that's the way Nair wants it.

DANESH THAKKAR

RAJAN

(Left) Gopalakrishnan Nair with his wonder oil; Anoop marketed by Godrej: simple packaging

With the tie-up, Anoop is being sold at Rs 100 per 50 ml bottle all over the country. Nair's agreement with Godrej is for five years, but it allows him to sell bottles to his own customers.

If Nair can increase production (he has already bought land to grow more herbs) and Godrej's marketing strategies are successful, both will have it made. In fact, Godrej began marketing Anoop on 5 August and already demand far outstrips supply. Letters have been pouring in from jubilant consumers. Nair has even been receiving orders by post. The hair oil has even attracted the interest of people in the US and Switzerland.

So far, it seems to be a winning combination. Whether it raises hair or not, it is certain to raise money. ●

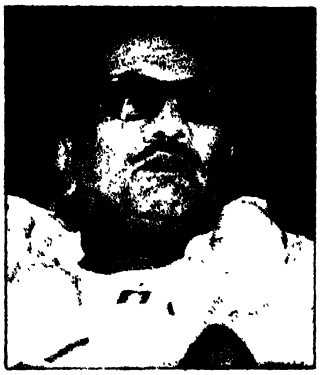
Olga Tellis/Bombay

COMPANIES

A panicky peace?

Perhaps, as Tamil Nadu chief minister M. Karunanidhi may have bitten off more than he can chew with Standard Motors

On the face of it, it appeared that the Tamil Nadu government had decided to buy peace. On 22 August, Standard Motors Products of India (SMPL) chairman A.C. Muthiah was summoned by state chief secretary M.M. Rajendran. Good news, thought Muthiah, this is the end of his pariah status, the end of the year-long persecution by the state government—courtesy chief minister Muthuvel Karunanidhi's long-standing ire against everything the Madras-based industrialist and his family had a hand in. Of immediate concern, however, was the possibility that the government had something in mind to resolve the crisis at SMPL, its factory locked out since February 1989, and the company declared sick.



However, when Muthiah presented himself in Rajendran's office, it did not take him long to realise the meeting was a mere formality, and that the government had no concrete proposal to reopen Standard Motors, one-time maker of the ill-fated Standard 2000 luxury car. Why, then, was Rajendran so keen to meet Muthiah, a man the state government has systematically hunted down? Especially when Muthiah has said often enough that he has washed his hands of SMPL—a company he picked up as a bargain two years ago but discovered soon enough that it was a dud—and how relieved he would be if he was able to offload his 20 per cent SMPL equity on to any buyer?

Corporate observers have it that for a change, the Tamil Nadu government is in for some flak. Karunanidhi had announced in the Assembly that he would make sure the SMPL facility reopened by June. Nothing happened. The Communist Party of India (CPI), which controls the SMPL labour union—and is politically allied with Karunanidhi's Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam—is tired of the CM's assurances, say political observers, and is getting restive. For a good reason: the company's 3,000 workers are without a job and the leftists have already lost a lot of credibility, walking a tightrope between an ally's promises and constituents' aspirations. A number of CPI legislators have even served notices for an adjournment motion in the Assembly on the SMPL issue. Faced with a tricky political situation, say observers, Karunanidhi had to act—and fast.

Hence the government's sham meeting with Muthiah. But it was enough for Karunanidhi to claim in the legislature that "even today, the chief secretary is holding discussions with Muthiah".

THE STANDARD 2000

M. KARUNANIDHI

A.C. MUTHIAH

The Tamil Nadu chief minister may have realised that without Muthiah's help, it may be impossible to get SMPL going

Corporate observers have it that for a change, the Tamil Nadu government is in for some flak

The CPI is not the CM's only worry, or the only cause to keep alive the pretence that he is really interested in SMPL's—and by default, Muthiah's—welfare. The Board for Industrial and Financial Reconstruction (BIFR) has scheduled a hearing for the sick company's affairs on 12 September. R. Ganapati, the board's chairman, is exasperated enough with the Tamil Nadu government's vacillation on SMPL, and has even issued a show cause notice asking why the company, burdened with a staggering Rs 20 crore loss, should not be wound up. The government panicked and asked for a grace period, promising that it would name Muthiah's successor—as chairman and co-promoter—by 12 September.

With the publicised meeting, Karunanidhi can at least tell the BIFR that he is doing his best to figure something out—holding out the same sop he has to his communist allies—to solve the SMPL mess. Not exactly buying peace with Muthiah, but buying time to save face.

The DMK don, however, may find it difficult to find a way out: he has already tried roping in buyers for Muthiah's stake, but all moves till date have fallen through.

The Tamil Nadu government—after Muthiah cried off—approached four industrialists to find out if they would be interested in rehabilitating SMPL. They were non-resident Indian Vijay Mallya of the United Breweries Group, R.J. Shahaney, Ashok Leyland's chairman, M. Puroshothaman, a small-time businessman and owner of Empee distillery in Tamil Nadu, Palani G. Periaswamy, NRI businessman and a friend of Tamil Nadu's former CM M.G. Ramachandran.

Among them, say government insiders, only Mallya seemed really keen. Shahaney even claimed that he "would not touch SMPL with a bargepole". But, unfortunately, Mallya's applications to the Union industry ministry for certain concessions in duties on the sale of the car and for importing parts for the manufacture of the luxury vehicle were rejected. Moreover, all his appeals to the state government asking it to try and influence Delhi in his favour came to nothing. "We could not help him in that," confesses a state government official. So, Mallya held discussions with experts and decided to keep off SMPL.

This is where a crucial realisation on the state government's part comes in, say observers, an acknowledgement of the fact that without Muthiah's help, it may be virtually impossible to ever get SMPL going again. After all, a prospective co-promoter would have to bring in Rs 8.40 crores as bail out money, inclusive of Muthiah's 20 per cent holding. Karunanidhi had managed to stall criticism somewhat, by pledging Rs 3 crores from state funds for SMPL's well-being, and getting the Indian Overseas Bank, through a special Reserve Bank of India directive, to pump in a crore more. He also announced an ad hoc grant of Rs 250 to each SMPL employee—"the third time such help has been provided to them by the government," declared the CM at the Assembly recently—adding up to Rs 7.5 lakhs, but such palliatives only have a short-term effect.

Seen in this light, the 22 August meeting between Muthiah and secretary Rajendran does not seem like a sham, but the first move towards reconciliation—both political and corporate—by a hard-pressed government.

But it remains to be seen whether Muthiah will respond to the Karunanidhi government's gesture—if indeed it is a gesture. After all, in end-July, the government filed criminal charges against him and other executives of Southern Agrifurane—the government removed Muthiah from the vice-chairmanship of the joint sector company last year. In April, the government sacked Muthiah's father, M.A. Chidambaram, from his post as chairman of the family's flagship joint sector company, Southern Petrochemicals Industries Corp. (SPIC). It must also hurt that state chief secretary Rajendran, the government's let's-have-a-chat-man, is now SPIC chairman.

In this set-up, it seems very unlikely that Muthiah will be enamoured of a government that has not even bothered to hide its animosity towards him. Unless, of course, he can extract a bit of revenge. Okay, he might say, drop the criminal charges and maybe I will help you out with SMPL. Try returning the management of some companies you took away, and I will help some more. And about SPIC, dear chief secretary...

The progression can go on, in a battle which started with Karunanidhi's advent at the state's helm and the SMPL muddle, peaked with the SPIC ouster and the cases, and has come a full circle—assuming Karunanidhi is ready with the peace pipe. Whatever the case, Muthiah can rest easy about one thing. He does not have much more to lose. Anything positive that happens now is a step up from rock bottom. For Karunanidhi, on the other hand, it is just the opposite. ●

R. Bhagwan Singh/ Madras

PROSPECTIVE BUYERS

VIJAY MALLYA

R.J. SHAHANEY

The government asked both to pick up the Standard Motors stake, but only Mallya seemed really keen

PLANTATIONS

Tea? No, thanks

Locals and environmentalists slam a proposed tea garden in Karnataka's coffee-growing Coorg region

Anyone for tea? Well, certainly not the Coorgs of Karnataka. Or environmentalists, for that matter. Together, the unlikely team is trying its level best to stall a project which envisions Asia's largest tea estate, spread over 2,096 hectares of the state's coffee producing Coorg district.

The project, called Kantea, was proposed by the Karnataka Forest Development Corp. (KFDC) in 1984, when Ramakrishna Hegde was chief minister. The Tea Board had backed it to the hilt, and the National Bank of Agriculture and Rural Development was enthused enough to extend a loan. But nobody planned for any opposition, which is surfacing only now. Perhaps because the state government, mindful of the present slump in the coffee industry worldwide, is pushing the project—tea is still in demand and fetches extremely good prices—to hedge against a shaky future.

As far as the Coorgs are concerned, the problem is fairly straightforward. They mostly depend on the district's numerous coffee plantations for their livelihood. They are already resentful of Malayalees from neighbouring Kerala who have established a stranglehold on the coffee trade, once a Coorg preserve. Besides, large numbers of migrant labour from neighbouring states work in Coorg plantations, and locals fear that the grandiose tea project would only bring in more labour, totally swamping the Coorgs. As it is, claim the Coorgs, competing for jobs with outsiders is tough enough.

Says Sarojini Muthanna, a local and all-India secretary of the Bharatiya Janata Party's Mahila Morcha wing: "Trade is already in total control of the Malayalee, and the labour force largely comprises Tamilians...the Coorg population in the area of the tea project is around 24,700. The project will bring in about 5,000 labourers and their dependents. With the existing outsider population, the local people will be left with no hope."

Muthanna's fears reflect an age-old wariness born partly out of xenophobia, and mostly, out of a realisation that employment opportunities—increasingly—ignore regional and ethnic boundaries. But environmentalists, on the other hand, predict an ecological doomsday in the region if the project ever assumes its full form. Sunderlal Bahuguna, leader of the Chipko movement and one of India's most respected environmentalists, even visited the proposed site and gave a number of reasons as to why the project should never take off. For example, the use of fertilisers and pesticides could pollute the hilly area's streams and the Kootepal river, which supplies drinking water to Mercara town, the district headquarters. Also, as the project will attract labourers in large numbers, and as there are no facilities to meet the fuel and fodder needs of the migrants, they would have no choice but to fell trees in the area. The nearby shola forests, cautioned Bahuguna, could be destroyed. The results: massive erosion, a surefire way to ecological hell.

Battered by increasing criticism, the state government thought it wise to set up a working committee to go into the "environmental and socio-economic aspects" of the project. For starters, the committee suggested that some measures be taken before the Kantea project kicks off. Mulching for instance, spreading a mixture of straw and dung on the ground which helps to protect a plant's roots, hold it firm and ultimately, helps prevent erosion. The committee also suggested that the government should plan to control run-off water from the project area, and be very careful about how it used fertilisers and pesticides to prevent polluting streams.

THE CRITICS

SUNDERLAL BAHUGUNA

SAROJINI MUTHANNA

The politician (above) and the environmentalist are trying to stall the project.

The report also notes that the project may start a chain reaction, drawn by the Kantea effort, others may also decide to set up tea plantations nearby once the project is in full swing. Actually, this future has already been pre-empted. "In the neighbouring areas of the project," says Muthanna, "there has been a heavy rush to buy land to grow tea. In fact, recently one person from Tamil Nadu bought 200 acres for this purpose." With the blessings of the Tea Board, she adds. Some locals, belying Muthanna's pro-Coorg, anti-tea stand, are also said to be waiting for the project's fruitition—which mean tea curing factories and other trade paraphernalia nearby—so that they can start growing tea on their sizeable hillside plots.

Battered by criticism, the state government set up a working committee to go into the "environmental and socio-economic aspects" of the project its brainchild prosper, has already cultivated tea plants over 34.5 hectares of land as an experimental project—without the state government's approval, and, say insiders, ignoring the working committee's suggestions. No mulching has been done in the area, for example. The KFDC has also sunk Rs 1.2 crores in its experiment, and the danger could be that the organisation can say it has to go ahead with Kantea, now that so much has been spent already. The corporation's eagerness—and alleged malpractices with money, to boot—has led B. Basavalingappa, Karnataka's minister for forests, to say that he will start an official enquiry into KFDC functioning.

This is no guarantee that the government will actually do something about the Kantea controversy. But the way things are going, the minister must surely be hoping that coffee prices, for a change, go up. It would save him a headache, the Coorgs their identity and livelihood, and the region its ecology. •

Gayatri Laxman/Bangalore

CURRENCY

Dinar spill

The Kuwait scare knocks Bombay's black money exchange

Iraqi president Saddam Hussein's conquering mood has shaken up more than just India's expatriate workers in Kuwait and the Persian Gulf region. It has knocked the bottom out of Bombay's flourishing black market trade in Kuwaiti dinars.

Before Hussein's ill-advised invasion of the oil-rich and cash-flush country, one Kuwaiti dinar fetched Rs 70 in Bombay. Officially, it was almost Rs 60 to a dinar—it still is. But the black market rates have plummeted to Rs 4 for a dinar. And sometimes, even this rock-bottom dinar is going abegging. "I have stopped accepting the Kuwaiti dinar," says the owner of a hotel in Bombay's southern Colaba Causeway area, "because at this stage one does not know what will happen. I know that there are many people who are buying dinars left, right and centre, but they are taking a big risk." All hoping, he says, for a time when things return to normal, and they can make a killing in the black market, a gain potentially worth more than 17 times the investment.

Before Hussein's invasion of the country, one Kuwaiti dinar fetched Rs 70 in Bombay. Now black market rates have plummeted to Rs 4

The hotelier-cum-black marketeer cautions against such profligacy. "Supposing," he continues, "the currency changes (if Iraq decrees that only Iraqi dinars are legal tender in Kuwait, and to hell with the pampered Kuwaiti variety), what are they going to do with all that paper? It will be useless." He adds: "I have been approached by hundreds of people who want to unload their dinars and buy (US) dollars, but right now I am not touching them (Kuwaiti dinars)." There is reason enough for his apprehension. Iraq has already declared parity between its dinar and Kuwait's and scrapping the Kuwaiti dinar could be the next illogical step.

Perhaps, the worst affected by Hussein's goose-stepping are havala operators—who effect currency smuggling scams by supplying hard currency at a location abroad for the payment in rupees, at a premium rate, of the equivalent black market exchange at home—who managed the Kuwait run.

"This Saddam Hussein has shattered much more than the peace of people all over the world," says an anguished M. Shah (who declines to give his full name for obvious reasons), a havala operator who lives in Pali Hill, a top-end north Bombay locality. Even in Dubai, says Shah, which is still a duty-free and money-switching haven, "people want to get out the money they have banked there". He continues: "But most of the operators that I know are very wary. What if there is a war (encompassing the Middle East)? Then the entire Gulf will be affected and it will be years before it comes back to normal. Let's face it. Right now, the situation is too risky."

SADDAM HUSSEIN

There may be a way out. Dump the dinar and go for the dong. With US and Japanese aid making their way to Vietnam, the struggling nation's economy may be looking up, in turn strengthening its currency. In the long run, a Ho Chih Minh may be better than a Hussein. •

Godfrey Pereira/Bombay

Plastic ways

Many economic analysts thought it wouldn't work out. India is simply too primitive to live by the credit card, they said—yes, even urban India. But that hasn't stopped organisations from entering the fray. The latest in a line of Indian companies is the Taj Group of Hotels, which offers its 15,000 private card holders—who are entitled to concessions at Taj hotels, among other things, in much the same way the Oberoi chain operates one—the facility to draw credit. The Taj has tied up with Bank of India for the Mastercard facility. This is a departure from the norm, at least in India, where banks and finance companies have held sway in the credit card business. The only exception was Diners Club India, the pioneer, but after its takeover by Citibank early this year, the Diners credit cards went the bank way. Even public sector banks have been bitten by the bug. Central Bank of India followed in Diners' footsteps in 1981, Andhra Bank and Bank of Baroda three years later, ending with Canara Bank, Vijaya Bank and the Bank of India in the latter part of the decade. While India is light years away from the credit card culture in, say, the US, and cash is always more welcome, trends show an increasing growth of a plastic society.

Ajit Kerkar: plastic convert

Buy-now-pay-later is what conquered the West. To many in India, it seems as attractive.

Slipping on oil

Prophets of doom have already begun talking of the oil crisis that is bound to follow if the Gulf situation does not improve. And the bright sparks at the finance ministry have begun developing ways and means to stop the excessive consumption—and wastage—of petrol.

The only way to do it, they decided, was to curtail the use of private cars. But there was one hitch to that. For, private vehicles account for only six per cent of total petrol consumption. And even if they were kept off the roads totally—not the most practicable of moves—the petrol saved would be negligable.

So, now the great geniuses are back at the drawing board trying to think up new schemes.

Au revoir?

Sacre bleu! And if the turn of telecom events in New Delhi is anything to go by, the French could be emoting in a stronger vein pretty soon.

Rumours have it that the government has junked plans for the ESS-II (Electronic Switching System) factory in Bangalore, a plum US $500 million-plus contract French telecom giant Alcatel was hoping to get. Instead, goes the grapevine news, the Centre for Development of Telematics (C-DoT), Alcatel's bugbear for the last five years, should pass on its technology to the state-run Bharat Electronics Ltd to manufacture small rural automatic exchanges. If this is true, the possibilities are endless, and none of them favourable for Alcatel or any other multinational hopefuls. For starters, it means that till India tides over a foreign exchange crunch, technology stays home-grown. That's a multi-billion dollar proposal down the drain for foreign companies. It could also mean that Sam Pitroda, C-DoT's eccentric, but undeniably bright creator, is on his way to becoming officially rehabilitated, and would continue in his efforts to keep telecom imports at bay. It also means Telecom War II. K.P. Unnikrishnan—a pro-imports man—is no more the communications minister. It should be interesting to see who takes Pitroda on for this round. En garde!

Sam Pitroda: back to the future?

STOCK QUOTE

"The way things are going, I might as well go in for an air-conditioned bullock cart."

A Bombay businessman, commenting on the economy, the looming oil crunch and the government's decision to hike the tax on cars

POLITICIAN OF THE WEEK

Madhu Dandavate

Finance minister

• The professor is in for a bad patch. His money-juggling effort should take a beating with increasing oil import bills, and the estimated Rs 3,000 crores extra it is supposed to cost the exchequer is a pressure that India can certainly do without—things are bad enough as it is. Left with very little, Dandavate tried a new tack. He put on a truly remarkable performance in Assam last week, exhorting students to lift the state's oil blockade, and even went as far as to say that he would give his life to stick to his beliefs. That should fetch the minister some sympathy when he gets up to defend the economy's dismal performance in Parliament. But that will only last a while—till people go back to realising that profligate state expenditure is the main reason behind India's plight, and a bunch of militant students have very little to do with it.

DILIP THAKORE

Dear Prime Minister

The Mandal Commission report is shocking

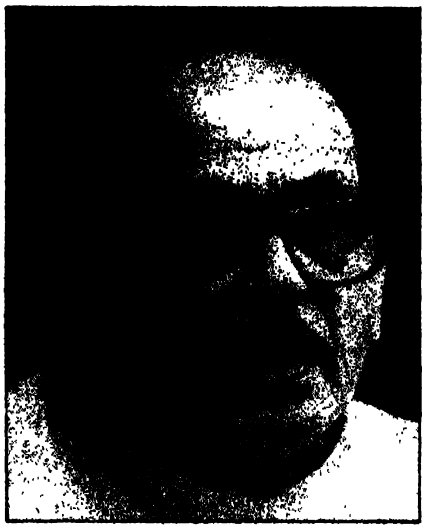
Dear V.P. Singh,

I am writing this letter to you to register my protest against the opportunistic and reckless manner in which you have espoused the pernicious Mandal Commission's report and have revived casteism into a national issue.

Less than a year ago, like millions of other citizens, I responded to your proclaimed crusade against corruption in high places and your call for value-based politics. Within an amazingly short span of time—confirming the cynics of that time—you have let your supporters down. For what is it but corruption that to win the imminent mid-term general election you have opened the Pandora's box of casteism and caste conflict? Surely to have done so is the antithesis of value-based politics.

If your government introduces legislation to enforce the recommendations of the Mandal Commission, 49.5 per cent of all jobs in government and public sector enterprises will be reserved for citizens belonging to the scheduled castes and tribes and other socially and economically backward castes. Surely, you are aware that given the nation's huge pool of unemployed, estimated at 40 million, there will be a mad rush for caste certificates? And surely you have taken into consideration that all kinds of rackets—issuance of false certificates and the like—will flourish.

Besides, from reserving jobs in government and public sector enterprises to reservations in schools and colleges (given that the Indian people seem doomed to suffer welfare sector shortages) is but a short and logical step. Or else how will people of the backward castes be able to impart even a modicum of efficiency to the jobs reserved for them?



The vital requirement of a modern state or political entity is unity if not homogeneity. Surely, it is not lost on you that almost every developed nation as also the newly prosperous nations of South-East Asia are united by homogeneity? If not, they are unabashed meritocracies such as the USA.

The moral of the history of development, my dear sir, is that nations must be united if they are to prosper. That their common cultural and spiritual heritage must be emphasised by their leaders to mould them into a disciplined citizenry working unitedly to attain common objectives. A nation characterised by caste or class conflict—particularly to the extent that one of two employees in government and public sector enterprises is selected on the basis of caste by birth rather than merit—cannot prosper. Such institutionalisation of caste added to the numerous ethnic, religious, lingual and occupational cleavages that Indian society is heir to, will make the task of economic and social development even more difficult. One does not need a doctorate in logic to deduce this, does one?

Shockingly, the Mandal Commission not only recommends the reservations of jobs in government on retrogressive caste considerations, it also says that jobs should be reserved on the same principle in public sector enterprises. In retrospect, it is now crystal clear that the public sector (which includes the central and state governments' commercial enterprises and departmental undertakings) in which the nation's savings have been forcibly canalised during the past decades, is the primary cause of India's abysmal economic growth record. A massive investment estimated at Rs. 300,000 crores has produced an average net return of less than 1 per cent during the two decades past. Little wonder that "resource constraints" is the perennial national lament. And now, instead of gearing up the public sector by attracting the most able and competent managers, caste quotas are being created within it. What a travesty of planned development! What's the utility value of the new industrial, agriculture and foreign investment policies if the performance of the vital public sector infrastructure industry is budgeted to go from bad to worse?

V.P. SINGH

The antithesis of value-based politics

No, Prime Minister, your avowed determination to give what you consider a fair deal to the backward castes is motivated less by concern for their well-being than electoral calculations. You (erroneously) believe that short-sighted populist measures such as caste-based reservations will win you the mid-term general election which you are all set to proclaim. Well, this shows that you have a poor grasp of history. For your information and education, there's never been a single general election in which the people have voted differently from the educated middle class. And by resurrecting the spectre of caste, you have alienated the educated middle class which propelled you to power. In short, you are about to fade into the footnotes of history.

Someone very prescient once highlighted the difference between a politician and a statesman. A politician is a person who thinks about the next election; a statesman thinks of the next generation. Unfortunately, Mr Singh, you have shown yourself to be a mere politician. Like Mr Mandal whose foolish recommendations you value so highly.

Dilip Thakore is the former editor of Business India, Business World and Debonair

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

Pussyfooting in Punjab

The NF government has done precious little in the most troubled state of India

Now, what on earth do you think persuaded the Prime Minister to announce to the pressganged inhabitants of the border village of Lopoke (hereafter renamed "Low Poke") that he would be undertaking a padayatra in Punjab? Doesn't he like open jeeps any more? Or has he discovered that Punjab is rather longer—and rather more serious—than 200 yards from Jallianwala Bagh to the Clocktower Gate of the Golden Temple (surrounded, moreover, by Sikh plains-clothesmen disguised as plain Sikhs)? Or is it that, with the Tau humbled, V.P. Singh now thinks he can flatter Chandra Shekhar out of the way by recalling through imitation the last person to undertake a pointless trek from Nowhere to Nowhere—the Ageing Turk himself?

No, none of these explanations fits. For, quite simply, V.P. Singh has concluded that the time has come for yet another futile gesture. All that stuff about "dil ki tijori" (the treasury of my heart) which he flung around at the January rally in Ludhiana has gone with the wind. Gogia Pasha is left with no alternative but to rummage once again in his populist bag of tricks. So, where another Prime Minister was so naive as to actually believe that what Punjab needed was a policy, this one is persuaded that what Punjab needs is a padayatra. The futile gesture has the merit, moreover, of being a useful substitute for the tiresome business of working out a solution. Never one to walk out on a problem, our VP is determined to walk into it. As the old saw goes: "tum-te-tum-te-tum/Where angels fear to tread"!

The low farce began last October when the National Front decided to spell its views in its election manifesto on the country's most intractable problem. Two ingredients were considered essential: one, total distancing from anything Rajiv Gandhi might have said on the subject, however sensible; and, two, blood-curdling metaphors cast in the mould of our contemporary Rabindranath Tagore, the Raja of Manda no less. Accordingly, since the Congress had considered the key problem of Punjab to be terrorism, out went the word 'terrorism' and, ergo, any suggestion as to how terrorism was to be tackled. And, calling up the Muse, the National Front delivered themselves, in the introductory section of the manifesto, of that remarkably original observation: "Punjab is now a boiling cauldron" (which is why, perhaps, the minute V.P. Singh put his hand into it, he was scalded!). Having thus construed Punjab as a culinary (rather than a political) question, the manifesto then went on to say nothing further in the matter till, several pages later, in the section entitled "Punjab", the National Front spells out what has hitherto been its only policy statement on the issue: in a total of seven crisp sentences.

Nirmal Mukarji: He persuaded himself that all he had to do was rein in "police excesses" and the poor misguided youth of Punjab would come trooping in to the negotiating table, like adolescents cajoled to the family dining table by a doting father Sentence One: "The National Front government will immediately take steps to resolve the Punjab tangle." Immediately? Nine months on, can one ask—what steps? True they've held an "all-party" meeting (one: that's it!). And true they've held an "all-party" rally (one: that's it!). And true too they've recalled from Punjab their own chosen Governor in what (but for Jagmohan) would have been the shortest governorship in living memory. And, yes, true also that in the Bad Old Days before VP discovered that his initials stood for vertebrae-in-place, they'd picked, as the avuncular Nirmal Mukarji's replacement, a Devi Lal chamcha called Virendra Verma (who had never run even a gram panchayat before, let alone the most troubled state of the Indian union!).

But, apart from such trivial gimmicks—ranging from the futile to the foolish—what other "steps" have they taken? And, at that, "immediately"? To "resolve", moreover, what their manifesto called the "tangle"? The fact is that, close on 12 months since the NF government assumed office, swearing to "immediately take steps to resolve the Punjab tangle", the only real steps they can claim to have taken will be the steps the Prime Minister will be taking as he steps out on his padayatra—delicately picking his way through the Punjab tangle!

Sentence Two: "Laws that violate civil liberties will be reviewed." When they got down to it they discovered that the only law that could be said to "violate civil liberties" was the 59th Amendment to the Constitution. Or, rather, one clause of that Amendment. Which, incidentally—and significantly—had never been invoked. And which could not have been invoked without Parliament's prior consent. And which was in any case due to expire on 31 March 1990. They even forgot that—so it was left to Rajiv Gandhi to remind them; and then offer the full strength of the largest single party in the Lok Sabha to get the Amendment annulled—before it died of its own accord!

Sentence Three: "All those persons against whom there are no specific charges will be released." What the manifesto conveniently failed to mention was that almost all such persons—the victims of the Operation Bluestar/Woodrose round-up—had already been released. The NF let off the handful that remained. But it made no material difference to the political situation in Punjab for, although the NF had been beguiled by the Punjab Group's hue and cry on the subject, the fact is that the detention of innocents was always a human rights issue and never a particularly germane political issue. Neither was their detention the cause of the problem. Nor was their release a solution. Or—as we can now testify nine months and a thousand-terrorist-inflicted deaths later—even a contribution to a solution of the problem. The release was right. Making it the central question in Punjab was merely gimmicky populism.

Sentence Four: "Wide-ranging discussions will be held, without preconditions, with leaders of various sections of the people for a political solution to the Punjab problem." And therein lay the crucial difference between the NF approach and the predecessor government's policy. The NF refused to recognise the reality of terrorism. Not even the word "terrorism" was allowed to figure in their manifesto. Nor was it allowed to figure in the national Front's election speeches. Indeed, JD candidates had no compunctions about cozying up to anyone ready to train their guns on the Congress—metaphorically or even literally. "Terrorism" was banished even from the President's address to Parliament. The overwhelming fact of terrorism in Punjab was simply wished away (as Hegde is doubtless whispering into his telephone: "If wishes were horses, buggers would ride"!).

It was the mindless stupidity of not reckoning with terrorism that caused the NF to proclaim that they would hold discussions even with secessionists, terrorists and their criminal cohorts "without preconditions". Their newly-appointed Governor, Nirmal Mukarji, persuaded himself—doubtless as a result of inadequately digested lunches with his Punjab Group cronies at the India International Centre—that all he had to do was to rein in "police excesses" and the poor misguided youth of Punjab ("Tut, tut, never call them terrorists—militants, if you will, but never, never terrorists") would come trooping in to the negotiating table like adolescents cajoled to the family dining table by a doting father!

Not even the assassination of Govind Ram, the dreaded former senior superintendent of police of Gurdaspur, the worst-affected district of Punjab—who was always portrayed as the very symbol of "police excesses" and from whose funeral Governor Mukarji, therefore, ostentatiously stayed away—nor the mounting murder of other police officials (which took a larger toll in Mukarji's first four months than in all of Arjun Singh's and Siddharth Shankar Ray's four years)—could persuade Uncle Mukarji into understanding that terrorists are not wayward kiddies ("Say good morning nicely to Aunty, dear"), but psychotic assassins and cold-blooded criminals. His appeasement of terrorism led to the average daily rate of the killing of innocents mounting from around ten per day, when he took over, to over 30 per day by the time he was through. He had failed to heed the sage advice tendered him by the Chandigarh Tribune (26/12/89): "It is not enough that policemen do not commit excesses. Respect for human rights must be accompanied by concern for innocent human lives."

So, Mukarji had to go—and with him quietly went the National Front's commitment to talks "without preconditions". For, the same week that saw Mukarji's unlamented exit from Chandigarh also saw V.P Singh announce that talks would now be held only with those who (a) eschewed violence, (b)

SUBHAJIT PAL

Trouble in Punjab and V.P. Singh: 12 months since the NF government assumed office swearing to "immediately take steps to resolve the Punjab tangle", the only steps they can claim to have taken will be the steps the Prime Minister will be taking on his padayatra swore fealty to the Constitution and, (c) respected the democratic way of life. And where had we heard that before? In the Congress manifesto, of course: "A political solution will be found with the participation and cooperation of all people and all political parties of Punjab who eschew violence, affirm their loyalty to the Constitution and accept the democratic way of life"! The only policy on Punjab that the Prime Minister had ever enunciated is the Congress policy. Would it not be more logical to leave it to a Congress administration to run a Congress policy?

In contrast to the turnabout on Sentence Four, Sentence Five of the NF's manifesto promises on Punjab has been fulfilled: "A round table conference will be convened for this purpose." Well, a conference was called. It achieved precisely nothing. Another conference is still to be called. Nothing much wrong with not having called a second conference—for, after all, the NF had promised only "a" round table conference, not two!

On then to Sentence Six: "Elections to the Punjab Assembly will be held expeditiously." Not even Vishwanath Pratap Singh's poetry—nor even Vinod Pande's astrology—can help our Prime Minister duck out of that one. Within nine months of winning the Eighth Lok Sabha elections, Rajiv Gandhi held Assembly elections in Punjab. Within nine months of winning the Ninth Lok Sabha elections, V.P. Singh has nothing to show the Punjab electorate but yet another broken promise. The reason? Let me leave it to Chandan Mitra to spell it out (Times of India, 14 January 1990):

> "At present, V.P. Singh probably regards Simranjit Singh Mann as his Sant Longowal. But the Sant was a mature politician with decades of experience in the field. Mann is a different kettle of fish."

How prescient! But then Chandan Mitra is neither a Janata Dal propagandist—nor, indeed, like the National Front's favourite editor, a merchant of mendacity!

Sentence Seven—and that's it: "Discussions between Punjab, Haryana and Rajasthan for settlement of disputes will be organised." Not even one discussion has been held. As for Punjab, the Punjab Group/V.P. Singh line always was that the Tau's langotiya, Parkash Singh Badal, was the key that would open the magic door to peace in Punjab. Badal collected all of five per cent of the votes cast in the Punjab elections. In any case, with the Tau put to grass, Badal too has gone to pasture—as the Tau's goatherd.

So, Punjab cannot be brought into the promised trilateral inter-state discussions for the "settlement of disputes". As for Haryana, V.P. Singh is persona non grata in the hukumat of the Tau's protegé, chief minister (and chief floor-swiper) Hukum Singh. And, in Rajasthan, there rules the BJP's formidable Bhairon Singh Shekhawat who won't discuss anything with anyone other than the duly annointed pratinidhi of the Hindu Rashtra! And, thus, not only has not even one of the "discussions" promised in the NF's manifesto been held, none, in the nature of things, can ever be held—at any rate, not so long as V.P. Singh bubbles on the surface of what the NF manifesto has so disarmingly called the "boiling cauldron" of Punjab.

And that, I am afraid, is it. Never since the manifesto has the National Front or its Prime Minister (never mind about the home minister, who isn't even allowed into Punjab as his deputy, Subodh Kant Sahay, does a Chidambaram on VP's Buta Singh!) articulated a policy on Punjab. As for the manifesto policy, that now stands revealed as a heap of broken promises. Without a policy and without a programme, all that V.P. Singh has left for Punjab is a Padyatra.

When we were schoolboys, we used to assiduously store up what were called PJs (i.e. "Poor Jokes"; otherwise somewhat cruelly called "Punjabi Jokes").As our Prime Minister sets out on his wanderings across Punjab, a PJ of childhood memory comes to mind: "Arre yaar, why don't you take a long walk off a short pier?!" Au revoir, VPji—or, better still: Thank you—and goodbye! ●

SONDEEP SHANKAR

The views expressed in this column are those of its author and do not purport to constitute an official statement of the Congress party's position

Who wouldn't want to earn upto 10.94%* interest on his monthly savings instead of the usual 5%?

The ANZ Grindlays Hi-Performance Savings Account offers upto 10.94%*. Not just 5% that an ordinary Savings Account offers. Plus the freedom to withdraw upto 75% against your accumulated monthly savings. Anytime. By cheque.

You pay 2% interest (above base rate earned) on withdrawals.

To open an account, your average monthly savings should be Rs.1,000/- or more. Call or visit us today. Or mail the coupon now.

HI-PERFORMANCE SAVINGS ACCOUNT. THE ONLY ACCOUNT OF ITS KIND IN YOUR CITY.

EARN UPTO 10.94%*

GRINDLAYS HI-PERFORMANCE SAVINGS ACCOUNT

Grindlays Hi-Performance Savings Account is a brand name of ANZ Grindlays Bank plc and includes a package of services

*10.94% is the compounded interest rate on a 3 year Recurring Deposit on a base rate of 10%.

SDY

Marketing Manager – India, ANZ Grindlays Bank, 132 Mint Road, Bombay 400 001

Yes, I want to earn more on my savings through your Hi-Performance Savings Account.

Please send me more information/an Account Opening Form

Name. _____

Address. _____

_____

Phone: _____

ANZ Grindlays Bank

ANZ GRINDLAYS MAIN BRANCHES: BOMBAY – 90 M.G. ROAD, PH: 270165. CALCUTTA – 19 N.S. ROAD, PH. 208346. NEW DELHI – 10 SANSAD MARG, PH. 312004 MADRAS – 19 RAJAJI SALAI, PH: 589131 AMRITSAR – GANDHI BAZAR, PH: 43217. BANGALORE – MISSION ROAD PH: 220300 COCHIN – BRISTOW ROAD, PH. 69582 DARJEELING – 49 LADEN LA ROAD, PH: 2777. GUWAHATI – FANCY BAZAR, PH. 27018 HYDERABAD – 5-9-234 ABIDS, PH. 237506 KANPUR – 16 M.G. ROAD, PH. 211462 SHIMLA – THE MALL, PH: 3025. SRINAGAR – SHERWANI ROAD, PH: 76935 TUTICORIN – 44 BEACH ROAD, PH. 20817

SPEER 28 192 90

Taking a walk

Will V.P. Singh's padayatra in Punjab disarm the terrorists?

Prime Minister V.P. Singh had made stirring speeches promising to heal the wounds of Punjab. They were fine words as long as the euphoria over unseating the Congress(I) lasted. But hardly anything has changed in Punjab since V.P. Singh replaced Rajiv Gandhi. If anything, terrorist killings have taken a turn for the worse.

The Prime Minister plans to walk through the terrorist-infested rural areas early this month. He is convinced that the gesture will win more hearts than similar padayatras undertaken in the past by Baba Amte, Sunil Dutt and Acharya Sushil Muni. "This time I will not return from Punjab until I have won your hearts," V.P. Singh told a gathering at the border village of Lopoke. "In fact, I would prefer dying in Punjab for this is a land of martyrs," he added.

But can a padayatra alone help,if he cannot follow it up with a determined effort to fulfil popular demands and isolate the terrorists? After all, his earlier visit to the Golden Temple in an open jeep eight months ago had also generated enormous goodwill. But he made no attempt to capitalise on it.

Punjab is a challenge the Prime Minister has refused to face squarely. The National Front government's policy on Punjab—if there is one—hasn't gone beyond rhetoric and emotional outpouring. The government has failed to check the entry of Pakistan-trained terrorists and restore the political process as it had promised.

The PM's idea of walking through the Punjab villages, however, is being praised as a courageous gesture. Many see it as a sign that elections will be held to the state Assembly in the near future. The padayatra is aimed at ending the alienation of the masses. The home ministry officials see in it an immense scope of "grassroots interaction" for the PM.

V.P. Singh's proposed initiative has been timed to coincide with the confusion in the ranks of the Akalis. Both Simranjeet Singh Mann and Prakash Singh Badal—whom the government had thought of installing as the CM at different times—have made themselves irrelevant to the state's politics. Mann has developed a reputation for antics each time somebody else steals the limelight. Even Atinder Pal Singh, MP,had complained against Mann to the underground Panthic Committee after his release from Tihar Jail.

The chairman of the committee, Dr Sohan Singh, subsequently, questioned Mann's background and integrity. Mann immediately resigned from the presidentship of the Akali Dal (Mann) and from the Lok Sabha. Atinder Pal believed that Mann had persuaded the V.P. Singh government to delay his release from jail. According to Atinder Pal, Mann feared that he would emerge as his political competitor. And the Panthic Committee was inclined to believe Atinder Pal.

Mann's resignation (which he withdrew following pressure from party colleagues) proved that Akali politics today is run according to the whims of the militants. The Panthic Committee's criticism stemmed from its disapproval of the Akali Dal (Mann)'s constitutional ways of struggle, even though its goal was the right to self-determination. The committee's assertion that it would recognise only the struggle waged for the freedom of the Khalsa Panth stemmed from its suspicion that the Akali Dal (Mann) would contest the Assembly elections and join the political mainstream. Again, it was in order to comply with the militants' opposition to constitutional politics that Mann quit his seat in the Lok Sabha.

The militants are also furious at the move to revive the Punjab Assembly through a writ petition in the Punjab and Haryana High Court in Chandigarh. Ironically, the very politicians who had expressed relief at the dismissal of the Assembly in 1987 are now trying to revive it. The leaders of Akali Dal (Badal) are now engaged in discussions with the Akali Dal (Longowal) about a possible move to revive the Assembly.

V.P. Singh talking to Punjab villagers: preparing the ground for his new venture

While the drift in Punjab continues, the terrorists are becoming increasingly dangerous. They have now started attacking army units patrolling the border areas, where they have their hideouts. Recently, they fired on jawans of the Bihar regiment. Already, the army in Punjab has been placed on full alert. And a number of anti-insurgency units, which took part in the IPKF operation in Sri Lanka, have been sent to Punjab. But whether they will succeed in containing the terrorists remains a debatable matter. ●

Nirmal Mitra/New Delhi

MAHESH JETHMALANI

Leaks, plants and lies

In defence of the much-maligned Bofors investigation

The manner in which recent events concerned with the Bofors investigation have been portrayed by a section of the press cannot but serve to leave an innocent, though interested, reader with the rather unfortunate impression that far from exposing corruption in the highest echelons of the previous regime, the entire issue may well be a disappointing damp squib. Worse is the suggestion, by this very section of the press, that Bofors was a mere tool, and Rajiv Gandhi and the Bachchan brothers convenient scapegoats used by Mr V.P. Singh to elevate himself to the post of Prime Minister. The National Front investigation into the matter is depicted as no more than political vendetta, which received its deserved come-uppance in two court decisions—the rejecton by the Cantonal Court of Geneve of the Letter Rogatory filed by the CBI in respect of six entities holding accounts in Switzerland, and Ajitabh Bachchan's much celebrated victory over the Swedish newspaper Dagens Nyheter in the London courts.

On the Swiss ruling, criticism has essentially been of two varieties. The harshest protagonists of the first kind are none other than Vir Sanghvi, the editor of SUNDAY, and of all persons, Chitra Subramaniam who has sedulously assisted the Bofors team in its investigation in Switzerland. The burden of their theme has been that the Letter Rogatory submitted by the CBI was naive and clumsy in the extreme. This criticism is, in fact, directed against members of the Bofors team itself and focuses particularly on the

THE CRITICS

For someone so closely associated with the Bofors team, the public rebuke administered to her colleagues is the unkindest cut

His theory that the investigators have reached a dead-end is misconceived, erroneous and devoid of logic

This magazine has done a marvellous demolition job on the Bofors team executed with professional ruthlessness and efficiency manner in which the Letter Rogatory, the First Information Report (FIR) and the accompanying documents were drafted and submitted. Significantly, neither of these criticisms questions the motives behind the entire investigation. This, however, is their only saving grace, for otherwise, they are unwarranted, if not downright unfair. The most unfortunate part is that because of their ad hominium thrust, the claim that the criticisms stem from genuine concern about the fate of the investigation and no more, does sound a little suspect. Mr Sanghvi's compunctions are hard to understand. Having pursued the Bofors investigations for three years, he has suddenly changed his tune. The rejection by the Geneve Cantonal Court of the CBI's Letter Rogatory furnished Mr Sanghvi a splendid opportunity to discredit the Bofors team, which he could hardly be expected to spurn. Both before and after the order of the Geneve court, he has spared no effort to tell us what he thinks about the competence of the team. In issue after issue of this magazine, the investigators have been portrayed as a bunch of bungling detectives whose efficiency is so pathetic as to almost lead to the impression that they are acting at the behest of the real beneficiaries of the Bofors commissions. Mr Sanghvi has done a marvellous demolition job on the Bofors team, executed with professional ruthlessness and efficiency.

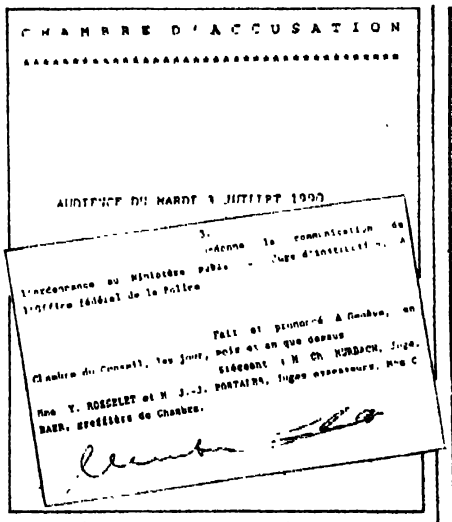
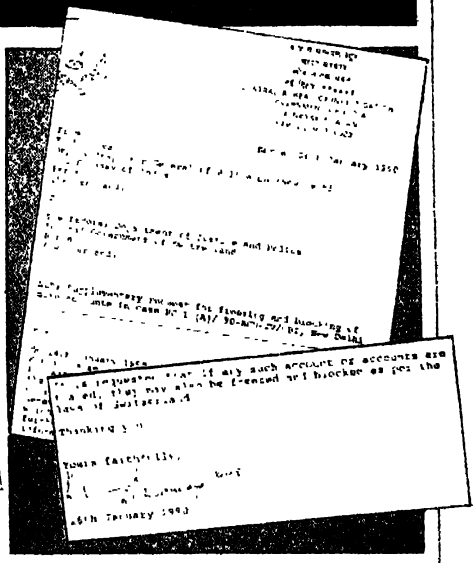
Ms Subramaniam's motivations are considerably more difficult to decipher. Her indictment of the Bofors team in her article of 7 July, carried on the front page of the Indian Express, was savage in the extreme. For someone so closely associated with the Bofors team during the course of its investigation, the public rebuke administered to her colleagues must appear to the latter to be the unkindest cut of the Et-tu-Brute variety. Significantly, she chose to attack her colleagues after the Geneve Cantonal Court had delivered its judgment. Was her ex-post-facto wisdom about her co-investigators' lack of competence in dealing with such delicate matters as letter rogatories, no more than an attempt to distance herself from the setback in the investigation, which the Geneve Cantonal Court order was bound to be perceived as?



But how substantial are the criticisms levelled by Mr Sanghvi and Ms Subramaniam? Is the Bofors investigating team really as blame-worthy for the rejection of the Letter Rogatory submitted to the Geneve court as it is made out to be? Indeed, why was the Letter Rogatory defective, and can its rejection be attributed to the incompetence of or the lack of expertise on the part of the investigating team?

From what has appeared in the Indian press including Ms Subramaniam's own article of 7 July in the Indian Express, the objections of the Geneve court to the Letter Rogatory seem to be technical and trivial. An Indian



THE INVESTIGATORS

Ultimately, the responsibility for the Letter Rogatory lies with the learned special judge who gave it its final shape

The Geneve court's objections to the Letter Rogatory seem to be technical and trivial. An Indian judge would have overlooked them

An honest man should welcome an investigation. Just because somebody is listed as a suspect doesn't mean he's guilty

It is now clear that the Hindujas were involved in Bofors. They have been linked to the Pitco/Moresco payments codenamed Tulip judge, more concerned with substantial justice, would perhaps have overlooked these. Several of the objections of the Geneve court pertain to defects of translation into German and French. Some objections pertain to mistakes in paging, and some to the existence of annotations in ball-pen.

Yet some others pertain to doubts and misconceptions which the Geneve court entertained on Indian law and procedure. Unfortunately, there was no representative of the investigating team who could clarify these across the Bar, since nobody was permitted to remain present. None of the objections are so grave as to cast doubts on the efficiency of the Bofors investigating team. The members of the team operating as they were in an unfamiliar jurisdiction could hardly have foreseen the ultra-technical requirements of that jurisdiction. In short, no blame can attach to them for not having attended a Swiss legal finishing school. The situation at the most calls for greater coordination with the CBI's retained lawyer in Switzerland, Marc Bonnant.

Further, it is important also to remember that the Letter Rogatory and accompanying documents were merely submitted by the CBI to the special judge in Delhi, Shri R.C. Jain. It was the special judge who moulded the Letter Rogatory, gave it final shape and signed it. Ultimately, the responsibility for the Letter Rogatory lies with the learned special judge, for, it was he who issued the same to the Swiss courts. Once the Letter Rogatory bore the imprimatur of the learned special judge, the CBI could hardly be expected to alter its form and tenor.

One criticism of Ms Subramaniam—though not of the Geneve court itself—centres round the First Information Report (FIR). According to Ms Subramaniam, the Swiss court considered the FIR to be tediously prolix. While this may or may not be true, it is unlikely that an Indian court would have joined issue on the FIR on this account. The FIR in the Bofors case is no more or less prolix than most of the FIRs prepared by investigating authorities and lodged in Indian courts.

In any event, it ought not to have been too difficult for the Geneve court judge to cull out the essential ingredients of the offence from the FIR. Once again, the investigating team can hardly be blamed for a foreign judge's inability to summarise the bare essentials of an offence from a lengthy Indian document. The FIR, a uniquely Indian document, was bound to be prepared in accordance with the prevailing conventions in this country.

A second variety of criticism regarding the Swiss court order is of the doomsday-prophet variety. This variety has its best exponent in Pritish Nandy. Mr Nandy's interpretation of the order is that the Swiss court has not merely sought further clarifications from the Indian government, but "has clearly and unequivocally turned down the request for judicial assistance sought by the Indian authorities..." According to Mr Nandy, the Swiss court in its order has insisted on evidence of actual corruption before they admit a request for judicial assistance, which, he says, "means that the Indian government has 60 days to prove that civil servants have been actually bribed by Bofors and initiate prosecution against them before the investigations can go further". It is Mr Nandy's considered opinion that the investigating agencies have reached a dead end on Bofors.

This extremist interpretation is—fortunately—misconceived and erroneous. His views are not shared either by the Swiss police assisting the Bofors investigating team, nor even by Mr Sanghvi or Ms Subramaniam. Further, a fresh Letter Rogatory, which is to be submitted to the Geneve court complying with the form required, is awaiting final touches in India. This Letter Rogatory has been prepared without the Indian government going through the exercise of proving that civil servants have been bribed and initiating prosecution against them in India, as Mr Nandy would have us believe were the Swiss court's directive.

Moreover, Mr Nandy's theory is devoid of logic. The entire procedure, commencing with the tendering of a Letter Rogatory to the Swiss authorities, is for the purpose of seeking judicial assistance in the matter of uncovering recipients of illegal commissions which have been stashed in Swiss banks. The assistance of the court is being sought to discover the recipients, so that they can be prosecuted in India. Mr Nandy has given us to understand that it is incumbent upon the Indian government to prosecute named recipients and then seek legal assistance from the Swiss courts. Indeed, if the Indian government were possessed of proof regarding the identity of the recipients of kickbacks, there would hardly be any need to approach the Swiss courts for any assistance under the treaty. Mr Nandy's views do not make for good sense or good Treaty Law.

While the Geneve court decision, then, has been subjected to grossly distorted and unwarranted interpretation, the interpretation of the English court decision in Ajitabh Bachchan vs Dagens Nyheter must surely furnish an object lesson in disinformation and the art of securing maximum propaganda advantage from an innocuous event. The pro-Bachchan press would have us believe that capitulation by a Swedish newspaper in an English court on facts constituting the subject matter of an Indian investigation (and, therefore, within the special and exclusive knowledge of the Indian investigators) is tantamount to conclusively establishing the innocence of the Bachchan brothers in l'affaire Bofors apart from exposing a vindictive investigation. Such inferences may well be permissible in the heady celluloid world which Mr Amitabh Bachchan is so accustomed to. But, in the rather more disciplined realm of law and criminal justice, such conclusions are a non sequitur.

The interpretation of the Bachchan case must surely furnish an object lesson in disinformation and the act of securing maximum propaganda advantage

Let us first consider the facts with which the Dagens Nyheter decision was concerned. The Bofors investigating team visited Berne in Switzerland, in the last week of January this year. A short while thereafter—on 31 January—Dagens Nyheter carried an item in which they alleged that a sixth account had been discovered by the Bofors investigating team, into which some of the commissions paid by Bofors had been deposited. Dagens Nyheter categorically asserted that the holder of this account was Ajitabh Bachchan.

Of considerable significance is the fact that in the said article itself, the paper unambiguously stated that the information was provided by "sources with detailed access to the Indian bribery investigation". Of commensurate importance is the fact that the article also recorded that the CBI had not confirmed that Ajitabh did indeed hold the sixth account.

Ajitabh Bachchan initiated an action for libel against Dagens Nyheter in the High Court of London in respect of the article. On 19 July this year, a settlement was arrived at. Dagens Nyheter offered to pay an undisclosed sum to Ajitabh Bachchan who generously announced that he would donate it to charity. Dagens Nyheter stated that the information for the article was derived from "a source directly connected with the Indian investigation".

The latter statement by the paper has been seized upon by Amitabh's media supporters to suggest that the article in Dagens Nyheter was based on information furnished by a member of the Bofors investigating team, and probably, Mr Arun Jaitley, additional solicitor general.

The investigators, operating as they were in an unfamiliar environment, can hardly be blamed for not having attended a Swiss legal finishing school

This contention is not only tendentious but manifestly untenable. On Dagens' own admission, it is impossible that any member of the Bofors investigating team could have been the source of this article. In the article, the paper recorded that its information was derived from sources close to the investigating team and not the investigating team itself. Why then, did it eventually agree to alter this admission to one which could encompass in its sweep members of the Bofors investigating team?

The answer is not far to seek. There simply was not enough material in Dagens Nyheter's possession on the basis of which it could be said that the sixth account uncovered in Switzerland belonged to Ajitabh Bachchan. In the article, Dagens claimed that it was acting on information obtained from sources close to the Indian investigating team. The paper may have been misled by its source in either one of two ways: the source may have conveyed as fact to the newspaper what to the Bofors investigating team was only a legitimate line of investigation. Alternatively, if the Bofors investigating team was possessed of proof that the sixth account belonged to Ajitabh Bachchan, it was unlikely that it would share it with anybody outside the team, including Dagens' "source" no matter how close that individual was to them.

Left, therefore, with no defence to the libel action, Dagens rephrased the description of the source of its article. Significantly, it refused to name Arun Jaitley as its source. In other words, it was willing to go to the trial if Ajitabh's counsel had insisted that Arun Jaitley be named as the source. Contrary to what Mr Bachchan has been insinuating in post-trial interviews, Mr Arun Jaitley cannot be the source of the Dagens article. There is only one person who fits into both the descriptions furnished by the newspaper regarding its source. For the time being, the identity need not be disclosed.

What did the compromise in Ajitabh vs Dagens really amount to? Flushed with his brother's victory, Amitabh claimed that "India has been shamed in a London court". Surely this is excessive licence even for a filmi script. There was no question of India having been shamed in an English court, for, neither the State nor the Government of India were represented in that court. Amitabh's is a prime example of a flag-waving man, waiving what the flag stands for. Not only, however, is Amitabh guilty of spreading disinformation and attempting to strike an amusingly patriotic note in aid of that disinformation, but his untenable interpretation of the London court judgement cannot but be viewed as an attempt to intimidate the investigating team. And consequently, an attempt to obstruct the course of justice.

In actual fact, Ajitabh's victory in the London court could well be a pyrrhic one. Ultimately, all that he received from Dagens was an undisclosed sum and an unnamed source. It is inconceivable that the undisclosed sum could, in fact, be no more than the lowest coin in the realm i.e. a farthing. In such an event, all that Ajitabh is left with is an unnamed source, and with little to donate to charity. But, even if the undisclosed sum is substantial, Ajitabh's charitable intentions must fail to impress, for, we all know what the favourite charities of the Bachchans are.

There can be no doubt that the Bachchan brothers must necessarily figure as suspects in any investigation into Bofors. The Hindujas have been linked to at least one of the streams of payment made to the Pitco/Moresco group, viz. Tulip. The Bachchans are known to be close to the Hindujas and have had financial dealings with them. Amitabh has made donations amounting to 1/3rd of his income in a year, to the Hinduja Foundation. The Hindujas, in turn, have financed several films starring Amitabh Bachchan.

In addition, the Bachchan brothers are extremely close friends of Rajiv Gandhi who finally concluded the Bofors deal. Ajitabh Bachchan was abroad shortly after and during the time some of the commissions were paid up by Bofors. He, admittedly, is the holder of an apartment in Switzerland, into the banks of which country the commissions were paid. In proceedings under the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act (FERA) concerning the acquisition of this apartment, Ajitabh has admitted that the flat stands in his name, but stated that the money was furnished by a foreign company and a foreign national.

The previous regime of Rajiv Gandhi accepted this contention and exonerated Ajitabh in a palpably absurd order. A review of that order has been sought by the present regime. In proceedings under FERA, Ajitabh has not disclosed the bank accounts from which those payments were made. If the payments can be traced to accounts which directly or indirectly received part of the Bofors commissions, then the case against Ajitabh would be transformed from one of reasonable suspicion to one of conclusive proof. The Bofors investigating team can legitimately pursue this line of investigation. To be a suspect is not to be a criminal. An innocent man would welcome such an investigation into his affairs, for, it would establish his innocence.

There's no doubt that Arun Jaitley did not leak the story about Ajitabh to Dagens Nyheter. Only one person could have done so—but more about that later

The Bachchans' conduct subsequent to the National Front assuming power has only served to enhance suspicions about their role in Bofors. The moment the Bofors team was constituted, Amitabh's hitherto infrequent interviews to the press became common-place and they all dealt with his innocence in the Bofors affair. His famous missives to the Prime Minister were addressed at about the time the Bofors team uncovered the sixth account in Switzerland. The Bachchans travelled to Switzerland to meet Chitra Subramaniam, during the course of which meeting, they undoubtedly attempted to elicit information regarding the sixth account, while simultaneously protesting their innocence and suggesting they were the victims of a frame-up.

They obviously expected the Bofors team to discover some documentary evidence, since Amitabh asked rhetorically in public as to what his fate would be if someone actually involved in Bofors attempted to forge documents to implicate him. If documents implicating the Bachchan brothers in the Bofors affair are, or come, in the possession of the Bofors team, we know what the Bachchan's defence is likely to be. In short, Amitabh's behaviour in public was scarcely that of an innocent man.

The good news then, for all those who are interested in the truth about Bofors emerging in the near future, is that notwithstanding the Geneve court order rejecting the Indian Letter Rogatory, the Bofors investigation is alive and kicking, the order itself merely amounting to a request for compliance with proper form. The bad news—for the Bachchan brothers—is that while they may continue in misconceived fashion to console themselves that the London court order constitutes a first-round victory for them, it remains to be seen whether they can last the distance. ●

Mahesh Jethmalani, the author of this essay is a Bombay-based barrister and a member of the Bharatiya Janata Party. He is SUNDAY's newest columnist.

Country pleasures

Rural retreats are the latest craze in Bangalore

Delhi's elite has its country homes—so what if it is only a farmhouse in Mehrauli? And Bangalore, the garden city of the south, now has its country clubs. Set amidst sprawling acres of verdant green and boasting such facilities as swimming pools, swank restaurants, billiards rooms, meditation centres and—most important—exclusive membership, these rural retreats have become the place to be seen in. And predictably, everyone who is anyone is queueing up to join.

One of the more talked about places is Shankar Nag's Country Club which was inaugurated on 24 August. A highly successful actor in Kannada cinema Nag had been sitting on a 15-acre plot for years when a friend suggested that he put it to good use by opening a country club. With a bit of help from his friends and massive loans from outside Nag set about the task.

The actor feels that it is the lack of social activity in Bangalore that accounts for the concept taking off so well. "Besides films, what is there," he asks. This, added to the fact that there is no place near Bangalore which is ideal for a quick getaway makes Nag confident that his club will be a roaring success.

If the number of hopefuls queueing up for membership is any indication, Nag's confidence is sure to be vindicated several times over. Such is the clamour for entry into these clubs that when memberships went on offer, there was a tremendous rush, despite the fact that Nag had made it clear that no more than 200 would be taken in. Even though the admission fee was a steep Rs 15,000 Nag received no less than 3,000 applications.

The only hitch, as far as Nag was concerned, was the fantastic sums of money he had to put into the project. The initial outlay of Rs 1.5 crores was soon exhausted and the completion of the project meant added expenditure to the tune of Rs 1.5 crores. But raising the money is the least of Nag's worries: "We worked out the economics and saw that we needed at least 2,000 members to make it click." So, the actor has decided to lift the 200-member ceiling and will take in another 1,800, who will be charged a whopping Rs 25,000 for life membership. "Believe me, there are any number of takers," he discloses.

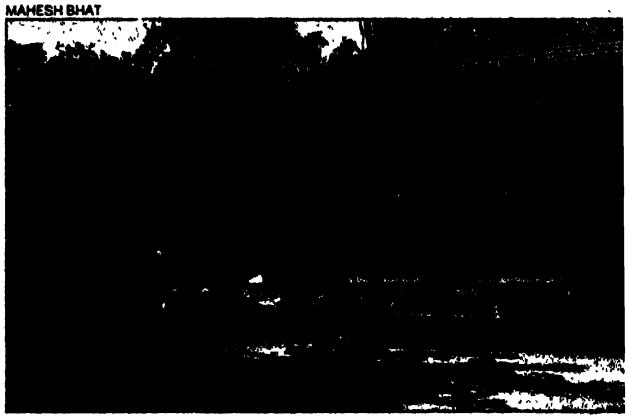
One look at the club, though, and the amount of money spent on it seems totally justified. Designed by architects from Pune the club buildings are attractively modern, yet blend into the scenic environment with ease. The white building with the wide arches and tiled roofs is an elegant departure from the Bania Byzantine school of architecture so popular today. The pool, for instance, looks straight out of a James Bond movie, with a bar situated bang in the middle. The coffee shop, too, is unusually designed, built on the lines of small hut-like shelters with an artificial lake in the centre.

In keeping with the current ethnic craze there is also a rustic corner. The food served here is derived from the typical recipes of Karnataka farmers: Ragi Mudde (millet balls) Akki (Rice) rotis and the like. The old wooden door, salvaged from the granary of a

MAHESH BHAT

Shankar Nag (inset) and his country clubs the ideal getaway

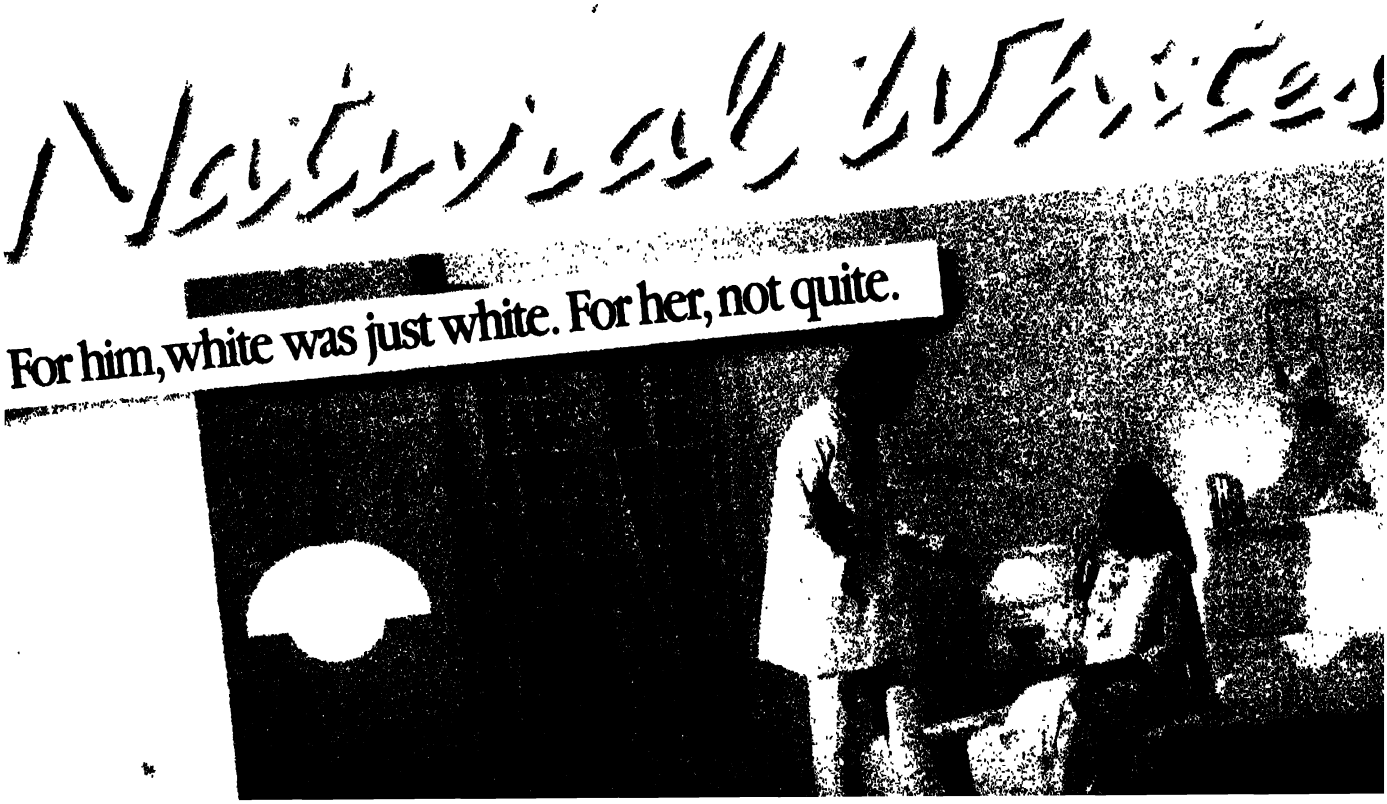
Kerala palace which was being demolished, helps create the right ambience.



Entertainment will not be lacking at the club either. While there is a discotheque for the jivers there will also be local artistes coming over from the neighbouring villages to play their rustic tunes. But if a Bhimsen Joshi or a Bismillah Khan is scheduled to perform at the club there is a theatre for them as well. As with the rest of the structures this is not in the regular arch format with a stage at one end. Modelled on ancient Greek lines, the amphitheatre comprises a huge pit in the centre for the performers with stones jutting out at irregular levels making up the seating arrangement for the audience.

Nag is certain that his club will become the ideal spot not just for leisure activities but also serve as a weekend resort and conference centre. For which purposes Nag is also setting up another massive banquet hall.

That there's money in country clubs is beyond doubt. Or why would the liquor barons, Khodays, move in for a slice of the market? The Khoday's club will be built on a much larger scale, though. Sprawled over 100 acres on the outskirts of the city, the project is expected to cost over Rs 12 crores. And its sophisticated fixtures are sure to provide stiff competition to Shankar's more humble outfit. Called Country Club and Village Resort the Khoday's project is due to start operations in a year and a half's time. It will have an 18-hole golf course, a skating rink, an artificial lake equipped with a wave making machine, water cascades, musical fountains, rope chair cars and—believe it or not—a robot service.



If the number of hopefuls queueing up for membership is anything to go by, country clubs are the latest status symbol

MAHESH BHAT

Designed by some Delhi architects, the club is set in the midst of two hillocks. The emphasis is on creating an illusion of sweeping space and panoramic views. Exquisitely set out Japanese gardens with the most extraordinary landscaping are just a few of the embellishments that the club boasts of. The Khodays too hope to recover their input in five years time by taking in about 5,000 members.

The manner in which Bangalore's elite is lining up for membership seems to suggest that there is a dearth

The exclusivity of such institutions as the Bangalore Club remains. But the new rural retreats have their own market of clubs in the city. But, in fact, Bangalore has always had several clubs. Besides the old and exclusive Bangalore Club there is the Century Club. (When the Bangalore Club was considered the bastion of the British, the Indians got together and opened their own club—The Century Club.) The Bowring Institute is another club dating from the days of the Raj.

But since these have long frozen their memberships, or have a ceiling, those who wanted to break into the club circuit found they had nowhere to go. Added to this was the growth of Bangalore as south India's boom city. The burgeoning population, the escalation of commercial activity in the city all created a class of people who were very eager to achieve the kind of exclusivity that membership to a club invariably brings.

Country clubs were the logical answer to such a need. While the good clubs in the city offer all the traditional services associated with clubs like a bar, library, swimming pool, they often lack such extravagant features as the meditation centre at Shankar Nag's club. While a club in the city suffices for an evening out country clubs offer a complete break from routine.

And their restricted membership imparts an air of exclusivity to them. For scores of social climbers in the boom city this is the most irresistible part of the deal. Moreover, country clubs claim that they will not enrol anyone who is already a member of the city clubs. Though, one suspects, that if they are rich and influential enough they can get past such obstacles.

But there is no denying the country clubs are where the action is, these days. Apart from Shankar Nag's club and the Khoday's club, which is still under construction, there are many others in the conceptualisation stage. One hotelier, for instance, has bought land near the airport for setting up a country club. And if it does come up, there will be no dearth of takers. As a market survey undertaken by the Khodays before they launched on their country club project revealed, there is a tremendous market out there, just waiting to be tapped. •

Gayatri Laxman/Bangalore

Right on target

Archery is a form of gambling in Meghalaya

As the last rays of the sun cast a charming spell over the picturesque town of Shillong, Meghalaya's capital, crowds begin to pour into the Polo Grounds. Every evening, the lush green field overlooking the majestic Khasi Hills wears a festive look. Makeshift stalls, selling food and the precious archery tickets, are always jammed with men, women and children. And as the much-awaited archery competition gets underway, all eyes turn towards the archers and the target. The show lasts for barely 15 minutes, but the enthusiasm it generates throughout Meghalaya and other neighbouring states of the north-east surpasses that of any other popular sport.

There is a reason for the craze though. The archery game—known as Thoh Teem or just Tir in local parlance—is a form of gambling, legalised by the government of Meghalaya in 1982. The most attractive aspect of the game is that the rules are very simple and it is extremely easy to make quick money. For instance, in just over 15 minutes one could make as much as Rs 5,000 by investing a meagre Re one. What is more, since the entire operation is controlled and supervised by the government, there are no chances of foul play: the winner is paid his due on the spot with the minimum amount of fuss. No wonder, gambling has become part of the Khasis' social and cultural ethos. And its popularity keeps growing by the day.

Take a hint. Though the government has set up stalls throughout Shillong and in other towns of the state, there is a great rush since morning to acquire tickets from the numerous licensed bookies. The shooting time has also been adjusted to suit office-goers: between 4.30 pm and 5 pm. What is more, one could even bet from places as distant as Itanagar in Arunachal Pradesh, Imphal in Manipur or Guwahati in Assam over the telephone. And, according to S. Pal, a bookie, "We receive hundreds of calls everyday from these places. Our phones just keep ringing all the time." And since the stakes are pretty high, there is no dearth of those willing to gamble.

Archery has always been traditional to Meghalaya. It is a form of tribal sport and the bow and arrow are symbols of Khasi culture. In the olden days too, the sport was used by many to gamble. In fact, one reason why the state government decided to get into the gambling business was because of the huge amount of money that was changing hands at the shooting sites. Today, the sales and excise department of the government virtually runs the show. However, the state authorities have restricted their involvement to just making the rules for the game, the printing and distribution of tickets and the appointment of bookies and organisers. The actual show is conducted by these licenced organisers.

The rules and regulations for the betting are all laid down in great detail in the book, Taxation Laws in Assam and Meghalaya. The government has chosen three shooting sites in the state: one each in Shillong, Jowai and Khanapara. But the one in Shillong is by far the most popular. Shooting takes place everyday except on Sundays and religious

An archer takes aim: tension all around

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

(From left) People crowd around the archers; a ticket booth doing brisk business: a popular sport

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

The arrows being counted: nervous moment for the gamblers holidays. The price of tickets ranges between 25 paise and Rs 20. And for every rupee invested, a winner gets Rs 80. The rates are even higher for a jackpot: Rs 4,444 for a rupee.

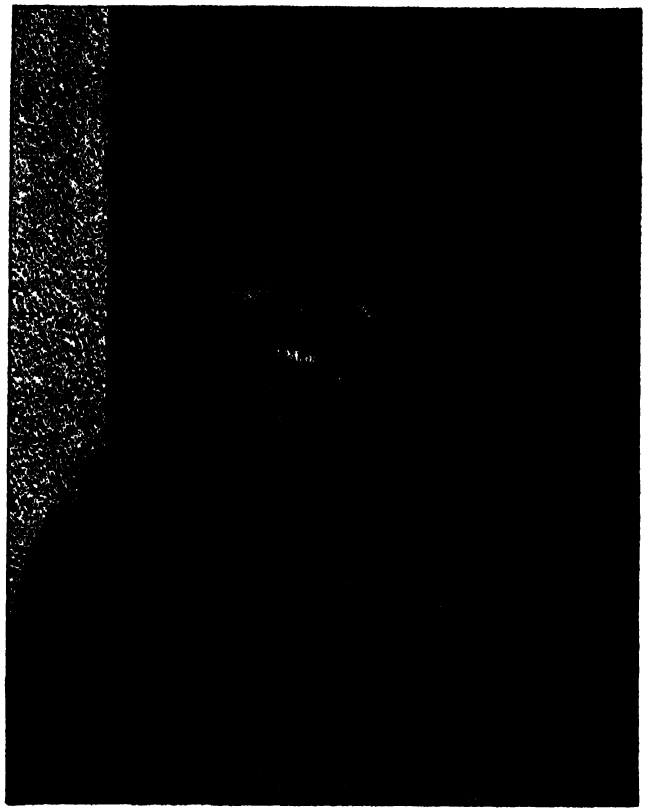
The rules are all too explicit regarding the conduct of the game. Between 30 and 50 archers appointed by the organisers—all archery clubs—can take part. Initially, appointment of archers was the sole prerogative of the associations. But, when charges of foul play were levelled against the clubs by the bookies' association, the government stepped in and allowed the latter to appoint 20 archers. Today, 50 archers take part in the shooting: 30 from the organisers and another 20 from the bookies' association.

The game is played over two rounds. Both the rounds are identical. The archers—all aged Khasi tribals—sit around a target, made of stuffed banana tree, and start shooting arrows at random. Round one ends when between 700 and 2,000 arrows have been shot. The organisers then count the arrows which have hit the target. The winning number is determined after the first digit of the number of arrows which have hit the spot is deleted. And if the number of successful hits exceed 1,000, the first two digits are deleted. (Example: if 622 arrows have hit the target, the winning number is 22). Round two is the same. This stage is, however, important because of the jackpot.

Government sources are extremely tight-lipped regarding the amount of money that changes hands at the shooting centres every day. All they are willing to reveal is that the government levies a 20 per cent amusement and betting tax on the stake money. The bookies, however, are not that secretive. Informed S. Pal, who has been in the business for the last 22 years: "Though it is difficult to ascertain how much money is spent every day as there is a lot of illegal betting as well, I can safely say that as much as Rs 4 to Rs 5 lakhs change hands every day in Shillong alone." Other bookies feel much the same.

There is no doubt that the government, too, must be netting in a tidy sum. But moralists have raised a hue and cry over the government virtually promoting a social evil. The authorities, however, counter such an argument. They maintain that if horse-racing is legitimate, why protest against archery? In any case, the people of Meghalaya have gambled at the shooting sites since the beginning of this century. The government stepped in only to ensure that the rules of the game were observed and the people got their due. "We used to get a lot of complaints from the masses. And since there was no way we could ban the gambling since it was in the tradition of the Khasis, we did the next best thing and ensured that the game was played fairly," said a state government spokesman.

And so the archery competitions continue. And people continue to try their luck in the hope of becoming rich overnight. •



Rajiv Bagchi/Shillong

Sonu Walia and beefier-than-thou Vinod Khanna are coming together again. The last time they acted together was for Mahadev.

In those days, of course, the noted drunk was going around with Amrita Singh—she of the vaguely equestrian features. And on being confronted with talk of the special vibes that Sonu and Vinod were sharing, the formidable Ms Singh bristled, as only a furious sardarni can, and called Sonu a cheap floozie. Not long after this incident the Vinod Khanna-Amrita Singh combine broke up.

Now that there is talk of Vinod and Sonu starring in Hema Malini's home production, to be directed by Aruna Raje of Rihaee fame, Kavita Daftary-Khanna should gear herself for a tough battle ahead.

What makes the matter just a trifle more complicated this time is that director Aruna is not one who believes in playing coy games with the audiences. So, no shots of a flock of birds flying off towards the sky or fresh blooms appearing in the scene in place of the real stuff. She obviously believes in supplying the real totally unadulterated stuff in her impeccably adult manner.

Vinod Khanna (left) and Sonu Walia: that old magic...

Not that the audiences will be complaining, but the new Mrs Khanna is extremely worried.

Babita, the one Kapoor bahu who never took kindly to her forced retirement from films, is hell bent on making her daughter Karishma achieve the superstardom she missed.

So what's new? Just another sordid saga of an ambitious parent getting her kicks from her child.

But such is Babita's growing despair to launch Karishma that, recently, she pulled out her daughter from the film that she was supposed to star with Dharamendra's younger son Bobby, and went ahead and signed up Bhappi Sonie's Nischay opposite Salman Khan, the better box-office bet. This did not please Dharam too much.

It seems likely that Babita will end up in quite a mess in her hurry to prove her point. For going around troubling powerful benefactors like Dharamendra is not going to make her task any easier.

Ashwini Bhave: playing second fiddle to Zeba

Shakti Kapoor is on a different high these days. (As distinct from his alcoholic highs.) The actor is elated because of the encouraging response he has received from fans for his performance of a homosexual in Veeru Dada. He claims that he has received 300 international trunk calls and 250 telegrams from fans and admirers congratulating him on his performance.

Of course most of it is straight fan mail, you know, like the kind he used to get in the good old days when he played a tough cookie. But then that was before he took it upon himself to be Hindi cinema's pioneer gay! And no he can't deny that he has also received enthusiastic response from gay organisations abroad.

Enthusiastic responses or overtures?

The second female lead of Henna has at last been finalised. And that puts an end to the hopes a lot of starlets had pinned to the project. The lucky girl is Ashwini Bhave, a Marathi stage and film actress, who was also seen in a couple of TV serials like Apne Paraye, Jantar Mantar, and Ek Kahani. Earlier girls like Neelam and Juhi Chawla were being considered for the role, but neither of them were too keen to play second fiddle to Zeba. Ashwini suffers from no such starry hang-ups. She is too excited about her imminent trip to Switzerland for the shooting of the film, anyway. ●

Practice makes perfect

Ila Arun's Riyaz goes down well with the audience

A new, offbeat, relatively unknown theatre group is making a name for itself in a place not particularly famous for serious Hindi drama. The group: Surnai. The place: Bombay. And the critics: fulsome in their praise. Dolly Thakore wrote that their play "certainly makes one sit up in amazement", while Kavita Singh applauded Surnai's "move away from empty hilarity, usually referred to as entertainment" in Bombay.

Surnai, a small and close-knit troupe, has writer Ila Arun, director K.K. Raina and designer Vijay Kashyap as its core members. All three act, and their faces are all too familiar to television viewers. Ila Arun, who hails from Rajasthan, composes lyrics and music and sings; Raina is best known for his work in films with Benegal; and Kashyap often doubles as director in addition to conceiving of and executing sets and lights.

Their brief career spans five productions. They began with two successes based on Rajasthani folklore, A Musical Sandstorm and Jethwa-Ujli, followed by Ila Arun's original script Riyaz. Lately, they have adapted two rather obscure European plays—the existentialist Albert Camus' The Just (translated as Jayaz-Najayaz) and the Soviet writer Arbuzov's Success Woman (Hindi title, Parten). But there's no doubting the troupe's sincerity. Surnai is so dedicated and meticulous that it reportedly spent eight months on The Just which is particularly relevant now because it deals with extremists deciding to do away with a government official.

But, Surnai's biggest success has been Riyaz, most of all because it heralds a new voice—Ila Arun—in Indian playwriting, which hasn't had too many talented young entrants of late. It has won over average Bombay spectators accustomed to watching and expecting mirch-masala melodrama and bedroom farces. Perhaps attracted to Prithvi Theatre by the ads claiming that the play can heal a breaking marriage, audiences have stayed on. Bombay magazine describes the viewer reaction thus: "Audiences who shell out their money only for comedies these days, sat gravely through most of Riyaz, laughed a couple of times out of turn, clucked at the wisdom of some dialogue and came out saying it was so close to their lives."

Indeed, the story is so close to the lives of so many contemporary couples that one wonders why somebody didn't think of it earlier. Dhani (Ila Arun) and Rishabh (K.K. Raina), a young couple who once had a torrid romance, find their not-too-old marriage souring as they drift apart. With the domestic responsibilities of a newborn baby and household chores to look after, Dhani must stay at home most of the time and forget about practising vocal music, which used to be her passion. With the financial responsibilities of running the family on his shoulders, Rishabh has to stay out longer and longer, trying to milk the maximum money out of his profession, which happens to be directing theatre.

Friction sets in. Dhani feels Rishabh is being selfish, enjoying himself at rehearsals and neglecting her at home. Rishabh thinks Dhani is being selfish, inconsiderately demanding attention and becoming irritable when he is slaving to earn their living. Both wonder where love has gone.

Above all, the question of Dhani's personal fulfilment occupies central place. The symbol of the modern urban Indian woman, she has been educated and knows that her intellect is rusting because of disuse. Why can't her husband see that her talent is just as deserving of nurture and development as his?

The title is the message—riyaz (practice) makes perfect, both practice of one's talent and practice at a marriage, but neither at the expense of the other. The only weak link is the ending, which resolves everything perhaps too quickly and too simplistically. Otherwise there's some fine acting, directing and design; a touch of class in Ila Arun's scripting of dialogue, with a sensible blend of realism and humour (not too serious, yet balancing the perspectives of both partners), as well as the symbolism of music and theatre.

And even a comic subplot in which an elderly couple provides a marital contrast of mutually acceptable, conventional, pre-feminist, arranged-marriage division of labour. Ila Arun shows a lot of potential for thought-provoking drama.

Let's hope Riyaz is no flash in the pan.●

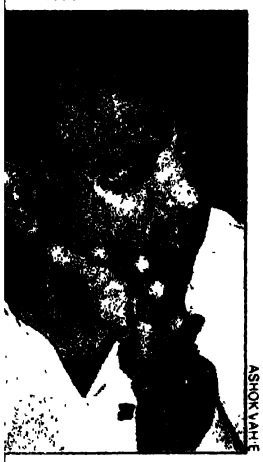
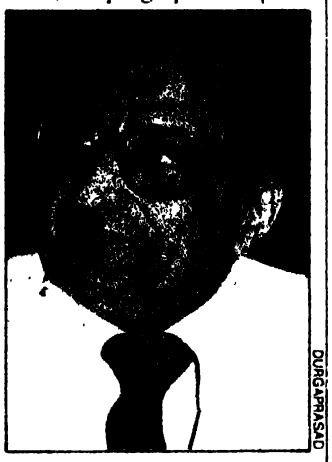
Ananda Lal/Calcutta

SANSKRIT SAGAR



Ila Arun and K.K. Raina in a scene from Riyaz: stark reality

Curbing Pawar



V. P. Singh snubs the Maharashtra chief minister

MAHARASHTRA

It is a coup of sorts. Prime Minister V.P. Singh has created a flutter in Maharashtra's political circles by giving the green signal to the formation of three development boards in the state. And by doing so, he has won the hearts of the people belonging to the three backward regions—Marathwada, Vidarbha and Konkan—where these boards are to be set up—although some politicians are clearly miffed.

ASHOK VAHILE

DURGAPRASAD

Pawar's (left) detractors within the Congress (I) are overjoyed with Singh's (centre) decision. But Palkhivala (right) feels that the formation of the boards could lead to protracted litigation

Singh's move has put chief minister Sharad Pawar in a fix. The Prime Minister ignored Pawar's demand for a board in his constituency, Western Maharashtra, the stronghold of the state's powerful sugar lobby. The Dandekar Committee, set up in 1983 to look into the development profile of the state's districts, had categorised Western Maharashtra as a backward area. But it had also observed that the region topped the state's literacy list and was lagging behind because its physical resources remained untapped.

The chief minister's immediate reaction to Singh's decree was to call a press conference in which he regretted the Centre's discriminatory attitude. Pawar revealed that Western Maharashtra comprised 80 per cent of the state's chronically drought-prone areas, 85 per cent of its hilly terrain and some of the most inaccessible tribal areas such as Akrani and Akkalkuva. That is why, said Pawar, the state legislature had adopted a resolution recommending four development boards in the state. Pawar, however, was careful not to antagonise the Centre on this issue. "There is room for dialogue and I hope to try that route," he said, keeping options open.

The only politician of consequence to oppose the move in its entirety is former chief minister S.B. Chavan. "The boards would lead to the disintegration of the state," he glooms, implying that Vidarbha may, in the long run, demand complete statehood. And there is little doubt that Chavan's followers in Pawar's Cabinet are backing him up.

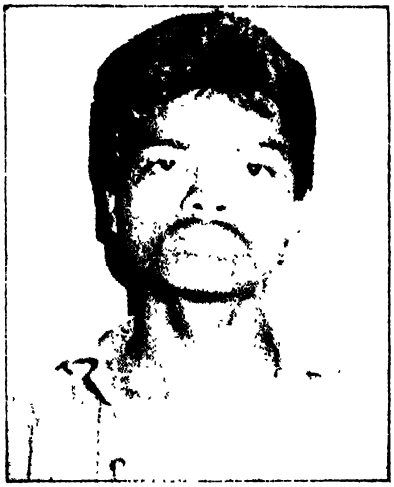
But what has surprised political observers is the criticism voiced by the noted jurist, Nani Palkhivala, against the concept of development boards. He issued a press statement recently saying that "public interest demands" that the "President of India be advised to make a reference to the Supreme Court under Article 143 of the Constitution so that the government and the public have a clear guidance on the baffling questions which arise under Article 371". Palkhivala feels that if the President did not intervene to stop the formation of the boards, "years of protracted litigation to decide several fundamental questions" is likely to follow.

It is true that Article 371, which provides for the setting up of development boards for backward areas, is not clear about the structure and power of such bodies. But the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) spokesman, Dharamchand Chordia, feels, "This can be solved by putting on the boards experts from various fields and legislators and MPs from the respective regions. Allocation of funds can be made on the basis of area, population and the magnitude of the backlog."

Pawar's detractors within the Congress(I), led by former chief minister A.R. Antulay, are obviously overjoyed with the Centre's decision. They had organised a seminar on 29 July to pressurise the government into forming the boards and feel that Pawar is trying to make the best of a bad situation by straining to present a cheery visage. Antulay, as well as Congressman Nilangekar Patil, avoided taking part in the Nagpur meet despite having been its important convenors because Pawar had, supposedly, convinced Congress(I) president Rajiv Gandhi against the need for such boards.

Once the bodies are formed, the chief minister's wings are likely to be clipped though it is not yet clear how much power the Governor would weild as the special authority on fiscal and executive matters of the three boards. But Pawar is unlikely to let his opponents within his party stage a cakewalk and may indefinitely postpone the formation of the boards by initiating court cases with the help of his supporters. And with Palkhivala virtually on his side, the new arrangement might still be a long way off. ● Olga Tellis/Bombay

Killed in custody



The Karnataka police is accused of murder

KARNATAKA

In Karnataka recently, the long arm of the law proved to be a shade too short. Three policemen have been charged with the killing of a young man in police custody. The COD (Corps of Detectors) wing of the police responsible for the case finds itself unable to solve it, even after a month. Meanwhile, the case has assumed political overtones.

It all began in Tumkur, a small town near Bangalore. On 8 July, 20-year-old Narasimharaju, a petty thief, was picked up by two constables near his house. He never returned. His impoverished family members suspected foul play and soon the case snowballed into a major controversy. It was suspected that certain political parties were involved. Moreover, with the current focus on cop brutality, the case further threatened to tarnish the battered image of the Karnataka police. The government quickly roped in the state's elite COD to work on the case.

Narasimharaju: a victim of brutality

The accused are still at large and a key witness backtracked on his statement. People suspect that the COD was pressurised to drop the case

Veerendra Patil, promising justice

Initially, they made some progress. And filed a case of "wrongful confinement and disappearance, alleged death and destruction of evidence". Then, four constables were arrested and a hunt launched for the three main accused—a sub inspector and the two constables who had picked Raju up. After that, however, the COD appeared to have reached a dead end. The accused are still at large and a key witness backtracked on his statement.

As a result, people suspect that the COD was pressurised to drop the case. The opposition is threatening to expose the Veerendra Patil government and the local Congress MLA made matters worse by issuing a statement dissociating himself from the case. And all the while, the aggrieved family pleaded for the case to be taken up by the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI).

The case was complicated by the involvement of two teenagers, whose families were influential in Tumkur. Along with Raju, these two were earlier booked in five cases, for lifting two-wheelers. While Raju had been acquitted in all, the other two had been let off under the Probationary Offenders Act in one case. This meant that the two would face jail in the event of a future conviction.

So, when the theft of two mopeds was reported, these three were suspected. Only Raju was picked up. People suspect that this was to corner him into taking the rap, so that the other two could go free. He was shifted from the Tilak Park police station to the town police station, where they have a special "crime room" for conducting interrogations.

According to a petty criminal present during the interrogations, Mutta, Raju was severely beaten up by the police on 12 July. Mutta also claimed that he had been asked to put Raju's body in the police van. The arrested van driver, Habibullah Khan, admitted to the COD that he had been asked to drive beyond the district's border and dump Raju's body on the highway to make it look like a hit-and-run accident. He even guided the COD to the spot. Further investigations revealed that the Chikmagalur police had picked up Raju's body, declared it unidentified and buried it. The post-mortem report mentioned multiple injuries on the body and specified that death was due to shock.

Unfortunately, Habibullah went back on his statement. He declared before the sub-divisional magistrate Sandeep Dave that he had no clue about Raju's death or the disposal of his body. He even mentioned that because his van had some engine problems, he had left it at the town police station.

This was not true. Enquiries revealed that Habibullah had dumped the van at a repair shop after the police had disposed of Raju's body. Although a key witness has been lost, the COD seem optimistic. "The absconding policemen will not go scot free," says a top COD official. "We are still investigating and we have a strong case."

But Raju's family is not assured. "They will just hush it up, as the COD is a part of the police force," says Kumbaiah, Raju's uncle. "That is why we want the CBI to take over. When will we get justice?" His view seems justified in the wake of recent developments. Police atrocities are on the rise and has resulted in at least four deaths in police custody in just four months.

Things have reached such a stage that chief minister Patil, who holds the home portfolio, has intervened. "The government will not tolerate police excesses and the accused in this case will certainly be nabbed," he promised.

And somewhat sceptically, Raju's family waits for that day of justice. ●

Gayatri Laxman/Bangalore

The great escape

Undertrial prisoners stage a daring getaway in Delhi

DELHI

The scene was straight out of Frank Sinatra's famous Von Ryan's Express--or very nearly so. In the cliff-hanger war-time film, over 400 allied prisoners escape from a German train during the Second World War. The prisoners had cut a hole through the belly of one of the train carriages and escaped to freedom one by one.

The sequence was closely re-enacted by some undertrials of Delhi's Tihar Jail earlier this month. On 10 August, some 56 men—mostly petty criminals—were being transported to the Shahdara courts for remand proceedings. Six armed guards were sitting in the front and back of the jail van. Almost half way to Shahdara, the van stopped at a traffic signal at the Shakarpur crossing and a bystander noticed the head of one of the undertrials popping out from below the vehicle's chasis. He cautioned the driver, who immediately inspected the van and caught a prisoner in the act of slithering out of a hole made in the floor of the van. A headcount revealed that seven undertrials had already escaped by then.

Senior Delhi Police officers feel the escape was well-conceived and meticulously planned. "It looks like a premeditated attempt. The undertrials managed to come out of the bottom stealthily, and proceed in different directions," said B.S. Brar, the deputy commissioner of police, east district, who is handling the investigations. He added that following the daring escape, security arrangements for transporting undertrial prisoners to courts had been strengthened and that police teams had fanned out to track down the fugitives.

The attempts of the police, however, met with marginal success. Raju, an undertrial facing a murder charge and believed to be the brain behind the getaway, and four others were still at large six days after the incident. On 12 August the police managed to nab one of the escapees, Shankar, while he was proceeding to board a train for Bombay. The following day, Basanta, who was being tried on a robbery charge, was arrested in Gaziabad. Shankar was caught while he was on his way to Old Delhi Railway Station, with a muffler around his face. It was a bad enough disguise and an alert police party was quick to pounce on their quarry. And on 16 August, Noval Kishore, involved in 33 cases of murder and robbery, was arrested in Shakarpur. "We have spread our dragnets in neighbouring cities too and will soon trap the others," said an optimistic Brar.

Delhi Police officers feel that the daring act was meticulously planned and was the most sensational one in recent times

The interrogation of those who have been re-arrested revealed that the wood and iron boards of the van's floor were a little loose. This set the prisoners into action. While some began to sing and clap loudly, Raju and others made a hole in the floor. Shankar and Basanta disclosed that the plan was for all the undertrials to flee through the opening.

The 10 August getaway was the most sensational after the escape of Charles Shobraj from Tihar Jail on 16 March, 1986. On that day, Shobraj and some of his accomplices had faked a "birthday party" in the office of the prison's deputy superintendent. The unsuspecting jail officials were fed drugged custard. They were knocked out within minutes and Shobraj and his friends drove out of the prison in a jail van. Later, Shobraj was re-arrested after a massive man-hunt in Goa.

This time the prisoners were no high-profile criminals. But then human ingenuity knows no class. •

Ritu Sarin/New Delhi

Street darbar

A BJP MP's way to solve people's problems

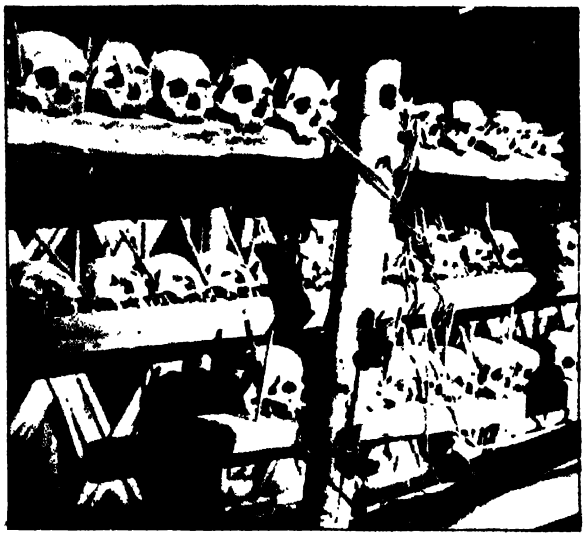
The venue: a footpath near a busy bus terminus in Ahmedabad. The scene: about 500 people—half of them women—squatting on the ground, with about a hundred others standing around. All eyes are rivetted on a tall man wearing a saffron scarf. He is accompanied by four or five others sitting on a slightly raised platform. Vehicles whizz past the crowd as it drizzles. But no one takes any notice.

This is the footpath durbar of 50-year-old Shankarsinh Vaghela, Lok Sabha MP and chief of the Bharatiya Janata Party's (BJP) Gujarat unit. He gives a patient hearing to each person and tries to solve his or her problems on the spot.

Veghela has held 15 such roadside lok darbars in various parts of his constituency, Gandhinagar (which includes parts of Ahmedabad), and his popularity has soared.

Two days before such durbars are held, people of the locality are informed through leaflets. With Veghela arriving on the dot, the meeting begins after the men and women take their seats under a simple pandal erected by BJP volunteers. Once the written ques-

The head-hunt



Many are beheaded as Naga tribes clash

NAGALAND

In the sleepy hilltop village of Tobu, the dawn of 17 August saw a swarm of Naga tribals in traditional battle gear block the escape routes amidst war-cries. The Konyak Nagas had attacked the Chang Nagas, a minority in the village. As terrified women and children slipped and fell while scrambling down the hillside, they were grabbed and their heads chopped off. At least 20 heads were taken away, very few of adult males, and six victims died later. Not satisfied with this, the Konyaks marched ten kilometres to Saochuo village, found it empty and set it ablaze.

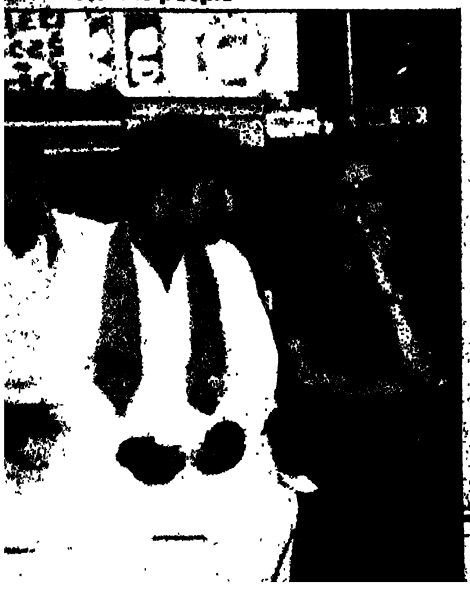
The Chang Nagas were not ready to take this lying down. Even as chief minister Vamuzo was frantically organising detachments of the Assam Rifles and the Nagaland armed force, news of vendetta reached the capital

A Naga chief's home: the shelves of pride

The heads were carried off to a nearby hamlet and kept on a platform dedicated to a chief

The Changs had beheaded at least four Konyaks, including a policeman.

The state authorities swung into action. Helicopters ferried troops from Zakhama to the affected areas. A round-the-clock curfew was clamped on about 40 villages. There were shoot-at-sight orders and the suspension of arms licences in the disturbed districts. Deputy chief minister (CM) I.K. Semare, who held fort as the CM rushed to Delhi for consultations, told SUNDAY that although the situation was brought under control by 20 August, the area was still very tense. "Anything might happen anytime," he said.



To calm the warring groups down, all kinds of measures have been taken. Chingwang Konyak, a Congress(I) stalwart and Nagaland minister, was hustled to the spot on a peace mission. Overwhelmed by such medieval behaviour, he reprimanded his tribesmen and asked them to own up and go back home without creating further trouble. The heads were reportedly carried off to a nearby hamlet and offered on a platform dedicated to the memory of an ahugh (chief of Konyaks).

Apparently, the trouble began with the transfer of Tobu to the Mon district. The village is on the border between the districts of Mon and Tuensang. The Konyaks dominate this village, own most of the shops here and discourage the Changs from getting a foothold. In 1987, there was a burst of violence when the former objected to the latter building a community hall and five persons were killed. Their traditional animosity is heightened by their conflicting political views. While the Konyaks are the force behind the NSCN (National Socialist Council of Nagaland), the Changs support the Phizoite NNC (Naga National Council).●

Santanu Ghosh/Silchar

tions or complaints are handed over to the MP, he calls complainants—women getting preference over the menfolk. The problems discussed range from an open manhole, low pressure in taps, non-availability of edible oil to violence by goons and even domestic squabbles. The local municipal councillor, legislator and taluka or district panchayat members are generally near at hand and take note of every complaint.

Veghela (with spectacles): working for the people

But Veghela, MP since 1976, doesn't have solutions for all the problems. "I frankly say 'no' if I am unable to solve any problem," he concedes.

Indeed, Veghela's footpath meetings have proved to be a runaway success — with people preferring to attend his durbars rather than go all the way to Gandhinagar Sachivalays to meet officials concerned, who often ride roughshod over them.

It was the late Jaiprakash Narayan from whom Veghela first got the inspiration to mingle with the masses and feel the pulse of the people. Once his party became a partner of the ruling coalition in Gujarat in March this year, he took the plunge. Egged on by the fantastic popular response, the BJP chief has asked other MPs and MLAs and even the party's ten ministers to organise such programmes. If this happens, it will not be hard for the BJP to outclass the Janata Dal and capture power in the state in the none-too-distant future. ●

Mahesh Trivedi/Ahmedabad

Stop press!

Government officials are told not to speak to the media

MADHYA PRADESH

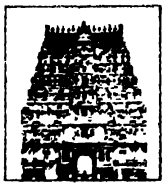
The revenue commissioner of Bilaspur division went to meet the press some time back. And guess what he did at the conference: refused to talk. He accepted the invitation of the Press Club of Bilaspur where—as was to be expected—he faced a barrage of questions. But the official refused to oblige newsmen, saying that he had received categorical instructions from the commissioner and secretary of the department of information and publicity, L.K. Joshi, prohibiting government officials from speaking to the press directly. This holy business, according to him, was reserved for the state's public relations officer.

The pressmen had reasons to be agitated by this unexpected government fiat preventing free flow of information. But the very next morning, the information secretary issued a clarification that—not surprisingly—created confusion instead of sorting things out. Joshi made it known that there were no restrictions on officials and they could speak freely to the press. Contrary to what the revenue commissioner claimed, Joshi said that he had, in fact, asked government officials to cooperate with media-persons by giving them full information about government activities.

Barely had Joshi's explanation sunk in, when a senior policeman from Rajnandgaon district told a local paper that police officials had been instructed not to give any information to the press about Naxalite activities in the area unless there was a major incident.

The official explained that the state government felt the Naxalites were indulging in petty activities and were publicity hungry. Press reports, according to the government's perceptions, only helped build their image. In fact, he further revealed that the superintendents of police in all Naxalite-infested areas had planned a meeting with the editors and reporters to discuss the problem with them.●

M.V. Kher / Raipur



MALA MURASU

'Auto' Shankar (second from right): dead or alive?

The man who knows too much

'Auto' Shankar's escape from jail fuels speculation about the involvement of government officials in the incident

TAMIL NADU

What is the public and the government in Tamil Nadu most excited about these days? All the gossip, legislature discussions and Tamil media headlines are being hogged by a dreaded killer, who, in the early hours of 21 August, escaped from the 'high-security' Madras Central Prison along with two of his accomplices. Two other prisoners, lodged in the same cell for different crimes, also escaped with them.

'Auto' Shankar, arrested during the President's Rule in July 1988, was among the most important inmates of the prison, having been involved in at least six murder cases during 1987-88. He headed a 16-member gang of criminals, many of whom were from his own family. Shankar's main vocation at that time was the distribution of illicit liquor and running a brothel in Thiruvanmaiur, which is close to the Adyar beach.

The apellation 'auto' got attached to his name because he was employed, in the early period of his crime life, by a brothel mistress to 'deliver' girls to her clients in his autorickshaw. From then on, Shankar quickly graduated to big-time crime with the alleged blessings of influential politicians and police officers. When he was finally nabbed during the President's Rule that followed chief minister M.G. Ramachandran's death, the bodies of his victims were dug out from under buildings he built.

The victims included one of his many wives. They were killed because of jealousy and disputes over his 'business' interests. Half a dozen policemen, including one deputy superintendent of police (DSP), were suspended for allegedly cooperating with Shankar in his crimes. The case created a sensation when it first came to light andvivid details of the involvement of influential officials and politicians with Shankar were widely reported in the local press. What shocked the people most was the disclosure by the investigating sleuths that some video films gave evidence of Shankar's close links with senior police officers and politicians.

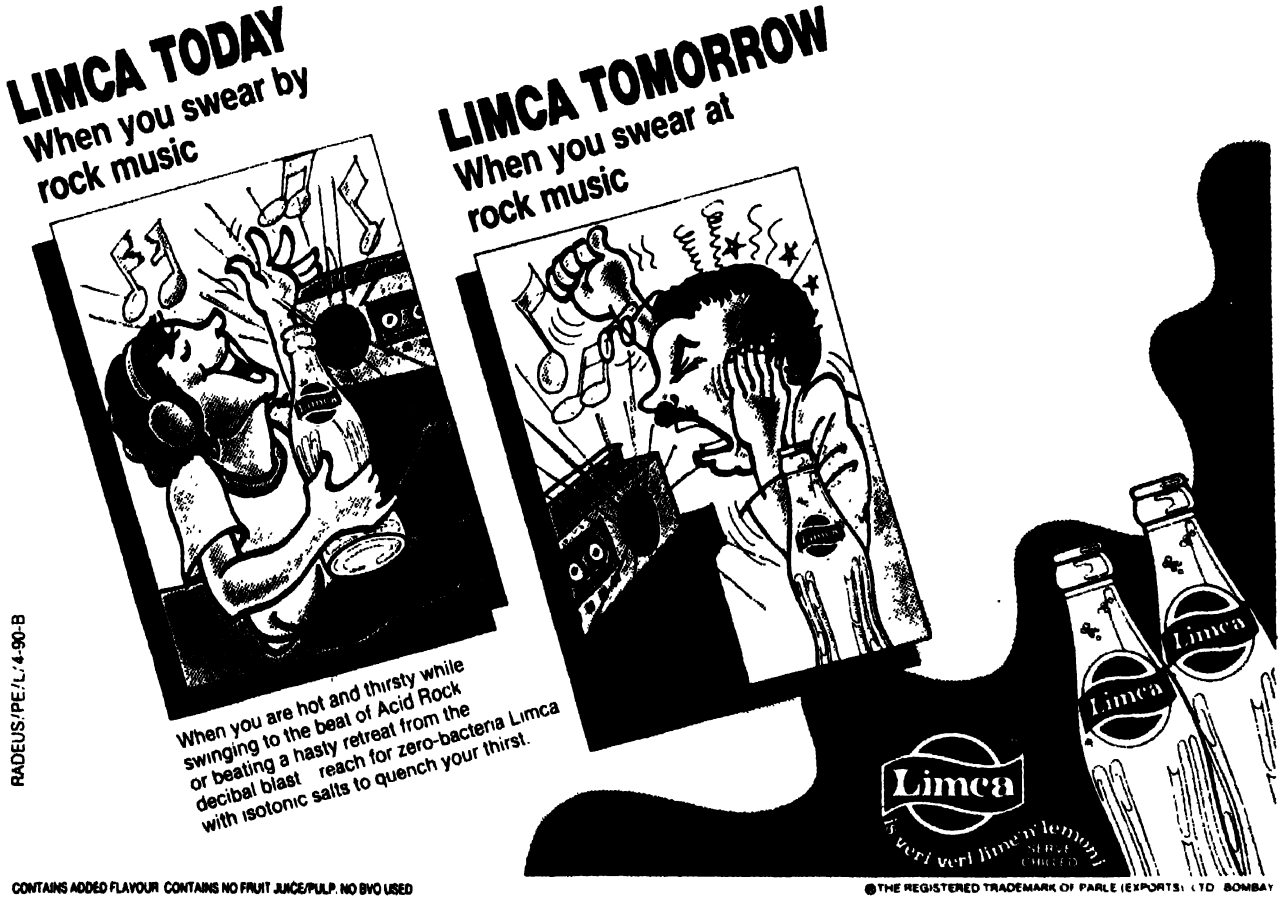
It appears that his ties with officialdom stood Shankar in good stead even in prison. When his escape was discovered during a headcount on 21 August, the government immediately deduced the involvement of jail staff in the embarrassing episode. Chief minister M. Karunanidhi, who informed the state Assembly about Shankar's escape, also announced that 12 jail staff were placed under suspension. Of them, three were arrested and criminal prosecution initiated against them for their complicity in the case.

The chief minister, looking visibly embarrassed, told the House, "Auto Shankar and four others lodged in the same cell have escaped between midnight and 4 am. The door of this particular cell was not locked at night and the usual check to ensure locking was also not done." A special cell was immediately set up to launch what could be described as the biggest manhunt in Tamil Nadu.

The chief minister announced a judicial enquiry into the escape, but that did not prevent the Opposition from launching a tirade against him. The PCC(I) president, Vazha Padi K. Ramamurthy, demanded the chief minister's resignation along with those of the chief secretary, M.M. Rajendran, the home secretary, R. Nagarajan and the police chief P. Dorai. "Only their stepping down can uphold the high traditions in public service," Ramamurthy declared.

The Congress(I) whip, S.R. Balasubramaniam, flayed the DMK administration during the Assembly session, saying that MLAs would face threats to their lives if they spoke out against Shankar. "The judicial enquiry, though welcome, could take a long time to complete. What we need is an investigation by the CBI," the Congress legislator urged.



While the theory of the jail staff helping Shankar to escape has many buyers (including Karunanidhi), it is also rumoured that Shankar was deliberately allowed to slip out of his cell so that an encounter could be engineered to finish him off. This may have become necessary, many suspect, to preclude the possibilities of Shankar exposing the politicians who once maintained links with him.

Said Balasubramaniam: "There are several police officers who are now living in fear of exposure by Auto Shankar. There are rumours that they have finished him off already. Others say he would never be caught alive but shot down in a fake encounter."

Chief minister Karunanidhi scoffs at these speculations. "There are no orders to shoot down Shankar on sight. We are confident of nabbing him soon," he has said.

Added police chief Dorai: "Special squads have already fanned out to look for Auto Shankar. One team has gone to Thanjavur and another to Tirupati." The trip to Tirupati for the special squad became necessary following reports that the fugitive was at the temple town in a disguise. When other reports suggested that he may try to flee to Sri Lanka with the help of Eelam militants, another investigating team was despatched to the Thanjavur shoreline. If the master criminal is not caught fast, the DMK government's image might suffer a severe blow. •

R. Bhagwan Singh/Madras

Culture vultures

The former National Museum's director-general, Dr Laxmi Sihare, may be their first victim

From the grand, sprawling offices of the National Museum to the cramped premises of the Vigyan Bhavan annexe is definitely a comedown. Eight months before he was due to retire, the National Museum's director-general, Dr Laxmi P. Sihare, has been unceremoniously ousted, from the post he brought much controversy to. And now he is designated officer on special duty (OSD) to the institution he transformed, during his six years and four months long tenure, into one of the finest museums in the world.

The marching orders, which were reportedly issued with the express approval of the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) on 22 August, came as the culmination of a concerted campaign, mounted only to get rid of Sihare. Since, it was almost impossible to point a finger at the museologist's professionalism, he was accused of displaying "unorthodox behaviour" and of "rubbing too many people the wrong way". Admittedly, his brusque, no-nonsense style of functioning, did earn him a lot of enemies. But beyond the tough exterior, Sihare remained a man who unfailingly put the museum's interests above those of individuals. And eventually had to pay for it.

Sitting forlorn in his bare new office, Sihare refuses to comment on the government's decision to divest him of his post. Or on the fact that now he also ceases to be associated with the National Museum's Institute of the History of Art, Conservation and Museology, which he has worked tirelessly to establish over the last two years. He doesn't comment on his new assignment either, which includes the preparation of a comprehensive manual, laying down procedures for documenting and cataloguing museum items in the country. A task that a man of his qualifications and experience should take no more than a month to complete.

What is much more demeaning, however, for a man who has contributed 20 years to the Indian art world is the concerted attempt to discredit him. Controversies which had long died a natural death are now being resurrected just to make a case against Sihare, and ensure that he is kept safely out of the way.

In recent months, the art expert has been waging a relentless war against the auctioning abroad of the Nizam of Hyderabad's jewels (Sunday 8—14 April, 1990) and other art treasures like the Baroda silk carpet which he claims are part of India's national heritage. Sources close to Sihare allege that it was not his boorishness, but his battles to protect India's art treasures that resulted in his ouster.

Officials in the ministry are keen to stress that Dr Sihare is not being punished, but has been transferred because his expertise was required in another area (display and documentation) before he retired. But this version doesn't really hold water because it will be tough replacing Dr Sihare—even his worst enemies admit that there are few people whose knowledge of museology surpasses his.

The most serious charge against Sihare pertains to his permitting the use of the National Museum premises for a cocktail party hosted by a leading American banking organisation (Sunday 15—21 July, 1990). Sources close to Sihare say that the case is now well and truly closed with the former culture secretry J. Veeraraghavan, submitting in writing that he had given his express permission for the event. Moreover, the charges against Sihare, in a letter to the Prime Minister, dated 17 January, by 400 employees belonging to the Museum's Non-Gazetted Officers' Association, that they were victims of Sihare's high-handed behaviour, have yet to be substantiated by the courts.

Sitting forlorn in his bare new office Sihare refuses to comment on the government's decision to divest him of his post

Sihare (left) with President Venkataraman making a round of the National Museum in New Delhi

Sources close to Sihare allege that there is a nexus between the Nizam jewel case and the one being fought by the National Museum's union. Both are being fought by the same advocate. "It is evident that the Nizam is greasing the palms of the union leader from the fact that the same lawyer is handling the Rs 300-crore Nizam jewels case and that of the union leaders," says a Sihare supporter.

He adds: "Pupul Jayakar, a known opponent of Dr Sihare is very close to the Nizam s auctioneers in London, and also to his legal counsel, J.B.Dadachanji. For them, it is a big victory to see Sihare go." Jayakar, whose running battle with Sihare has been hitting the headlines over the last five years, went so far as to write to V.P. Singh—soon after he took over as Prime Minister—complaining that she had received an impertinent letter from the museum director.

Besides, government sources also disclose that they are examining another complaint about Sihare's rude behaviour, sent in by Indira Mansingh (wife of Indian Council forCultural Relations' former director-general, Lalit Mansingh). "She thought she could persuade Dr Sihare to agree to sending exhibits like the Didarganj Yakshi to Singapore, works that had never been allowed to leave the country even for the festival in Japan," states a source close to Sihare. In fact, "She was about to sign an agreement when he intercepted the text." Later, the lady complained that Sihare's rudeness had reduced her to tears.

What is interesting about the Sihare saga is the fact that it was the PMO itself that worked on his removal. When all the so-called enquiries against Sihare were cleared at the ministry level, why did the PMO take a personal interest in sidelining an official who had only eight months left to retire?

"It couldn't have been merely that Pupul Jayakar or another official thought he was rude, or that he was unpopular with his employees for being a hard task-master that led to his removal," says a colleague in the art world.

Some people allege that it was the Allahabad lobby in the PMO that was responsible for his downfall. This version has it that Vinod Pande and Bhure Lal (left) and Vinod Pande: were they instrumental in ousting Sihare?

Bhure Lal worked on former culture secretary M. Varadarajan, the present secretary Bhaskar Ghose, and joint secretary, R.C. Tripathi who is known to be close to H.P. Sharma, the Raja's private secretary. "The Allahabad lobby in the PMO finally decided that Sihare was better out of the way."

Not because he had raised a hue and cry about the Nizam of Hyderabad's designs to deprive the country of vast sums of money and some invaluable treasures. But because Sihare was embarrassing the government by insisting that it adhere to certain decisions on privy purses taken by the Indira Gandhi government.

Two months ago, Sihare demanded that the ceremonial regalia of the erstwhile ruling families, that they were allowed to keep during the time of the merger of the state, should be returned to the state. According to Sihare, these items, like crowns, jewellery and thrones were no longer necessary after the royal titles were seized and that they were now part of the national heritage and should be handed over to the government. "It is these powerful lobbies that felt Sihare was a threat to them and worked through their connections in the PMO to get rid of him," alleges a source close to Sihare.

Though Sihare is maintaining a low profile so as to not jeopardise his last few months in service, it is unlikely that he will give up without a fight. Judging from the past, it will be unusual if he accepts defeat so easily.

Sihare's ouster may have provided temporary respite to his enemies. But it is unlikely that the controversy will end here. •

Shiraz Sidhva/New Delhi

V GANGADHAR

Untruth involves us all

Madhu Kishwar takes on Arun Shourie and the Indian Express

A belated realisation: What are guest columns in magazines for? To do the dirty work for the editor? The 'guest writer' is free to take on any issue or any personality, and the editor can shrug off any controversy with the comment, "What had appeared in print is the personal opinion of the guest writer and did not have anything to do with the editorial policy of the magazine!"

I have just finished reading a most astonishing guest column which appeared in The Illustrated Weekly of India (August 19-25). Titled, "Just Malice", it is authored by Madhu Kishwar, who is an active member of the "Independent Initiative", an organisation which invites itself to supervise poll practices at selected constituencies represented by people it generally does not like.

Kishwar's ire, for a change, is not directed at Rajiv Gandhi and the Congress. In a six-page article, she tears into the Indian Express and its editor, Arun Shourie, particularly for their harangues against Chaudhary Devi Lal and his son, Om Prakash Chautala. Probing into the 'vested interests' which had mounted a vicious campaign against Devi Lal and his followers, Kishwar reaches certain conclusions about the Express and Shourie which had been fairly obvious to the impartial media watchers for several years: their investigative reporting is selective, they hit below the belt, they act more like king-makers than practitioners of fair, objective journalism.

Such an attack on Shourie and the Express sounds natural when it comes from someone like Mani Shankar Aiyar (and he has been dishing them out too). But Madhu Kishwar and Independent Initiative? Hadn't the accused and the accuser, all these years, been fighting together for human rights, value-based politics and blaming everything which went wrong in the country to Rajiv Gandhi and the Congress? Didn't they vent their ire against state terrorism in Punjab and Kashmir while ignoring the mass killings by terrorists? Wasn't the Independent Initiative as selective in exposing corruption and poll malpractices as the Indian Express and its celebrated editor?

Why the fallout then? Kishwar is among the urban elite, who seem to have developed a guilty conscience over the treatment given to Devi Lal and his followers in the media, particularly the Indian Express. The leader of this newly-organised pack is the Weekly editor, Pritish Nandy, who is only too ready to make room for such guest columns. Some days back, Olga Tellis of SUNDAY wrote her "Point of View", for the magazine, strongly supporting the views expressed by Devi Lal in his celebrated interview with Nandy.

The sudden awakening of rural-consciousness among a section of our urban elite is certainly interesting. Why all this consideration for Devi Lal and Chautala? Have they forgotten the hue and cry raised over the "accidental death" of Supriya, the granddaughter-in-law of the Tau? Strangely enough, the Express which was strongly pro-Devi Lal in those days, did not launch an investigation on the death. How times have changed!

The Kishwar guest column attacks Shourie on the means he uses to attack those who come in his way. The Independent Initiative found large-scale rigging at Amethi and Baghpat (Ajit Singh's constituency) but Shourie chose to highlight only the Meham happenings. He is silent on the antics of Dr Sanjay Singh—deeply involved in the Syed Modi murder case—who was the campaign manager for Rajmohan Gandhi at Amethi. Singh, besides playing around with badminton belles and finishing off their husbands in straight sets, is an expert in booth-capturing and leading gun-toting hoodlums in the "battle of the ballots". Why go soft on him?

Shourie, according to Kishwar, follows the Bombay film formula, seeing life in black and white terms, the good guys vs the bad guys, with no shades of grey. Often the Express guys (Goenka, Shourie, Gurumurthy, Jethmalani) themselves are the good guys, self-righteously frightening away the Hadn't Madhu Kishwar (left) and Arun Shourie been fighting together for human rights, value-based politics and blaming everything which went wrong in the country on Rajiv Gandhi? Why the fallout then?

Says M.A.K. Pataudi (above), "The overreaction from both adversaries makes one question Gavaskar's (left) objectivity as well as Bedi's right to interfere in what has nothing to do with him" supposed villains into behaving better.

So concerned is Ms Kishwar with Arun Shourie's unholy crusade (which is quite unthinkable for a liberal), that she even detects good qualities in her earliest victim, former Maharashtra chief minister, Abdul Rehman Antulay (administrative skills, efficiency). "Even his corruption, it is widely acknowledged, was more on behalf of the party than for himself." Shourie went for Antulay, concludes Kishwar, because he is a Muslim. There are other interesting statements. The Arun Nehru-Arif Mohammad Khan (Shourie's favourites) gang is among the most adept at juggling party funds. We can't afford to forget Nehru's likely involvement in the Bofors deal and his well-known role in aiding, abetting militant fundamentalists in Kashmir, and instigating riots to bring down the Abdullah regime and implant his own dummy as the chief minister.

Kishwar points out that Shourie remained a starry-eyed admirer of Rajiv Gandhi despite the massacre of Sikhs in 1985 and the ruthless killings of Muslims by the Meerut Provincial Armed Constabulary. Yet, there are some gaping holes in her narrative. Why did Shourie ditch Rajiv and turn into his implacable enemy? What is the real motive behind the Ambani vendetta? Why doesn't Shourie's all out support to Ramakrishna Hegde figure in the article?

She lists the lies and the half-truths of the Express to denigrate Devi Lal and his followers. While every newspaper in the country commented on the impressive (not massive though) turnout at his Kisan Rally in New Delhi on 9 August, the Express dismissed it as "poor turnout" quoting the police estimate of 1.3 lakhs. Devi Lal's cut-out was dismissed thus: "Even his awesome plywood look-alike craned its neck forward to catch a glimpse of the original Jat." Concludes Kishwar, "This is not to suggest that the Meham rigging should be condoned, but only to point out that the out and out villainous image of Devi Lal being projected by the Express is deliberate.

"What are Shourie's motives for launching such a campaign? There is very little doubt that Devi Lal is being hounded out by the Express mafia basically to clear the way for the BJP to take over Haryana and after that, Uttar Pradesh and Gujarat." Or read this attack: "It is not just that Devi Lal has to be seen out of the government ...The type must be seen out of Indian public life...They flaunt mediocrity, lack of knowledge and education, as qualification...They assert mediocrity and unletteredness as the norm, vulgarity as a right, sheer numbers and muscle as right."

The Express and Shourie are obviously disturbed at the entry of the masses into politics and regretfully notes the disinclination of the white collar elements, and certainly the more outstanding among them, to join politics. One remedy, according to the paper, would be "cajoling the good guys" from educated, elitist backgrounds, into sacrificing their life and privacy and get them to enter Parliament through the backdoor, as in the case of Ram Jethmalani from Bangalore and Sanjay Singh from UP.

Kishwar's conclusions are rather disturbing: "Very clearly, Shourie is very uncomfortable with the democratic process if it doesn't suit his personal and political predelictions. In short, Shourie aspires to snuff out whatever little we have by way of democratic institutions and disenfranchise the vast majority of Indians. Democracy is to be tolerated only as long as the urban, educated, elite can dominate the political institutions."

At times, Kishwar is entirely fair to Shourie. But by and large, her arguments do hold water. It is encouraging that the eyes and ears of some of our intellectuals are slowly opening to the dangers of this kind of 'press freedom'. A recent editorial in the Express said, "our legislatures are no longer a fora for informed and reasoned debate, of analysis and examination. Their proceedings are marked by abusive personal attacks and the spewing of intemperate rhetoric and shop-soiled cliches..."

Kishwar has a point that this description fits the Express kind of journalism no less than it fits parliamentary proceedings. Such comment, however, are not likely to have any impact on Shourie, who is on to a fresh game: Mandal-bashing.

The last word

The most objective analysis of the Bishan Bedi-Sunil Gavaskar feud comes from M.A.K. Pataudi, editor of Sportsworld: "The overreaction from both adversaries makes one question Gavaskar's objectivity as a serious journalist as well as Bedi's right (while he is an official on tour) to interfere in what has nothing to do with him." •

Bending rules

The BCCI tries to make domestic cricket a little more exciting

The much-expected changes in the Board of Control for Cricket in India (BCCI) did not quite come off. With the Indian cricketers still struggling to save the Test series against England, a plan was hatched to change almost the entire structure of the upper echelons of the BCCI, together with moves to give the board far more powers over men and matters. But these decisions were postponed till after the annual general meeting planned on 22 and 23 September at the Taj Bengal hotel in Calcutta. The working committee meeting of the BCCI in Bombay in the second week of August did, however, produce some changes relating to the game itself.

The rules of the Ranji Trophy tournament have for long frustrated the budding cricketers in the weaker sections of the competition. Players from states like Assam and Andhra Pradesh, for example, would get just one opportunity to prove themselves against some of the toughest sides in the group. In the preliminary rounds of the competition, three days were set for each match, which barely was enough for more than an innings each. So, players from the weaker sides would get just one crack with the bat and the ball.

The board has now ruled that preliminary matches would be played over four days instead of three. In the knock-out stages of the tournament, the matches would be played over five days, thereby increasing the chances of outright victories, instead of the laboured exercise of a first innings lead.

More important, however, is the move to alter the quotient rule, which had caused so much controversy in the past. The practice was that in case the first innings of a match was not completed or in the event of a tie, the winner was decided on the runs-per-wicket-lost basis. But now it will be the runs-scored-per-over that will count, which will encourage a positive approach to the game.

A graded system of bonus points has also been adopted, with a minimum of one point for over 250 runs to four points for a score exceeding 400. Similarly, in the bowling sphere, one point from three wickets taken would scale up to four points for nine or ten wickets. The targets in both the areas would be reduced for bonus points in the second innings.

The bonus rules apply to 120 overs in the first innings and 55 in the second. Earlier, it used to be 90 overs in the first and 40 in the second. The rules for penalty points have also been modified. Previously, the penalty for bowling less than the required number of overs in an innings was a mere four runs per over. This has been increased substantially to 12 an over.

Another decision taken by the working committee of the BCCI was with regard to the pitch. So far, there were no rigid rules relating to the surface. Now, the board has decided that all matches conducted under its rules would have to be played on turf.

On the international front, too, some important decisions have been taken. Heading the list was the Sharjah jamboree. The board has again decided not to send an Indian team to play there this year. Although the board secretary, Ranbir Singh, said that the decision had nothing to do with the alleged Pakistan bias of the Cricketers Benevolent Fund Series (CBFS), the plea that the cricketers would be 'jaded' by the time they take on this tournament does not really convince anyone. The feeling is further reinforced because Sri Lanka has been invited to play a series of one-day internationals in December.

But one stand taken by the board will please cricket-lovers in India. When Pakistan –the country was to stage the Asia Cup—declined the offer, the BCCI requested the Asian Cricket Conference to allot the tournament to India. Pakistan, according to the board secretary, made a 'sly' move by asking Bangladesh to host the competition. But as things stand now, if the tournament is held at all, it will be staged by India, which is scheduled for November-December. As it is, Sri Lanka is coming in December and Pakistan have an official tour of this country coming up in January next year.

SUJIHALIT PAI

The BCCI is in favour of neutral umpires for all official competitions. But it is not easy to implement this since the host nation would have to bear the entire expenses of the umpires, who will be coming from a third country or countries.

One line of thinking is that the question of having neutral umpires should be decided by the two playing countries—or all participating nations. If the agreement is unanimous, then each nation could be asked to contribute equally towards the expenses of the umpires. If it is a two-way contest, then the visiting country would have the option of choosing between paying equally for the umpires or settling for the host nation's match supervisors.

What is very heartening for the players is that the long-standing demand of the Association of Indian Cricketers (AIC) has been met by the board. This mitigates, to a large extent, the disappointment in cricketers' circles over the statement made by the board secretary that the BCCI will not recognise the AIC and that all decisions with regard to players in international competitions will be discussed with the captain of the team.

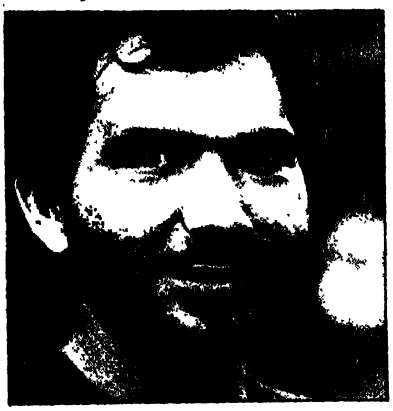
The issue of payment to players had created a lot of bitterness. Until the last season, the preliminary rounds of the Ranji Trophy fetched just Rs 300 per month for each player. This time, the board has accepted the recommendations of the committee set up to look into the payment rates. In the opening rounds, the players will receive Rs 500 per head. In the pre-quarters and quarters, the sum will be raised to Rs 700. In the semi-finals, each player will get Rs 1,000 while in the final, it will further go up by Rs 500. The Duleep Trophy matches will also fetch the players more than double the amount they have received so far. For these revised payments, the board is giving each state association an additional grant of Rs 20,000 per season.

RASHBEHARI DAS

NIKHIL BHATTACHARYA

The BCCI president, Biswanath Dutt (extreme right), felt that Bedi (middle) did not do the right thing by criticising Gavaskar's (left) decision to reject the MCC's offer of life membership

The only discordant note struck at the meeting was the Bedi affair. The manager of the Indian cricket team went on record saying that Sunil Gavaskar had shamed the country by rejecting the MCC's offer of life membership. The BCCI president, Biswanath Dutt, made it clear that Bedi did not do the right thing by addressing an open letter to Gavaskar as manager of the Indian cricket team. In fact, secretary Ranbir Singh has been asked to write a letter to Bedi asking him to explain why he had used official nomenclature. Several members had felt an immediate explanation was called for, but considering the effect it could have on the touring Indian team, it was decided that the letter—which is not a show-cause notice—would be served as soon as Bedi returned home.



The changes sought to be made in the playing conditions and the players' emoluments have gone down well in cricketing circles. But a note of dissent has been sounded by the 'thinker' among cricketers, Arun Lal. The opening bat welcomed the increase in players' fees, but said the new quotient rule would only serve to ruin the game. He has given a classic example by saying that a side scoring a mammoth 600 runs in 120 overs for the loss of just one wicket would still lose if the opposition managed to score 40 runs for the loss of as many as nine wickets, provided these runs came in seven overs or less. If a situation like this occurs, there will be again a hue and cry over the quotient rule.

But these possibilities are far from the minds of all members of the board as they gear up for the elections next month. After all, power is the name of the game. •

Arijit Sen/Calcutta

A Ranji Trophy match in progress: will the new rules work?

Arun Lal sounded a note of dissent. He welcomed the increase in players' fees but said that the new quotient rule would only serve to ruin the game

Jesus Christ, B.C.?

New research pushes back the date of the Messiah's birth by two years

What does Santa Claus do with his furs and woollens and pointed pompom cap if we start celebrating Christmas in mid-summer? We might, if we go along with astronomer R. Subramaniam's theory.

If Subramaniam, director of the Birla Planetarium, is right, then Christ was not born on 25 December, Zero AD, but on 17 June, 2 BC. And the "Star of Bethlehem", which heralded the birth of the Saviour, was not a new star, as suggested by the Magi, but a conjunction of Venus and Jupiter, the two brightest planets in the night sky.

PRATIK KANJILAL

"The conjunction was the most prominent celestial phenomenon in the period of ten years before and after Zero AD," says Subramaniam

This rare conjunction took place again on 13 August, 1990. The brightest planet, Venus, was just 0° 2.4' north of Jupiter, the second brightest planet. "But the conjunction in 2 BC was closer than this year's," says Subramaniam. "The angular separation was of only a few seconds." Being almost superimposed on each other, the planets would have appeared to be a single, dazzling celestial object. This, in all probability, the Magi hailed as a "new star".

Astronomers of this century, however, have believed the Star of Bethlehem to be either a comet, or, more likely, a supernova explosion. The latter is preferred as an explanation, since the phenomenon of an ageing star exploding makes it many times brighter than our sun for a few days, and that could easily have been taken as a miracle signalling the arrival of the Son of God. But Subramaniam frowns upon both these explanations.

"In ancient records, comets are always described as "a star with a tail," says Subramaniam. "And there is no mention of a tail in the case of the Star of Bethlehem. He also discounts the supernova theory, because the object would have lit up the sky for much longer than the Magi describe. Also, that would have been recorded by other cultures, which isn't the case. "This was certainly the most prominent celestial phenomenon in the period ten years before and after what we now take as Zero AD," says the astronomer. So, if the star of Bethlehem was not a figment of the religious imagination, it most probably was this planetary conjunction.

But A.K. Bhatnagar, director of the Positional Astronomy Centre, Calcutta, doesn't quite agree. "It is not very likely that the Magi, known as the 'wise men of the East', would mistake a planetary conjuction for a new star," he says. They were probably familiar with the detailed astronomical records at Alexandria, Babylon, Greece—maybe even India.

Subramaniam began work about five years ago on the peculiar conjunction of last month. Working backwards to the last such conjunction—with the help of Herman Mucke, director of the Urania Observatory in Vienna—he had placed the date at 17 June, 2 BC. The correlation with the birth of Christ hit him when he realised that this was the brightest phenomenon in the night sky around that time.

Surprisingly, the Bishop of Calcutta, the Rev D.C. Gorai, has no qualms about accepting a new date of Christ's birth. "Christmas is a later development, made to coincide with the already existing time of festivities," he says. "The Orthodox churches like the Armenians, for example, celebrate Christmas on 6 January.

Other scholars seem to hold similar opinions. "The theologian Clement of Alexandria once suggested 2 May," says Rev. Sujoy Bannerjee, vice-principal of the Bishop's Theological College, Calcutta. According to Rev. Bannerjee, celebrating Christmas on 25 December began in the fourth century AD, probably to divert people from the pagan festivals of the winter solstice. However, Rev. Bannerjee has certain reservations. "It is believed that Herod killed all first-born male infants in an effort to eliminate Jesus, and we know that Herod died in 4 BC," he clarifies. "So, how could the Massacre of the Innocents have taken place, if Christ was born after 4BC?"

And the underdogs of the science of star-gazing, astrologers, believe the Saviour was born even before. "Given the peculiarities of Christ's life," says Amritlal, a leading Calcutta astrologer, "it is likely that he was born on 25 December, 7 BC at 10:18 pm. Under the planetary conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in Pisces." But he admits that a birth under the conjunction of Venus and Jupiter would be highly significant, since these two planets have the greatest religious powers. "Jupiter being the Devaguru and Venus the Asuraguru, anybody born under their conjunction would have fantastic religious powers," he adds. "In fact, the influence of either one would be impressive. Zoroaster, Buddha and Vivekananda were all born under Jupiter."

However, whether another founder of a world religion was born last month under this rare conjunction, the astrologer cannot tell. Only time will.●

Antara Dev Sen/Calcutta

A noble example

■ There couldn't have been a better way to encourage the Dattak Putri Yogna , (the female adoption scheme). The additional chief secretary of the Madhya Pradesh government, D.G. Bhave, announced recently that he would adopt one girl child each from the seven districts of Bhopal and Hosangabad divisions to give a fillip to the practice of adopting orphan girls in the state. Bhave, who is in charge of the department of rural development which drafted the Dattak Putri Yogna , made his announcement in Bhopal during a meeting to review the progress of measures taken under the women and child welfare development programmes. And to prove his sincerity, he urged the seven district collectors of Bhopal and Hosangabad as well as the joint director of the panchayats, who were present at the meeting, to select one child for him from each district. Going by the success rate of most government-sponsored social welfare programmes, Bhave's attitude is definitely worthy of emulation.

On the road with culture

■ The authorities at the Prince of Wales Museum in Bombay have come up with a novel scheme for reaching out to more schools and children, particularly those belonging to the weaker sections of society. The Rs 25 lakh project is the brainchild of Sadashiv Gorakshkar, director of the museum, who believes that "a museum's activities should not be confined to its premises. It has to reach out to the people."

The scheme, currently awaiting the approval of the Union ministry of culture, involves mobile exhibitions, lecture-demonstrations and slide shows on various aspects of Indian culture. Says Gorakshkar, "If schools cannot reach us, we will go to them."

The idea for this project occurred to Gorakshkar when he saw how thrilled a group of roadside children were when they were brought to the museum by a social service agency.

He also plans to start a children's library in the museum, which will stock books and video cassettes catering to their tastes.

Charnock's Cocktail

■ Charnock's Cocktail! A drink with which revellers can toast Calcutta's tercentenary? No. It is a publishing house which brings out a travellers' guide—Frequent Traveller—edited and published quarterly from Calcutta. It provides a mine of information on flight schedules and choice hotels all over India.

It also contains a comprehensive list of domestic flight details which is titled "The frequent travellers' nightmare". There is also information on international flights. This pocket guide is really handy for it is filled with myriad details not only on beautiful tourist resorts dotting the country but also provides the Indian traveller with lists of foreign missions all over the globe

SEPARATED AT BIRTH?

Radha Seth

Dimple Kapadia

THIS INDIA

RAJNANDGAON: An official of Ambagarh Chowki has had to take charge of eight posts simultaneously following large-scale transfer or suspension of officials on charges of corruption and irregularities. Naib tehsildar Bhattad, now holds charge as tehsildar, municipal administrator, block officer, deputy registrar, zonal convener of census, in-charge of sub-treasury and another post of naib tehsildar besides his own post. Ironically Bhattad himself had been transferred to Hairagarh by the Madhya Pradesh government but could not be relieved—Indian Express (M.T. Sampath Kumaran, Bangalore)

ILLUSTRATION: DEBASHIS DEB

LUCKNOW: In their apparent haste to catch a train a couple took away someone else's child, leaving their own crying at the Charbagh railway station. Two couples were sleeping in the station's waiting hall with their baby boys of almost identical age. But when Pradip Kumar of Sitapur and his wife woke up they found their five-month-old son missing. In his place was another child of approximately the same age. Pradip Kumar has lodged an FIR with the GRP who are finding it difficult to look after the stranded child—The Times of India (Anjali Khare, Faizabad)

CALCUTTA: Women police in Calcutta will have to wear trousers while performing outdoor duties according to an order issued by the city police chief B.K. Saha. According to the police gazette, women police personnel "shall perform duties in working uniform comprising white slacks, white shirts, belts, black shoes and helmets. They would also carry small batons. The women police in the assistant commissioner rank will wear khaki uniforms."—The Telegraph (Ajanta Dasgupta, Howrah)

BEGINNING 2 SEPTEMBER 1990 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (21 March—20 April)

Friends and relatives will be helpful to you. You may have to go through a lot of hardships, but do not worry, for good times are ahead. A letter will bring good news. Take care of your health.

Good dates: 2, 5 and 8
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 8
Favourable direction: North

TAURUS (21 April—20 May)

There will be important changes this week. Make the best use of the opportunities that come your way. You will be able to overcome most of your obstacles. Romance is not on the cards.

Good dates: 4, 6 and 7
Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: West

GEMINI (21 May—20 June)

This is a memorable week for lovers. A friend will be helpful. Employees will progress steadily. Artists should be more imaginative. Students will be very busy. A favourable week for mediamen.

Good dates: 3, 4 and 6
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: South-west

CANCER (21 June—20 July)

Professionals will do well if they play their cards properly. Financial gains are indicated. But check extravagance. The time is ripe for romance and matrimonials. Take care of your health.

Good dates: 2, 3 and 5
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: East

LEO (21 July—20 August)

Businessmen will do extremely well. Financial prospects are bright for all of you. This is a lucky phase for lovers. A pleasure trip is in the offing. A favourable week for doctors and scientists. Watch your health.

Good dates: 6, 7 and 8
Lucky numbers: 5, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: South

VIRGO (21 August—20 September)

The time is favourable for matrimonials. You may have to bear some physical hardship now. Legal problems might cause concern. A family member might fall ill. Businessmen must avoid investments.

Good dates: 5, 6 and 8
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: North

LIBRA (21 September—20 October)

This is a lucky week for all of you. Most of your problems will be solved. You will be able to win over your foes. The domestic front will remain peaceful. Your children will be a source of joy to you.

Good dates: 3, 6 and 7
Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: West

SCORPIO (21 October—20 November)

Those in service might be promoted or transferred to places of their choice. Businessmen must not fritter away the chances that come their way. Romance is in the offing. You can also strike new deals.

Good dates: 4, 5 and 6
Lucky numbers: 6, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

SAGITTARIUS (21 November—20 December)

This is a good week for business meetings and fundraising. The period may not be an eventful one. But you will gain a lot during this phase. Your health will improve. Your domestic affairs will take up much of your time.

Good dates: 2, 4 and 7
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: North-west

CAPRICORN (21 December—20 January)

The financial front looks bright. Some of you will inherit property. This is a fairly good week for romance. Do not neglect your work. Keep an eye on your health. Avoid unnecessary risks.

Good dates: 3, 5 and 6
Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: West

AQUARIUS (21 January—20 February)

Good fortune is in store for you. Romance is in the offing. This is not the time to lend or borrow. Be on the guard against deceit. You may have to shoulder added burden. Your efforts may not bear fruit.

Good dates: 2, 3 and 8
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 5
Favourable direction: South

PISCES (21 February—20 March)

This is a week of mixed fortunes. Those in service must not neglect their work. Be careful on the financial front. Consult your elders before taking any decision. Take care of your health.

Good dates: 5, 6 and 7
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: East

STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—CAPRICORN

The Scorpio woman will be very appreciative of the Capricorn man's ambition and his devotion to his career. But the Capricorn man should not go overboard, for in the long run his career might come in the way of their relationship.

Give my jeep back!

Those of the Tau's former protégés who thought they had got away with letting down the Chaudhary, have another thing coming. Devi Lal, in his infinite wisdom, has now hit upon a novel way to get back at them.

It's very simple, really. The Tau had given all his supporters jeeps during the last election to help them campaign in their constituencies. Now the former deputy prime minister wants them back. And fast.

Predictably, the recipients are refusing to surrender the vehicles.

But the Chaudhary is not going to give up without a fight. He has already lodged a police complaint in Faridabad against Janata Dal MP Vishwendra Singh, who had refused to return his jeeps. The police raided the member's house to recover the vehicles.

Devi Lal: getting tough

Vishwendra Singh, however, was prepared for this contingency. And had sent the jeeps to his constituency so that the police could not seize them. Not content with that, the honourable member complained to the Speaker, asking him to take action against the police.

But it is only a matter of time before the Tau gets his possessions back. For, the papers of all the vehicles are lying with the Chaudhary and the MPs may have no option in the matter.

HEARD IN CENTRAL HALL

We thought that Devi Lal would be this century's Charan Singh, but judging by V.P. Singh's courtship of the backward castes, he himself is the new Charan Singh.

A BITTER JANATA DAL MP

Beyond Pepsi

The behaviour of George Fernandes, the maverick minister of railways, is causing some concern to the Prime Minister's supporters.

When he was fired as minister for Kashmir affairs, Fernandes held his peace. When the new industrial policy—which goes against all his beliefs—was in the news, he refused to embarrass V.P. Singh.

George Fernandes: he's got the Raja thinking

But now, George's firebrand temperament is resurfacing. On Khula Manch, he gave as good as he got and was outraged when P.Upendra chopped out all the fun bits. He even went public with his criticisms. (See Doordarshan Pvt. Ltd, page 10).

And last week in Calcutta, he took on Jyoti Basu at a public meeting to complain about his notoriously inefficient regime.

George's friends say that he hasn't gone over to Chandra Shekhar despite rumours to this effect. But the Raja's camp is worried about what the maverick will do next.

CASTE-O-METER

Who's against the Mandal Commission report—and who's for it

- Arun Nehru: The minister for commerce believes that the implementation of the Mandal recommendations will divide Indian society on caste lines, and completely destroy the country. Has tried to make the Raja change his mind, but with a remarkable lack of success.
- Arif Mohammad Khan: Even when the Janata Dal manifesto was being finalised, Khan had objected to the inclusion of the reference to the Commission. Nobody paid much attention to him then. And that situation persists.
- Ajit Singh: Resolutely opposes the implementation of the report. There isn't much to the allegation that his unhappiness stems from the fact that the Jats have been kept out of the reservation lists.
- Sharad Yadav: Led the campaign to get the report's recommendations implemented. It was, apparently, the textile minister's persuasive skills—and talk of caste combinations at the next polls—which helped the Raja make up his mind.
- Ram Vilas Paswan: Is convinced that his support base will increase once the reservation policy gets going. Therefore, Paswan doesn't mind adopting a confrontationist stand on this matter.

Free hand? Not really

When Virendra Verma had been appointed Punjab Governor, the Raja had promised to give him a free hand in solving the problems of the state. It now turns out, however, that the Prime Minister was less than serious.

For one thing, it is minister of state for home affairs, Subodh Kant Sahay, who has been entrusted with the responsibility of getting the problem state in order. And Sahay has already begun touring the border areas and issuing instructions to state government officials, much to Verma's chagrin.

To add to the Governor's resentment, he was not even allowed within handshaking distance of the Prime Minister during the Raja's recent visit to Punjab. The tour itinerary was fixed by Sahay and Verma was kept out of things totally.

Of course, the official version is that Verma was far too ill during V.P. Singh's visit to appear in public. But his miraculous recovery after the Raja zipped back to Delhi does make one wonder. ●

Shadow minister for AIIMS?

Has the Bharatiya Janata Party lost use for A.B. Vajpayee's famed oratorical skills?

Yes, if the monsoon session of Parliament is anything to go by.

While party president L.K. Advani initiates debates on national issues in the Lok Sabha, J.P. Mathur performs the same role in the Upper House.

Atal Behari, on the other hand, finds himself restricted to raising such matters as the current strike at the All India Institute of Medical Sciences (AIIMS).

A.B. Vajpayee: losing out

Sorry, but you'll have to walk

Madhu Dandavate may have been nominated to the National Security Council. But he certainly doesn't have much luck with the security personnel stationed at Parliament.

Recently, the finance minister drove into the main gates of Parliament, only to have his car flagged down by the guards. His car, the securitymen informed the bemused Dandavate, did not have the required parking label on the windscreen. Hence, they couldn't possibly allow it to proceed to the House.

But didn't they know who he was, asked the astonished minister.

Yes, of course they did, came the indignant answer. But rules, you know, are rules.

Dandavate got off the car and walked to the main building.

But the matter didn't end there.

The incident was reported to the Speaker who was asked to enquire as to why the security staff had been so disobliging. After all, several cars without parking labels are allowed inside, if the person inside the vehicle is identified.

So, why the discrimination against Madhu Dandavate?

HEARD ON THE STREETS

V.P. Singh ki antim iccha, Brahmin Thakur maange bhiksha.

PRO-MANDAL COMMISSION SLOGAN

V.P. Singh ki antim iccha, padhe likhe chalayen riksha.

ANTI-MANDAL COMMISSION SLOGAN

Madhu Dandavate: the car stops here

AMPLIFIER

The noisiest members of the Rajya Sabha

■ S.S. Ahluwalia: Congress(I) member from Bihar. Insists in intervening in every parliamentary debate even if he knows nothing of the matter under discussion. His propensity to throw his weight around had led to many reprimands from the Chair.

■ Ratnakar Pandey: The man who mourned Mamata Banerjee prematurely. Pandey makes a lot of noise but remarkably each intervention consists of the same less than erudite statement: "Resign. Resign. V.P Singh, resign." It is rumoured that by the next session he will have learnt a second phrase.

■ Shankar Dayal Singh: Come back Kalpnath Rai, all is forgiven. Singh, a Janata Dal member from Bihar, makes more noise than Rai used to. Oddly enough, he is most voluble when the Raja is in the House.

■ Pramod Mahajan: More sensible than the Congress(I)'s megaphones. But the BJP member from Maharashtra's policy is: anything they can do, I can do louder.

Auto pilot

The deadlock over the choice of a new managing director for Indian Airlines continues. V.P. Singh had decided to give the job to Shekhar Singh who had flown the UP government's plane when he was chief minister. Vinod Pande tried to implement this decision while Arif Mohammad Khan, the minister, agreed to go along.

Unfortunately, UP chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav objected to the proposal. And just as VP thought he had got around Mulayam, the Public Enterprises Selection Board decided not to shortlist Shekhar Singh for the job.

The Cabinet secretariat persuaded the board to yield enough to interview him but it has now refused to recommend his name.

At Air India, Arif wants to follow the sensible, if obvious, course and confirm Subhash Gupte, but such is the state of the government that even that hasn't come through.

Only Vayudoot, whose MD does not get on with Arif, seems to be unaffected by the chaos at the aviation ministry. ●

What did the Skypak Man say to the girl from Singapore?

"Don't kill me with your charm! I have a job to do..."

We'll deliver. Wherever on earth. SKYPAK The worldwide couriers.

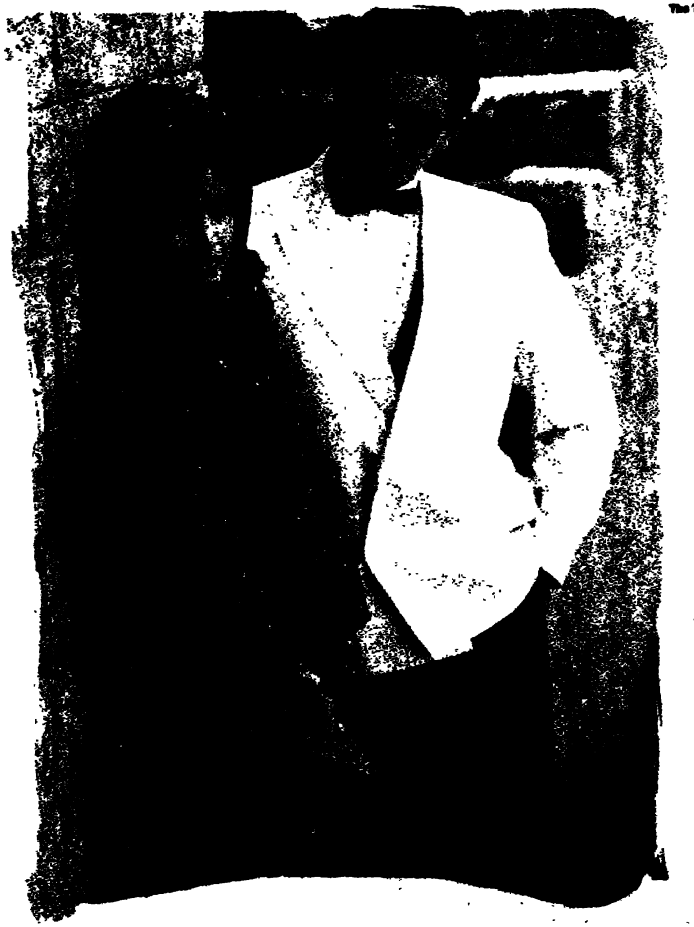
Skypak House, Off M. Vassanji Road, Marol, Andheri (E), Bombay 400 059

No ban, no challenge... just a burning desire.

ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION □ RS 7.00

GOLDEN GIRLS: INDIA'S ACE SPRINTERS



SUNDAY

THE IMAGE CRUMBLES

Is the uproar over the Mandal Commission the beginning of the end for V.P. Singh?

Creations for a Masterpiece.

JCT FABRICS

SUITINGS • SHIRTINGS • DRESS MATERIALS

CONTENTS

SUNDAY
VOLUME 17 □ ISSUE 36 □ RS 7.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION
9—15 SEPTEMBER 1990

28
COVER STORY
The image crumbles
Is the uproar over the Mandal Commission the beginning of the end for V.P. Singh?

14
CONTROVERSY
Assault on a green
A parliamentary controversy erupts over SUNDAY's Maneka Gandhi article. Also, the green minister replies to the charges.

24
PROFILE
Does anybody remember this man?
Mufti Mohammad Sayeed: the invisible home minister.

48
TEXTILES
All that glitters...
Four centuries later, the Banarasi silk industry still thrives.

70
PHOTO-ESSAY
Golden girls
With Ashwini Nachappa beating sprint queen P.T. Usha in a recent race, the top honours for women's athletics is wide open. Who are Usha's contenders?

76
BOOK EXTRACT
The pen is mightier
Arun Shourie's account of the Indian Express' battles with the Indira and Rajiv Gandhi regimes.

84
SPORTS
Mixed fortunes
Though the Indian cricket team lost the Test series, its tour of England was not a complete disaster.

LETTERS 4
GOSSIP SWEET AND SOUR 7
SIGHT AND SOUND 9
COUNTERVIEW 12
BODYLINE 18
SOUTH BLOCK 19
NEWSWATCH 23
Jyoti Basu vs the party
MANI-TALK 40
SPOTLIGHT 44
BUSINESS 50
BUSINESS DIARY 57
NEWS 58
KHAAS BAAT 69
MEDIA MUSINGS 82
MILESTONES 87
SUNDAYWEEK 88
RANDOM NOTES 89
DELHI DIARY 90

Cover transparency: Gautam Patole

Cover artwork: D.S. Thapa

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu and edited by Vir Sanghvi from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001 Air surcharge for Srinagar ex-Delhi and Tripura: 20 paise, North-eastern states: 30 paise

Death of democracy

The cover story (Fired!, 19—25 August) was absorbing. The dismissal of Benazir Bhutto's government by President Ghulam Ishaq Khan has dealt a severe blow to democracy in Pakistan, as the army has been allowed to reassert itself.

Benazir had to pass through a turbulent time during her truncated tenure as Prime Minister. Being a woman in an Islamic country, she was always viewed with a jaundiced eye by the fundamentalists and the army.

It was widely felt that with the introduction of a democratic process in Pakistan, a new era would begin. But the present situation has shattered such hopes.

Shashank Prasad, Meerut (Uttar Pradesh)

■ The dismissal of Benazir's government by the Pakistani President, Ghulam Ishaq Khan was both constitutional and unconstitutional.

It was constitutional because Bhutto's government failed to maintain law and order in the country, specially in her home province of Sind. The country was in turmoil ever since she came to power, with ethnic riots paralysing life in Sind.

But her removal was unconstitutional because she was elected democratically. Therefore, the present situation suggests that Pakistan is back to the dark days of military dictatorship.

S. Bachan Jeet Singh, Hyderabad (Andhra Pradesh)

■ The cover story was a timely evaluation of the factors that led to the ouster of the Benazir government in Pakistan. The democratic process has suffered a severe setback. The reasons behind her ouster are the following:

The Pakistani Army could not stomach the fact that democracy was back and an elected government was in power. The Islamic fundamentalists could never accept a woman as Prime Minister. Moreover, Benazir's inept style of functioning, rampant corruption, and ethnic violence in the country, especially in Benazir's home province, Sind, queered the pitch for her.

Thus, Benazir failed to live up to the expectations of the people of Pakistan. Also, India did not gain much from her rule, for the Kashmir problem worsened, thanks to the active support given by the Pakistani Army to the Kashmiri militants. And India's hopes of improving relations with Pakistan suffered a rude shock.

Amitava Sen, New Delhi

■ The article on Benazir was both informative and interesting. Her assertion that she took Kashmir out of cold storage, something which all her predecessors had failed to do, was, however, ludicrous. It was ironical because she herself was ultimately thrown into cold storage in her own country. Besides this, her allegations that her ouster must have made Indians happy are totally baseless. One feels sorry not for her ouster, but for the fact that democracy in Pakistan received a very severe blow.

Prabhakar S. Harsole, Indore (Madhya Pradesh)

Benazir Bhutto with husband Asif Zardari

■ The write-up on Benazir's dismissal was excellent. It is unfortunate that the people of Pakistan could not ensure the survival of democracy. The Pakistani Army was mainly responsible for the present state of affairs. The military and the fundamentalists could never accept a woman as the country's Prime Minister. President Ishaq Khan has also been a party to the conspiracy against a democratically elected government. Had he been fair, he would have allowed Benazir to seek a vote of confidence before dismissing her on charges of corruption. Actually, the whole idea is to keep Benazir out of power anyhow and install someone who is willing to toe the line of the generals.

Khursheed Ahmed, Patna (Bihar)

■ Benazir's dismissal goes a long way in establishing the fact that democracy is something which the Pakistani Army and the fundamentalists are allergic to. Moreover, of late, the President of Pakistan had a strained relation with Benazir. She, on her part, also failed to live up to the expectations of the people. But with the sacking of the Bhutto regime, democracy seems to be the main loser.

B.N. Bose, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Rule of the mediocre

The write-up on the Mandal Commission report (Promoting mediocrity, 19—25 August) was timely and appropriate. The implementation of this report will certainly lead to a deterioration of standard in every sphere. Undeserving candidates may end up as technocrats, or for that matter, hold important positions in government institutions. Needless to say, merit will suffer. Besides, the nation will be divided along caste lines. The move was clearly aimed at cornering the backward caste vote banks and points to the possibility of a mid-term poll.

At a time when the country is beset with problems in Kashmir, Punjab and Assam, the National Front government has added to its troubles by deciding to implement the Mandal Commission report. What is worse is that none of the political parties has protested against the government's move. Are they scared of losing the vote bank?

Deepak Kumar, Patna (Bihar)

■ In an attempt to steal the show in his ongoing tussle with Devi Lal, Prime Minister V.P. Singh has dropped a bombshell by accepting the recommendations of the Mandal Commission report. There is no justification in making upper castes—if they can be really called that—the scapegoats. Instead, the government should have made education free for all and allowed students to compete for jobs without discrimination.

Krishnendu Chakrabarti, Howrah (West Bengal)

■ By deciding to implement the Mandal Commission report—which had been gathering dust since 1982—V.P Singh has only betrayed his cynicism. As employment opportunities become scarce, concessions, like the one the government has given to the backward classes, are sure to be resisted by students all over the country.

Chiranjib Haldar, New Delhi

■ The central government's decision to implement the Mandal Commission report is a highly retrograde step. It will jeopardise the future of lakhs of students throughout the country. By going in for the reservations the government is aiming to build a second rate nation. The decision seems to be a highly motivated one. The National Front is using this as a ploy to win over the backward caste vote bank. It is also deplorable that none of the other parties such as the BJP, the leftists and the Congress(I) has condemned the Centre's policy.

The government should provide the so-called backward classes with proper education facilities and better opportunities to improve their lot. Reservation is certainly not the solution.

Rohit R. Das, Bangalore (Karnataka)

Students protesting against the Mandal Commission report: their future is in grave danger

Under pressure

The write-up on (The siege of Mahanta, 12—18 August) raises a few questions. The gruesome murder of the SP(Superintendent of police) of Dibrugarh shows the latest strategy being adopted by the ULFA activists. While Bhrigu Phukan, the home minister tendered his resignation owning moral responsibility for the killing, the Mahanta government should have done the same.

The state government of Assam does not know how to deal with the situation while the ULFA seems determined to cripple the administration and hold the innocent to ransom. Unless some serious steps are taken, things may go out of hand.

Chiranjib Haldar, New Delhi

ULFA guerrillas: holding Assam to ransom

True history

The interview featuring Govind Talwalkar (Transfer of power, 12—18 August) was excellent. The time has come for us to know history in its true perspective before getting carried away emotionally. Talwalkar seems to be a level-headed person and India needs more of his kind at this hour.

Sandip K. Tagore, Director, Indian Culture Centre, Osaka (Japan)

Frankly speaking

The interview with Rajiv Gandhi (Time to be frank, 12—18 August) made interesting reading.

Rajiv Gandhi: ruing his fate

Rajiv's version that V.P. Singh had conspired for the top post in the country cannot be denied completely. After all, V.P. Singh's image of a crusader of truth has come to be questioned. And at this stage, Rajiv's electoral defeat can be attributed to the fact that he and his team were largely misrepresented as computer boys, whiz kids and the agents of Bofors.

What the country needs is a leader who can lead and not a set of leaders who are determined to perpetuate misrule under the garb of collective leadership.

G.V. Prasad, Mangalore (Karnataka)

A mockery

Incredible as it may seem, there was hardly a paragraph in the report (Friend? Who, me? 22—28 July) that was not fatally flawed with bloomers. For example, the authors state that before 1974 both Bombay Dyeing and Reliance imported DMT. Bombay Dyeing has never imported DMT, which is a raw material for polyester that they do not manufacture themselves. In 1986, Bombay Dyeing started manufacturing DMT for sale to polyester producers. Similarly, in 1974, Reliance was just a small private fabric weaver. It only went public in 1977 and into the polyester yarn manufacturing business in 1982.

The statement that the Reliance project at "Patalganga is a dud..." really takes the cake. The plants have been operational for years, working to capacity, making polyester fibre, polyester yarn, LAB, PTA, paraxylene etc. As a matter of fact the customs authorities inspired by Mr Wadia's zeal to destroy Reliance, recently issued the company a show-cause notice alleging that it produces more PTA and paraxylene than the Mr Wadia gave it permission for.

As for finances, the results of the year ended 31 March, 1990, which were announced recently show that the company performance had gone up in all sectors and that its low debt-equity ratio indicated a borrowing power of over Rs 2100 crores.

It is also incorrect to link the L&T suppliers' credit issue to Reliance's financial future. This credit was no grant or gift, to put cash into Reliance's pockets. It was a credit specifically dedicated for the supply of L&T equipment for the gas cracker project at Hazira. The Rs 820 crore debenture issue was no "neat plan" for easy cash. These debentures were meant to provide partial financing for a Rs 1425 crore investment plan, in which suppliers' credit was less than half.

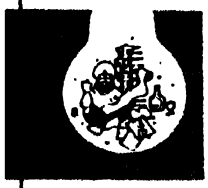
Needless to say, the report is factually wrong in stating that Nusli Wadia did not receive any blessings from the new government. Departing from the long term fiscal policy, the Janata Dal government retained a low customs duty rate of 80 per cent despite the crash in world prices of paraxylene from $900 a tonne to $350 a tonne. The duty on other similarly affected petrochemicals like MEG was raised from 90 per cent to 150 per cent but not paraxylene, vital to Bombay Dyeing. With landed costs of imports around Rs 13,000 per tonne compared to Rs 18,500 per tonne for domestic supplies, Wadia gained a huge windfall profit. He was allowed to import 4000 mt of paraxylene in February 1990, followed by a further clearance to import 8000 mt in March, curiously enough just hours before the new import policy was announced. In April, another licence to import 14,500 mt was given to Mr Wadia.

On 2 May, the DGTD cleared the way for another 30,000 mt, without caring to fulfil the Exim policy which required prior clearance from indigenous manufacturers. This total of 56,500 mt, well exceeds Bombay Dyeing's annual requirement of 40,000 mt but a benevolent government is disclaiming the imports approved in the previous year, i.e. before 31 March, 1990. It is ironic that while the government is urging everyone else to conserve scarce foreign exchange and reduce the imports of petroleum poducts, it is blithely allowing imports to Bombay Dyeing worth nearly Rs 40 crores, despite offers of local supply from Reliance and IPCL. The price differential compared to domestic prices gives Bombay Dyeing a huge windfall profit of nearly Rs 30 crores.

Dhirubhai Ambani: losing out to Wadia?

If Wadia received no favours, was it a coincidence that the National Front government decanalised paraxylene on 30 March, and placed it on the Limited Permissible List, thus allowing discretionary treatment in issuance of import licences? Was it not strange that the government bent further backwards in the first week of May by allowing all items on the Limited Permissible List to get 18 months requirement under Automatic Supplementary Licence, regardless of domestic availability? It also allowed any new items in the Limited Permissible List, which was earlier in the canalised list. Somehow, there was only one product which fit the bill. No marks for guess work. It was indeed paraxylene.

To make a further mockery of the Janata Dal government's much professed decrial of not taking sides in a corporate war, it has dropped all the FERA and other cases listed in the Company Law Board report on Bombay Dyeing after the Indian Express adviser, S. Gurumurthy, reportedly interceded on Mr Wadia's behalf with the Government of India. The enforcement directorate had even imposed a penalty of Rs 1.14 crores, which has not been enforced. There were also dozens of other cases which have all been conveniently dropped.



In his recent speech at the Annual General Meeting, Mr Wadia made much of his needs to import paraxylene for lack of availability of domestic production. Reliance has several letters on the file sent to the government expressing its willingness to sell paraxylene. Bombay Dyeing has never sent any correspondence asking Reliance or IPCL whether it has paraxylene for sale.

The effect of all these generous privileges accorded to the Janata Dal's most favoured company has been reflected in their share prices which have soared from Rs 80 to Rs 250. Surely, Bombay Dyeing's share price did not soar because a value-based government decided to bless him with an Indian passport. Who can say that Wadia does not have friends? With friends like the Indian Express who needs the government?

Tony Jesudasen, Group Adviser, Corporate Communications, Reliance Industries Ltd, New Delhi

KHUSHWANT SINGH

Yugoslav exposure

I have never been to Yugoslavia but have had quite a few Yugoslav friends. Ever since I read Ivo Andric's A Bridge on the Drina, I have made it a point to pick up whatever works I could find in their many languages in English translations and read them. They are not many. And hardly any available in Indian book stores. Fortunately, the present Yugoslav ambassador and his wife happen to be academics and as generous in lending books as they are in dispensing Slivovitch. I got a haul of books, mostly Slovenian, from their collection: Ivan Cankar's autobiography My Life, Ciril Kosmac's A Day in Spring, Ivan Potrc's The Land the Flesh, Vitomil Zupan's Minuet for a Guitar and Dominik Smole's Antigone. I had never heard of anyone of them.

The first thing that strikes the reader about the modern Yugoslav writer is that though influenced by European and American writers, there is a unique Slavonic flavour in their writings. As in other countries, they rebelled against the social order. Most of them like Djilas were not only against Stalinist communism but even against its tepider version imposed by Marshal Tito and his successors. Many had their books banned and suffered imprisonment. Others went underground, wrote for proscribed underground literary and political journals.

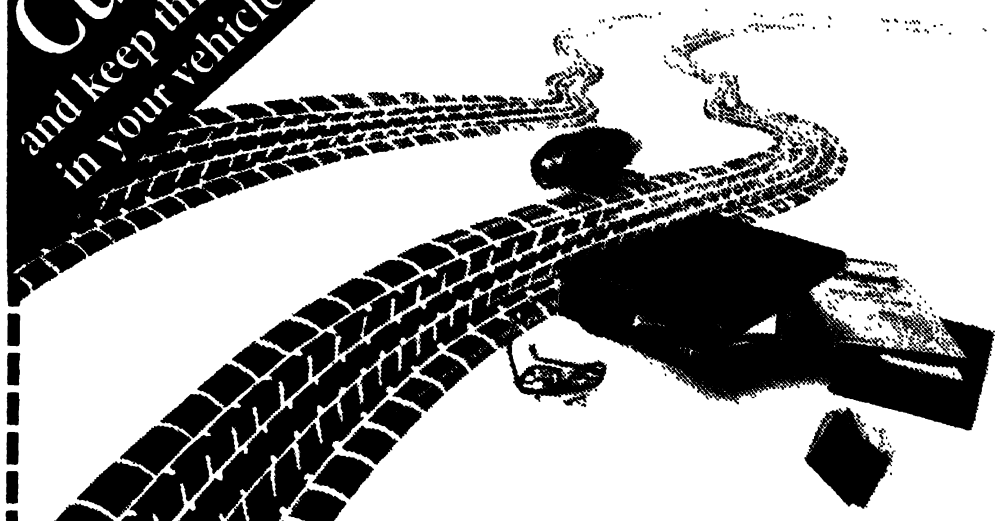
Of the clutch of books I got, I was most impressed by Dominik Smole's Antigone. It is a play based on a Theban episode with very little dramatic content and just four main characters. Antigone was the daughter of Oedipus. She and her sister Ismene are living with King Creon and his son Haimon. Teiresias is the king's counsellor, a sort of Greek Chanakya. The play revolves round the siege of Thebes. It is repelled but amongst the dead is Polyneices, the brother of Ismene and Antigone. King Creon believes he played a traitorous role and his body should be let to rot or eaten up by scavengers. The two sisters are equally firm that he should be given a decent burial so that his spirit is at rest. Against the king's wishes, Antigone goes out of the city walls looking for her brother amongst the dead. She does not appear in the play at all but her relentless search for her dead brother is what one play is about.

The sage Teiresias speaks for the establishment. "All wars are senseless, without rhyme or reason, but one thing's certainly sure: that in the last account we have a non-event," he proclaims. Creon has his own obligations to stand by tradition; and tradition demands that Polyneices' body must remain unburied. He loves both Ismene and Antigone; but he will not allow his affection for the princesses to stand in the way of his duty. "A king should have restricted contact with his people and keep modest profile," he says. "A man when king, does not view the world from the centre of the scrimmage; but climbs a hill which has no colour and no sunshine, hoping to have a clear, objective view. Affection, tolerance and pity are emotions most appropriate for the family circle. A man made king knows only: investigation, trial and sentence."

Teiresias fully backs the king. He tries to persuade Ismene to tell her sister to give up seeking her brother's body.

"Sin, conscience, innocence and guilt—fine words indeed. But what of life, reality and circumstance, dear lady, position, situation, and those factors, hard and solid which buffet you and which you have to struggle with. Harsh facts, my child,
All else is but a stream of high-falutin's verbiage, a hollow jingle beside the hard and sad reality of daily life."

And adds:
"And in our dealings with the dead we cannot add nor take away for if you wish to foist on them some attribute or label, to shower them with glory or to press their dead heads in the mire, you waste your effort to no purpose! What's the use if all you get in answer is a stony smile and bye-bye. Toddle-oo. I am no more."



Ismene represents the conscience of humanity and refuses to compromise:
"For those whose conscience does not rise above the gutter, who for a bowl of soup or a snug corner by the fire would pawn their hearts and souls who have no sense of pride and no idea of honour
With such, dear sage, Ismene does not deal!"

She tells Teiresias: "True peace and reconciliation are the work of noble minds, not fixers and accountants." And to the king: "Wisdom without mercy is an ignoble, hollow thing." She adds, "Nothing will be right tomorrow which is wrong today." Her alter ego is her page with whom she is evidently in love—"A happy child, radiant creature, glowing with an inner light—anxious as an early flower, which trembles as it submits to that fluttering butterfly, the world." And so on.

One is not sure whether Polyneices' body is found; Antigone claims she has given it a proper burial but this is far from clear. The play is summed up by a chant of the chorus addressed to the page. "Unlucky servant, faithful only to yourself, loyal only to your own advantage, and even more unhappy boy, unhappy Thebes and Creon too, who thought by evil to accomplish good. But evil, born of evil, evil bears in an unending line."

The first thing that strikes the reader about the modern Yugoslav writer is that though influenced by European and American writers, there is a unique Slavonic flavour in their writings

Cut and keep this ad in your vehicle.

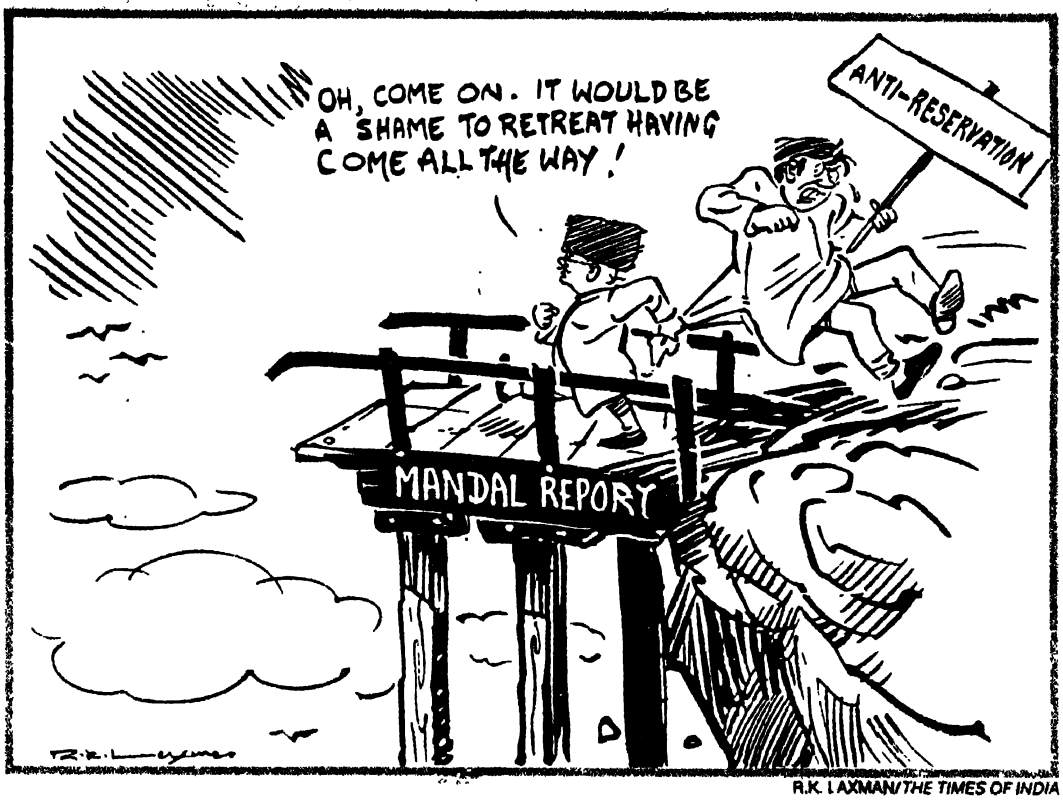
You'll need it in case somebody is knocked down accidentally.

It can happen to the safest driver. As you are driving, suddenly, you knock down somebody. And the person is injured, sometimes fatally.

If a third party is injured, or property is damaged, do the following:-

- Though not obligatory under motor insurance, please help to move the injured person to a hospital for treatment.
- Inform the insurance company describing the nature of injury or damage.
- Please follow the advice of the insurance company. Do not promise any compensation to any third party who is involved in the accident without consulting the insurance company.
- In case of Police prosecution, seek legal counsel and keep the insurance company informed.
- If your paid driver is involved, please take down the particulars of his driving licence. Please see that the driver is available in future for investigation.
- If you receive any notice of claim from the third party, Motor Accident Claims Tribunal, or a Court of Law, intimate your insurance company immediately.
- Send all notices and summons you receive concerning the accident to the insurance company. The insurance company will attend to all of them on your behalf.

If your own vehicle is damaged, follow the procedures carefully for making a motor insurance claim.



Please help us to help you in getting the claims recovery faster.

File your claim right and it will be processed in the quickest possible time.

GENERAL INSURANCE CORPORATION OF INDIA

NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED · THE NEW INDIA ASSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED · THE ORIENTAL INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED · UNITED INDIA INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED

R K SWAMY/GIC/768 B

R.K. LAXMAN/THE TIMES OF INDIA

■ Treating unequals as equals is the greatest injustice.

V.P. SINGH, Prime Minister

■ After all ours is a democracy, you listen to our views, we listen to yours. We are not among those who can be cowed down by terror tactics and show of force.

MUFTI MOHAMMAD SAYEED, Union home minister, in Assam

■ I would like the next poll to be in 1994.

L.K. ADVANI, BJP president, on the possibility of a snap Lok Sabha poll

■ Everyone is groping. I am also groping, not about what to achieve but how to achieve it.

I.K. GUJRAL, external affairs minister, on his recent visit to Kuwait to ensure the safety of Indians there

■ When the questions concern the Prime Minister, it is desirable that he attend the House. It is a tradition, a wholesome tradition, and it should be maintained.

S.D. SHARMA, Rajya Sabha chairman, admonishing V.P. Singh for arriving late during Question Hour

■ You can ask me any number of questions. You can lay me on the table of the House if you like.

MADHU DANDAVATE, Union finance minister, in the Rajya Sabha after announcing the hike in car prices

■ We (Pakistan and India) have already fought three wars. How much more before we realise the need to be together?

KULDIP NAYAR, Indian high commissioner to Britain

■ This government too can do what it wants.

DHIRENDRA BRAHMACHARI, controversial godman, on the corruption charges against him

■ We are not like those who swear by the Constitution and then forget all about it.

LALOO PRASAD YADAV, Bihar chief minister

■ I never think of who is with me and who is against me. I only think of what is right for the public.

MULAYAM SINGH YADAV, Uttar Pradesh chief minister

■ People who are always listening to electronic music are actually destroying themselves by reducing their life span.

USTAD AMJAD ALI KHAN, sarod maestro

BE THE MASTER OF YOUR OWN DESTINY.

CANSTAR

Earn 50% or more return per annum for a lifetime on initial investment after 10 years

Canbank Mutual Fund has, since its inception, built up an excellent track record The best of professional skills, financial acumen and intimate knowledge of the corporate world combine to bring to you high return yet safe investment opportunities Scheme after scheme, launched by us, has succeeded in turning market opportunities into lucrative returns Look at the total payout of CANSHARE alone -- over 100% in less than 30 months excluding market appreciation (Market price Rs 22 50 as on 31st July, 1990)

HIGHLIGHTS:

- A well established Mutual Fund with the largest investor base
- Professionally managed with proven track record of success
- Tax benefit under Section 80L of the Income-tax Act, 1961 upto Rs 10,000 or Capital Gains* benefit under Income-tax Act
- Easy encashability -- to be listed on Bombay and other Stock Exchanges after one year
- Buy back any time after three years
- Easy Transferability

* Separate application forms available

Minimum Repurchase price for 1000 Canstars:

A. On completion of

3 Years	–	Rs 15,150
4 Years	–	Rs. 17 400
5 Years	–	Rs 20,000
6 Years	–	Rs. 23,000
7 Years	–	Rs 26,500
8 Years	–	Rs 30,500
9 Years	–	Rs 35,000
10 Years	–	Rs 40,000

B. Option on completion of 10 years
Receive monthly income @ 12 50% p a. calculated on accumulated amount
and
Receive an annual bonus/appreciation from the 11th year onwards

OFFER CLOSES ON 15TH SEPTEMBER, 1990

CANBANK MUTUAL FUND
Orient House, Adi Marzban Path (Mangalore Street), Bombay 400 038
Principal Trustee : CANARA BANK
Always a step ahead

Concern

VINOD MEHTA

Take a bow, Srichand!

The Hindujas seek to get even with Arun Nehru

Two of the most unattractive figures on the contemporary scene are once again fighting for our attention. My first instinct is to ignore their shenanigans, but their manipulative skills are awesome and in their quest for survival they have managed to embroil one serving, one ex-Prime Minister, sections of the press, issues of probity and, of course, that ever-blazing 155 mm howitzer, Bofors. These are all booming in concert, shedding more heat than light and demonstrating yet again how low and despicable public life in India has become.

In one corner are the Hindujas, masters of intrigue, duplicity and chicanery. If tomorrow a Bofors cheque was discovered in their bank account they would produce an affidavit from that very bank denying its existence. They think nothing of flying editors ("bring your wife and family along") to London, all expenses paid, but a friend who worked as a consultant found them haggling over 50-rupee bills. He resigned in disgust. The Hindujas are unctuous, and in their attempts to 'buy' journalists they are embarrassingly straightforward. "How much?" is the first question they usually ask.

Tired and visibly panting in the other corner is Arun Kumar Nehru. Ancient and implacable enemy of the Hinduja brothers, his political career encapsulates some hitherto unstated Parkinson's law. In the early 80s, his power was legendary and so was his capacity for rudeness. Journalists trembled in his presence while Congress politicians approached him head down. Every dirty trick Indira Gandhi planned was executed superbly by this faithful. Rajiv used him for similar purposes before abandoning him for more talented hatchet-men. However, it must be conceded that in the corridors of power, Arun Nehru enjoys a formidable reputation for ministerial competence. His desk, rumour has it, is bereft of pending files.

The Hindujas: masters of intrigue, duplicity and chicanery. If tomorrow a Bofors cheque was discovered in their bank account, they would produce an affidavit from that very bank denying its existence

As every literate Indian knows, the Hinduja brothers are struggling to keep out of jail. Naturally, every underhand stratagem is being explored. Therefore, their interest in a report published in a Bombay daily The Independent on 29 August is understandable and so is The Independent's eagerness to extract the maximum mileage out of it. Newspapers prosper by disclosure, even though one might ask how photostats of the report reached the hands of Congress MPs in Delhi on the very morning the story was published in Bombay. But that is a minor cavil.

The report itself, alas, does not amount to much. Interestingly, even before it appeared, another Bombay morninger, The Daily, spoiled the 'scoop' through a front-page story that the Hindujas, courtesy friendly editors, were circulating anti-Arun Nehru disinformation which was expected to hit the headlines very soon. On 30 August, The Daily reported: "More documents related to Bofors are now available to The Daily. This time pertaining to Arun Singh's talks with the Swedes when he was minister of state for defence in the Rajiv Gandhi government." The paper went on: "It is obvious from the documents that by the time the actual negotiations for the gun started, Arun Nehru had been completely sidelined." Clearly, we are witnessing a new phenomenon in Indian journalism—a document versus document war with Hindujas arming one side and Arun Nehru the other.

The Independent report which set the stage for the war is, as I suggested earlier, small change.

- I don't think it will come as any great surprise to even cursory followers of national affairs that Arun Nehru was a major player in the initial discussions with Bofors and the Swedes. His assurance to a Bofors executive (Martin Ardbo) that his company had a "realistic chance" of winning the contract cannot be seen as out of line or suspicious.
- Neither can the Arun Nehru observation, that "an agreement on the political level was crucial" before the deal could be clinched, be considered startling. Indeed, it was the obvious remark to make. Bofors finally won the contract precisely because of a political agreement at the highest level—between Rajiv Gandhi and Olaf Palme.

INDRAJEET AURANGABADKAR

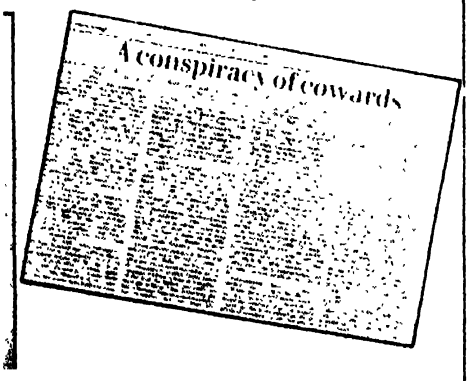
• The New Delhi-based Swedish official's communication to Stockholm that Arun Nehru sought to create the impression that he was the eminence grise of the Bofors deal will provoke nothing beyond an 'interesting' response from followers of the Bofors mystery trail. Actually, Mr Nehru at the time was not just the eminence grise of the Bofors deal but of the entire Rajiv government.

• Arun Nehru's insistence that his and Rajiv's name be kept out of the negotiations is of a piece in the context. Now, if the commerce minister had said that only his name be kept out, that would have been news, big news.

• A tit-bit of the controversy--the allegation that the Indian Express suppressed the documents—is the only revelation in the report. However, here too it can be argued that given the paper's self-proclaimed editorial bias, the censorship, though regrettable, was perfectly understandable.

In Parliament an orchestrated din has been duly registered with shouts from the Congress benches for a full debate or the suspension of Zero Hour. A routine visit to Stockholm by V.P. Singh, when he was finance minister in the previous regime, is being seen as "clear proof" that the Prime Minister was involved in the Bofors scam and is "hiding his role". Surprisingly, the thrust of the Opposition attack was not directed at Arun Nehru. In fact, not a single Congress MP even mentioned his name as they sought to establish a "nexus" between this government and the Bofors scandal. Who, then, was the target? Vishwanath Pratap Singh, of course. We are being asked to believe that the present Prime Minister authorised the presence of middlemen or, at the very least, organised the paperwork.



It is such a preposterous charge that only an Opposition as cretinous as this one could have made it. If V.P. Singh was even obliquely involved—we should not rule out that possibility completely—would Rajiv and his coterie, who have had access to every scrap of information on the deal, have kept quiet? If they had discovered just one signature by the Prime Minister on any file, which could conceivably have been interpreted to suggest that he was privy to the details of the agreement, one can be certain that V.P. Singh's name would have been dragged through the Bofors mud. The truth of the matter is that VP played absolutely no part in either negotiating the contract or deciding on the purchase of the gun. The attempts to implicate him directly only show up the bankruptcy of the Opposition.

But why, one should ask, is Arun Nehru being shielded? For obvious reasons. Whatever role the 'fat man' played, whatever negotiations he conducted in Sweden, Austria and New Delhi, whatever portion of the illegal gratification he or the party or 'others' kept—all of this had the approval and consent of the supreme leader. Such was the complexity, size and international scope of the contract that AKN could not have made a solo run.

In India there are two individuals who know everything there is to know about Bofors, Rajiv Gandhi and Arun Nehru. In that order. If it was possible for the Congress through fabrication, forgery or fact to de-link Rajiv and link AKN with the commissions, the deed would have been done a long time ago.

But they can't. Because Arun Nehru knows too much. He will only keep silent as long as Rajiv keeps his part of the bargain. Any effort to pin part or all of the blame on him by his cousin will mean that the real Bofors story begins to be screened before the nation. Who knows then where the buck will stop. The Congress spokesperson, M.J. Akbar, when asked why his party, though in possession of all documents on Arun Nehru had hitherto preferred silence on the subject, replied, "The Congress government has chosen not to behave irresponsibly and disclose Cabinet secrets. What is a secret for this government remains a secret." Given the Congress record in selective leaking, the recourse to the high moral ground is fatuous.

As in the past, the Bofors agenda is being set in the press. Whether it is the CBI or the Hindujas or the Bachchans or Arun Jaitley or Chitra Subramanium, the dirty work is being done in newspapers. The government and the investigative agencies merely react or comment on allegations and denials in the media. As a result, the Bofors conundrum is fast becoming an enigma with the electorate, the first and final loser. All those who were promised the full facts in 15 days can today only be certain of one fact: vast sums were paid as illegal commissions and most of these went into Congress pockets. The answer to the question of who, when and how much, remains as distant as ever. Perhaps we shall never know.●

A conspiracy of cowards

Pritish Nandy and his article in The Independent: the Hinduja brothers are struggling to keep out of jail and therefore their interest in the report published on 29 August is understandable and so is The Independent's eagerness to extract the maximum mileage

V S RAMANATHAN

Arun Nehru: implacable enemy of the Hindujas, his power encapsulates some hitherto unstated Parkinson's law. In early 80s, his power was legendary and so was his capacity for rudeness

Assault on a Green

A parliamentary controversy erupts over SUNDAY'S Maneka Gandhi article

It was an unusual feeling. After eight months of unblemished media adulation, Maneka Gandhi suddenly found that the tide had turned.

The storm began with an issue of SUNDAY which carried a story on the squabbles within the environment ministry. The story did not dispute Maneka's basic assertion that she was far more sincere in her commitment to the cause of the environment than Nilamani Routray, the Cabinet minister for environment and forests. But, it suggested that many of the Gandhi-Routray rows were unrelated to environmental issues.

Instead, the two ministers were squabbling over such matters as the use of the ministry's aircraft (presented by a United Nations body for fire-fighting purposes) and the division of responsibilities. Moreover, Maneka's personal style was resented by bureaucrats who were not used to ministers scrawling things like "the CM is mad" or "illiterate comment" on letters and files.

Maneka Gandhi: outraged

JAGDISH YADAV

Nilamani Routray: doughty minister

NITIN RAI

V.P. Singh: keeping shut

The story found its echo in Parliament shortly after SUNDAY hit the stands. Jayanti Natarajan, the Congress(I) MP from Tamil Nadu, read from SUNDAY and demanded an explanation from environment minister Routray who was present in the House. Other MPs took up the chorus and asked if it was true that Routray-Gandhi relations had deteriorated to the point where the senior minister was writing angry letters to the Prime Minister about his minister of state's behaviour.

This afforded Routray a splendid opportunity to debunk the SUNDAY story and to deny that he was at loggerheads with his junior minister—even if he did not wish to go so far as to defend her.

The uproar in Parliament continued for two days. On the second day, Maneka released the text of a letter to SUNDAY (carried overleaf) which gave her side of the story. (The letter reached the Press Trust of India before it reached SUNDAY's Calcutta offices.) And on the third, she appeared in the Rajya Sabha to hurriedly read out a statement making the same points.

The rebuttals made some sense—as readers can judge for themselves—but they did not alter the impression that the environment ministry is a house divided with the doughty Routray and the sharp and articulate Maneka seeking only to undermine each other's position.

Maneka's outrage over the leak of documents from the environment ministry to SUNDAY was genuine. How, she asked, did a confidential letter from foreign secretary Muchkund Dubey to environment secretary Mahesh Prasad find its way to the press—particularly as she had never heard of the existence of such a letter? Moreover, if Routray had written to V.P. Singh complaining about her behaviour, then surely somebody (either Routray or the Prime Minister) should have told her about it. Why did she have to first read about it in SUNDAY?

But such outrage only provokes derisive sniggers in the environment ministry. Says a senior official: "She started the leaks. She took the battle to the media in an effort to discredit Routray."

The prevailing view in New Delhi's political circles is that Maneka still retains much of her credibility. But that however hard she might try to explain away all the notations on letters and files, the feeling that she is brash and perhaps a little arrogant is hard to shake.

This is not the view of the environment ministry, however. The vast majority of Pariyavaran Bhavan's officials are on the side of Nilamani Routray.

They question Mrs Gandhi's vision of herself as a Joan of Arc fighting to free the environment from the grip of heavily armed vested interests. Innumerable explanations are offered in support of their contention.

Among them is Maneka's claim that she has opposed moves to limit the role of the environment ministry. On 30 August, the United News of India creeded a report saying that the ministry had submitted a set of proposals to the Cabinet which would raise the investment ceiling for projects requiring environmental clearance "in contradiction of the minister of state for environment, Mrs Maneka Gandhi's plea that the investment ceiling for environmental clearance be reduced to Rs five crore."

Nonsense, say ministry officials. "We have the files where all these decisions have first been sanctioned by her, with her personal signature, and then by Routray." No doubt if Maneka persists with the claim, more documents will be leaked to the press.

In the final analysis, all the responses to the SUNDAY story—from Maneka, Congress MPs and ministry officials—all tend to confirm our original thesis. The environment ministry is deeply divided. And very many of the disputes have nothing to do with the environment. ●

Shiraz Sidhva/New Delhi

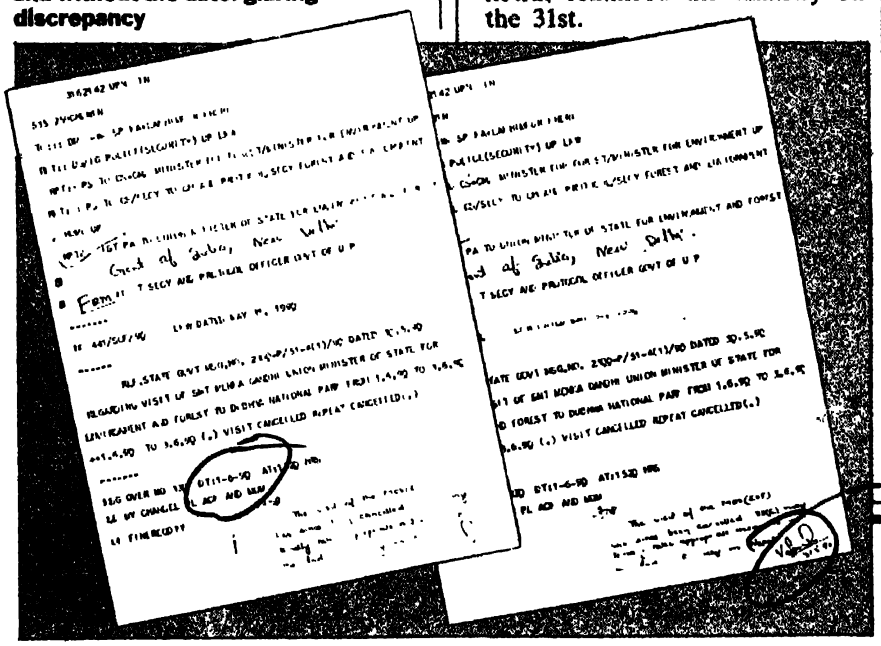
The prescient notation

A new controversy over a telex

A new controversy has erupted over Maneka Gandhi's claim that she had informed officials that she would not be using an air-strip in Nepal. The foreign secretary, Muchkund Dubey, complained to the environment ministry that neither the foreign ministry nor the Nepalese government were told that Maneka would not be landing in Nepal at all. And that the Nepalese waiting to receive her were most upset when she did not turn up.

Maneka says that she cancelled her trip on 29 May 1990, three days before the scheduled departure and told Mahesh Prasad, the environment secretary, about it the same day. Further, she adds, her additional private secretary, Vijay Samnotra, reminded the ministry on the 31st.

In support of her contention, Maneka offers a telex message dated 1.6.90 (330) spelling out that the visit has been cancelled. On the telex is a handwritten notation by her personal staff directed at a joint secretary in the environment ministry asking him to inform the Indian embassy in Nepal. Obviously, the joint secretary did not do so.



It is this notation that has created the controversy. Environment ministry officials say that it was fabricated later. They offer two grounds for believing this. One: that the joint secretary was away in Geneve at the time so it would have been silly to have expected him to call Kathmandu. And two: the notation is dated 31.5.90. How, they ask, could her staff have made a notation a day before the telex was issued?

To be fair to Maneka, the copy of the telex she sent SUNDAY does not support this reasoning. The photocopy is so faded at the end that it is impossible to read the name of the man who signed the personal notation, let alone make out the date.

However, there is another copy of the telex which officials say was circulated by Maneka before the gaffe was discovered. On that copy, the date is visible.

And yes, her additional private secretary does appear to have made the notation on 31.5.90, a full day before the telex was issued!

Copies of the telex message—with and without the date: glaring discrepancy

The other side

Maneka replies to the SUNDAY story about the squabbles in her ministry

This is with reference to the item in SUNDAY (19—25 August) entitled Maneka Gandhi versus everybody. I would like to clarify the facts for your readers.

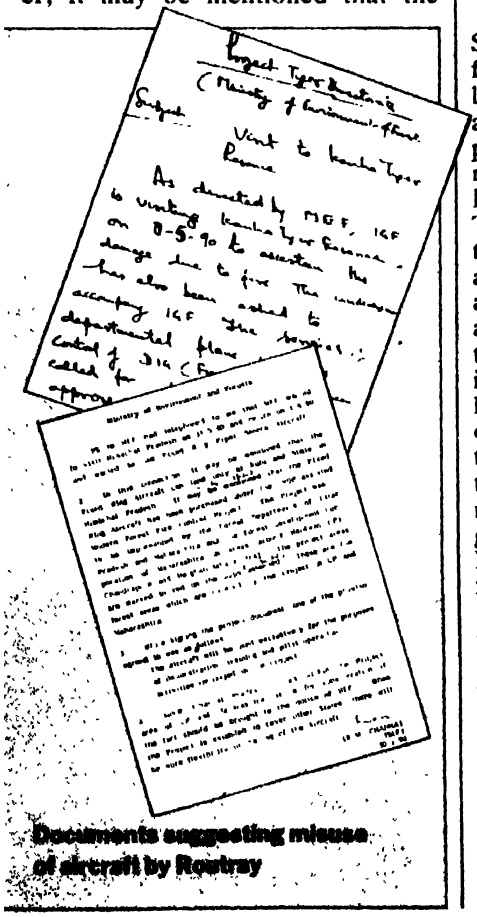
I was surprised to see press reports based on a secret letter written by the foreign secretary to the secretary (environment & forests) regarding an embarrassment caused to Indo-Nepalese diplomatic relations, which has been attributed to supposed carelessness on my part. I was not even aware of such a letter until I saw it for the first time in press reports. I am astonished that a secret letter could find its way into the press.

The facts are that I had proposed to visit the Dudhwa National Park on an official visit as I had received complaints regarding the conditions in the park. The park also falls within the area of the Modern Forest Fire Control Project of the ministry, which I was to review. Accordingly, my office had asked the secretary (E&F) on 25.5.1990 to obtain necessary clearances for the project aircraft to land on the Nepal side of the border, which is a few kilometres from the park. A request to the ministry of external affairs had been sent from the joint secretary in my ministry to make necessary arrangements.

Due to circumstances beyond my control, I had, on 29.5.1990, cancelled my visit; ie, three days before the scheduled departure. The secretary (E&F) was informed about this the same day. On 30.5.1990, the joint secretary concerned had recorded: "I was told by Secretary (E&F) that MOS(E&F) had cancelled her proposed visit to Dudhwa National Park." My APS, Shri Vijay Samnotra, further reminded the Ministry on the 31st. Thus, the officials concerned had sufficient time to inform the ministry of external affairs and/or the Indian embassy in Nepal of the cancellation of my programme. Apparently this was not done. The supporting documents are enclosed.

Further, if due to oversight of the officials concerned, some embarrassment had been caused, this should have been brought to my notice so that I could have expressed my regrets and personal apologies to the Royal Nepal Government for the inconvenience caused due to circumstances beyond my control. However, this was not brought to my notice and I first learnt of it from the press reports which have appeared in the last few days.

I would also like to clarify that, out of 71 hours flying time logged by the project aircraft since I became minister, I have used it for only eight hours. Of these eight hours, six hours were logged in visiting the project area. Only two hours were outside the project area to Jaipur on World Environment Day, as I had to attend official functions in Rajasthan, Haryana and Delhi within the space of a few hours. I would like to mention here that my visit to Jaipur was on the occasion of the World Environment Day on 5 June, 1990. The schedule for that day was particularly tight. Beginning with a programme to start the "Greening of Delhi" at 7.00 am in Delhi, I proceeded to attend three meetings in Rajasthan, viz, a meeting with the CM to declare the new forest policy; to address the NGOs for greening of Rajasthan in a function at the HCM Institute and opening a park in Jaipur. On returning to Delhi at around 4.15 pm in the afternoon of the same day, I proceeded to Manesar (near Gurgaon district) to launch the EEC-aided Arawali Project for which my ministry had procured Rs 36 crores. I also held a meeting with Haryana officials and businessmen at Maruti factory in Gurgaon to allocate planting land.



I would further like to mention that, after the tragic demise of my husband, late Shri Sanjay Gandhi, I have an aversion towards flying, particularly in small planes, and do so only when unavoidable.

Maneka Gandhi at an exhibition in Rajasthan: busy schedule

I was shocked to read that Mr Routray in his letter to Prime Minister on 13 July, 1990 mentioned that "I feel embarrassed to write to you that the aircraft has been extensively used by her in the past to make trips to Bareilly, contrary to the conditions imposed by the UNDP under which the aircraft cannot be used for non-project work". It is pertinent to note here that the minister (E&F), Mr Routray, permitted the inspector general of forests to visit Kanha Tiger Reserve in Madhya Pradesh on 8.5.1990 and the project aircraft was away to Kanha from 8.5.1990 to 13.5.1990 where it did 20 hours of flying and also stayed at Bhopal for two days. The minister never thought it embarrassing here even though Kanha Tiger Reserve does not fall anywhere near the UNDP Project area. The same IG(Forests), under the instructions of minister (E&F) also went to see elephant corridors on the India-Nepal and India-Bhutan borders in the UNDP Project aircraft, for which the flying time was over 20 hours. Further, it may be mentioned that the secretary himself visited Haldwani en route to Pantnagar. The Union minister himself had wanted to use the aircraft to visit Shimla and Kulu in Himachal Pradesh on 31.5.1990 and 1.6.1990—both places nowhere near the project areas.

Documents suggesting misuse of aircraft by Routray

The Kanha National Park: too far to fly

The note of the joint secretary (F), Shri K.M. Chadha, dated 15.5.90 refusing the permission also categorically states that in one of the proviso, the aircraft will be used exclusively for the purpose of demonstration. It is pertinent to note that 10 states namely Haryana, Himachal Pradesh, Orissa, Tamil Nadu, Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Karnataka, Manipur, Nagaland and Arunachal Pradesh have been asking for demonstration of planes and want extension of the project to these 10 states which has also been incorporated in the joint secretary's letter which states "when the project is extended to other States". Therefore, two hours of the demonstration flight to Rajasthan should not be made much of an issue as the plane had also gone for demonstration to Arunachal Pradesh, Nagaland and Manipur etc for over 20 hours.

With regard to the other points raised about allegedly derogatory remarks made by me on official files, I would like to give you the brief background of the cases in question. In one case in which I have noted "illiterate comment", the facts are that this was with reference to a very important project on tigers being conducted in Karnataka, which officials were trying to scuttle on the basis of mere suspicion, even though there was a report of the wildlife officials exonerating the project investigator, Shri Ulhas Karant. Therefore, my remarks have to be seen in this context. With reference to another case in which my noting has been quoted, I would like to clarify the context in which the word "mad" was used. I have been vehemently opposed to the reduction of the 'no construction limit' for hotels and beach resorts in Goa. In a meeting held on 18 May, 1990 with the chief minister, Goa, I had refused to concede the demand for the relaxation of the no construction zone from 500 metres to 200 metres from the high tide line. The chief minister on his part was not agreeable to the involvement of non-officials as members of the monitoring committee set up by my ministry to ensure the compliance of environmental safe-guards for the construction of beach resorts. Following this meeting I felt that the chief minister of Goa was annoyed/angry with my stand on the issue and the word "mad" was used merely in the colloquial sense to convey this feeling.

While my being termed "arrogant" is a subjective opinion, I maintain that I have not in any way been careless in my official dealings. On the other hand, I have been meticulous in pursuing the various environmental issues which I feel are of paramount importance to this country's future. This selective leak of documents appears to be a coordinated conspiracy by vested interests to malign me and make naught of all my efforts for the environment by deliberately obfuscating the fundamental issues involved.●

RAVI SHANKAR

INDER MALHOTRA

Hands off the Gulf

India turns its back on a grave international problem

Several Third World leaders in the past, such as Ahmed Sukarno and Kwame Nkrumah, whenever confronted with a difficult domestic problem, tried to 'solve' it by diverting attention to some foreign issue and even by going abroad on a fairly protracted visit. V.P. Singh and his government appear to have reversed this pattern almost completely.

By creating an avoidable country-wide upheaval over the reservation of 27 per cent of government and public sector jobs for the "other backward classes", a crass euphemism for intermediate castes, many of which wield considerable economic clout, the South Block has seen to it that the Gulf crisis, in some ways the most ominous the world has witnessed in the 45 years since the end of the Second World War, is ignored not merely by the government but also by the country as a whole. Few except the relatives of the Indians stranded in the area are talking about it. Parliament has given it a go by after one perfunctory discussion. Almost everybody in the corridors of power in the Indian capital is busy calculating the electoral dividends and social losses of the move to mobilise the so-called backward castes' votes.

No wonder then that on the wider world stage, 850 million Indians just have no say in how the life-and-death issue in a region of utmost importance to them is going to be resolved. The five permanent members of the UN Security Council have been acting in concert, not just the two superpowers alone. They are parties to no fewer than five successive resolutions of the council, including the one sanctioning the use of force against Saddam Hussein's Iraq. Their views on how and when force should be used, of course, differ. But in their resolve to oppose and defeat Saddam's stupid aggression they remain united.

The situation by itself should have given New Delhi sufficient incentive to reflect on India's undoubted diplomatic skills. But never before has a government in this country turned its back on a grave international problem so casually as the Janata Dal team has done this time. We seem to have no other interest in the whole affair except to get the stranded Indians back home safely.

To his credit, Inder Gujral did undertake a strenuous journey to Moscow, Washington, Aman, Baghdad and Kuwait. But, apparently under the mandate of the Cabinet, his mission was confined to working for the safe repatriation of the Indian nationals. This was underscored by his elaborate statement in Parliament. Surprisingly, not a single MP bothered to raise the wider issues involved in the crisis. The government alone is not to blame. The entire country seems to be abdicating its international role.

Sadly, VP's own contribution to the discussion of the Gulf crisis has been limited to precisely three sentences during his Red Fort oration on 15 August and some stray remarks at encounters with the press, Indian and foreign. The utmost the Prime Minister persuaded himself to do was to tell a Yugoslav interviewer that the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) should take some intiative over the Gulf.

This was a classic case of passing the buck—this time to a government which is even more immobilised by domestic worries than ours. In any case, in heaven's name, when has NAM been able to take an initiative without the impetus coming from India, not just a founder member of the movement but also the largest one in the body of 104 nations? Some ministers are to meet in Belgrade on 15 September. By that time, the Gulf might well have blown up.

Meanwhile, Pakistan has opted to send troops to Saudi Arabia under the US scheme of things and thus incur the thanks of its American mentors and military allies. It can be taken for granted that Islamabad would demand and get ample quid pro quo for services rendered. There is no dearth of practical suggestions by recognised experts on how a UN-sponsored collective security scheme, in which India would take part, can ensure that Indian interests would not suffer in the Gulf in the long run. No one in authority is, however, listening.

Tragically, even the plans to evacuate more than 200,000 Indians from Kuwait and Iraq has run into difficulties. The Jordanian route is choked. And Iran have gone back on its earlier promise to allow Indian civilian and military transport aircraft to overfly its territory and bring back the Indians in distress. International insurance companies are no longer insuring any passenger aircraft touching down in the danger zone. ●

GAUTAM PATOLE

Indians returning from Kuwait: the crisis deepens

"RISE, SIR LEGEND"

MRF CONGRATULATES SIR RICHARD HADLEE ON HIS KNIGHTHOOD

And on Indian roads, MRF Legend continues to be India's favourite car tyre.

Whichever field they're on, legends are recognised for their outstanding performances. On June 16th, 1990, Richard Hadlee became the only cricketer to be knighted while still on the field. Meanwhile, back in India, MRF Legend keeps proving itself on the toughest roads all over the country. Which just goes to show that once you have a legend, you have a winner.

LINTAS M MRF FHP 216 2334

LIKE THE WARMTH IN YOUR HEART

TERENE/WOOL WORSTED FROM GWALIOR SUITING

Losing ground

Jyoti Basu is under pressure from CPI(M) Young Turks

At 76, Jyoti Basu is easily the most charismatic communist in the country. But contrary to popular belief, the West Bengal chief minister does not wield absolute power within his party. The Communist Party of India (Marxist) believes in the concept of democratic centralism, which, simply put, means collective leadership. Major decisions have to be endorsed by senior party fora like the state and central committees. In West Bengal, the party's supreme decision-making body is the state committee, which traditionally has been under the control of the party's organisational bosses. This body till 1982 was tightly controlled by the state party chief Pramode Dasgupta. Jyoti Basu then was the mere head of government. His job was not so much to make policies as to implement those decided upon by the state party leadership.

After Pramode Dasgupta's death, Basu staged a coup of sorts by packing the party's state committee with men loyal to him. Basu had perhaps hoped that he would emerge as the de facto head of the Bengal unit of the CPI(M). For a few years it seemed that he had indeed succeeded. In the Bengal unit of the party, Basu's every wish was a decree. But that did not last. For, a sizable section of the party continued to subtly oppose him and his rightist policies. They questioned the chief minister's Marxist credentials and resented his attempts to clip their wings.

A number of senior Bengal Marxists like Samar Mukherjee openly challenged Basu on a number of issues. But men like Mukjerjee were old and increasingly incapable of playing an active, assertive role in state politics. Basu consequently managed to sideline them. What he perhaps did not quite expect was the emergence of a clique of junior leaders who would one day effectively challenge his authority. These junior leaders, most prominent among them Biman Bose and Buddhadev Bhattacharya, had been promoted by the late Pramode Dasgupta and were given a tremendous amount of organisational responsibility. Today, they have emerged as key figures in the CPI(M) in West Bengal and are beginnig to assert themselves.

Basu obviously is not too pleased at what is happening and has time and again tried to put them in their place. But it has been a close battle. Basu's advocacy of the Ambanis and Hindujas, for instance, only helped the Young Turks to score a point against him. They increasingly circumscribed Basu's functionings and suggested that the chief minister should concentrate more on government affairs and leave the nitty-gritties of political management to the party. Just how powerful they became can be gauged from the fact that they succeeded in ousting former Calcutta Municipal Corporaton mayor Kamal Basu, a friend of the chief minister. Biman Bose openly criticised the rampant corruption that prevailed in the corporation's affairs and ultimately managed to instal his man, Prasanta Chatterjee, as the mayor. Now, the corporation is investigating into the deals made by the former mayor involving Jyoti Basu groupies like Amal Dutta, MP, who had floated a number of real estate projects.

Alarmed by the sudden increase in the clout of the Young Turks, the chief minister shrewdly decided to cut them down to size indirectly. He began promoting state finance minister Asim Dasgupta as his likely successor. Buddhadev Bhattacharya, information and civic affairs minister, who had all this time been considered as Basu's replacement, found himself slighted by the government. When the Congress(I) called a bandh on 16 August, Basu initially said that party cadres would not be used to resist the bandh. This attempt to snub the rebels, however, backfired and the chief minister had to give in. When ex-Congress(I) MP Mamata Banerjee was murderously assaulted by party cadres and the bandh was declared a success, the chief minister once more found an apportunity to assert himself. He told the party that such coercive tactics would not work in Bengal. He insinuated that only a bhadralok like himself, could properly project the CPM's image in Bengal. The party could not but endorse this view. The new generation leaders had to fall silent. But the question is: for how long? ●

Indranil Banerjie/Calcutta

Jyoti Basu (left) did not quite expect that a clique of junior leaders, prominent among them Buddhadev Bhattacharya (middle) and Biman Bose (right) would one day effectively challenge his authority

Does anybody remember this man?

Mufti: the invisible home minister

When Vishwanath Pratap Singh sat down to select his Cabinet, rumour has it that he offered Arun Nehru the home portfolio. "Fine," said Nehru, "but will you let me do what I think is necessary? Can I crack down on the militants in Punjab? Fix the Kashmiri terrorists?" And so on and so forth.

At this stage, a glassy look came into the Prime Minister's eyes and he lapsed into one of his enigmatic silences. "Look," said Nehru, "it won't work. I'll take some other portfolio. But I have just the man for the home ministry. How about Mufti?"

Legend has it that V.P. Singh was less than enthused at the prospect of entrusting this key ministry to a golf-playing, well-meaning lightweight whose last portfolio had been tourism. But once Nehru started listing the virtues of the Mufti (first Muslim home minister, shows Kashmir is an integral part of India, will do what he's told, etc.) the Raja began to see the point.

And so it came to pass, that Mufti Mohammad Sayeed was duly sworn in as the home minister of India.

Within weeks, the government had reason to question the wisdom of the choice. Kashmiri terrorists kidnapped Rubaiya, the Mufti's daughter and refused to release her unless the government set free several of their imprisoned colleagues.

Farooq Abdullah, who was then chief minister and hated Mufti's guts, agreed to release the terrorists and Rubaiya was returned to her father but the episode had given the Mufti exactly the sort of publicity a home minister does not need. Only the extremely insensitive (i.e. Rajiv Gandhi) suggested that the government should not have agreed to the swap, but everyone began to regard Sayeed as a lame duck minister whose first action in office had been to release terrorists.

THE MUFTI tried to recover. His chosen area of operation was Kashmir.

During Mrs Gandhi's day, he had used Jagmohan to fire Farooq Abdullah so that the Congress could take office along with a breakaway faction of the National Conference headed by Farooq's brother-in-law G.M. Shah. The move had been a disaster. The new chief minister had soon been dubbed 'Curfew' Shah because violence (engineered by the pro-Pakistani elements) had swept the Valley and finally, the Congress had dumped him. (At which Shah declared: "I have always been a Pakistani at heart." Shame nobody told the Mufti about it earlier.)

Now as home minister, the Mufti thought this was the thing to do again. He sent Jagmohan back and Farooq promptly resigned. No problem, said Jagmohan, and (if Rajiv Gandhi is to be believed) set about promoting the JKLF as an alternative. (Perhaps the Mufti was trying another 'Curfew' Shah-style stunt.)

It didn't work because George Fernandes, the minister for Kashmir affairs, decided that Jagmohan was a menace who was alienating the entire population of Kashmir. Fernandes fought with Jagmohan, was yelled at by Sayeed and faced Arun Nehru's haughty disdain. Finally, V.P. Singh fired him, but he took Jagmohan with him.

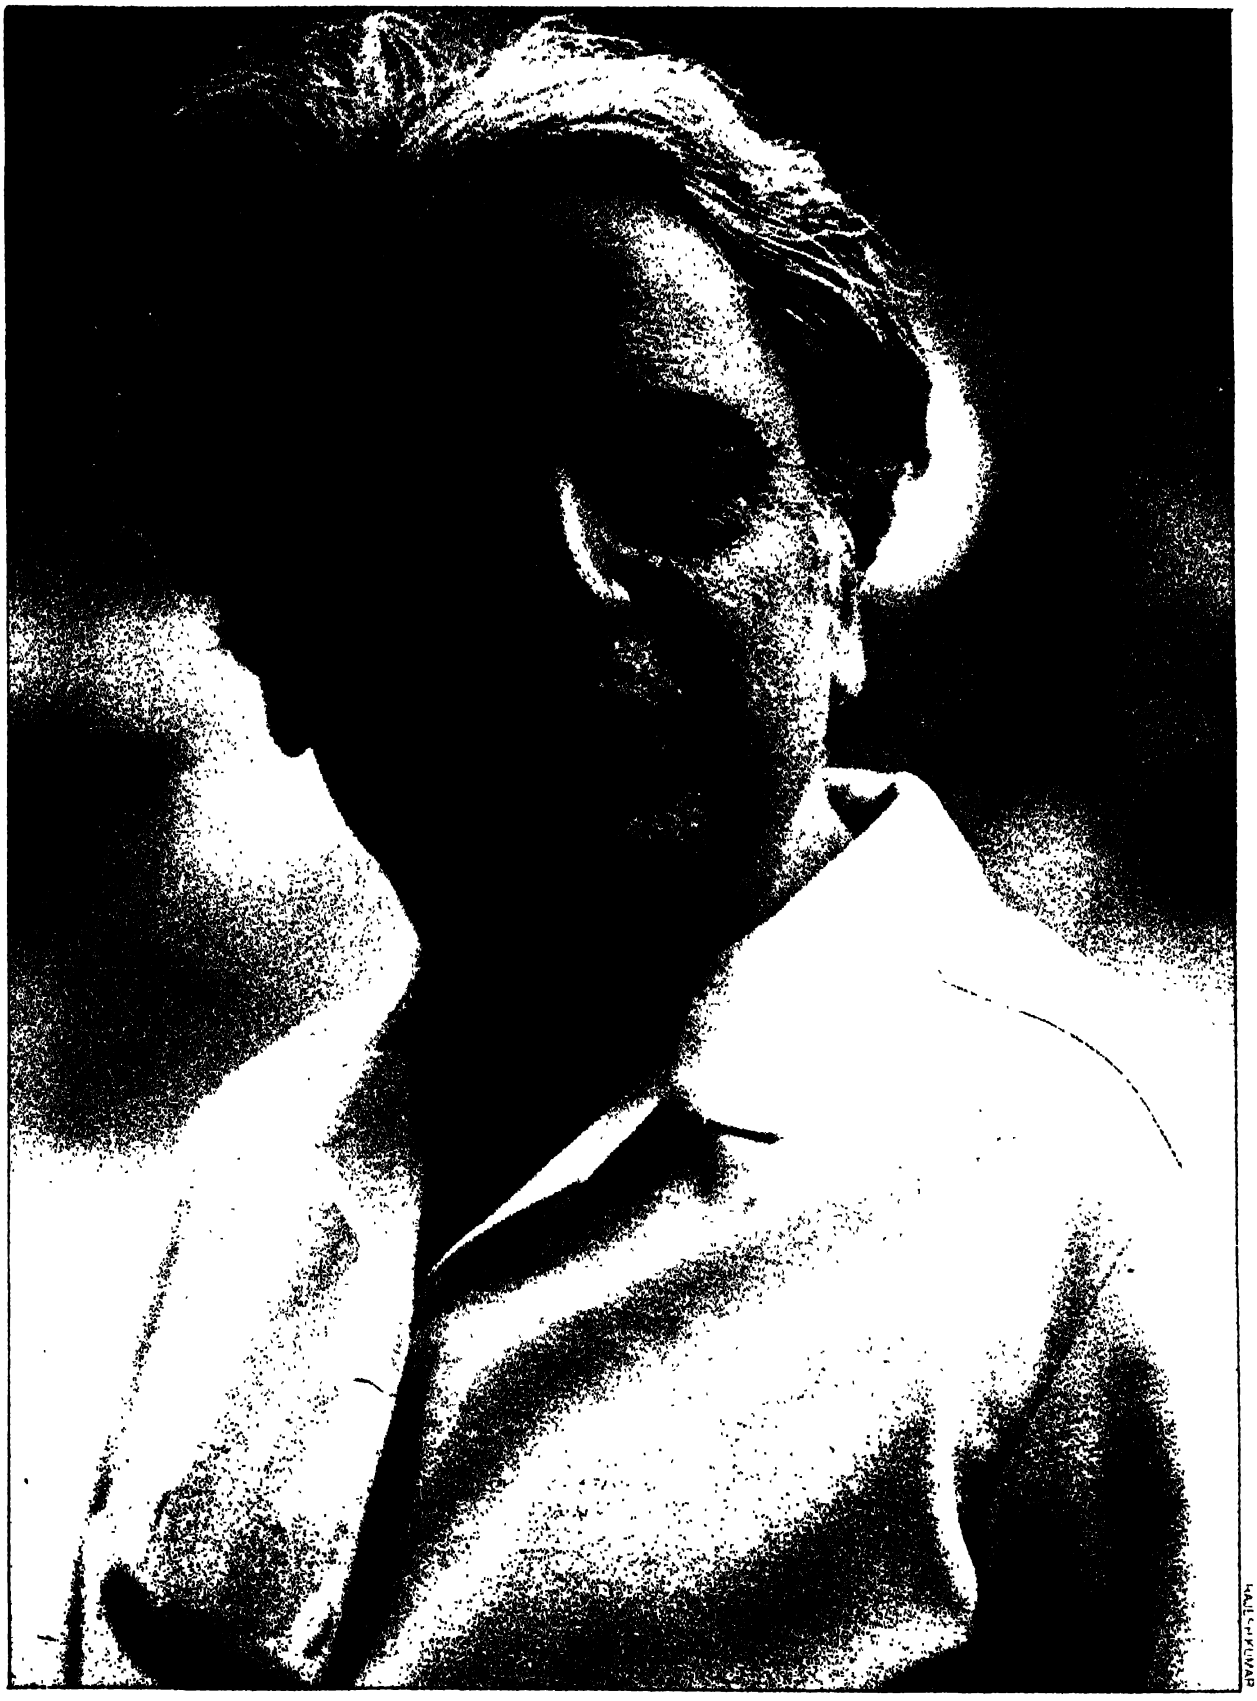
And Kashmir was back to square one.

IF ALL of the foregoing sounds like a mess, consider this: it was the Mufti's moment of glory.

Bizarre as it may sound, Kashmir represented the acme of Sayeed's achievement. At least, he got rid of Farooq.

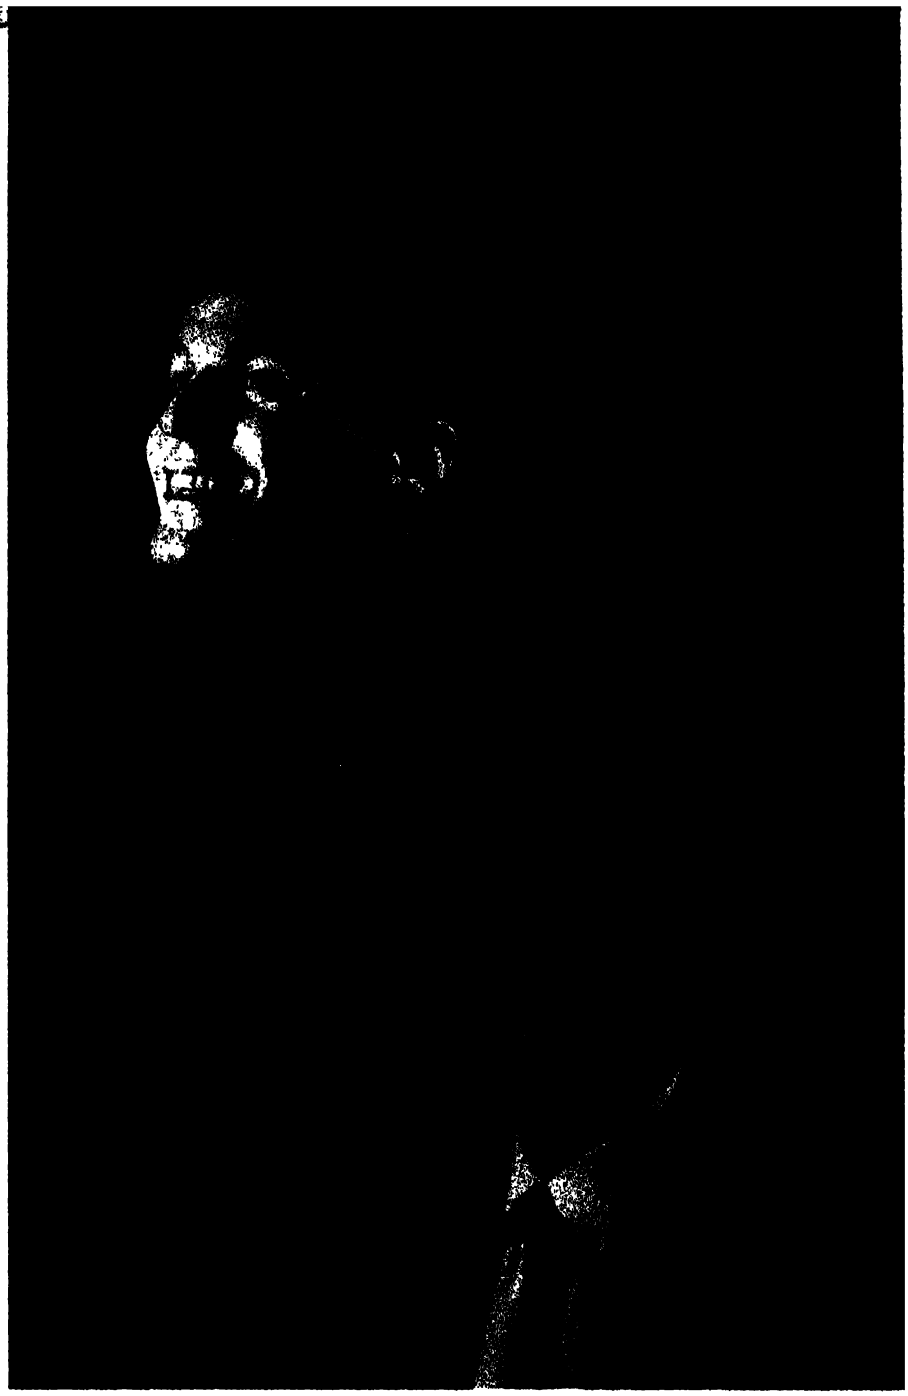
As far as the rest of India is concerned, the home minister might as well not exist. Last week, anti-reservation agitationists shut down Delhi on three separate days and the home ministry was unable to do anything about it. Finally, all schools and colleges had to be shut down for an unprecedented 30 days to help restore order to the capital.

As for Punjab, the Mufti trotted off to the Golden Temple, placed the regulation hanky on his head and murmured sweet nothings (along with V.P. Singh) shortly after the government was elected. After that, he has done precious little and stood on the sidelines while the situation in the state has got far worse than anyone thought possible.



On Assam, Mufti's role has been similarly non-existent. ULFA terrorists gun down businessmen and government servants at will, the government seems incapable of handling the violence and the home ministry has no grip on the situation, either.

The same is true of nearly every other part of India where violence has broken out. The Mufti either has no interest in doing the job he was appointed to or—and this is more likely—he is simply not up to it.



Politically, he is even more of a lightweight now than he was last December. He is no longer as close to Nehru, has few real friends in the Cabinet, and would probably lose his security deposit in a municipal election in Kashmir.

The only time people are reminded of his existence is when he appears on Doordarshan addressing audiences of 400-500 in Kashmir (the cameras shoot the meetings in tight close-up). Such is his low profile that though law and order has reached the lowest point since 1984, nobody even blames the home minister.

He has become the invisible man of the Cabinet. ●

NOTHING WORTHWHILE WAS EVER ACHIEVED WITHOUT SOMEONE STICKING OUT HIS NECK.

Do you know why our customers swear by us? Because we are infallible? Hardly. Like everybody else we make our share of mistakes. It's because we never let them down. What matters to us is the spirit of commitment and not the small type in a contract.

Take the case of the mudgun motor we designed and supplied to the Bokaro Steel Plant.

In 1977 one of our agents supplied 50 KW flame-proof motors to the Heavy Engineering Corporation. It was only by chance that we found out later that the motor had gone to the Bokaro Steel Plant for a very unusual operation: to replace Russian mudgun motors in blast furnaces. It was instantly clear to our engineers that our motors were unsuitable for the job.

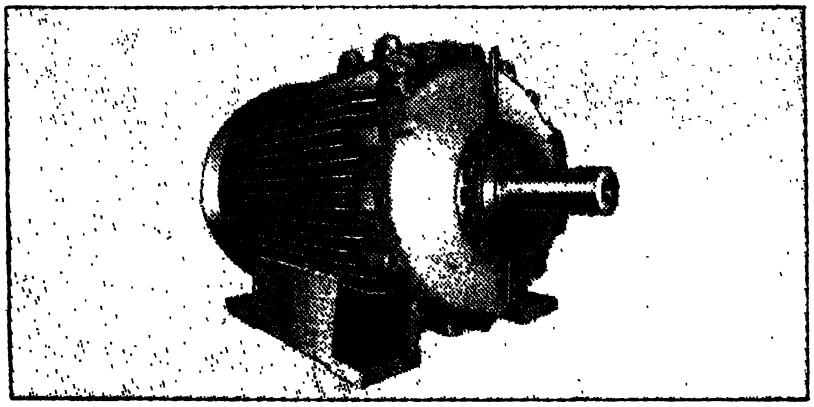
We came right out and told the Bokaro people about this. We added that it would take us a few months to design a new motor for their mudgun. The Bokaro people agreed to the delay but revealed that there were no specs available.

It was like entering a maze blindfolded. These motors had never been manufactured in India. But we decided, nothing ventured, nothing gained. We said yes.

The whole essence of import substitution is a strong and perceptive engineering team with the patience and commitment to work for months, even years, till they design and manufacture a totally satisfactory replacement for the original.

What do mudgun motors do? During the manufacture of steel, molten metal flows out through the base of the blast furnace. Once the metal is drained, the outlet is sealed with wet clay fired from a distance by a mudgun. The wet clay hardens and forms a strong and secure lid. If the hole in the blast furnace is not totally sealed, the furnace itself will burn and bring steel production to a halt.

Our engineers realised that the motors would require an extremely high torque for short periods. They work with multiple starts and stops in high ambient temperatures. Thanks to the glutinous nature of the clay which they handle, they would have to withstand extended stalling conditions.



The KEC team returned home and in consultation with HEC determined new specifications for a 50 KW, 415 volts frame motor. Today our mudgun motors are in operation in several steel plants. And going great guns.

But Kirloskar Electric is more than the sum of all the firsts it has earned over the years. We are India's leading industrial electrics and electronics company in the private sector. We make some of the finest standard AC and DC drives, transformers, welding equipment and systems, motorised gear units, equipment for defence, electronic control equipment, CNCs, etc. But the one single reason why we are the prime movers in our field is because the centre of gravity at Kirloskar Electric is the customer. Our hi-tech, engineering expertise, superior quality and reliability are all geared to anticipate and respond to his needs.

KIRLOSKAR ELECTRIC CO. LTD.

INDUSTRIAL ELECTRICS AND ELECTRONICS

Regd. Office : Industrial Suburb, Rajajinagar, Bangalore-560 010.

When nobody else can do the job, Kirloskar Electric will.

Pratibha/KEC/265/

MR CASTE

V.P. Singh's image crumbles as civil war breaks out in his party—and in the streets

This wasn't the way it was supposed to happen. Just over a month ago, Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh recast his image. His advisers told him that he was personally popular but was perceived, nevertheless, as being weak and indecisive. Moreover, his Janata Dal lacked a base of its own and was much too dependent on Devi Lal's Jats. So, Singh proved that he could take tough decisions by firing the Tau. And in an attempt to create his own base, he played caste politics in the cow belt by accepting the recommendations of the Mandal Commission.

But then, things began to go wrong. The cheers that followed the dismissal of Devi Lal faded much too quickly. And while political pundits greeted his hasty cobbling together of a caste coalition with murmurs of admiration, the doubts soon set in. Within two weeks of his triumphant Independence Day address, Vishwanath Pratap Singh suddenly looked less and less like a savvy political wizard and more and more like a small-time cow-belt mainpulator who, having being entrusted with the future of India, chose to barter it away in a desperate attempt to squeeze in a few more weeks at Race Course Road.

In a matter of days, everything appeared to be going wrong.

- Anti-reservation agitators brought all of north India's towns and cities to a standstill. The nation's capital was shut down thrice in a single week and finally, schools and colleges were closed for 30 days.
- The agitators were upset about the recommendations of the Mandal Commission, but their anger was directed at the Prime Minister personally. In Delhi University, students even revived a variation of that old school-boy doggerel: "Inky, pinky, ponky; V.P. Singh is a donkey."
- The Mandal recommendations split the Cabinet. At a stormy meeting of the Cabinet Committee on Political Affairs (CCPA), Arun Nehru and Ajit Singh bitterly attacked the decision to play caste politics. Only Sharad Yadav and Ram Vilas Paswan backed the Prime Minister.
- The National Front's allies also distanced themselves from the decision. The CPI(M) attacked the recommendations and the BJP claimed that a minority government had no right to make such drastic changes in the structure of society.
- In Orissa, chief minister Biju Patnaik publicly rejected the Mandal Commission report, made rude noises about cynical attempts to win votes in the Hindi belt and snubbed the Prime Minister.

A HELL OF A WEEK ☐ The beginning of the end?

VIOLENCE

Unprecedented violence rocks New Delhi and the rest of north India as the stir against the Mandal Commission recommendations spreads

DISSIDENCE

The Cabinet splits down the middle over the Mandal Commission recommendations. Rumours spread that Nehru and Fernandes have quit

REBELLION

Biju Patnaik declares that he will not implement the Mandal Commission in Orissa, regardless of whatever the Centre says

• There were other problems too, unrelated to the Mandal mess. Law minister Dinesh Goswami submitted his resignation as relations between the Janata Dal and the Asom Gana Parishad (AGP), its National Front ally, plummeted. Goswami was finally persuaded to stay, but the resignation drama suggested that the National Front was not holding together.

• Unfortunately for Goswami, his resignation was overshadowed by rumours that Arun Nehru and George Fernandes had resigned. The rumours were denied but Fernandes, who openly attacked the censoring of his Khula Manch TV programme, was regarded as a dissident by the Prime Minister's camp.

• Nehru soon became the focus of another controversy when Bombay's The Independent newspaper printed documents linking him to the Bofors deal. There was nothing incriminating in the papers, but they raised the question of why the Raja's hit squad had not bothered to investigate the commerce minister, especially when its members seemed quite willing to leak stories about nearly everybody else.

• Central to the Nehru controversy was the charge levelled by The Independent that the Indian Express had suppressed the Nehru documents for two months to save the Raja embarrassment. But, in a sense, it hardly mattered. The Express had turned against the Prime Minister and even India Today—his other great friend in the media—turned viciously anti-V.P. Singh, slamming him as a "vote-hungry power-broker shamelessly using the two elements that ever bloodied and divided this nation—religion and caste".

• But India Today did not content itself with demoting its "artful dodger" to "demagogue". A MARG poll conducted for it by Prannoy Roy forecast that even with seat adjustments, the National Front and its allies would not get an overall majority if an election were held tomorrow. Moreover, if there were no adjustments—which is now a near certainty—the Congress(I) would get an overall majority on its own.

Suddenly, V.P. Singh began to look less and less like a Prime Minister. And more and more like a lame duck.

ANGER

The Indian Express and India Today, two of the Raja's strongest media supporters, denounce him as a demagogue

RESIGNATION

Law minister Dinesh Goswami submits his resignation as relations between the AGP and the Centre plummet. Finally, he withdraws it

ISOLATION

The all-party meet on Mandal ends in chaos. Apart from the Congress (I), even the BJP and the CPI(M) make it clear that they won't support its implementation

The howitzer backfires

Troubles and squabbles mar the Bofors investigation

They have been the longest '15 days' in history. Shortly before the last general election, National Front spokesmen assured the media that were the then Opposition to win the election, the names of the Bofors recipients would be out in 15 days.

Nine months later, it is clear that the corruption investigations are in more trouble than anyone ever thought possible. And even V.P. Singh has stopped talking about the corruption issue.

The investigations face the following problems.

• Sloppy framing: Even if one goes by the government's official version, then its Letter Rogatory (LR) in the Bofors case was 'returned' (in fact, it was rejected) because it was badly presented.

• Inadequate preparation: But this explanation does not account for the ruling of Judge Murbach of the Geneve Cantonal Court. And even if it does, it doesn't explain why the HDW LR has also been returned. Clearly, the Indian investigators do not fully understand how the Swiss legal system works.

• Charges of vindictiveness: Last week, Dagens Nyheter (DN), Sweden's most respected newspaper, apologised once again to Ajitabh Bachchan for alleging that he was involved in the Bofors affair. The settlement came in the wake of a Swedish legal action and afterwards, Bachchan said that thanks to information provided by DN, he was now going to charge the investigators with criminal conspiracy for having leaked his name to the paper. There was no evidence to link him to Bofors, he said, but his name had been smeared as part of a vendetta against Rajiv Gandhi's friends.

• Allegations of selectiveness: The uproar over documents printed by Bombay's The Independent engulfed the investigation. The LR named 47 persons and entities as suspects in the Bofors case. In the vast majority of cases, there was no prima facie evidence against these 47. So, why had the sleuths fought shy of at least investigating Arun Nehru who had some involvement (no matter how marginal) in the Bofors negotiations?

• Internal squabbles: Till now, the corruption enquiries had been associated with a group of politicians, civil servants and journalists, known loosely as the Express lobby. After Ajitabh Bachchan won his case in London, the first cracks appeared in this group. But after the Arun Nehru controversy erupted, the Express lobby split down the middle.

Had the investigators played into the hands of the Hindujas? They had believed the sixth account story and now they were paying the price for it

What had gone so wrong? The way the critics of the investigation told it, the problem was simple enough: the entire campaign had been based on a vendetta and this could not be sustained. The investigators told their own story: yes, they said, there had been problems with the LR but basically, they were the victims of slander and disinformation. (This view was best summarised by Mahesh Jethmalani in last week's SUNDAY.)

As the controversies mounted, a third theory emerged. Had the gullible investigators been duped by the ever-resourceful Hindujas? According to this hypothesis, the basic problem with the investigation was that the sleuths had been in such a hurry to prove that the Bofors trail led to Rajiv Gandhi, that they had failed to follow the logical procedure and first establish that the Hindujas, Win Chadha, et al, had received the money.

Instead, they had fallen for the oldest trick in the book: the suggestion by the Hindujas that they had passed on the Bofors commissions to Ajitabh Bachchan who was handling Rajiv Gandhi's money. We now have a court judgement to prove that this was not so, but seven months ago, this was exactly what the investigators wanted to hear.

So, they jumped the gun and upon hearing that there was a sixth account (now conclusively established as belonging to Jubilee Finance, a Hinduja company), immediately assumed that it belonged to Ajitabh. The entire Bofors investigation was predicated on this (false) conclusion and finally, it all blew up in the investigators' faces.

Now that the Bachchans have been cleared, the Hindujas need a new diversion. And who better than their old bete noire, Arun Nehru?

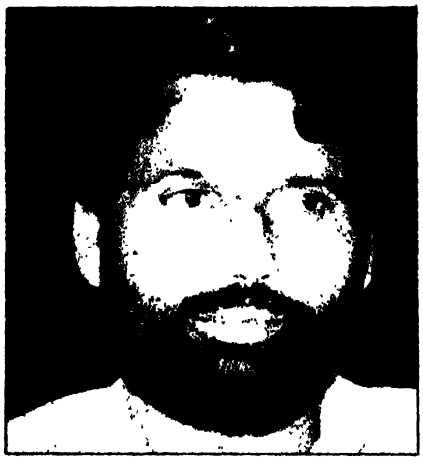
This hypothesis may make some sense, but it does not explain why so many schisms have developed within the Express lobby. The divisions are as follows:

- Ram Jethmalani was kept out of the drafting of the LR (though S Gurumurthy was consulted) because of his links with the Hindujas. Jethmalani is now openly attacking the investigators for shielding Arun Nehru.
- Chitra Subramaniam and N. Ram were co-opted to the Express lobby after their problems with The Hindu's Kasturi. Then, Subramaniam stopped allowing Ram to add his byline to her pieces. Now the two disagree over the Arun Nehru revelations.
- Subramaniam filed a story in June 1990 suggesting that Nehru was involved in Bofors. The Express used excuse after excuse to not carry it. Finally, Subramaniam snapped links with the paper on this issue.
- By then, Arun Jaitley, a key member of the investigative team, and K. Madhavan, a CBI official, had decided that Subramaniam was not to be trusted. This opinion was disputed by Bhure Lal and CBI director Rajendra Shekhar.
- Oddly enough, N Ram also came out in defence of the anti-Subramaniam forces and tried to play down the importance of her Nehru revelations. An angry Ram Jethmalani dismissed N Ram as "an absolute simpleton" who had "put his name to this cover-up job". It was a terrible put-down for the self-righteous, self-styled champion of Bofors. But by then, others had begun to share Jethmalani's belief that Ram simply did not understand Bofors, especially from the time that Subramaniam had stopped allowing him to hog the credit for her work.

The squabbles mounted. Jethmalani called N. Ram "an absolute simpleton" who was part "of a cover-up". It was a rare rebuke for the self-styled champion of Bofors

By the end of last week, it was beginning to seem that Bofors would do to the Express lobby what it had to The Hindu. The regime was no nearer getting the names and the Hindujas—who actually received the money—were flushed with the success of their manipulations.

The immediate focus of the discontent was the decision to implement the recommendations of the Mandal Commission. Shortly after V P Singh announced that Mandal's proposals would become law, industry minister Ajit Singh issued a statement backing the idea. From Ajit's point of view this was a mistake because the commission had ignored the Jats, his constituency.



Ajit soon regretted having been talked into supporting the recommendations by Sharad Yadav and V P Singh after a meeting of the CCPA. He joined up with the dissidents in the Cabinet, a grouping that includes Arun Nehru, Arif Mohammad Khan, Chiman Mehta, Satyapal Malik, Mufti Mohammad Saveed, I K Gujral and Mohan Gurupadaswamy. All of them are peeved by the manner in which V P Singh first made the announcement and then forced his Cabinet to back him.

Once dissensions in the Cabinet became public knowledge, the Raja acted to limit the damage. He did not convene any meetings of the full Cabinet but stuck to the core group of the CCPA. But by then, it was too late. When Ram Vilas Paswan—one of the strongest advocates of the Mandal Commission—got up in Parliament to defend the report, Janata Dal MPs visibly dissociated themselves from him. Paswan made things worse for the government by declaring that 540 MPs do not make a nation. This angered the normally mild mannered L K Advani so much that he questioned a minority government's right to speak for the country. Finally, Madhu Dandavate apologised on behalf of Paswan, but what was noteworthy was that only Sharad Yadav seemed willing to associate himself with Paswan's cause.

Both Yadav and Paswan came in for some stick at meetings of the CCPA and the Dal Political Affairs Committee (PAC). Yadav had alienated most of his colleagues by urging the so-called 'backward communities' to come out in the streets and fight for reservation. Arun Nehru, Chandra Shekhar and Yashwant Sinha accused him of spreading chaos and disorder, but neither Paswan nor V P Singh came to his assistance.

As the week went on, it was obvious that the government was deeply divided on many key issues. Rumours that Arun Nehru (see following story) and George Fernandes had resigned turned out to be incorrect, but what Mandal Commission ☐ Where does the Janata Dal stand?

RAM VILAS PASWAN

A Harijan, he is a strong and enthusiastic supporter of the proposals, though the Harijans may lose out from the extension of reservations

V.P. SINGH

A total shift of stance for a man who was the candidate of the Thakur lobby in 1980. Now loves every backward who has access to a ballot box

ARUN NEHRU

Does not agree with the principle of extending reservations at all. Is upset that the Raja made the announcement before consulting the Cabinet was surprising was the manner in which they found ready acceptance.

Clearly, everyone has come to expect that a '79-like collapse is inevitable.

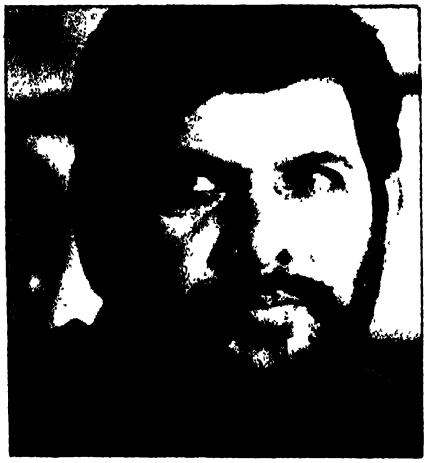
Where does all this leave V.P. Singh, the man who could have been Mr Clean but chose to be Mr Caste? The Raja was beginning to consider whether—for perhaps the first time in his life—he had made a major miscalculation.

His supporters said that he still clung to his original view that the Mandal issue would help the Janata Dal to knit together a coalition of backwards that would make it electorally unbeatable in UP and Bihar. Moreover, they pointed out, he had been vindicated in his belief that no political party could dare oppose reservation.

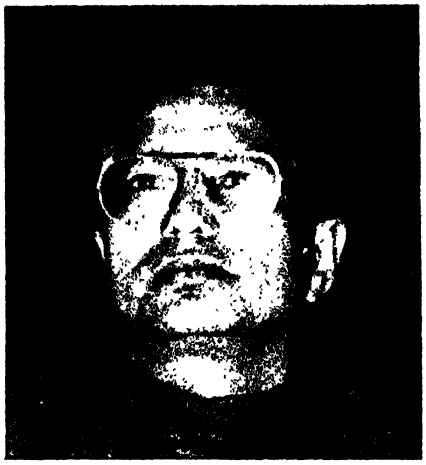
There were two problems with this view. Firstly, it was true that nobody had openly opposed reservation, but—sensing the mood of the media and the middle class—nearly every party had found the perfect excuse for opposing the Raja's decision to increase reservations. Generally, this was framed in terms of "we are all for the 'backwards' but we oppose the manner in which the Mandal recommendations are being implemented". That this was a politically expedient stand became clear when the all-party meet to discuss Mandal ended in chaos with each participant producing its own reservation formula. Consequently, the Raja stood isolated.

The second problem was that the electoral arithmetic only made sense if there was an election. But would V.P. V.P. Singh call an election? The MARG poll showed that he would lose and though his supporters pointed out that it was conducted before the decision to back Mandal, it still seemed unlikely that his party had the confidence to face the polls.

Moreover, could he call an election? With the mood in the Janata Dal being what it is, there is now little doubt that Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal could split the party should the Raja call elections. If that happened, the President could well ask one of the dissidents to form a government with Congress support (the Charan Singh syndrome). And if V.P. Singh did get his election, the Janata Dal dissidents would split the party's share of the vote.



The betting nevertheless was that he would call an election this winter. Ironically, such is the Raja's credibility these days that sceptics were convinced that he would go to the

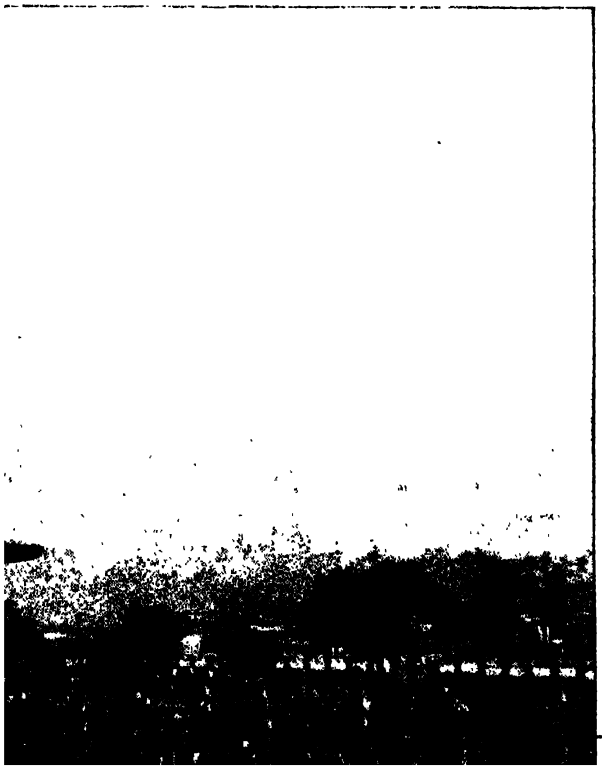


CHANDRA SHEKHAR

Has a support base among backwards, but is outraged by the current move which he thinks is a cynical attempt to win votes

SHARAD YADAV

The Yadavs will be among the principal beneficiaries of the new reservation policy, so he is probably its strongest supporter



AJIT SINGH

Blames SUNDAY for calling him the 'flip-flop man'. So, we'll just say that he has revised his earlier enthusiastic support of the proposal country only because he had declared that there would not be a mid-term poll. Said a member of the Chandra Shekhar faction: "Whatever he says you must believe the opposite. Remember how he told us he would not become Prime Minister?

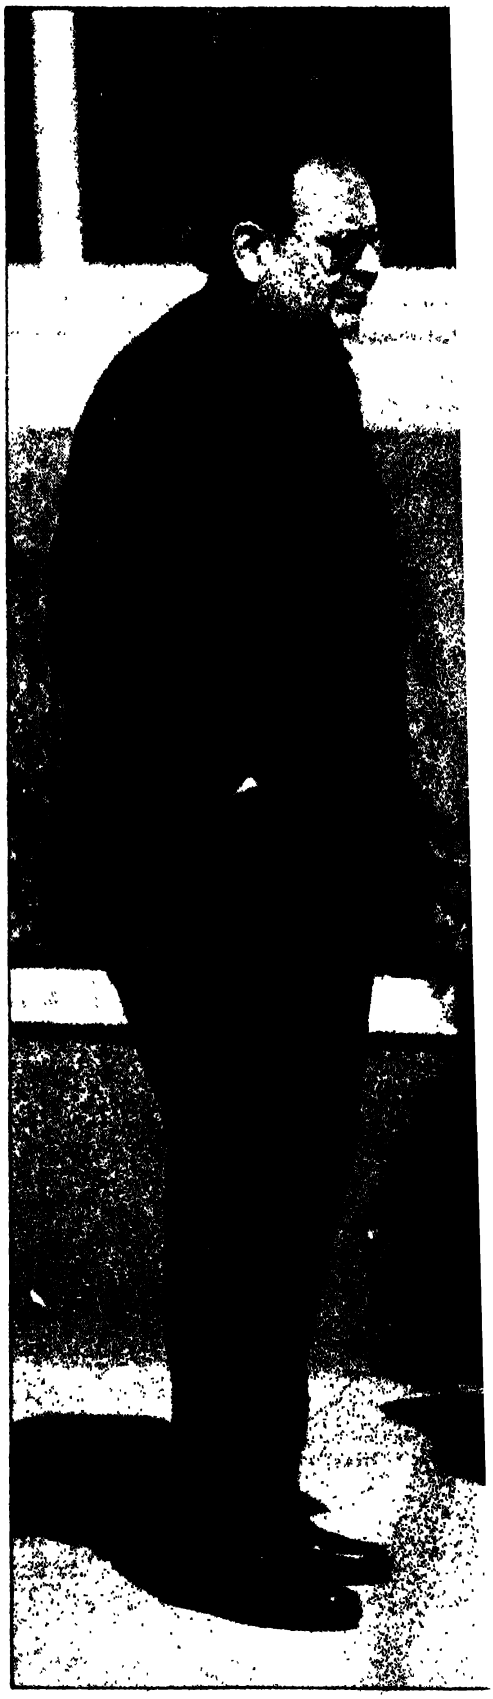
Such cynicism, sadly, is the hallmark of today's Janata Dal politics. And much of it is prompted by doubts about Vishwanath Pratap Singh's motives. His colleagues say that in 23 years of politics, he never once uttered a word in favour of 'backwards'. When he was UP chief minister an Opposition MLA accused him—on the floor of the Assembly—of having connived at the murder of thousands of backward castes by Thakurs. (That MLA was Mulayam Singh Yadav who is now chief minister of UP.) And last week, Rajiv Gandhi told The Times of India that V.P. Singh had opposed the implementation of the Mandal recommendations when he had been a member of the Congress Cabinet. V.P. Singh's spokesmen denied the former Prime Minister's claim the next day, but even they couldn't find much evidence of pro-backward sentiment

Within two week of his triumphant Independence Day address, V.P. Singh suddenly looked less and less like a savvy political wizard and more and more like a small-time cow-belt manipulator

As the week drew to a close, V.P. Singh's supporters were convinced that the Mandal card would win the Janata Dal an overall majority. But others were less convinced. Moreover, they pointed out, even a Congress government would find it difficult to put the genie of reservation back in the bottle now that such extravagant expectations had been aroused.



It was a fair observation and one that boded ill for an India torn apart by violent social wars and ostensibly governed by a Cabinet whose members were conducting their own wars with each other. Now, it was being suggested that even voting V.P. Singh out would not rid the nation of his legacy.

That was a truly frightening prospect. ●

Rajiv Shukla/New Delhi

Ready to bolt?

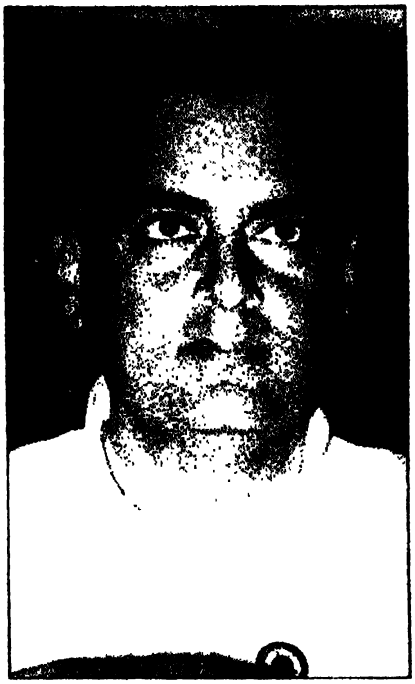
Speculation mounts over Arun Nehru's future plans

He doesn't say much but when he does, the effects can be felt for months. In mid-June, Arun Nehru gave SUNDAY the only major interview he has granted since the general election. Much of the interview was concerned with his achievements at the commerce ministry but he made three significant points.

- The government was in trouble over rising prices. It was issues such as this that would determine its future. The last election had not been won on such issues as Bofors, corruption etc., at all.
- Consequently, it was pointless to devote so much time to FIRs and vindictive investigations. Instead, the government should use the present "for the future and not for the past".
- He was still in touch with Rajiv Gandhi and bore him no ill-will because the slate had been wiped clean.

Last week, the impact of that interview could still be felt. Nehru made it clear that he thought that the National Front government was still ignoring the real issues and banking on such gimmicks as reservation. His critics alleged that his opposition to the FIRs stemmed from his own involvement in the Bofors affair: Ram Jethmalani said it was the SUNDAY interview that had convinced him of this. And as he seemed more and more of an outsider in the new caste-based, cow-belt avatar of the Janata Dal, speculation that he would return to the Congress(I) mounted.

Through it all, the man himself maintained an enigmatic silence. What little publicity his point of view received was largely due to his lieutenant Arif Mohammad Khan's links with the media. And while nobody could claim to speak for Nehru, his friends suggested that he was treating allegations of involvement in Bofors with "the contempt that all Hinduja plants deserve".



The storm was provoked by the publication of two documents in The Independent, the small-circulation, but nevertheless high profile, second newspaper of the Times of India Group in Bombay. The documents were secret telexes sent by the Swedish embassy in New Delhi to the foreign ministry in Stockholm. They were minutes of meetings between Nehru (then minister for energy) and Rolf Gauffin of the embassy.

It is clear from the text that the Bofors deal was discussed by the two men. Nehru asked the Swedes to fire their agents failing which, there would be no deal. Further, he asked them to lower their price, to remember that political considerations would decide the choice of weapon and to ensure that neither his name nor Rajiv Gandhi's featured in subsequent negotiations. The documents raised several questions according to Nehru's critics.

- Why was he talking to the Swedes? The howitzer deal had nothing to do with the power ministry. Yet the Swedes thought he wanted to be the éminence grise!
- What did he mean by political considerations? Was this a code-phrase for a kickback?
- Why should he want it made clear that neither Rajiv's nor his name was mentioned? Unless, of course, he had something to hide.

Even before Nehru could respond to the charges, Jethmalani held a press conference and urged V.P. Singh to ask for Nehru's resignation. His call found few echoes, however, and The Independent dubbed the silence "a conspiracy of cowards", asking why

Why should Arun Nehru stick with a man whose policies he disagreed with when he had patched up with his cousin? There was no easy answer even the Congress(I) seemed unwilling to probe Nehru's role in Bofors.

Nehru's side offered timing as its principal defence. The discussions between Nehru and Gauffin took place on 21 June and 12 July, 1985—eight months before the Bofors contract was signed. Apparently, there is no document in existence that suggests that Nehru was involved after that date. So how could he have swung the deal?

Moreover, what had Nehru said to Gauffin that was so objectionable? Surely he was within his rights to urge the Swedes to fire their agents and ensure that they lowered the price of their weapon?

All of this makes some sense but it does not explain why Nehru should have been so interested in the deal that he spoke to the Swedes twice. The government signs scores of multi-crore contracts every year. What made Bofors so important to Nehru that he took it upon himself to get involved in the negotiations at an early stage?

Nehru's defenders offer half-hearted explanations (i.e. well, he was the éminence grise of the government in those days anyway, etc.). But none of these tells the full story.

In fact, there is an explanation for Nehru's behaviour. And not only does it explain why he spoke to the Swedes but it also accounts for the resurfacing of the documents.

The Hindujas.

In 1984, it was an open secret in New Delhi that Rajiv Gandhi and Arun Nehru had blacklisted the Hindujas because they believed that they had not passed the HDW commissions on to the Congress party. (The HDW deal was struck during Sanjay Gandhi's lifetime.)

While Rajiv had banned the Hindujas from Safdarjang Road (which was then the Prime Minister's residence), it was Arun Nehru who had taken on the task of ensuring that they received no official patronage. Foreign minister Bali Ram Bhagat was fired for meeting them and N.K.P. Salve was told that they would not be allowed to sponsor the cricket World Cup.

In mid-1985, Nehru was told by a representative of Nitro Nobel (Bofors' parent group) that the Hindujas were representing both a Swedish power company and Bofors. He went to Rajiv and they agreed that the Hindujas had to be removed from both negotiations. Therefore, when he told the Swedes that regardless of price, it was the political aspect that would dominate, he meant that India would not award the contract to a company that was represented by the Hindujas, however good its offer. Further, he told Gauffin that Bofors had still not fired its agents and the negotiations would go no further until it did so.

This became the official position of the Government of India: "Fire your agents" which meant, in effect, "Fire the Hindujas".

In due course, Bofors promised the government that the Hindujas had been sacked and the deal went ahead. It was only later that Nehru found out that the arms giant had not, in fact, fired its agents but had continued to pay them under the subterfuge of 'winding-up charges'. It was this revelation in mid-1987 that sparked off the Bofors scandal.

The Nehru camp believes that the Hindujas who were, naturally enough, informed by the Swedes of his

The new Bofors allegations

CONTROVERSY

1

Why did Nehru involve himself in the Bofors negotiations when he was power minister?

2

What did he mean when he told the Swedes that the "political aspect" would swing the deal?

3

Why did he ask that Rajiv's and his names be kept out of the negotiations?

4

The Indian Express sat on the story for two months. Why did it do so?

THE DEFENCE

1

Nehru's interest was in getting the Hindujas removed from the deal. Bofors said it had done so by July 1985. Nehru then moved out.

2

He meant that politically undesirable agents would not be allowed to swing the deal.

3

He had no role to play in the negotiations except for this one limited aspect. So, why should he have wanted his name mentioned?

4

Ask the Express why it sat on the story. How would Nehru know?

opposition to them, had access to the minutes. They held on to them hoping to leak them when it would cause the most damage to their old adversary.

This, of course, does not explain how Chitra Subramaniam got them because if there is one person who the Hindujas dislike more than they hate Nehru, it is Chitra whose investigations first exposed their involvement in the Bofors scandal.

But then, it is clear that there were several sets of these documents floating around. Subramaniam had one set. Nehru himself appears to have had another. The Independent's source was not Subramaniam, so that makes for a third set. And according to Jethmalani, Arun Shourie has had these documents since 1988. Moreover, there is Jethmalani's own set, which he says he procured a month before The Independent story.

According to the Nehru camp, Subramaniam is on the level, but many of the others—especially Jethmalani and P. Chidambaram, an old Nehru antagonist, who flourished the documents in Parliament—got their sets of the telexes from the Hindujas and acted at their behest.

Such charges are virtually impossible to substantiate—which might explain why they have been leaked to the press rather than levelled openly—but there is no doubt that Nehru's friends see the entire controversy as being Hinduja-inspired. This theory found its most open exponent in the Ambani-owned Sunday Observer, whose chairman R.K. Mishra is a close friend of Nehru's.

What will Nehru do now? His strategy seems to be to sit it out. He thinks that the Bofors controversy will blow over and, certainly, for about a week after the stories first appeared, most politicians—including those hostile to Nehru—seemed unwilling to turn the documents into an issue.

The possible exception was Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh, who told the press that he was instituting an enquiry into the allegations against Nehru. And when journalists asked him how he intended to respond to Jethmalani's demand that he fire Nehru, the Prime Minister evaded the question.

V.P. Singh's press advisers claimed the next day that he did not mean to impute any guilt to his commerce minister but only hoped to defuse the crisis by consigning it to the realms of some enquiry panel. But by then, other more sinister interpretations had made the rounds.

ANTI-RESERVATION STIR

The most drastic of these suggested that the anti-Nehru stories were published with the connivance of the Prime Minister or even, at the behest of cabinet secretary Vinod Pande and the Raja's trusted joint secretary Bhure Lal.

This conspiracy theory found few takers, but it was clear that relations between V.P. Singh and Arun Nehru were strained. The areas of difference, however, were unrelated to Bofors.

At the political level, Nehru was said to be deeply distressed by the decision to implement the Mandal Commission report. Whatever his other faults, the commerce minister has never been a casteist and his approach to politics has been to create more employment rather than reserve existing jobs for potential vote-banks. Nehru fought long and hard for the industrial policy and just when he seemed to have won the battle, the Raja turned his back on liberalisation and plumped for casteism.

Predictably, this has annoyed the commerce minister who has made his displeasure known at the Cabinet Committee on Political Affairs and at meetings of the Janata Dal Political Affairs Committee. In fact, even be-

ARIF MD. KHAN

ARUN NEHRU

Nehru's critics allege that he and his friend would have based their exit from the Dal on the Mandal Commission, had the Bofors documents not surfaced. But, Nehru could not leave when his integrity was being questioned. It would have seemed too much like running away fore the Bofors documents appeared, New Delhi was full of rumours that Nehru had resigned over the Mandal Commission.

So far, at least, he has not resigned. But it is becoming clearer with each passing day, that he is a misfit in the Janata Dal. His beliefs, his style, his background and his modus operandi all differ so drastically from V.P. Singh's that it seems unlikely that the two men will be able to get on for much longer.

Within the Raja's coterie, it is believed that Nehru is only biding his time before crossing over to the Congress(I). The evidence for this assertion is limited so the SUNDAY interview is pulled out again and again.

Last week, Ram Jethmalani declared at his press conference that "his interview to SUNDAY was an act calculated to frustrate the (Bofors) investigations altogether, a course which would certainly earn the gratitude of Rajiv Gandhi and many Congress(I) men. If I were the Prime Minister, I would have asked him to quit that very day. Nehru has kept all his options open."

A few days before Jethmalani's outburst, Nehru and Rajiv Gandhi had met at B.K. Nehru's residence in Dehradun (where they had gone to celebrate their aunt Vijayalakshmi Pandit's birthday). The meeting set off a fresh flurry of speculation about a reconciliation and newspapers even carried stories to the effect that Syed Ashraf, a former V.P. Singh aide, had confessed to planting anti-Raja forgeries at the behest of Arif Mohammad Khan, Nehru's chief lieutenant. The stories were false (Ashraf had made no such confession) but because they emanated from Janata Dal MPs who are close to the Prime Minister, they gained a certain credibility.

Nehru's critics alleged that he had already made a deal with Rajiv Gandhi whereby Satyapal Malik, Arif and he would go over to the Congress(I). All that they needed was an issue.

According to this version, Nehru's demand that the Prime Minister sack Devi Lal was a step in this direction. He was convinced that the Tau would survive and so, he would have grounds for quitting. When, against all expectations, V.P. Singh fired Lal, Nehru found he had to stay.

The Mandal Commission would have been the second such issue on which Nehru and his two friends would have based their exit. But the emergence of the Bofors documents scotched that plan. For Nehru to have left when his integrity was being questioned would have seemed too much like running away.

Supporters of this version say that this is why V.P. Singh is avoiding giving Nehru a clean chit. And that the Congress(I)'s reluctance to attack Nehru on this score is because he is expected to cross over soon.

All this is, of course, speculation. So far there is no hard evidence that Nehru intends to quit the Dal and return to the Congress.

But, if you go by his SUNDAY interview, it does seem clear that all the reasons he gave then for being disenchanted with the government continue to be valid. Prices are still going up, the regime is still not using the present for the future, preferring instead to play caste politics, and his relationship with Rajiv has—if anything—improved.

This does not necessarily mean that Nehru will cross over. But as V.P. Singh looks more and more like a loser, any politician—let alone one who disagreed with his policies—would begin to question the merit in sticking with him.

And if recent political history has demonstrated anything, it is that nobody knows more about survival than Arun Nehru. •

Rajiv Shukla/New Delhi

Biju's reservations

The Orissa chief minister rejects the Mandal recommendations

Memories of yesteryears haunt Biju Patnaik. The Orissa chief minister remembers with a certain amount of trepidation how a snowballing students' movement in 1964 had brought down a regime of which he was the de facto ruler. So this time, with students clamouring for the repealing of the Centre's reservation policy based on the Mandal Commission's recommendations, Biju decided not to take any chances.

More than three weeks after Prime Minister V.P. Singh announced his decision to implement the Mandal Commission report, Biju Patnaik turned it down, at least for Orissa, saying that it was "full of errors and incongruities". And he had not even read the report fully, as he himself admitted at a news conference on 29 August, where he denounced the commission's recommendations and went as far as to accuse V.P. Singh of "playing caste politics for getting votes". It was no secret that Biju was deeply worried over the anti-reservation stir at different places in the state, particularly in Bhubaneswar, where it had turned violent. Moreover, there were ominous signs that the movement would not remain confined to the anti-quota issue alone, but would develop into an anti-government agitation in general.

The students and lawyers of Bhubaneswar were already raising slogans like "death to the mad government" and the students of Rajdhani College had burnt effigies of the chief minister. Many members of the Bhubaneswar Bar Association took this opportunity to demand that Patnaik apologise for his alleged derogatory comments against the state's lawyers.

Initially Patnaik did not come out openly against the reservation policy. Instead, he decided to wait and see which way the wind blew. In fact, his first response towards the student agitation was of initiating stern administrative measures. He tried to suppress the movement by ordering the police to deal with students firmly in Bhubaneswar, where the stir was launched.

ALOKE MITRA

Biju Patnaik: taking no chances

The police, therefore, went on a rampage, entering colleges and beating up not only the students but also the administrative staff of the institutions. These actions only added fuel to the fire and the movement spread in a more violent form to Cuttack, where normal life was thrown out of gear. And reports from other parts of the state also suggested that the movement was catching on and acquiring a state-wide character. What is more, the students began protesting against the police atrocities as well.

The quick escalation of the agitation probably sounded the alarm in Biju's mind. In 1964, a minor clash between a shopkeeper and the students of Ravenshaw college in Cuttack, in which the police and the administration sided with the shopkeeper, developed into a massive anti-government students' movement that ultimately brought down the government of the then chief minister Biren Mitra. Though Mitra headed the ministry, the real policy-maker was Biju, who was then the state Congress president.

Biju knew that his government's record was not too bright. His decision to raise the daily wages of farm labourers from Rs 11 per day to Rs 25 and asking the police to seek permission before firing on attacking mobs have made the people suspect his wisdom and have generated a fair measure of discontent in certain quarters.

Biju feared that his opponents might capitalise on the students' disaffection and oust him. So, before time ran out, he decided to perform a volte-face. On 28 August, he wrote to Singh asking him to make two amendments to the commission's recommendations. First, he wanted an income ceiling, even for the backward castes, so that only those whose earnings were below the specified limit would be eligible for preferential treatment. Secondly, he suggested that the quotas should be maintained only for recruitment and not for promotions.

But Biju knew that writing a letter was just not enough. Surely, he had to do something more to convince the angry students that he was genuinely opposing the reservation policy. So he called a press conference on 29 August to denounce the Mandal Commission report and to announce that he was not implementing it in Orissa.

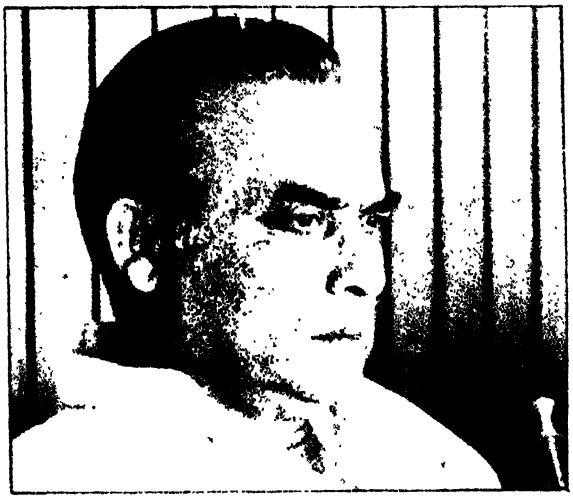
However, his turnaround may have come a little too late, for the students have shown no signs of relenting and the agitations continue despite his assurance. ●

Sarada P. Nanda/Bhubaneswar

The resignation drama

Union law minister Dinesh Goswami quits the Cabinet in a huff, only to return three days later

It came as a bolt from the blue for Prime Minister V.P. Singh. At a time when his government is battling for survival in the face of mounting odds, the sombre and staid Union law minister Dinesh Goswami dropped a bombshell. On the morning of 28 August, Goswami sent in his resignation to the Prime Minister, owning moral responsibility for the sorry state of affairs in his home state, Assam. For the next two days, Goswami steadfastly resisted all pressures from his Cabinet colleagues and the Assam chief minister, Prafulla Mahanta, to withdraw his resignation. But on the third day, he gave in. On 31 August, Dinesh Goswami returned to his office, which he had left in a huff just three days before.



Dinesh Goswami, while being one of the five members of Parliament from the Asom Gana Parishad (AGP)—the party which rules Assam—is the only representative of this regional party in the Cabinet. That, according to him, had become an impediment for him. While Goswami personally felt the National Front government had done a commendable job for Assam, his opinion was obviously not shared by the younger leaders of the AGP and the more militant members of the All Assam Students Union (AASU). Goswami began to feel increasingly isolated and was frequently caught in the crossfire between the Centre and the AGP leadership. "How can I continue to be a member of the Union Cabinet as the sole represenatative of the state if I have no say in the politics of the state?" he asked in his letter to the Prime Minister.

During a conversation with SUNDAY, Goswami explained that such problems were being faced not only by him, but by all leaders from the troubled states. "I don't think the AGP is ignoring me. I have a very good relationship with the chief minister, Prafulla Kumar Mahanta, and the other AGP leaders. It is just that in Assam, as in Punjab and Kashmir, the moderates are slowly becoming irrelevant."

Dinesh Goswami added that ever since he joined the Union Cabinet, he realised there was a difference of perception between him and the younger breed of AGP leaders. "It is not a generation gap, just that the state is passing through a different atmosphere. And with Assembly elections round the corner, I knew the battle lines would be drawn."

Though Goswami insisted there was no immediate provocation behind his decision to quit the Cabinet, political observers feel his recent visit to his home state, when he was gheraoed by AASU activists, brought matters to a head. Before that, Union finance minister Madhu Dandavate and home minister Mufti Mohammad Sayeed had visited Guwahati and were greeted by black-flag waving demonstrators. Also, in June this year, the ruling AGP government had organised a successful Assam bandh, in protest against the Centre's lackadaisical attitude towards the state. The AGP has been demanding that the Illegal Migrants (Determination by Tribunals) Act of 1983 be scrapped and the scheme to pump excess crude oil out of Assam be dropped.

Goswami's grouse is that though he was continuously fighting for the cause of Assam in Cabinet meetings, he couldn't make his demands public for obvious reasons. The minister pointed out that the oil royalty to Assam had been increased, several refineries had been expanded and clearances given by the Centre for the setting up of a new multi-crore gas cracker plant in the state. And all this largely due to his efforts. "I was fighting for all these things in the Cabinet, but the people of Assam do not hear about them. On the other hand, being a Union minister, I cannot speak very vocally about the problems of Assam in Parliament. Therefore, I thought I would be in a better position to speak in Parliament if I was a mere MP," Goswami reasoned.

Goswami's initial decision to resign had been precipitated by the general discontent in Assam towards the National Front government

His initial decision to resign, Goswami said, had been precipitated by the general discontent in Assam towards the National Front government. "And" he said, "if that is the feeling, I lose my moral authority to remain in the Cabinet. After all, it is the people who will judge what I have been able to get for them from New Delhi. I cannot continue to be my own judge."

Goswami's was obviously a very principled stand: he quit the central government since the people of his home state felt that the Centre was doing precious little to solve their problems. But then, under tremendous pressure from the Prime Minister and his Cabinet colleagues, Dinesh Goswami ultimately withdrew his resignation. •

Ritu Sarin/New Delhi

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

The Raja of Mandal

This man will stop at nothing in his quest for power

The British describe their form of government as "muddling through". The Raja of Manda describes his as "mandaling through"!

Cornered by the Tau, threatened by Arun Nehru, intimidated by his own backward MPs, in the minatory person of Ram Avadesh Singh Yadav, and forewarned by his astrologer-in-residence that the end is, indeed, nigh, our Raja of Manda does a quick change of garb and emerges (gillie! gillie!) as the Raja of Mandal. If he began his political career as a Praja Socialist whose feudal retainers called him the "Raja Saheb", he ends the roller-coaster ride as a Prime Minister who won't stand for pointers to poverty "diluting" the exquisite chopping up of our community into 3,473 finely divided castes and sub-castes! The culmination of our Prime Minister's art of managing contradictions is that his contradictions are now managing him!

We—that is, the 82 per cent of us who did not vote for the Janata Dal in the last elections—have, of course, always known that, in the end, it would come to this—even if the editor of the Indian Express disingenuously protests that he didn't. For, we knew, that one who puts together a political platform based on no conception of the nation but solely on the calculus of adding one caste to another, one vertebra to another, one vested interest to another, can end up only proclaiming that the whole is less than the sum of each of its component parts. AJGAR is not only the acronym for Ahir-Jat-Gujjar-and-Rajput. Ajgar is also the Hindi for the boa constrictor—the serpent which swallows its victims whole!

The wise Kakasaheb Kelalkar, chairman of the first Backward Classes Commission, foresaw it all. Article 340 of the Constitution laid on government the obligation to set up a commission to identify and recommend the special measures needed to secure the social, economic and educational emancipation of the backward classes. The expression "backward castes" was deliberately eschewed because our founding fathers had driven the communalists to Pakistan and the casteists underground. Worsted at the hustings, the casteists crept back through the woodwork during the sittings of the Kalelkar Commission. Kakasaheb was, thus, left bemoaning that "in the present context, the words 'sections and classes' can mean nothing but castes, and no other interpretation is feasible" (para 56 of his 137 paragraph letter, not to mention two lengthy postscripts, forwarding the report of the Commission to the President of India).

He regretted that the main consequence of the inquiry conducted by his Commission was that "caste-consciousness, caste loyalties and caste aspirations have increased throughout the country" (para 58). And he added with infinite sadness: "Communalism and casteism are bound to destroy the unity of the nation and narrow down the aspirations of our people" (para 59). Which led him to three major conclusions, first, that "two years of experience (i e the two years from 1953 to 1955 during which the Commission had held its deliberations) have convinced us of the dangers of the spread of casteism" (para 60); second, that "backwardness should be studied from the point of view of the individual and, at most, that of the family" (para 64); and, third, that we must "try to find criteria of backwardness that would eschew ideas of caste or class" (para 65).

Thirty-five years after Kalelkar (after whom, so few of my erstwhile civil service colleagues seem to remember, the Delhi babus' colony of Kaka Nagar is named)—35 years post-Kalelkar, we have as Prime Minister of India a Robber Baron who has the gall to proclaim in Parliament that the "introduction of economic criteria will dilute the purposes for which the Mandal Commission was established"! Here we have a Prime Minister– who has packed his own secretariat with forwards extending from a Brahmin principal secretary and a Brahmin cabinet secretary to a Brahmin private secretary, a sheaf of Brahmin additional secretaries and serried ranks of sundry forwards; why not start with 27 per cent reservation in PMO?!—as I was saying, here we have a Prime Minister--who rejected the Mandal Commission when he was chief minister of Uttar Pradesh, circa 1980-82, remember?--telling us now that Mandal is of such overwhelming importance that, following a brief discussion in Cabinet (on an agenda which did not even list the Mandal Report in the order of business!) a matter that has been pending for ten years, needs immediate disposal. (Would that such despatch were shown over Bofors! How now, V.P. Singh, what were you up to in Stockholm in the summer of 1985? And what little game have you and your commerce minister been playing since then?)

But, to get back to the issue at hand—class without economic criteria? Karl Marx denounced the socialist thinkers who preceded him (Proudhon, Robert Owen, Saint Simon and the others) as "Utopian socialists" because they did not understand the relationship between class and economic criteria. He described his own socialism as "scientific" precisely because it established the nexus between "class" and the "means of production". Those who owned the means of production were the "bourgeoisie" Those who worked the means of production were the "proletariat". Because the bourgeoisie owned the means of production, it controlled the state. And because the proletariat merely worked the means of production, it was exploited by the bourgeoisie through the state. Hence, the forces of dialectical materialism would force through a class conflict which would destroy the bourgeoisie and culminate in the withering away of the state itself. A century after Das Kapital, we have our homegrown Marxists extending their principled Marxist support to a landlord comprador (another vintage communist abuse) who says "class" will be "diluted" if economic criteria are brought in! As poor Marx turns in his grave in the Highgate Cemetry, the gravediggers have taken to calling him Revolving Karl!

Nothing could be more ignoble—or, indeed, more short-sighted even from the electoral point of view--than the caste war which the Raja of Manda has unleased upon our country. When Gandhiji started his fast unto death in the Yervada Jail in Poona in 1932, doubtless there were political "advisers" whispering in his ear (even as his opponents exulted for the same reason without) that, with elections likely after the London Round Table Conference, and Thakur and Bhumihar zamindars "resentful", the Muslims "alienated", the Sikhs "disturbed", the Christians "traitorous", the Harijans "lost" and the tribals "out", the best course, on the whole, would be to consolidate the swarna jati Hindus. But the Mahatma was the Mahatma precisely because he said, "No". (He also, incidentally, swept the polls! Nothing in the Indian democratic experience shows that the road to electoral victory is paved with casteist stones.) Gandhiji refused to countenance the division of Hindu society into separate electorates for the caste Hindus and the "Untouchables". He put his life on the line. He negotiated an agreement with Dr Ambedkar, known to history as the Yervada Pact, which established the principle of general constituencies for all, with some reserved for Scheduled Caste/Scheduled Tribe (SC/ST) candidates alone, thus ensuring that while legislatures would have several SC/ST members, none would be elected exclusively by an SC/ST electorate, nor, in non-reserved constituencies, would any other candidate secure election without the electoral backing of SC/ST voters. In a stroke, criminal injustice of centuries was ended, and the unity of the community (as also of the country) was ensured. It is a national consensus that has endured for six decades.

Devi Lal

Arun Nehru

JAGDISH YADAV
Vinod Pande

V.P. Singh: Cornered by the Tau, threatened by Arun Nehru, intimidated by his own backward MPs, forewarned by his astrologer-in-residence, our Raja of Manda does a quick change of garb and emerges as the Raja of Mandal

Jawaharlal Nehru gave the quietus to the Kalelkar Commission Report precisely because, Kakasaheb's subsequent forebodings notwithstanding, the Commission itself had defined "class" exclusively in terms of "caste". It was the Janata government, which assumed office in 1977 to loud hosannas from Arun Shourie and his ilk, who took the utterly retrograde step of selecting from their ranks the most avowed casteist of them all, the truly backward B P. Mandal, to head a Commission whose mandate was to rake over all the issues already gone into by the Kalelkar Commission. In the quarter century that elapsed between Kakasaheb's exertions and Mandal's last will and testament, the country made enormous progress in de-linking "caste" from "class". What Mandal did was to re-establish the nexus and equate social progress with the augmentation of the number of "backward castes", that is, from around 2,000 under Kalelkar to upwards of 3,500 in the Mandal Yuga.

Where was Arun Shourie when Morarji & Co. thus revived casteism? Loudly applauding on the sidelines, that's where he was. Where was Arun Shourie when they appointed Mandal—of all people—to head the Commission? (Kalelkar's description of the interests which the man represented fits so perfectly that I cannot resist the temptation to quote him in extenso: "there are certain communities who are financially well-off and, yet, are educationally backward, and a good many of them have been dominating society, especially in rural areas"! My exclamation—but that's from para 96. See also para 90: "The extremely backward communities are mostly the victims of the domination of the privileged and dominant communities among the backward classes. It would be a mockery of justice to allow such dominant communities to claim to be the natural leaders of the victims of their domination.")

But, to get back to my question: Where was Shourie when the government of his dreams proved exactly what a load of rubbish they were when they picked on B.P. Mandal, out of a hundred casteists, to do their dirty work for them? Shourie was silent—no, not on everything (for Shourie cannot go to sleep till he has badmouthed at least one Gandhi!) But silent, certainly, on what his mentors (or were they his dupes?) in the Janata government were up to. And where was Shourie when Mandal submitted his report? Drying his tears, doubtless, that Indiraji was back as Prime Minister. But did he ever have the courage—or conviction—to laud Indiraji for not implementing the Report—and precisely because she was unable to forge any national consensus on Mandal's equation of caste with class?

RAJESH KUMAR

Arun Shourie: A dangerous political operative who is using his pen to bring the BJP to power

It is only in the last 15 years that the generality of our newspaper reading public has had to suffer Arun Shourie's hypocritical self-righteousness. I have known it for twice that time—for Arun and I were in the same economics honours class at the same Delhi University college three decades ago. It comes as no surprise to me, therefore, to see that the young fraud of the late Fifties has grown into the middle-aged fraud of the Nineties. Else, how does Arun Shourie explain this conundrum: the National Front manifesto clearly and unambiguously stated that the NF government would, without any reservation, implement the Mandal Commission Report in toto. (So, incidentally, did the party of communalists that is truly after Shourie's heart, the BJP—but we'll come to that in a minute.) When V.P. Singh, in the November elections, promised to Mandalise our country, what was Shourie doing? I'll remind you—even if Shourie has forgotten: he and the rest of the chandal chowkdi were cheering VP on! Blinded by his utterly personalised hatred of Rajiv Gandhi—and spurred on by his true gurus in the BJP—Shourie led the brigade that defamed Rajiv on Bofors, and then cheered himself hoarse when the two Bofors conspirators, Arun Nehru (not the eminence grise of the Bofors deal, as the Swedish diplomat has described him, but surely the eminence gros : please, please look that up in a good French-English dictionary) and Vishwanath Pratap Singh, were installed as the dadas of India! What is the point of Shourie today quoting V.P. Singh as saying he wouldn't stand from Allahabad and then standing; and wouldn't run for the prime ministership—and then sprinting? Is it only now that Shourie's painstaking researches have turned up these gems? Does he not read his own front page? Does he not read what he himself writes?

But let us not be befooled. Arun Shourie is not a hapless victim of dyslexia (the inability to read and write) or amnesia (the inability to remember). Nor is he a Socrates in search of hemlock. Shourie is a dangerous political operative, who is using his pen to bring the BJP to power. (So am I, a dangerous political operative, who is using his pen to bring the Congress to power—but I openly proclaim my political purpose. I am not an unctuous hypocrite masquerading as an "investigative journalist". When Swami Shourie finally dons a saffron safari suit, we will finally see a wolf in wolf's clothing!)

As their tryst with Ram Janmabhoomi draws nearer, the BJP has come to believe that its hour has struck. The press is its chosen instrument for destroying the Janata Dal. The Tau is gone. Arun Nehru is on his way out. Shourie has been earmarked as V.P. Singh's hitman. In a few weeks from now, the Lok Sabha will be dissolved and fresh elections called. The BJP's bluff will also be called as Rajiv Gandhi rides back to South Block. And we can then give Shourie a quiet political burial, inscribing on the headstone of the grave over his ambitions: "Lies! Lies! LIES! R.I.P." •

The views expressed in this article are those of its author and do not purport to constitute an official statement of the Congress party's position.

For Talking. Laughing. Sharing. And Wearing.
NORTH STAR
10¢ STYLE
JEANS
WHEN JEANS MEAN JEANS
NORTH STAR
It's a great feeli
CLARION-C-BIL-NSA-43

MIND YOUR LANGUAGE!

She fell in with the idea of an Indo-pop aggregation readily enough. And teamed up with Boy George to form the West India company.

But even before the new group had begun recording, Asha Bhosle was consumed by self-doubt. Would her Marathi-accented English be good enough for the Boy? Or would she be laughed out of the studio when she burst into song?

Whatever the reaction, Bhosle was taking no chances. And began working on cultivating an upper-class Brit accent in time for the first recording.

The West India company: getting the accent right

As it turned out, she needn't have bothered. For Stephen Luscombe, the star synthesiser of the UK group Blancmange dissolved into uncontrollable giggles when he heard the new, improved Bhosle.

"Shet up, Ashah," he recovered to advice, "you're sounding stoopid."

And a relieved Bhosle reverted to her desi diction

IN WITH TIPU, OUT WITH TINNU

When she retired from the world of modelling to take up photography, everybody thought that Malvika Tiwari would now remain behind the camera forever and ever.

They had reckoned without Tinnu Anand, though. The director, exercising his not inconsiderable charm, managed to persuade Tiwari to sign up as leading lady of his next film.

But even before producer Shums Merchant could decide on the title of the movie, Malvika was dropped.

Why?

Apparently, the dimpled debutante had welshed on an understanding reached with Tinnu, and agreed to play Tipu's wife in the teleserial The Sword Of Tipu Sultan.

Anand insisted on exclusivity.

The lady refused.

And found herself out of the film.

Malvika Tiwari (far left) in Tinnu Anand's (above) unnamed film: she preferred Tipu

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS

On 27 August, the Mother turned 80. And greetings came from all over the world on the occasion, with Pope John Paul II and German Chancellor Helmut Kohl prominent among those who wrote in.

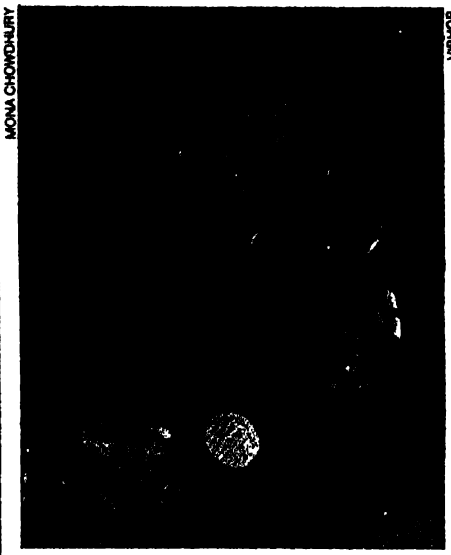
Mother Teresa, however, spent the day in retreat, praying to God to grant her the wisdom to choose an able successor (the election of the new superior-general of the Missionaries of Charity Order was due in a week's time). Members of her congregation offered mass and thanksgiving to God "for the gift of Mother Teresa to society, to the poor and to the world".

SRENIK SETH

Mother Teresa: 80 years and going strong

The Mother insisted that she didn't want any homage. "The only thing that will make me happy," she said, "is that all those who see the good being done may be led to give glory to God, and be helped to recognise the presence of God in the poor and to love and serve them."

YES TO FILMS



[redacted] Kishori Amonkar, one of the prime exponents of the Kirana gharana of Hindustani classical music, has always shied away from the crass commercialism of Hindi cinema. And resolutely steered clear of films after singing for V. Shantaram's Geet Gaya Patharon Ne, a couple of decades ago.

Now, after all these years, Amonkar has changed her mind about Bombay's film world, and decided to sing for Govind (Aakrosh, Ardh Satya, Tamas) Nihalani's forthcoming film Drishti.

According to Nihalani, the film, which explores the man-woman relationship in a marriage, will not feature the conventional background musical score to underline emotional movements. Instead, the director will rely on vocal renderings in between the scenes to achieve a similar effect.

Here's where Kishori Amonkar comes in. The musical virtuoso will sing ragas appropriate to the moment to hold the viewers spellbound. And, hopes Nihalani, keep the cash registers ringing.

MONA CHOWDHURY

VISHOR

Kishori Amonkar: singing for Govind Nihalani (above)

THIS IS YOUR CAPTAIN

[redacted] Ever since her Miss Asia days, she's been a bit of a high-flier. Small wonder then, that Air India picked on Zeenat Aman to play the lead in their video film Flights To Wonderland.

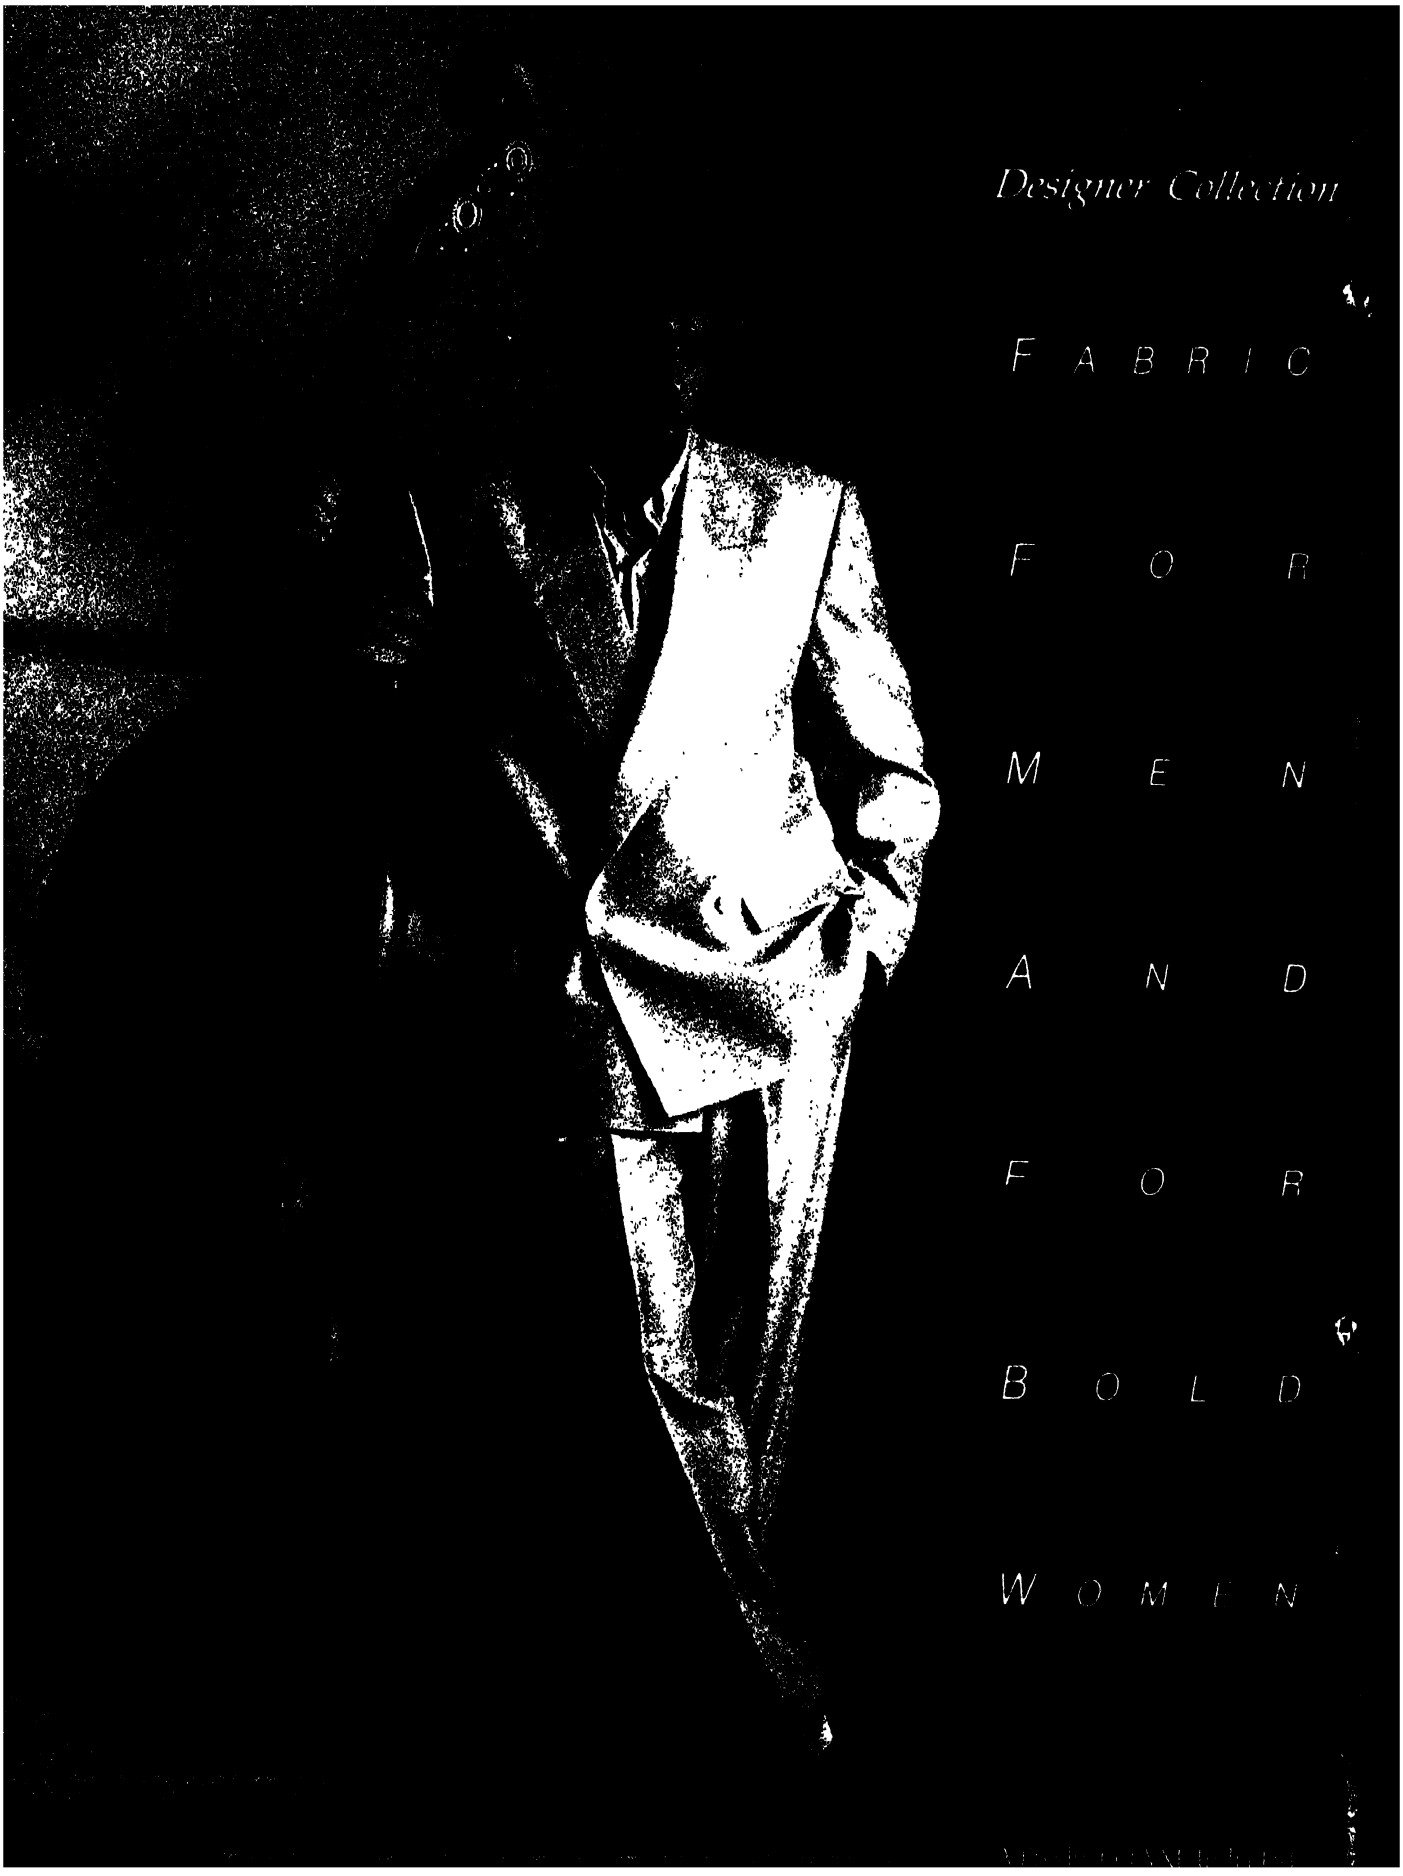
Scheduled for viewing on the airlines' long-haul flights, the audio-visual treat has Captain Zeenat taking a group of kids to palaces among the clouds, which have sunshine for domes, and whose inhabitants are straight out of Aesop's Fables.

After the success with her perfume, it should signal an interesting return to celluloid for Aman.

Zeenat Aman: calling all children

PRIZE WORK

[redacted] He's never been an unknown in media circles. But the success of The Great Indian Novel catapulted Shashi Tharoor to instant fame.



Published by Penguin India in September 1989, to overwhelming critical acclaim, the book, based on the Mahabharat, has sold nearly 10,000 copies in India alone, and is in its fourth reprint.

And now, the Commonwealth Foundation has decided to award the Eurasian Regional Best Book Winner prize to Tharoor for his maiden novel. The writer has been invited to Sydney to receive the £500 prize on 31 October. And he now becomes one of the contenders for the Commonwealth Writers Prize, which will be awarded to one of the five regional winners.

Shashi Tharoor: awarded

But no, Tharoor is not willing to speculate on his chances to swing that one. •

Designer Collection FABRIC
FOR MEN AND
FOR BOLD WOMEN

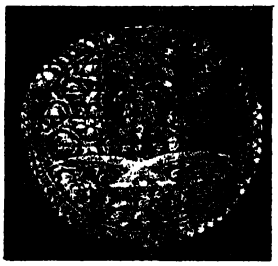
All that glitters...

Four centuries later, the Banarasi silk industry is still thriving

It is an industry, if a few thousand handloom units scattered among the poky, ill-lit bylanes of Banaras, operated by women, children and a few master craftsmen, with no fixed hours of work, wages, bonuses, holidays or compensatory schemes, can be so termed. But never mind the primitive nature of the trade and the obsolete methods of production: the Banarasi silk industry manages to produce sherwanis, dress lengths and, of course, the fabled saris worth around Rs 240 crores every year.

For a singularly disorganised business, the Banarasi silk industry hasn't been doing too badly. Consider the figures. According to the Central Silk Board, Banarasi saris and dress lengths worth Rs 4.82 crores were exported (to the Middle East, Canada, United Kingdom, USA, Mauritius, Singapore and Malayasia) in 1987-88. In 1989, the figure rose to Rs 5.50 crores, and the first six months of 1990 alone recorded trade of Rs 5.70 crores.

The domestic scene was equally promising, with the Uttar Pradesh Handloom Corporation distributing silk yarn worth Rs 18.57 lakhs and procuring finished goods worth Rs 113.62 lakhs in 1989. By June 1990, the corporation had given yarn worth Rs 12.36 lakhs and obtained finished goods worth Rs 48.22 lakhs. The turnover of the corporation's seven retail outfits in Varanasi alone amounted to Rs one crore and 14 lakhs. There was money in zari, even if it never really percolated down to the worker on the loom.



The real boom, however, was in the export sector, and catching on to the trend, many manufacturers opted for a complete switchover. One of them, Abdul Baashik, explains: "The success of the carpet industry (based in Bhadoi near Banaras) was an eye-opener to us. Its existence also facilitated our export channels and we could familiarise ourselves with the procedural formalities."

It helped, in this connection, that the second generation of manufacturers were less conservative, travelled abroad regularly, acquainted themselves with the latest styles through fashion magazines and incorporated them to their designs. "But the most important reason," says Baashik, "is the business we have been getting from the Middle East. The Gulf countries have changed our naseeb (destiny)."

Not that the home market is restricted, either. The demand for Banarasi silks—or even organzas and tissues done with brocade—has persisted despite the new-fangled products on offer. The reason, say manufacturers, has to do with the quality of the weave; every sari is distinctive and an artistic creation in its own right, and the mass-produced wares on sale are no competition.

The precise origins of the trade are shrouded in mystery, though there are several versions going around. The earliest reference to it comes in the writings of Ralph Fitch, a 16th century figure, who recorded that the silk turbans of Mughal royalty were made in Banaras. Tavernier, a 17th century French itinerant, substantiated the account of the flourishing textile industry. Apparently, around this time, several silk weavers from Surat migrated to Banaras, and imparted their skills to the Muslim craftsmen of Faizabad district, at the behest of the local Raja.

Such conventional colours as red, bright pink, deep purple and verdant

Exports to the Middle Eastern markets have helped the Banarasi silk industry, with certain royal families contributing their own designs. The red silk-satin piece above features the insignia of Saudi Arabian royalty green were favoured to highlight the bold jangla patterns of leafy trees, flowers, birds, butterflies, deer and paan, spun in pure gold and silver zari, which was manufactured locally. But with the growing popularity of these silks abroad, especially in England (manufacturers still talk with pride of the time master weaver Subhan Mia was invited to Queen Victoria's coronation), the colours and designs used had to be suitably modified. The new patterns were generally adapted from imported English wallpaper.

Some enterprising customers came up with original ideas. A British buyer, some 70 years ago, was asked to suggest a new design. By way of answer, he simply placed a gold mohar (coin) on the brocade length. Today, this motif, known in trade parlance as ashrafi buti, is a part of every designer's repertoire.

Tibet and Nepal used to be important customers, and special gyasas (prayer mats in brocade), spun in rich, baroque style, were made for them. Even today, a leading manufacturer, Haji Moinuddin, makes gyasas, of four-metre silk lengths, which he claims are smuggled into Tibet through Dharamsala and such conduits.

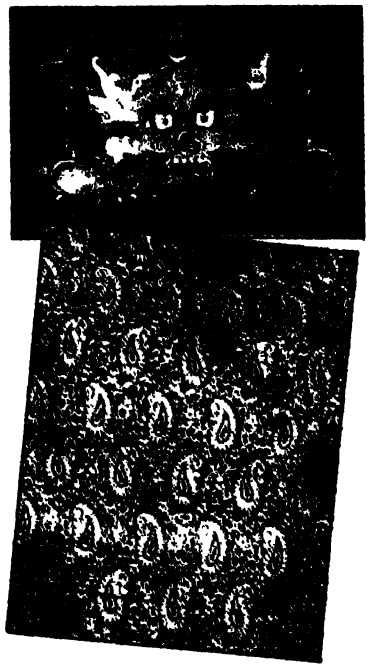
The Arabi pat, a dress length, has been specially fabricated for the Middle Eastern market, with certain royal families contributing their own designs. Master craftsman Abdul Aziz, for instance, spun a sample for the Saudi Arabian royalty in red silk-satin, embodying their insignia of a pair of crossed swords.

Much of the yarn used came from China and Japan. But imports stopped with the Second World War, and manufacturers were reduced to using Mysore yarn. Today, most weavers use Chinese yarn, smuggled through Bombay, Calcutta and Madras.

Of late, the industry has witnessed technological upgradation of sorts, with the coming of the powerloom. But it hasn't found too many takers, despite the fact that it can produce three or four saris a day as against the one per week a handloom does. In Varanasi district alone, there are 15 lakh handloom units to 12,000 powerloom ones. According to Riazuddin, a small-scale manufacturer and prominent activist of the Weavers Welfare Association, this disparity is due to "erratic power supply, the inability to produce traditional designs on powerloom and a general resistance to change on the part of the manufacturers".

Among the traditional trade practices which persist to this day is the use of child labour. The reason proffered for employing children is that their nimble fingers can best execute the dextrous tasks which are involved in the weaving of yarn. The official story is that all the child workers belong to the manufacturer's family. But investigations reveal that they are hired workers, who are paid no wages, on the grounds that they are apprentices. Nobody is quite sure how long the apprenticeship lasts. The manufacturers pay an advance—around Rs 5,000—to their guardians, and the children are reduced to the status of bonded labourers.

Rough estimates have it that one lakh children are employed by the industry. Manufacturers insist that this is only because older workers prefer to work for the carpet industry of Bhadoi. The emergence of Banaras as a major tourist centre also has something to do with it, with most adults choosing to work in hotels or as guides.



Children, however, do not qualify for these jobs. And the manufacturers prefer to employ them, since they don't have to be paid regular wages, either. Naiyyab's (12) is a typical case. His father took an advance from the manufacturer, and Naiyyab and his brothers were put to work on the loom. They work approximately for 12 hours a day, with a half-hour break for lunch, and spend the odd holiday performing household chores.

There isn't much hope of advancement, either. After working for nearly 12 years, Yaseer gets only Rs 450 a month and that only because he has managed to master a particularly complex motif. Not surprisingly then, there are frequent cases of the child workers running away, only to be caught up with in Bombay or Surat and brought right back to the looms.

In all this, however, the trade flourishes. And the Banarasi silk industry continues to do great business.●

Radhika Ramaseshan/Banaras

(Clockwise from far left) Women and children at work on the looms; a dragon motif specially woven for the lamas; and an intricate pattern on a sherwani length

PHOTOGRAPHS: KRISHAN SAITH

HOME SHOPPING

It's in the mail

Burlingtons' kicks off India's armchair consumerism

From slacks, Bermuda shorts and pullovers to slick lingerie and toddlers' jumpsuits. From contraceptives, cutlery and electronic items to sports equipment, cordless telephones and linen. India's first home shopping catalogue, brought out by Burlingtons' Home Shopping Pvt. Ltd, a division of the Burlingtons' Group, offers a total of 460 items for everyday wear, leisure and utility for the country's well-heeled, convenience-minded shoppers. "You could say we are delivering on approval," says André Kapur, Burlingtons' chairman and managing director. "If you like it, you keep it. And if you don't, we take it back." With a full refund.

The assumption, however, is that there will not be many returns. "We've put in a lot of effort into making sure that people will be satisfied with the products," says Kapur. For starters, the goods on sale are from top Indian manufacturers—cutlery from Kishco, menswear from Louis Philipe, Benetton and Zodiac, and shoes from Lotto, among others. Burlingtons' will be acting as a mailbox retailer for the manufacturers, but will market their products under its own label to retain the exclusive touch.

The Bombay-based Burlingtons' Group, a Rs 75 crore a year outfit with three major lines of business—garment manufacture and export, retailing at home, and acting as buying agents for some of the world's biggest names such as Bloomingdale's of New York, Lord & Taylor and the Neiman Marcus retail operations based in Dallas, Texas—launched its six-monthly catalogue in August. The initial target audience is the Rs 8,000 a month-plus earnings bracket, culled from the list of Mastercard, Visa and Diners Club credit card holders, a select group of highly paid and urbanised clientele. Business could be worth as much as Rs 10 crores for the first year, says Kapur.

André Kapur: home shopping pioneer

Later, after business picks up, Burlingtons' plans to add the Rs 5,000 a month segment to its marketing effort. For a very good reason: Kapur estimates the home shopping market to be potentially worth a staggering Rs 1,000 crores a year. The more India's middle and upper middle classes grow in numbers and get used to the idea of purchasing things from a single point outlet without having to make a trip to the marketplace, the more it will make the idea seem like a bonanza. A lot of entrepreneurs will be keeping a close watch on the Burlingtons' venture. If it clicks, urban India could well be inundated with a string of home shopping catalogue operations.

For that kind of market, the work that has gone into Burlingtons' Home Shopping has more to do with a bit of research, good timing and low overheads. The group commissioned Kirloskar Consultants Ltd of Pune to conduct a market survey, and results showed that out of 1,450 respondents interviewed, more than a thousand showed their willingness to opt for home shopping—70 per cent positive response. That was enough to get Kapur perked up about the whole idea.

Here comes the catalogue

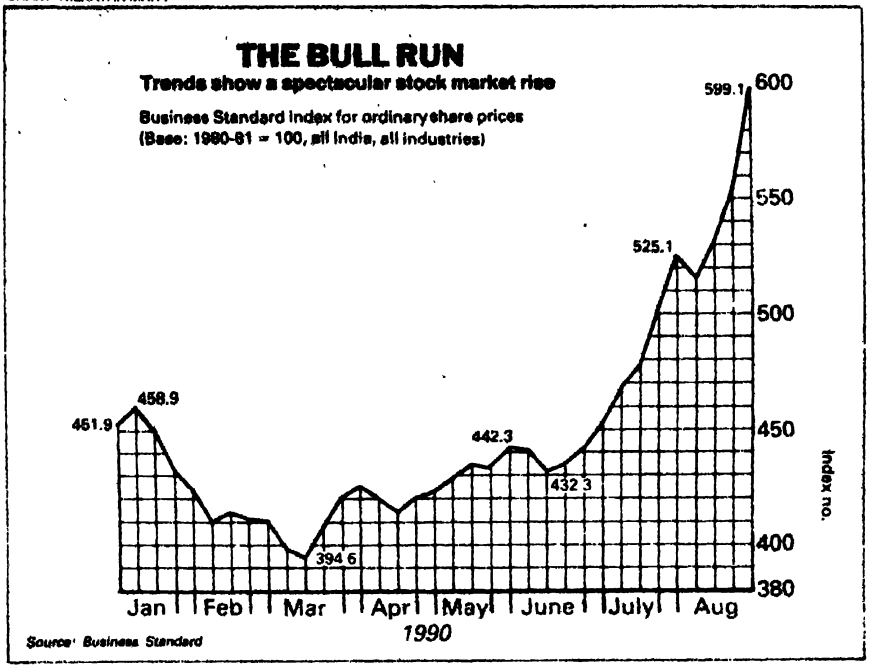
After that, it was just a question of buying floor space in the New Okhla Industrial Estate near New Delhi—which is the centre for accepting orders, processing them and shipping the goods out. Backed, of course, by a slickly produced catalogue—with Bombay's top models, Meher Jesia, Mustafa Eisa, Suzanne Sabloak and Nasser Abdullah, among others, to tout the products—priced at a reasonable Rs 30. The orders will be tracked and processed by computer, and, say company executives, will reach customers within three weeks.



Kapur claims that the catalogued products are priced at 25 to 40 per cent below market prices. While that is debatable—pullovers for Rs 425, Lotto sneakers for Rs 595, etc.—what is not is the convenience of the shopping. And this is where Kapur's claim of lower prices checks out. Prices are inclusive of postage and handling charges, which are considerably cheaper than driving a distance to shop; worse, going to a number of shops in the virtual absence of supermarkets and the department store concept in India. Besides, an order for more than five items guarantees a five per cent discount on the entire purchase order. Payments can be made by money order, cheque or VPP, or credit cards. For Grindlays Visa card holders, there is another facility: the option to pay for purchases in instalments over a year.

These options should draw customer support. And Kapur says he has things worked out to combat disappointment. Ironically, because of the catalogue's production quality. "It is not so much a question of conforming to the description of a product in the catalogue...every item is presented at its best in the photo using professional models and photographers, so the reality can sometimes be disappointing."

Kapur is guarding against that eventuality by picking top names as suppliers, as well as appointing the Société Générale de Surveillance, an international agency that monitors the quality of export items before they are shipped out—to keep track of the suppliers' goods. Even if that does not work out, consumers can rest easy on one count, one that really matters. The money back guarantee. •

Lavina Dixit / Calcutta

CHART NILRATAN MAITY

STOCK MARKETS

Animal house

The bears have taken a beating, and the bulls are giving share market experts confidence—and nightmares

In end-August, presidents of various stock exchanges met in New Delhi for a panic meeting. The outcome: a decision to ask stock brokers to liquidate their carried forward business by at least 50 per cent in eight key scrips—Associated Cement Cos, Baroda Rayon, Tata Tea, Tata Power, TELCO, Tata Steel, Orkay and Reliance Industries Ltd. The reason: an attempt to cool their share prices, and the stock markets, which should show signs of slowing down, but have not done anything of the sort.

In fact, market prices have gone through the roof. The Bombay Stock Exchange's (BSE) sensitive index, based on 30 scrip movements, hit an all-time high of 1,247 on 30 August, a 96 point jump from the previous high of 1,151 recorded just four days earlier. Even a dip on 28 August recovered, and the galloping bulls held on to the advantage. Using broader points of reference showed the same trend. The Business Standard index of ordinary share prices (which includes all industries countrywide) was pegged at 611.63 on 31 August, an almost 120 point jump from end-July. Market analysts estimate that shareholders may have gained as much as Rs 24,000 crores in the past two months, thanks to an increase in stock value across the board.

Most analysts would say this is a good thing, indicative of the strength of the market, indicative of a resurgence, and reminiscent of the boom days of 1985. Despite a floundering economy, lesser number of new issues in the market compared to last year, the Gulf crisis which is already telling on India's oil stockpile, and the political chaos in New Delhi. In fact, the presence of a boom when stock markets worldwide are showing signs of a bust, appears to be a case of incredible timing.

"It is not a question of timing," says Manoj Morarka, a financial analyst with the stock broking firm of Batliwa-

"We are worried about the fall"

Bombay Stock Exchange executive director M.R. Mayya on the share market boom

M.R. Mayya has seen it all—stock market rises and falls, booms and busts, sanity and insanity. It is all a part of the share game. This time, however, there is a sense of deja vu. The seasoned analyst, who runs India's largest exchange and is one of the most respected names in sharebiz is worried. The market is overheated, he feels, and unless someone reins in the speculators with a delicate touch, there could be chaos, and investors could be badly hurt. In a frightening replay of 1986, Mayya spoke to SUNDAY last week, discussing his views and fears. Excerpts from the interview:

SUNDAY: How much of the present boom at the stock markets is due to speculation, and how much of it is thanks to genuine investors taking an interest?
M.R. Mayya: A significant portion of the spectacular rise in share prices, particularly in the last two weeks is due to speculative forces. The initial rise, that is, between mid-June and end-July could be attributed to various fundamentals.

But the rise continued despite strict action by the BSE (Bombay Stock Exchange) authorities from 31 July onwards. On the contrary, the developments in the Middle East, and other internal factors, should have led to a softening of prices. But the hardening remained on excessive speculation pressure in the market. I would, however, hasten to add that it is difficult to quantify the exact extent of the rise that is due to solely speculative pressures.

Q: What makes you so sure that there is excessive speculation?
A: One of the yardsticks for judging whether there is excessive speculation or not is the price earning ratio (PER) of the shares. The PER for the 100 companies that constitute the BSE national index was 14.6 last year. Today, it is 23.03. This is indicative of the fact that it is a speculative rise. If you have a 23 times earning capacity, then it shows the rise is much higher than warranted by the corporate results. My overall view is that it is an overbought market, and cannot sustain (itself) for long. It has to find its level.

Q: According to some stock market experts, mutual funds, which are flush with money, have contributed to the rise in share prices. They have been buying heavily.
A: The mutual funds have unfortunately contributed to the buying of shares at successive higher levels of prices.

Q: Why do you say "unfortunately"? Isn't it a good thing if they can genuinely contribute to the buoyancy in the market?
A: Let me clarify. We are not against price rise. What we are worried about is the likely fall emanating from an undue rise in prices which will shatter the confidence of the investor.

GAUTAM PATOLE

Another significant factor is that the sharp fluctuation in prices is prone to produce greater hazards. It is absolutely necessary to ensure that no default takes place and sharp variation in prices cannot guarantee this.

Q: You say that the price rise is partly due to excessive speculation. Would you say this was a sudden development? After all, speculators have always been there, so what makes this boom so special?
A: I am sorry to say that speculators are generally not content with a stable market. They are neither eternal bulls nor eternal bears. They are bulls at a particular level of prices and bears at another level. Their desired goal is to have sharper and sharper fluctuations so they can make quicker—and larger—profits. So, a stabilised market is taboo for them and it is here that BSE regulators have to play a role and take such steps as to correct the aberrations because of excessive speculative operations.

Q: But none of the steps that you have taken seems to have had any effect. Prices continue to rise. The BSE index is at 1,247 today (30 August) as against 1,099 in July.
A: Had we not acted the way we did, the market would have risen to an even greater extent. We've deployed most of the weapons at our command to contain excessive speculation. They include prohibition on increase in future positions. Payment in 24 hours of full price of purchase and even contraction of outstanding positions.

Q: In 1986, when share prices and the BSE index went through the ceiling, financial institutions unloaded shares in the market. In fact, they unloaded to such an extent that prices collapsed. This was done to cool the market, so to speak. Why haven't they done it this time? Is it because the government would like a booming stock market, irrespective of any potential hazards?

A: I cannot speak for the government. But, in my opinion, the financial institutions (FIs) should play a role. (As) they hold over 35 per cent of the equity shareholding in the country, it is not difficult for them to do so. Taking the broad contours of the market they should sell in a rising market and buy in a falling market. While giving stability to the market, they can make their profits. Some FIs are trying to do this. There are others who are not doing so. Probably, they have their reasons. Which, however, are not in the overall interest of the market.

Q: Where do you think share prices will go from here?

A: I don't expect prices to collapse as (they did) in 1985-86, because today, fundamentals are very strong. The investor base in wide and mutual funds are flush with funds. So, they won't allow prices to collapse. They have to think of their investors. But there could be a technical retreat in prices. Our endeavour is to stabilise prices by putting restrictions to ensure that a technical retreat which may take place later, does not become too serious.

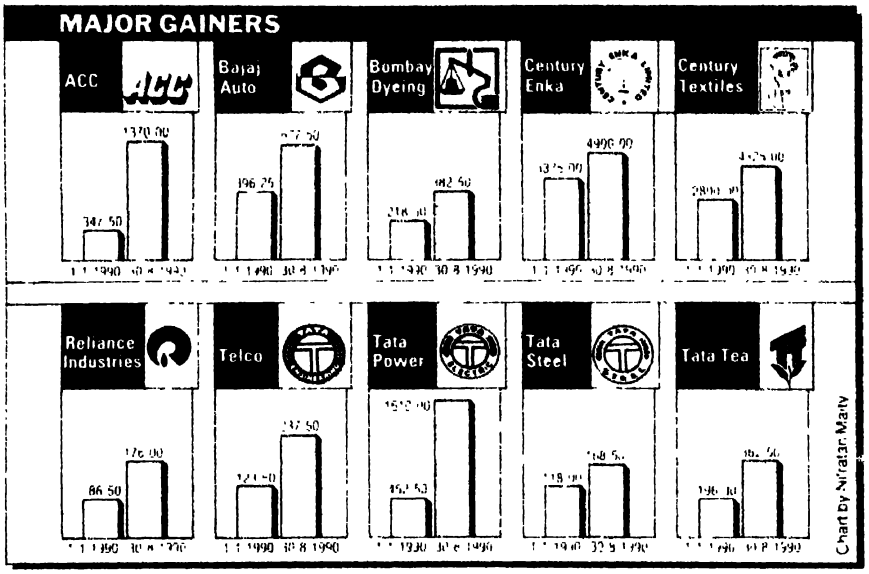
Q: Is there any truth in the premise that a lot of money that has come into the stock market is from the construction and the diamond industry? Even from foreign banks, who have financed investors' share purchases?

A: There seems to be some truth in this. Some foreign banks have liberally financed the stockbrokers, which I feel is not proper on the part of foreign banks. The fact that there accelerated bullish action by the set has been brought to the notice of the authorities concerned. We are taking suitable action. But there is nothing that the stock exchange authorities can do about it as they do not come under the regulatory ambit of the stock exchange.

la and Karnani. "This market is going through a fundamental change and (the boom) is a fruition of the government's liberalisation and broadbanding policies over the last five years." He adds that India will just have to "get used to the idea of higher share prices and good corporate results".

Besides, says R.R. Nair, BSE's general manager and overseer of the exchange's research, statistical operations and data processing, "This level of share prices is not too high." Nair says there are income growth schemes in the market which promise a doubling of the invested sum in three years, "the unexpectedly good monsoons for the third successive year, the corporate results for the year ending 31 March (1990) are reasonably encouraging, and mutual funds are coming into the market. Floating stocks are very limited. And above all, since the FIs (financial institutions) are in the market, they will see to it that the market does not slip".

And by definition of stock market play, speculators, too. As always, the present boom has more to do with people who gamble on the market and not the conservative investor who buys shares when the price is low enough—or attractive enough—and sits quietly for that annual dividend payment. Or sells his shares when prices zoom up. Market analysts such as Unit Trust of India chairman S.A. Dave feel that 85 per cent of the reason behind the surge in share prices is the speculator. He moves in quickly, buys up blocks of equity—often taking refuge behind rumours and almost as often, creating them—driving up prices, and then unloading at a huge profit. The method also works in reverse, with bear operators, who drive prices down. Either way, after the killing is made, it is generally a to-hell-with-the-rest attitude.



There could be some solid reasons behind the speculation. "Forty one per cent of the influence on the BSE index comes from the wholesale price index," says Deepak Raja, director of Strategic Consultants Pvt. Ltd. "In comparison, the influence of the book

DANESH THAKKAR

Mahendra Kampani: the high could last another two months

Market analysts estimate that shareholders may have gained as much as Rs 24,000 crores in the past two months, thanks to an increase in stock value across the board value of shares is 35 per cent, and the earning per share is 21 per cent." Raja stresses on the price index, because he says inflation helps to push up profits and, in turn, this "liquidity" finds its way into the market.

One of the yardsticks for judging whether there is excessive speculation, says BSE executive director M.R. Mayya (see interview) is the price earning ration (PER) of equities. Last year, the PER for 100 companies that make up the BSE national index was 14.6. In end-August, it stood at 23.03, a sure sign of speculation and danger, a rise, says Mayya, "much higher than warranted by the corporate results... my overall view is that it is an overbought market, and cannot sustain (itself) for long. It has to find its level".

Which could happen soon enough. There is not much of equity in the market. FIs hold a quarter of the stock in most companies, another massive chunk rests with a company's promoter, his family and associates, with the public being left with very little. Today, a buyer purchases already scarce stock, and in a bull run, the law of supply and demand ensures skyrocketing prices. And skyrocketing profits for speculators.

Market watchers talk about huge sums of money coming in from the diamond and building construction industry. According to sources in the diamond trade, there is a virtual crisis that began early this year and hit the mainly Surat-based trade heavily. The problem really started last year, when international diamond conglomerate De Beers—which has a stranglehold over the business—raised the price of uncut diamonds by an average of 15.5 per cent worldwide. For the Indian industry, the hike was 20.26 per cent, driving up costs, but slackening business. Added to this is a recession in the US diamond market, the main buyers of Indian finished diamonds. The situation is so bad that about half the diamond factories in Surat lie idle today

As a result, Indian diamond traders and exporters have begun to divert their money to the stock markets, playing it for quick returns. A similar situation prevails in the construction industry, which is experiencing a slump. Consequently, builders and contractors have moved in, fuelling the share scramble. Some foreign banks are believed to have liberally financed share purchases. "There seems to be some truth in this," says BSE's Mayya.

The Bombay Stock Exchange building: the eye of the storm

The danger here is that speculators can borrow large sums from banks, even as high interest short term credit, and shunt the funds for share purchases. After a quick kill, withdraw profits, pay off the bank, and live happily. And live to do it again. "The fact that they (foreign banks) have accelerated bullish action," says Mayya, "has been brought to the notice of the authorities...but there is nothing the stock exchange authorities can do about it as they do not come under the regulatory ambit of the stock exchange." He adds: "What we are worried about is the likely fall emanating from an undue rise in prices which will shatter the confidence of the investor."

An eventuality that FIs have traditionally guarded against with some orchestration by the finance ministry. It is simple: when the market is down, purchase shares to help drive prices up When it is boiling over, as some analysts feel, sell shares to keep prices down. This time round, however, FIs have bought equity lavishly, staying right in the middle of the speculative boom. As have state-run mutual funds. P.K. Pandit, who runs the Life Insurance Corp. mutual funds, has a ready defence, "We are guided by the needs of our investors," he says, "who subscribe to our growth-oriented schemes." Pandit declines to divulge information about how exactly he is going about playing the market, admitting only that his funds are "moderate players". Adds his counterpart, B.A. Vyas, executive trustee of the Bank of India mutual funds: "We are new entrants in the market. But we could be big players in the course of time." However, according to numerous observers, the future is already being played out right now. "The mutual funds," says Mayya, "have unfortunately contributed to the buying of shares at successive higher levels of prices."

To take the counterview, it is not a bad thing. If FIs and mutual funds can go the way of the upward market, without putting breaks on the system, then they are behaving in a free-market fashion, which really is the way things ought to function. As they do in markets abroad, where good news means a good market, and bad news breaks up the equity run. That is precisely what is happening now, share indexes have dipped from Tokyo to New York. But that has happened because they—by virtue of international trading—are susceptible to changes.

India, with its totally insulated market where no foreigner is permitted to invest, is not. Here, prices find their level on account of a good or bad monsoon, good or bad corporate results—and speculation of a kind which mostly defies logic.

The Indian stock market high could last as long as two months more, says Mahendra Kampani, who runs Jamnadas Morarjee & Co., a major brokerage house, "unless something drastic happens". Two months is a long time for profiteering. However, despite his live-well-while-the-going-is-good attitude, Kampani is not without caution. "The macro-economics of the situation are not good," he says, "with the war clouds looming over the Middle East, and other internal factors." Simply: less oil, therefore, less of everything, the possibility of the government cracking up, and so on. Negating the solid advantages of good rainfall and corporate performances.

'Be careful', appears to be the message, whatever goes up, must surely come down. There may not be a collapse—if the government steps in—but it could nevertheless hurt investors badly. Remember 1986? Then, the market went bust mainly because fly-by-night operators did not deliver on promises. This time, the reasons are different, but the effects could be as unnerving. •

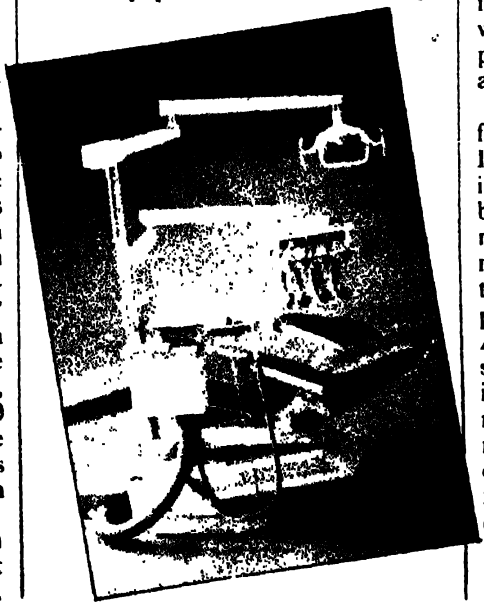
Olga Tellis/Bombay

DANESH THAKKAR

S.A. Dave: a speculators' market

DENTAL EQUIPMENT

Tooth ache?



Domestic manufacturers' attitude upsets dentists

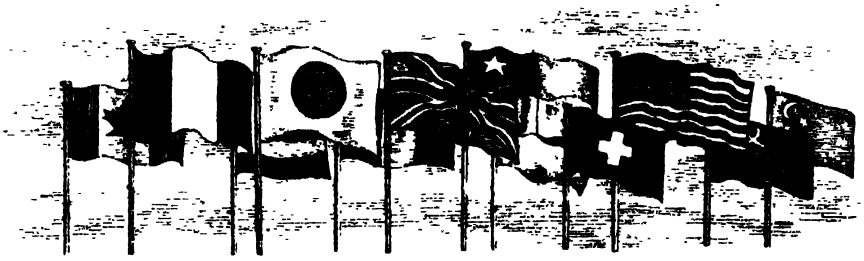
The Indian dental equipment industry is gnashing its teeth over the pro-import lobby's attempts to throw open the sector, kicking off a debate over domestic equipment versus the overseas hi-tech variety. "The government is throttling our growth by its liberal policy of import of dental equipment," says Subhashchandra Shetty, secretary of the All India Dental Equipment Manufacturers Association (AIDEMA).

Bunkum, says most of the dentist fraternity, comprising doctors in college affiliated hospitals, the Indian Army, the Tata Institute of Fundamental Research and private practitioners. "The local industry can in no way meet the requirements of the country as far as dental equipment is concerned," says Dr C. Naterwala, a Bombay-based dentist who has taken up the pro-imports cause. "Even today, what are they manufacturing?" The chair on which the patient sits, a unit for attaching tools of the trade such as lamps, magnifying glasses, trays, and sterilisers. Even then, 80 per cent of the parts are imported; the Indian manufacturer basically makes the shell. Annual imports are worth Rs 4 crores.

The Indian Dental Association (IDA) is playing the same tune, but based on statistics. Dr Vasant B. Kotak, IDA's president, estimates that 25,000 fresh dentists will enter the trade in the next five years. Even if all of them were not to purchase equipment, preferring instead to share them or leave it to a hospital or nursing home to provide them, the total requirement would be close to 5,600 dental chairs and units. Looking at it another way, if only five per cent of India's 15,000 dentists changed their equipment every year, it would still mean a demand of 750 chairs and units annually. A local manufacturer in Bombay opens his order books only once a year, and makes a mere 60 chairs annually. Or if he can handle it, a hundred. Other manufacturers—all small-scale—in Bangalore, Calcutta, Ahmedabad and Lucknow, account for less than half the industry requirement.

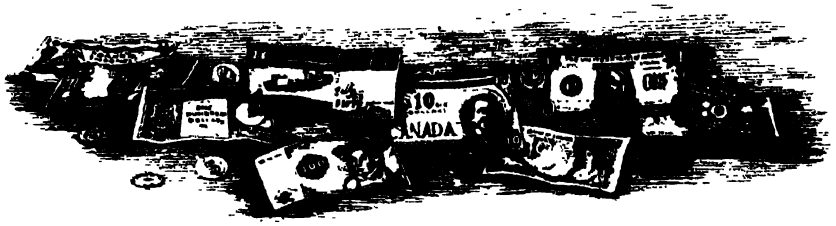
Dental equipment: domestic scarcity?

In addition, says Kotak, today's breed of doctors want to go in for the latest in equipment, sophisticated and comfortable for both the patient and the dentist, something Indian manufacturers cannot provide.



Or service, for that matter. Industry insiders say, for example, that Shetty, who runs a dental equipment firm, provides such inadequate service that a Bangalore college held up payment.

Out of 46 items that are permissible for import under the Open General Licence, only three are manufactured in India. But the domestic lobby has been influential enough. The Directorate General of Technical Development recently shifted a few more to the government's restricted list of imports. It seems like round one to the AIDEMA, but unless its members spruce up their technology, productivity and service, patients—and dentists—would suffer. And if the current trend persists, imports may be the only option, no matter that there is a foreign exchange crunch—health comes before profits, even if many profit by ill-health. •



Olga Tellis/Bombay

A MINIMUM OF PAPERWORK.

EXPERT KNOWLEDGE OF WORLDWIDE CUSTOMS REQUIREMENTS.

ONE ALL-INCLUSIVE PRICE.

IMMEDIATE DESPATCH OF YOUR SHIPMENT.

CAN YOU EXPECT THE SAME DOOR-TO-DOOR SERVICE FROM YOUR FREIGHT FORWARDER?

RAKA:3150:B:90

When shipping around the world, most freight forwarding companies depend on outside agents to handle your packages. At DHL, however, we offer you one door-to-door service, one all-inclusive invoice, and one truly global network. You can depend on the dedication of over 20,000 professionals, spanning more than 180 countries, and supported by over 7,000 vehicles and aircraft. So why not call us if you need an immediate pick-up today?

We are listed in the Yellow Pages/Telephone Directories.

DHL
WORLDWIDE EXPRESS®
DHL. THE COURIER DIVISION OF AIRFREIGHT LIMITED.

■ Move!

It's time the government figured out what to do with Union Carbide Corp. (UCC). Touch them for more compensation, let them off, honour last year's "dishonourable" settlement, throw its subsidiary, Union Carbide India Ltd (UCIL), off Indian soil, ban its batteries—something. The Supreme Court has reserved its judgement on reopening the case, and resuming criminal investigations into the 1984 Bhopal gas disaster. Fine, the court needs time to think. After all, it is about the biggest industrial disaster in the world. But the court wouldn't have listened if the Government of India didn't press for reopening the case. "We are not for conviction of UCC or UCIL," attorney general Soli Sorabjee told the Supreme Court last week, "but what we want to know is how and why this accident took place." So do we, so do we. But obviously, the court needs stronger arguments than that. India's investigating agencies did look into the mess for over four years. They must have discovered a set of clues. Why not present these to the court? If a corporation has erred, say so. Present a case. The court—and the world—will listen. Vagueness is a sign of fumbling idiocy, and there's enough of that in India.

Soli Sorabjee: clear the mess

STOCK QUOTE

"There is no sense in talking about growth in a mechanistic way."

Union finance minister Madhu Dandavate

"There is no sense in saying something and doing nothing about it, either."

A New Delhi economist, who—along with other citizens—is still waiting for the government's economic modus operandi to emerge, long after the budget and the industrial policy paper.

■ We're back

That's what Oswal Agro chairman Abhey Oswal appears to be telling the world. No amount of blacklisting will keep me down. Oswal Agro, the beleaguered industrialist's flagship company, is expected to declare a Rs 50 crore net profit on a turnover of Rs 300 crores for the year-ending June 1990. This is a Rs 23.2 crore increase over the previous year's profits, culled from a Rs 235 crore turnover. Oswal could do with good news—ever since Rajiv Gandhi and his policymakers disappeared from the scene, the industrialist has faced tax raids and investigations. Despite the present government's attempts to appear fair to everyone, they have gunned for Oswal, however much they may deny it.

PERSONALITY OF THE WEEK

D.N. Ghosh

Chairman, Larsen & Toubro

● Nobody is sure about what exactly is happening, but if rumours prove to be right, there could be trouble for Dhirubhai Ambani. Again. There is talk that Ghosh is thinking about selling off the 50 lakh shares of Reliance Industries Ltd that L&T currently holds to financial institutions and mutual funds. At an asking price of Rs 160 per share, L&T stands to gain Rs 15 crores, because when the shares were bought, the price was around Rs 130 per share. Ghosh is trying to convince the finance ministry to go in for the move, which would help sever Ambani links with L&T. On the other hand, it would also help Reliance to pick off these shares at leisure—once they are out of the L&T clutch, the shares are fair game. May the best player win.

■ Gold rush

Foreign exchange stocks are at Rs 5356.80 crores, Rs 434 crores more than what it was this time last year. But an increased outflow to pay for expensive oil could drastically reduce it. The answer: cut expenses and increase exports. On the first count, the government's policy is a bit of a disaster. The second, which could lead to a gold rush, is not. Last week, finance minister Madhu Dandavate announced that the government would sell its stocks of seized gold—a solid 18.99 tonnes—to India's jewellery exporters. At international prices, which the minister says is 55 per cent cheaper than prices at home. The government plans to pass on the gold to the State Bank of India for sale to exporters. The move would do four things: cut back India's gold imports, reduce foreign exchange outflow, increase exports, and—hold your breath—hinder smuggling. Noble thought. Currently, there is an estimated Rs 10,000 to Rs 15,000 crores worth of illegal gold floating around the country, smuggled in as domestic prices are steep. Way to go, professor.

Dandavate: gold digger

The Pawar academy

The Maharashtra chief minister finds a novel way to win over his opponents

MAHARASHTRA

Sharad Pawar is busy buying peace. Over the last few weeks, the chief minister's opponents, both within the Congress(I) and in the Opposition, had successfully managed to clip his wings by getting the Centre's clearance for the setting up of two development boards in the state's backward areas of Vidarbha and Marathwada. The boards are to be autonomous bodies under the direct supervision of the Governor, with the chief minister having little say in their functioning.

But Pawar isn't exactly the kind of person who can be expected to take such emasculation of his powers lying down. So, in a last-ditch effort to retain his sway over the entire state, he devised a novel way to silence his detractors. He decided to open colleges.

According to reports, Pawar has managed to win over the proponents of the development boards by giving them permission to set up colleges, which, in Maharashtra, is a euphemism for making money by charging capitation fees. The promoters of a college get 20 to 30 per cent of the seats as their personal quota, which they are free to auction away to the highest bidder.

And the rich are eager pay huge sums to get their wards admitted to such institutions. For instance, reports say that a businessman from Bihar paid rupees four lakh to get his son into a medical college run by a leading Congressman. Admissions to medical and engineering colleges can be had by paying capitation fees ranging from rupees four to seven lakh. The practice has been defended by Congressman N.K.P. Salve, who runs another medical college. Says Salve: "If people can afford it, why should they not pay?"

Pawar has managed to silence his opponents by issuing them permits to set up colleges and make money by charging capitation fees

Pawar expects that his opponents will reciprocate his gesture by not pressing for the development boards any further. He has, therefore, sanctioned 27 colleges in the Vidarbha area. Of these, two are medical colleges, one engineering, six B.Ed and 18 arts and commerce colleges.

Congressmen and Opposition leaders alike have benefited from this bonanza. Janata Dal legislator Netaji Rajgadkar, who runs a pen shop and owns no other commercial premises worth the mention, has been given the permission to set up an arts and commerce college. And the Congress Seva Dal leader and MLA, Ashok Dawad, hopes to run a college in the 100 sq. ft area he occupies in the Yashwant Stadium to run the Seva Dal office.

Most of those who have been given the permits have no buildings to house the institutions. But established organisations, with complete infrastructural facilities, have been ignored. It is said that the University of Nagpur, which wanted to start a B.Ed college, was not given the permission to do so.

Pawar's largesse has evoked loud protests from various quarters and the Akhil Bharatiya Vidyarthi Parishad, affiliated to the BJP, is planning to challenge the move in court. But the lucky politicians are said to have already started enrolling students and charging capitation fees, though the colleges, in many cases, are still on the drawing board.

While Pawar may have thus scored over at least a section of the pro-development board lobby, his worries are deepening over the land deals in the Vasai-Virar area, about 40 km from Bombay. Pawar had dereserved about 10,500 hectares of land set aside as a green belt for the setting up of a suburban township. But a writ petition has been admitted in the Bombay high court, challenging the dereservations as malafide.

It is being said in political circles that the chief minister has already sought legal advice to find out whether he should step down if some adverse remarks are made by the court about the deals. Pawar may have his own reasons to feel shaky, but his supporters have, apparently, told him that the auditor general and the attorney general of the state had gone through the files and found nothing that might necessitate the setting up of an enquiry commission. However, there is no official word on this matter as yet, and Pawar continues to remain vulnerable. •

Olga Tellis/Bombay

Two hours of tumult

The West Bengal Speaker suspends eight Congress(I) MLAs for unruly behaviour

WEST BENGAL

"The Assembly has become a circus," said Hashim Abdul Halim, Speaker of the West Bengal legislature, a ghost of a smile playing on his lips. "At this rate, I will have to install a trapeze and a couple of swings in the house," he snorted, after a tumultous two hours in the Assembly chamber. Of the 38 clamouring Congress(I) MLAs (many were absent that morning), Halim had just suspended eight, including Satya Ranjan Bapuli, the legislature party leader.

torship of the Opposition. They are frustrating the work of democracy," raged Halim.

Refusing to leave the house, the suspended legislators lent their voices to chaos. Both Ashok Ghosh and Sultan Ahmed had to be carried out by the hefty marshalls of the house. Supriyo Bose left only after exchanging rabbit punches with the marshalls. And Saugata Roy was dragged out. The others—Sudip Bandopadhyay, Manas Bhuinya and Amar Banerjee—left very unwillingly.

But the other congressmen continued crowding the Speaker and parading around the well of the house.

A Congress(I) MLA being carried away from the Assembly: huff, puff and away

"Arrest Alam" was the Congress(I)'s war cry in the house . From her hospital bed, the state Youth Congress(I) chief, Mamata Banerjee, beaten up by Alam's brother on August 16, concurred. Badshah Alam had planned to kill her, she alleged.

Perhaps no Marxist politician has been as much of a liability as Badshah Alam, the CPI(M) Calcutta district committee leader. The presence of chief minister Jyoti Basu in the house and the Speaker's refusal to allow discussion on the Alam issue lit the smouldering fire. As Basu rose to speak, came the first boos and catcalls: "Lallu raj, Billu raj, Cadre raj khatam karo". A flurry of paper balls followed.

Unable to restore order, the speaker first suspended Satya Bapuli and seven others for the day, and later, for the entire session. "This is the dictatorship of the Opposition. They are frustrating the work of democracy," raged Halim.

Forced to cancel the question and answer sessions, Halim began with the mention cases which could barely be heard above the din. "How can they shout so loudly if they have been on hunger strike on the Assembly premises (another breach of the rules)?" RSP MLA Jayanta Biswas wated to know.

Between the raucous Bande Mataram, epithets like "V.P. Singh's dalal", "centre's chamcha" and "ganashatru (enemy of the people)" were hurled at the treasury benches.

With the assembly session over, the Congress(I) will take to the streets and besiege the Writers Buildings on 12 September. But chief minister Basu provides the stern counterpoint: "Let them try. I dare them to go ahead with their programme." Clearly, ahead lies a day of bloodshed. •

Srinjoy Chowdhury / Calcutta

Water babies

Three chief ministers meet over the Krishna river dispute. Or was there more?

KARNATAKA

When three Congress(I) chief ministers met at the Lalith Mahal Palace Hotel in Mysore last month, on the agenda, ostensibly, was the Krishna river water dispute. But they appeared to be meeting a little too frequently in order to sort out a problem that needs to be resolved by 2000 AD so much so that the Congress(I) high command could not help sitting up and taking notice.

The trio—Veerendra Patil, Sharad Pawar and Chenna Reddy, chief ministers of Karnataka, Maharashtra and Andhra Pradesh respectively—have been on shaky ground for some time and are trying to consolidate their positions. Their coming together is meant to tell party president Rajiv Gandhi that they should be left to manage their own affairs and spared any interference from Delhi.

Congress-watchers believe that the water dispute has provided the three leaders with a perfect alibi for meeting off and on to form their own political enclave within the Congress(I). The three had previously met at Tirupathy in April where they held meetings without aides for a while, sparking off speculation that they were plotting against the high command. And then came the Mysore meeting, barely four months after, reinforcing that view.

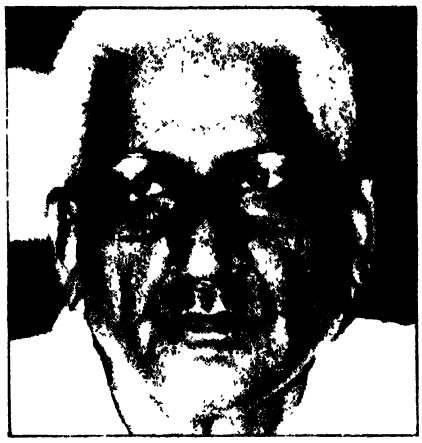
All three CMs have reason to scheme against the high command. From day one, Patil had to put up stiff resistance against Rajiv Gandhi's coterie. Attempts are being made to sideline Pawar by counterposing his arch-rival, former chief minister A.R. Antulay, and Chenna Reddy is besieged by dissidents who are emasculating his powers. Though the implications of the the combined show of strength by the three chief ministers is not yet clear, it may be just enough to rattle the Congress(I) boss. •

Gayatri Laxman/Bangalore

The numbers game

Hukum Singh survives, as the Janata Dal refuses to readmit eight expelled MLAs

HARYANA



Haryana chief minister Hukum Singh continues to be lucky. He has survived yet another attempt by state Janata Dal dissidents to dislodge him. And once again it was the party s all-India president, S.R. Bommai, who came to his rescue.

Hukum Singh, a protégé of the former chief minister, Om Prakash Chautala, son of the former deputy prime minister, Devi Lal, faced a tough challenge in the beginning of last month when 30 MLAs lobbied for his ouster by demanding a legislature party meeting to elect a new leader. But Bommai refused to give in saying that since the leader of the Dal legislature party had been elected as recently as July, he could not convene another meeting to elect a new leader so soon.

A second crisis developed when the dissidents demanded that 11 MLAs who had been expelled from the state unit of the party by Chautala on 11 July be taken back by revoking the expulsion orders. The rebels, led by Banarsi Das Gupta, who was chief minister for a brief period, felt that the balance would then tilt in their favour in the Assembly. The matter was referred by Bommai to P. Babul Reddy, chairman of the Dal's disciplinary committee, and Hukum Singh's fate hung in the balance.

But Hukum, who is known as a dummy chief minister (the real powers being weilded by Chautala and Devi Lal), was fortunate. Reddy revoked the expulsion of three MLAs only, leaving eight others outside the party's fold. This arithmetic robbed the dissidents of the required number of MLAs on their side to effect Hukum's ouster once the Assembly met on 3 September.

No amount of exhortation by Banarsi Das Gupta would make Reddy change his mind. The party ombudsman clarified his stanc saying that he was unble to take back the eight MLAs "in view of the grave acts of indiscipline on their part". The three MLAs whose expulsion has been revoked are Veerendra Singh, Raghubir Singh Khundian and Ran Singh.

Hukum Singh (left) and Devi Lal (right): the winners

Reddy's decision has jeopardised the plans of Prime Minister V.P. Singh and industry minister Ajit Singh's idea of dealing the final blow to Devi Lal and Chautala by dislodging Hukum Singh from the top slot in Haryana and thus ending dynastic sway over the state's politics. VP and Ajit Singh had hoped that, deprived of his political base in Haryana, Devi Lal would cease to be the irritant he still is.

Though the Prime Minister's efforts to weed out Lal has been frustrated by

Nari Hira goes to Pune

To launch his first magazine from outside Bombay

For once, Nari Hira, of Lana Publishing, has forsaken the charms of tinsel town and launched a magazine from Pune. Citadel, Hira's tenth magazine, is his first publishing venture from outside Bombay.

The 86-page inaugural issue of Citadel is priced at Rs 6. While bringing out a magazine predominantly devoted to a particular city is not a novelty, a magazine for a city which is not really a metropolis but is developing rapidly (Pune has the fastest growth rate in the world as the press release informs us) is fairly rare in India.

Given the constraints a city magazine has to work with, Citadel does not come off too badly. The cover story, dealing with the housing boom in Pune and the resultant decline in the costs of flats, makes interesting reading. The other informative article is on foreign students facing racial discrimination in Pune. Editor Sunanda Mehta claims that the latter article is a Citadel exclusive, as is the incredible story of General Gupta, a senior army officer charged with the embezzlement of army funds.

Nari Hira: expanding his empire

Reddy's judgement, Bommai has made it clear that he isn't going to interfere.

It is not yet certain as to who would win the trial of strength. The dissidents led by Hiranand Arya, Banarsi Das Gupta and Veerendra Singh have started returning to Haryana from Gwalior, where they were made to stay in a hotel for about a month in order to keep them out of Devi Lal's reach.

Soon after Devi Lal's removal from the post of the deputy prime minister, Ajit Singh and textile minister Sharad Yadav began moves for Hukum's ouster. They brought the Haryana dissidents to Delhi, held meetings with the Prime Minister, and then packed them off to Agra and Gwalior, where they were lodged in expensive five-star hotels.

But loyalty has strange ways. In spite of the luxury trips, the dissidents have all joined hands with Hukum Singh once again. So much for plans! ●

Rajiv Shukla/New Delhi

Then there are some fairly predictable features like the one on the National Film Archives of India. Articles like the one on how the city's numerous hostelites are faring and their growing attachment to Pune have a typically small-town appeal about them. The profile on Mrs Mrinalini Kirloskar, managing director of Poona Hotels Ltd, is also the kind that a Puneite would readily identify with but not the sort that an outsider would feel too enthusiastic about.

More in line with the traditional format of Lana Publication are the two pages of Mumbai Masala on filmstars and the rich in Bombay. Pune's glamorous neighbour is bound to impart sufficient zip to Citadel. The feature on fashion, with super model Rachel Reuben, spread over four colour pages adds a touch of glamour to the magazine.

It is still too early to predict how well the magazine will take off. However, going by the abundant advertisements it has received and the [illegible] mix of articles, it [illegible] ●

A fast against caste

J.K. Jain goes on hunger-strike in protest against the Centre's reservation policy

DELHI

It's not everyday that a man who is "no Gandhi" goes on an indefinite hunger strike "to appeal to the nation for the restoration of peace and sanity". Last week, Dr J.K. Jain, the BJP Rajya Sabha MP, lost seven kilos fasting at New Delhi's Boat Club lawns for seven days. He was protesting against the government's decision to implement the Mandal Commission's recommendations. But what he gained was a "lifetime's experience" and the knowledge that "you can achieve your objective in a purely peaceful and democratic way".

J.K. Jain breaking his fast: the experience of a lifetime

As Jain tells it, he was observing a religious fast on 25 August, when he realised that the country was "being pushed to the brink of a civil war". Jain's objection was not to the Mandal report per se but to the manner in which it was announced by the government, causing large-scale student violence. "Not only was the peace disturbed, but the country had been pushed into a state of class struggle," feels the surgeon-politician. "I just decided to continue my fast, and was advised by my friends to move to a public place, since I was making a national, public appeal."

The heat and rain at Boat Club were minor obstacles for the man who normally lives and works in an air-conditioned environment. What was worse, the doctor was still convalescing after a typhoid attack. But his "moral courage" saw him through. "The students would come in hundreds, sometimes in hijacked buses to rally around me," recalls Jain. "I would tell them only one thing: eschew violence, and use only peaceful means to achieve your objectives."

Dr Jain stresses that his protest was "not partisan or sectional, but above party lines", and was intended to emphasise that the Centre should have sought national consensus before taking such an important decision.

Unfortunately for Jain, a section of the press reported that his fast had led to a rift between the BJP and the RSS, and that the party leadership did not approve of the manner in which a loyalist like Jain (he was responsible for the BJP's very successful electoral campaign for the last Lok Sabha and Assembly elections) registered his personal protest.

Jain denies that this was true. "I am a disciplined member of a disciplined party," claims Jain defensively. He says that he could not contact the party leadership on the day he decided to start the fast since all of them were out of town. Realising that talk of a rift in the party due to the fast would defeat the very purpose for which it was being undertaken, Jain declared that he would abide by the decision of the party leadership. So, when party president L.K. Advani asked Jain to call off the fast, he readily agreed.

Shiraz Sidhva/New Delhi

The third party

A new extremist group strikes terror in Kohima

NAGALAND

Two rebel groups weren't enough: Nagaland now has another extremist organisation spreading fear in the highlands. The Naga Youth Liberation Front (NYLF), a shadowy organisation about which not much is known as yet, may soon outpace the traditional guerrilla outfits such as the Naga Federal Government and the National Socialist Council of Nagaland when it comes to being trigger-happy and going on a killing spree.

The NYLF made its presence felt by sending out threatening letters to a number of MLAs, bureaucrats and businessmen, who have been accused of "looting government funds". And the Front's non-tribal targets have been asked to leave Nagaland, if they failed to reform by paying back the money they had allegedly swindled.

The organisation showed that it meant business by killing K. Nagarajan, chief engineer of the state's public health engineering department, on 25 July in Kohima. Nagarajan too had been served with a quit notice before being gunned down in his office by a young man.

The assailant and his accomplices remained untraced even a month after the incident, but it was the official's assassination that made the administration aware of the group's existence. A senior home department official has conceded: "We still do not know much about it (the NYLF) except the fact that young men are regularly leaving their homes, supposedly to join it."

Among the recipients of the letters are Tiameron Ao and Chongsen Chang, a former MLA and minister respectively. The NYLF has alleged that they had siphoned off government funds by sanctioning orders far in excess of budget limits. They have reportedly been asked to return rupees two crore, which, the NYLF says, they had made on the sly while in power.

Santanu Ghosh/Silchar

The badge of courage

A woman receives a bravery award for killing a dreaded dacoit

UTTAR PRADESH

Even the Prime Minister's meetings had not drawn such a crowd as that in the Chitrakoot Inter-College ground in Karvi town, on 4 August. Over twenty thousand people had flocked to the award giving ceremony in honour of an 18-year-old village girl, Sundi Yadav, and seven others. They had killed Santosha Yadav, the dreaded dacoit of the Bundelkhand. Ministers, MLAs, senior police officials and various dignitaries paid glowing tribute to the "courage and heroism" of Sundi. The fact that everyone was so ecstatic about the axing to death of Santosha, testifies to the terror the dacoit had struck among the locals.

Sundi Yadav being awarded: farewell to fear

The story goes that on 31 July, Sundi was attacked by Santosha in Daghiya Purwa, 15 kms from Karvi. Sundi resisted him for nearly an hour and finally the neighbours, hearing her cries for help, came running with their lathis, axes and spears. Yadav, confident of his authority in the village, was unarmed. The police arrived at the spot 12 hours after the dacoit was killed. Chief minister (CM) Mulayam Singh Yadav promptly announced a reward of 5,000 for Sundi and a police job if she had the requisite education.

At the time of his death, Yadav had 48 major crime charges against him. These were mostly of murder, dacoity, rape and kidnapping. At 29, Yadav was the most feared anti-social of the region. When Santosha was only ten, his father was killed by Chandra Pal Singh, a Thakur of the neighbouring village. Five years later, Santosha's relatives killed Chandra Pal. Left penniless by the subsequent court cases, the Yadav family was helped out by a Surendra Pal Gautam. In return, the women of the family were sexually exploited by Gautam, even Santosha's mother. In May 1986, Santosha burnt Gautam alive.

There was no looking back. Santosha joined the legendary Shiv Kumar Kurmi, alias Dadua, who has over 125 crimes to his name. After a stint with another dacoit gang, Santosha formed his own gang with seven associates, in early 1989. And he did not follow the usual dacoits' code of conduct. He raped indiscriminately, where other dacoits stuck to loot, murder and maybe kidnapping.

On 8 May, this year, he kidnapped 16-year-old Savitri from Badauli village under the Beheru police station, who was to be married in four days. She was gangraped and otherwise brutalised. Six days later, he descended on Lameta, under the Bhadausa police circle, thrashed 20 villagers, raped three women, pierced the noses of thirteen men with a sackcloth needle and dragged them around with a rope through their bleeding noses. The episode so shocked the state that the CM had to personally visit the village to comfort people. This was in retaliation to some villagers informing the police about Yadav's presence in the village. Once again, the villagers had taken the step due to the desperation of the women in the village, who were in constant threat of sexual assault by the dacoit. And it was the attempt to assault another young woman, that killed Santosha Yadav.

Once the euphoria over the dacoit's death had subsided, there was one important question: would such a powerful anti-social have met with such prolonged resistance from a woman and also not put up a fight when attacked by the villagers? Even the seven felicitated for the killing are reluctant to answer. But there is a story that Sundi was Santosha's mistress. He had actually come to rape another girl, just before her wedding. To protect the girl's identity and since Sundi already had a "tarnished" reputation, she was projected as the victim. "The villagers were fed up with Yadav," said a policeman, "and no woman in these parts felt safe."

The killing, apparently, was carefully planned by the police. Capitalising on the villagers' hatred for Santosha, the police taught them ways to tackle the dacoit with their axes and spears. They were also asked to inform the police when Santosha entered the village. So, when he reached Daghiya Purwa on the evening of 30 July, some people crept away and reached the police at Karvi. Unfortunately, the circle officer the villagers trusted the most, was away. But the stars proved unlucky for Santosha anyway. And not only did the villagers charge at him, but the dacoit's accomplice, Ram Bhavan Yadav, who had Santosha's weapon, deserted him at the crucial moment. Apparently, the dacoit had raped Ram Bhavan's sister and assaulted some other women in his family.

The romantic image of the dreaded dacoit bound by his own norms was not for Santosha. As a police inspector said, "He was just another big bully, a common criminal who rose in the hierarchy only because it is so easy for anyone to procure arms these days." •

Radhika Ramaseshan/Lucknow

If you think you're hosting a conference at the Holiday Inn, Kyoto, you're thinking 6,000 km too far.

Holiday Inn, Bombay, offers you the same international facilities as any Holiday Inn worldwide.

For the business traveller, Holiday Inn, Bombay, offers a truly international range of facilities to cater to your small or medium – sized conference or seminar... just like any other Holiday Inn worldwide.

We offer fine dining, superior accommodation, conference facilities, inimitable service, and of course, the value for money you've come to expect from any Holiday Inn worldwide...

All the more reasons to choose Holiday Inn first.

Holiday Inn
Bombay
The World's First Choice

ARTIG-468A-90

For information and reservation, please contact: BOMBAY: Holiday Inn, Balraj Sahani Marg, Juhu Beach, Bombay 400 049. Tel: 6204444/6202398. Tlx: 011-78411 HOLI IN/ 011-78404 HINN IN. Fax: (0091-22) 6204452 • NEW DELHI: Holiday Inn, Connaught Plaza. Tel: 3320101. Tlx: 031-61186 HIND IN. Tel: 3010211. Tlx: 031-65526 CLAR IN • BANGALORE: Tel: 77676/77931. Tlx: 845-8668/2354 MACH IN • CALCUTTA: Tel: 412009. Tlx: 021-5421 • AHMEDABAD: Tel: 448602 • PUNE: Tel: 661752.

Trading charges

The Syed Modi murder trial begins in Lucknow

With its heady mix of crime, sex, politics and sports, the Syed Modi murder trial has become a cause celebre. Ever since Modi, the national badminton champion, was shot dead two years ago in Lucknow, the tumultuous events his murder triggered off were followed closely by the media. More so because the persons allegedly involved in the crime were Sanjay Singh, now a Member of Parliament who was secretary-general of the Jan Morcha during the time of murder, and Ameeta Modi, herself a national badminton champion and wife of Syed Modi. She was suspected of having an extra-marital affair with Sanjay Singh.

In September 1988, seven persons, including Sanjay Singh and Ameeta, were arrested on charges of murder and conspiracy. The other five were Akhilesh Singh, who allegedly possessed the vehicle in which the murderers were suspected to have absconded, and his accomplices, Amar Bahadur, Jitendra Singh, Bhagwati Singh and Balai Singh. They were subsequently released on bail. In November that year the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) filed an eight page charge-sheet, containing statements of 296 witnesses and submitted 146 documents relating to the murder. In early 1989, the case came up for trial at the sessions court in Lucknow. But it didn't make much headway, because the defendants sought repeated adjournments on different grounds.

Meanwhile, Sanjay Singh's recent nomination to the Rajya Sabha created an uproar among the Opposition, and the Congress(I) even staged a walkout in Parliament. The event rekindled interest in the Syed Modi murder case. The CBI too leaked out portions of the charge-sheet and the opinion of Shamrao G. Samant to a section of the national press. Samant is a leading authority in criminal cases, special consul for the CBI in the General A.S. Vaidya murder case and also a senior prosecutor in the Syed Modi trial.

Reacting to the revelations in the press a day after the hearing began on 16 August, Sanjay Singh filed an affidavit through his counsel, Ram Jethmalani, praying that the court should not be influenced or prejudiced by what was being reported in the press.

Expectedly, the courtroom was jampacked even as the prosecution presented its case over five days, raking up the salacious details that were frontpaged two years back. The prosecution's case, in the main, hinged around two premises: the extra-marital relationship between Ameeta and Sanjay Singh and the conspiracy hatched by Singh, Akhilesh Singh and others at Hotel Yatrik in Allahabad in June 1988 to get rid of Syed Modi. The main points were:

- Sanjay Singh's wife, Garima, had offered to leave her husband along with her three children if he thought "he had found a better companion".
- Reading out the statement of Gyan Prakash Jaiswal, a close friend of Syed Modi, Samant said that Jaiswal had confirmed that Singh was a frequent visitor to the Modis house. On 18 July, 1988, when Jaiswal had visited them, he found Modi sitting alone in their living room. On enquiring where Ameeta was, Jaiswal was told that she was watching a video film with Sanjay Singh in their bedroom. When Jaiswal suggested that they play cards, Modi reportedly went to fetch the cards, but came back, visibly perturbed and refused to play. According to Samant,

KRISHAN SAITH

Sanjay Singh (second from left) and Jethmalani entering the court: making a point

Modi had obviously found his wife in an "objectionable state" with Singh.

• Samant cited a number of examples to support his contention that Singh was ready to do anything for Ameeta. He said that Singh had got two flats at subsidised prices in a plush locality of Bombay for Ameeta's parents. The CBI counsel added that Sanjay Singh had recommended their case to the urban development minister of Maharashtra, Chandrakant Tripathi. He even read out Tripathi's statement to confirm the charge Samant further added that as the minister of state for animal husbandry in 1985, Sanjay Singh got Ameeta a job with the Provincial Cooperative Dairy Federation, Lucknow. Ameeta, he added, had resigned from her previous job with the railways even before the appointment letter was issued to her.

• When Syed Modi had objected to Ameeta's relationship with Sanjay Singh, Ameeta's mother, Pushpa Kulkarni, had reportedly asked Singh to "deal with the situation". According to Samant, Singh had assured Kulkarni that he would "silence Modi in his own way".

• Samant stated that in one of the diaries seized from Ameeta's possession, she had noted that during a New Year eve bash in Bombay in 1985-86, Modi had refused to dance with her. But Ameeta and Sanjay were on the floor all evening, during which he had held her close. Modi had even doubted the paternity of their daughter.

• Syed Modi, according to Samant, was evidently disturbed about his wife's relationship with Sanjay Singh. He had written in one of his letters, a part of which was read in court, that he did not have a single friend or sympathiser. Quoting from a diary of Ameeta's, Samant pointed out that she had once vowed that she would not have sex with Sanjay Singh but would continue meeting him. But whenever he turned up, her resolve broke and she gave in.

• Samant's observations regarding one of the prime accused, Akhilesh Singh, was that he was very close to Sanjay Singh. On more than one occasion in the past, when Akhilesh was arrested and jailed on criminal charges, Sanjay Singh had helped him out. Both had, in fact, managed V.P. Singh's Lok Sabha election campaign in Allahabad in June 1988.

Defence counsel Ram Jethmalani's main arguments were:

• The relationship between Sanjay Singh and Ameeta Modi was a platonic one, but it was being construed in salacious terms for the political benefit of some persons. Even before Syed Modi and Ameeta were married, said Jethmalani, the couple was very close to Singh. Ameeta's mother treated Sanjay Singh like her son; so Singh and Ameeta were like brother and sister.

• On one occasion, said Jethmalani, Modi did express his resentment over Singh and Ameeta's friendship, but when Singh explained what the "real nature" of their relationship was, Modi was convinced and never raised an objection again.

• Replying to the CBI's allegation that on hearing about Modi's accident through a friend of his—Neeraj—Ameeta chose to contact Sanjay Singh first instead of expressing anxiety over her husband's condition and rushing to him, Jethmalani read out Neeraj's statement which said that she approached Singh immediately because he was a good friend of her husband and would naturally help out in a crisis like this. Her reaction was therefore a natural one, and far from suspicious, countered Jethmalani.

• Jethmalani further stated that Ameeta's not attending Modi's funeral in his hometown, Gorakhpur, on 29 July, 1988, was not unnatural, since she was not in the best of terms with her in-laws. Modi's relatives had not even attended their marriage, which, in fact, was solemnised at the residence of Sanjay Singh.

• Regarding the Sanjay Singh-Akhilesh connection, the defence counsel said that they were both dedicated Congress(I) workers who later joined the Jan Morcha. Therefore, Jethamalani emphasised, their relationship and their supposed involvement in the Modi murder was being played up for political motives. According to the CBI, the conspiracy to kill Modi was hatched at Allahabad's Yatrik Hotel in June 1988. But, pointed out Jethmalani, Singh and Akhilesh were present in Allahabad at the time to campaign for V.P. Singh. Before the murder itself, Sanjay Singh had left for Delhi on 26 July and camped there till the 28th. Akhilesh too was in Delhi on 28 July and left for Hardwar on 29 July. So, argued Jethmalani, when was the so-called conspiracy hatched and executed by the accused.

• Jethmalani further informed the court that the CBI came into the picture on 2 August 1988, when the state government had expressed its dissatisfaction with the local police's handling of the case. He alleged that the CBI prepared its theory on the basis of statements rendered by three eye-witnesses who had earlier testified before the local police too. One of them was a rickshaw-puller, who said that he had seen a red Maruti car bearing the number SMD 7102 leaving the spot of the crime immediately after the shots were fired. This statement was recorded in the general diary of the police on 28 July. That very night, the senior superintendent of police ordered his personnel to intercept a white Maruti instead of a red one. Why the sudden change, asked Jethmalani? The CBI, too, later substituted the red Maruti with a white one bearing the number MG 1959.

With the atmosphere sufficiently surcharged, the case is bound to generate keen public interest and enthusiasm when the hearing is resumed on 5 September. •

Radhika Rameseshan/Lucknow

Ameeta Modi coming out of court: pleading innocence

Jethmalani's main argument was that the relationship between Sanjay and Ameeta was a platonic one, but it was being construed in salacious terms for political benefit

Getting it right

No, Uma Bharti doesn't think Madhavrao Scindia's sexy

She hasn't had it too good with the media. First, the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) leader, Uma Bharti, was quoted in Society as referring to Madhavrao Scindia as the most good-looking member of Parliament. Then, the story was fleshed out by cocktail-circuit gossip and the new, improved version went that Bharti had actually called Scindia the sexiest man in the House. This was duly picked up by a number of publications, including SUNDAY, and splashed in the political gossip columns, causing considerable embarrassment to the hapless Bharti in Central Hall.

Says Bharti, "I have done such good work with the refugees from Punjab and Jammu and Kashmir. How come nobody talks about that?"

Says an incensed Bharti. "I used to be one of the most vocal members of Parliament. But after these stories I find it difficult to look anyone in the eye in the House. I have never thought of any man or any woman, for that matter—in terms of their sex-appeal. So, how could I have said any such thing about Madhavrao?"

Uma has her own ideas on how the story came to be floated. Society, she recounts, did a major feature on her a couple of months back. At the fag end of the tape-recorded interview, Bharti was asked whether she thought Madhavrao was good-looking. Uma was unforthcoming. The interviewer then volunteered that she thought that Scindia was great looking. "Do you think so?" asked Bharti.

This, says the member, was twisted out of context and reported as if she had complimented Scindia on his good looks.

There has never been any love lost between Bharti and Scindia. They'd had a bitter quarrel with members and journalists cheering from the sidelines, in Central Hall in the last session of Parliament. Therefore, says Uma, the Madhavrao camp couldn't believe its luck, i.e. the Society piece.

The BJP member is convinced that Madhavrao, with the help of his friends in the media, contorted the story still further. Hence the spate of items about how sexy the sannyasin found the Maharaja.

Bharti was livid. And was all set to go to the Press Council with her complaint, before BJP president L.K. Advani dissuaded her. The story would do the rounds for a couple of months and then die a natural death, he said. If, on the contrary, she made an issue of it, it would remain in the news much longer. The advice didn't go down too well with the combative Bharti, but she conceded to her party elder, anyway.

What made the situation particularly galling for the BJP leader was the fact that Madhavrao Scindia was an old enemy. True, in the days when the Scindias were one big happy family, the Maharaja would attend Bharti's pravachans (discourses) held in the Rajmata's palace. But ever since the great divide, he and Bharti had clashed on numerous occasions. Uma, a simple village girl with socialistic ideas, had embarrassed Scindia—when he was in government—by publicising cases of atrocities on Harijans, etc., in the Congress minister's constituency. The two often quarrelled bitterly in Parliament, with Bharti managing to get the better of the minister on more than one occasion. Says Uma: "I always got the last word in every exchange, much to his annoyance."

Now, with the item about Bharti's opinion about Scindia's sex-appeal doing the rounds, it was Madhavrao's turn to crow over Uma's discomfiture.

Not for long, though. Bharti managed to set the record straight (extracting an apology from Society) and salvaged her reputation from what she regards as a smear campaign.

But the hurt remains. Asks Bharti: "I have done such good work with the refugees from Punjab and Jammu and Kashmir. How come nobody talks about that? I don't mind in the least if anybody attacks me on political grounds. But instead they concentrate on labelling me the sexy sannyasin and then, insist that I find Madhavrao sexy. You tell me, is there anything remotely sexual about my appeal?"

No. But it does make a good story. What's more, a story that will be read far more than any article that talks of Bharti's lecture tours in the United States, her near-effortless transition from religious preceptor to firebrand parliamentarian and her distinctive brand of committed politics.

For, when it comes to a female public figure, there's nothing more prurient than public taste. ●

Seema Goswami/New Delhi

Racial purity

A controversy erupts over the Parsi community's funeral practices

It was late afternoon, around 4.45 pm, on Friday, 27 July, when Adi Nazir, a Parsi surgeon, received a phone call. It was bad news. His young daughter, Roxanne, had been killed in a car crash. Nazir was devastated but pulled himself together with some effort to go through with the formalities of the funeral. Roxanne, a practising Parsi had to be consigned to the Tower of Silence, so that she could ascend to Chinwad, the bridge of the separator, where, according to the Zorastrian faith, departed souls are judged for their deeds in the material world.

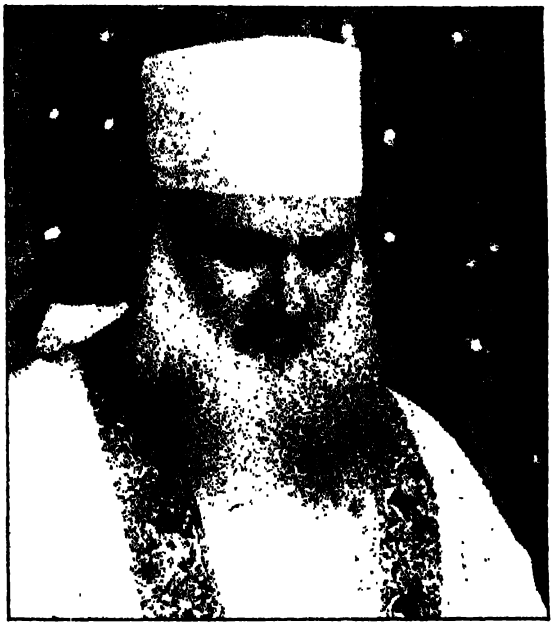
Roxanne had married outside the community. But since she had followed the Parsi faith, her husband and in-laws wanted to consign her to the Tower. Recounts Dr Nazir, "Since I had gone to the accident site to bring her body my relatives called up the management to book a bungli (hall). We gave her name, Roxanne Darshan Shah. We wanted them to know from the start that she had married a non-Parsi. There was going to be no other way we were going to do it. They said okay. Then an hour later we received a call saying that the Panchyat had asked them to refuse." The bereaved family was stunned by the sudden and inexplicable volte-face.

But the Parsi Panchyat and its chairman Aspy Golwalla refused to change their mind even in face of their obvious shock. Anyone who married outside the community, they maintained, could not exit from the Tower of Silence. The Sachkar ceremony, the Sagdid, and the prayers of the Ahunavad Gathe, all of which conjoin to release the soul from the living world, could only be recited when the deceased is a 'pure Parsi'. A premium is placed on 'purity', said the trustees and no allowances could be made in this connection. Roxanne would have to be cremated.

"One feels a little sad," says Adi Nazir. "As far as I can see a Parsi Zorastrian maintains her faith in spite of marrying a non-Parsi, unless he or she implicitly renounces the religion. My daughter Roxanne had married according to the Civil Marriage Act, and also had a small phera ceremony. She has worn her sudreh kusti (sacred shirt) and she has even visited the Agiary and the Atash Behram.

"One of my family members called up Aspy Golwalla, who said, 'Sorry, a resolution has been passed by the trustees which states that a Parsi girl who has married outside her community would not be allowed into the Tower of Silence.' We had no choice but to cremate her. He should have been more sympathetic in his approach."

But, it now turns out that there never was any such rule. Says Nazir, "Three days later we gathered that there is no such resolution. I think Golwalla should have the courage to admit to either his misinformation or his inadequate knowledge of the rules. Such an issue is the last thing parents want to face at the time of death. Let it be publicly known that our ceremonies will not be performed once the girl goes out. We all know that non-Parsis are not allowed in the main hall and we follow it. But nobody is sure about this. The Panchayat should have one religious head in their committee."



Vada Dastoor Dr Firoze M. Kotwal, one of the seven high priests of the Parsis in the world reacted with sympathy but firmness: "I can understand what the family is going through. But the Panchayat is absolutely right. Once a Parsi marries outside, even if it is a boy, they stop being Parsis. If they become ham bistar, that is even have a relationship with a parjat, they stop being Zorastrian. They may wear their sudreh and kusti and think they are still Parsis, but we do not recognise it. The Avestas are our divine utterances, we follow them. Let these reformists who are misguided say what they want to."

According to the conservatives those whom they consider outcastes are free to build their own temples, their own Tower of Silence. The high priests will not hold them back. But once they leave, they will have to stay out.

Intercaste marriages then, are not acceptable. And the dwindling number of the Parsi community not worth worrying about. In the eyes of the Zarathushtra, those who do not bow to fire, those who dismiss his customs as outdated cease to be Parsis. The purity of fire is all important.

Which is all very well. But what happens to the Roxannes of the world? ●

Cyrus Merchant/Bombay

Says Firoze M. Kotwal, one of the seven high priests, "Once Parsis marry outside the community they cease being Parsis according to the Avestas. Let these reformists say what they want to"

Take the world in your stride
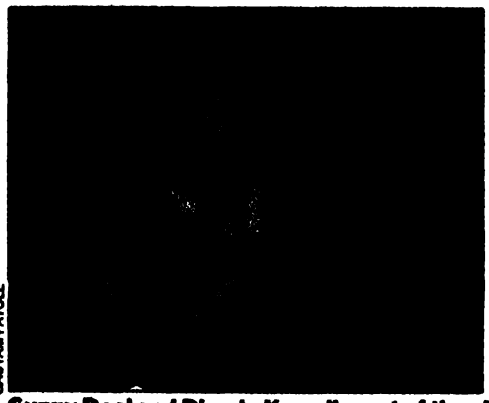
dinesh

When it comes to Punjabi pushiness there's nobody quite like Boney Kapoor.



Recently, when Sridevi's father expired, the actress went into long mourning and, consequently, refused to give any further dates for Boney's Roop Ki Rani Choron Ka Raja.

The mercenary House of Kapoor was completely thrown. Anil's two recent films, Amba and Jeevan Ek Sangharsh, had flopped. And the brothers were banking on Roop Ki Rani Choron Ka Raja to revive their flagging fortunes.

So, Boney swung into action with a vengeance, such as only a truly desperate producer can exhibit. He booked virtually every available ticket on the next flight to Madras so that he could take a large party with him to commiserate with Sridevi and her family.

This included much wringing of hands and repeated statements to the effect that their (Sridevi and her mother's) loss was his loss too, and how their family was like his own.

Even by film city's standards this was a bit thick.

GAUTAM PATOLE

GAUTAM PATOLE

Sunny Deol and Dimple Kapadia: out of the closet

The Sunny Deol-Dimple Kapadia affair is rapidly getting out of hand. Dimple, apparently, is fed up with being the other woman in Sunny's life and has begun demanding her due. But, strangely enough, even Sunny is coming around to her way of thinking.

Deol seems to have tired of the happily-married facade he had been flaunting to the world (while a pregnant wife Pooja languished at home) and wants the freedom to declare that it's Dimple he really loves.

Perhaps Sunny will get away with this new defiance. Dharam can hardly afford to say anything involved as he is with Jaya Prada.

After all, the younger Deol can always turn around and ask Dad—poised on the brink of a third marriage—to shut up.

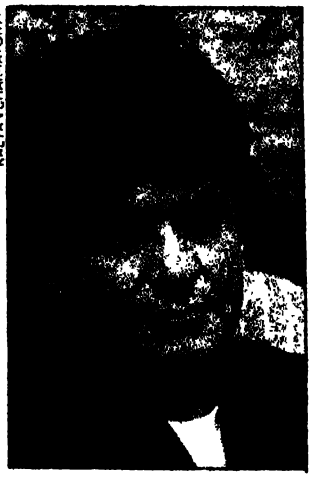
RAKESH SHRESHTA

Sridevi: getting the treatment from Boney

Q Whatever happened to the beefy male brigade that the Bombay film industry used to boast of in the good old days?

A: The male brigade defected—and promptly discovered the drag act. When a desperate Mithun does it, as in Roti Ki Keemat, it's understandable. When a Naseeruddin Shah dons a swimsuit you let that pass too.

That's the intense actor's way of showing that he is willing to do anything, anything at all to belong to the commercial films circuit.



And when a Chunky Pandey plays such a role everybody knows he's motivated by a feel for the part.

But why would a strait-laced Rishi Kapoor suddenly decide to impersonate a mujra dancer in Rishta Ho To Aisa? Past experience may have something to do with it. Kapoor has always had an affinity for playing girlie roles. Remember Rafoo Chakker, and the effortless ease with which Rishi portrayed a girl for the better part of the film?

Well, experience should pull him through this time too.

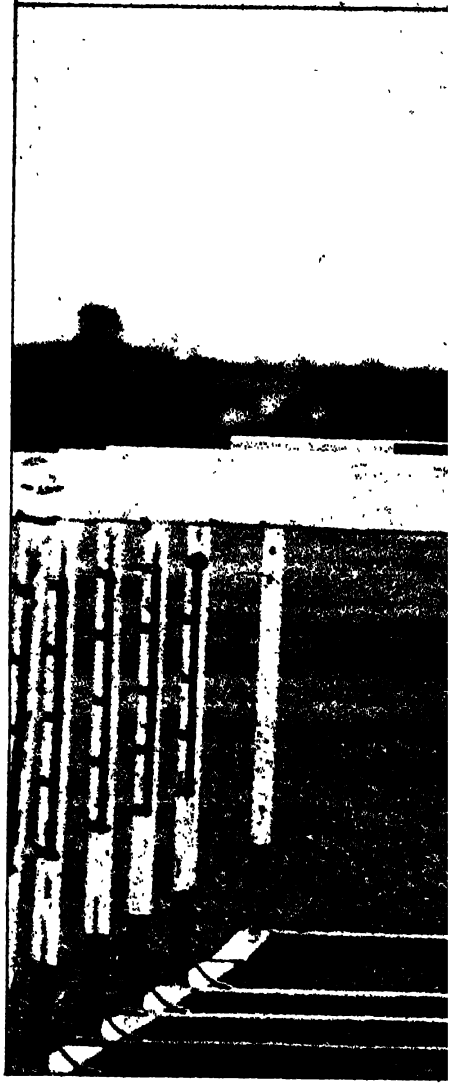
And a peaches and cream complexion certainly helps.

Jeetendra: shake a leg

KALYAN CHAKRAVARTY

Fifty plus, never-say-die ham actor Jeetendra and wife Shobha obviously have no clue as to how one ages gracefully.

Recently, they provided ample amusement to everyone at the Piano Bar, a frequent haunt of Amitabh Bachchan whenever he feels like shaking a leg.



Well, this night belonged to Jeetu and Shobha. Perhaps the Big B's absence did wonderful things for the Jumping Jack's ego and he went a little overboard, gyrating and grinding his creaking bones until they squeaked in protest. But his loathsome hip and pelvic movements did keep everyone amused.

And that's more than you can say for his films.

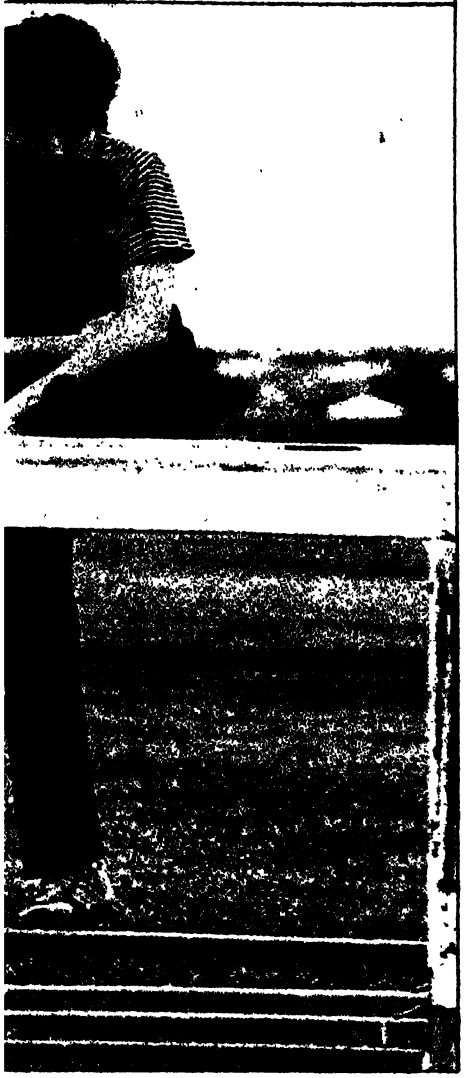
THE QUEEN : P.T. USHA

THE OUTSIDE

Golden girls

Ashwini Nachappa and Zenia Ayrton bid to overtake P.T. Usha

Pictures by Nitin Rai



The 200 metres sprint at the National Athletics Open, New Delhi. Undisputed track queen P.T. Usha is among the contenders. And nobody gives any of the other participants even an outside chance.

The race begins. And 24.07 seconds later the winner breasts the tape. No, it isn't P.T. Usha. Ashwini Nachappa has beaten her to it, and Usha is relegated to an unfamiliar (in domestic events at least) place, clocking 24.12 seconds.

Does this mean that Usha's reign at the top is over?

Well, yes and no. The one-off Nachappa victory notwithstanding, P.T. Usha's track record was good enough for her to hold on to the top spot in athletics. But with one difference. Her right to the number one slot was no longer undisputed, and the claims of the pretenders to her throne could no longer be laughed out of the stadium. Nachappa's win had proved that Usha was far from unbeatable and the top-most position on the winner's stand not out of bounds. And when Zenia Ayrton, the gamine Bombay-based sprinter beat Ashwini Nachappa in the 100 metres race in the Escorts Masters Athletics Meet, clocking 10.87 seconds, it was obvious that the battle for the top had been thrown wide open.

'ENIA AYRTON

THE CHALLENGER : ASHWINI NACHAPPA

Usha, without any serious competition on the domestic front for about a decade, was—predictably—less than happy at this development. And reacting to media reports about her comeuppance, retorted: "It is very difficult for me as I take part in four-five events in every competition. These girls (Ashwini and Zenia) are concentrating on one event each."

O.P. Nambiar, Usha's coach, dismissed the surprise defeat, ascribing it to the fact that his charge was unwell. "Besides," he explained, "Usha knew she had already qualified and was reserving her best for the Asian Games. In the end, it is not a question of who is beating whom, but who is keeping up the international standards. Usha is 26 years now and has been taking the strain for 12 years. But even today, if she is serious about a race, nobody can beat her in India for the next two-three years."

Nachappa, four years younger than Usha, is aware that her victory in the National Open is perceived as a fluke run by the likes of Nambiar. And is determined to prove such sceptics wrong. "Not being able to beat Usha was a great psychological barrier for which I had been doing a lot of mind training. And when I did beat her, people kept coming up to me and asking me to repeat the feat. Until I do that, my victory will lack credibility."

Sunil Abraham, Nachappa's coach, is far less charitable: "An athlete must appreciate the fact that she will be beaten one day. And when you are, you can't hide behind excuses, saying the food was not good and such things."

It was left to the petite Ayrton to put things in perspective. Despite the fact that she is a member of the brat pack baying at Usha's heel (and not just figuratively) Zenia is sporting enough to admit: "People have reached the stage when they are deriding P.T. Usha. But I think she has already done more than enough for her country. Everyone is just waiting for others to take over, and at the same time, pushing her to give her best. But it is humanly impossible for Usha to do as well as she was doing five years ago."

Such generosity notwithstanding, there's no doubting the animosity that exists between the prime conten-

READYING FOR BATTLE: COACH NAMBIAR AND USHA TRAIN IN BANGALORE

ders for the top slot. Ayrton, who lacks international exposure, keeps a low profile in the on-going battle, but Nachappa, who revels in her bindaas image—zipping around the 81-acre sports complex in Bangalore on her Kinetic Honda, turning heads wherever she goes—makes no pretence of liking Usha. Ashwini, whose flashy one-piece running outfits have earned her the sobriquet of 'poor man's Flo-Jo', blames Usha for the bad blood that exists between India's star athletes. "At the Seoul Olympics," she says, "we made fools of ourselves only because of Usha. We couldn't decide on the team that would run for the relay heats 36 hours before the final events, only due to her obstinacy."

Sunil Abraham, Nachappa's coach, describes the incident in some detail. According to his version, Usha did not want to run any of the trials at Seoul and insisted on walking into the finals. The other girls protested at this. Then Nambiar announced a specific time for the relay trials. But as the girls congregated on the track, Usha announced that she was unwell. The others, led by the fiery Nachappa, raved and ranted at this. And the Indian federation handed them letters of warning, instead of disciplining the star athlete.

Laughs Nachappa: "I shouted at Nambiar and asked him to mind his own business. So the federation thought I was the leader of the team which had staged a walkout."

In the end, Indian athletics was the worst loser. For, recalls Sunil Abraham: "Finally, when Usha participated in the hurdles event, it was clear that she was in no shape. She clocked 59-plus seconds, which was a bad timing for her."

In fact, maintains Abraham, over the years Usha has developed a habit of throwing tantrums and then making lame excuses when she fails to deliver on the track. "Don't her actions in Delhi remind you of what happened in Seoul?" he asks.

What's more, Usha has refused, on more than one occasion, to run with the likes of Ashwini and Zenia, the latest such instance occurring at the Delhi meet. The animosity between the sprint queen and lesser athletes runs deep.

It's much the same story at the Kangeri training camp (on the outskirts of Bangalore) for the forthcoming Asiad. Probables for the Beijing meet have gathered along with their coaches to go through their paces, and the divide is very apparent. Usha, Ashwini and Zenia are rarely to be seen together. While Ayrton, who arrived at the camp a week later than the others, is a bit of a loner anyway (though she sometimes chats up Nachappa and Reeth Abraham), Usha sticks close to the Kerala squad, with Nambiar hovering protectively around her. It takes a lot of persuading to get the athletes to pose for a group picture. And it is no coincidence that their coaches have chosen different times for their practice session.

The familiar lanky figure of P.T. Usha is much in evidence, frowning hard in concentration as she perfects her finish. Practising for the 4×100 metres relay with K. Saramma, Rachita Panda and Shantimoi Phillips, Usha clocks good timings on all the practice runs. Much pampering follows from Nambiar, who has become totally identified with Usha ever since she first began competing in the sprints at 14 years.

NEW GENERATION: AYRTON GIVES USHA HER DUE

A BINDAAS IMAGE: NACHAPPA ON THE FIELD

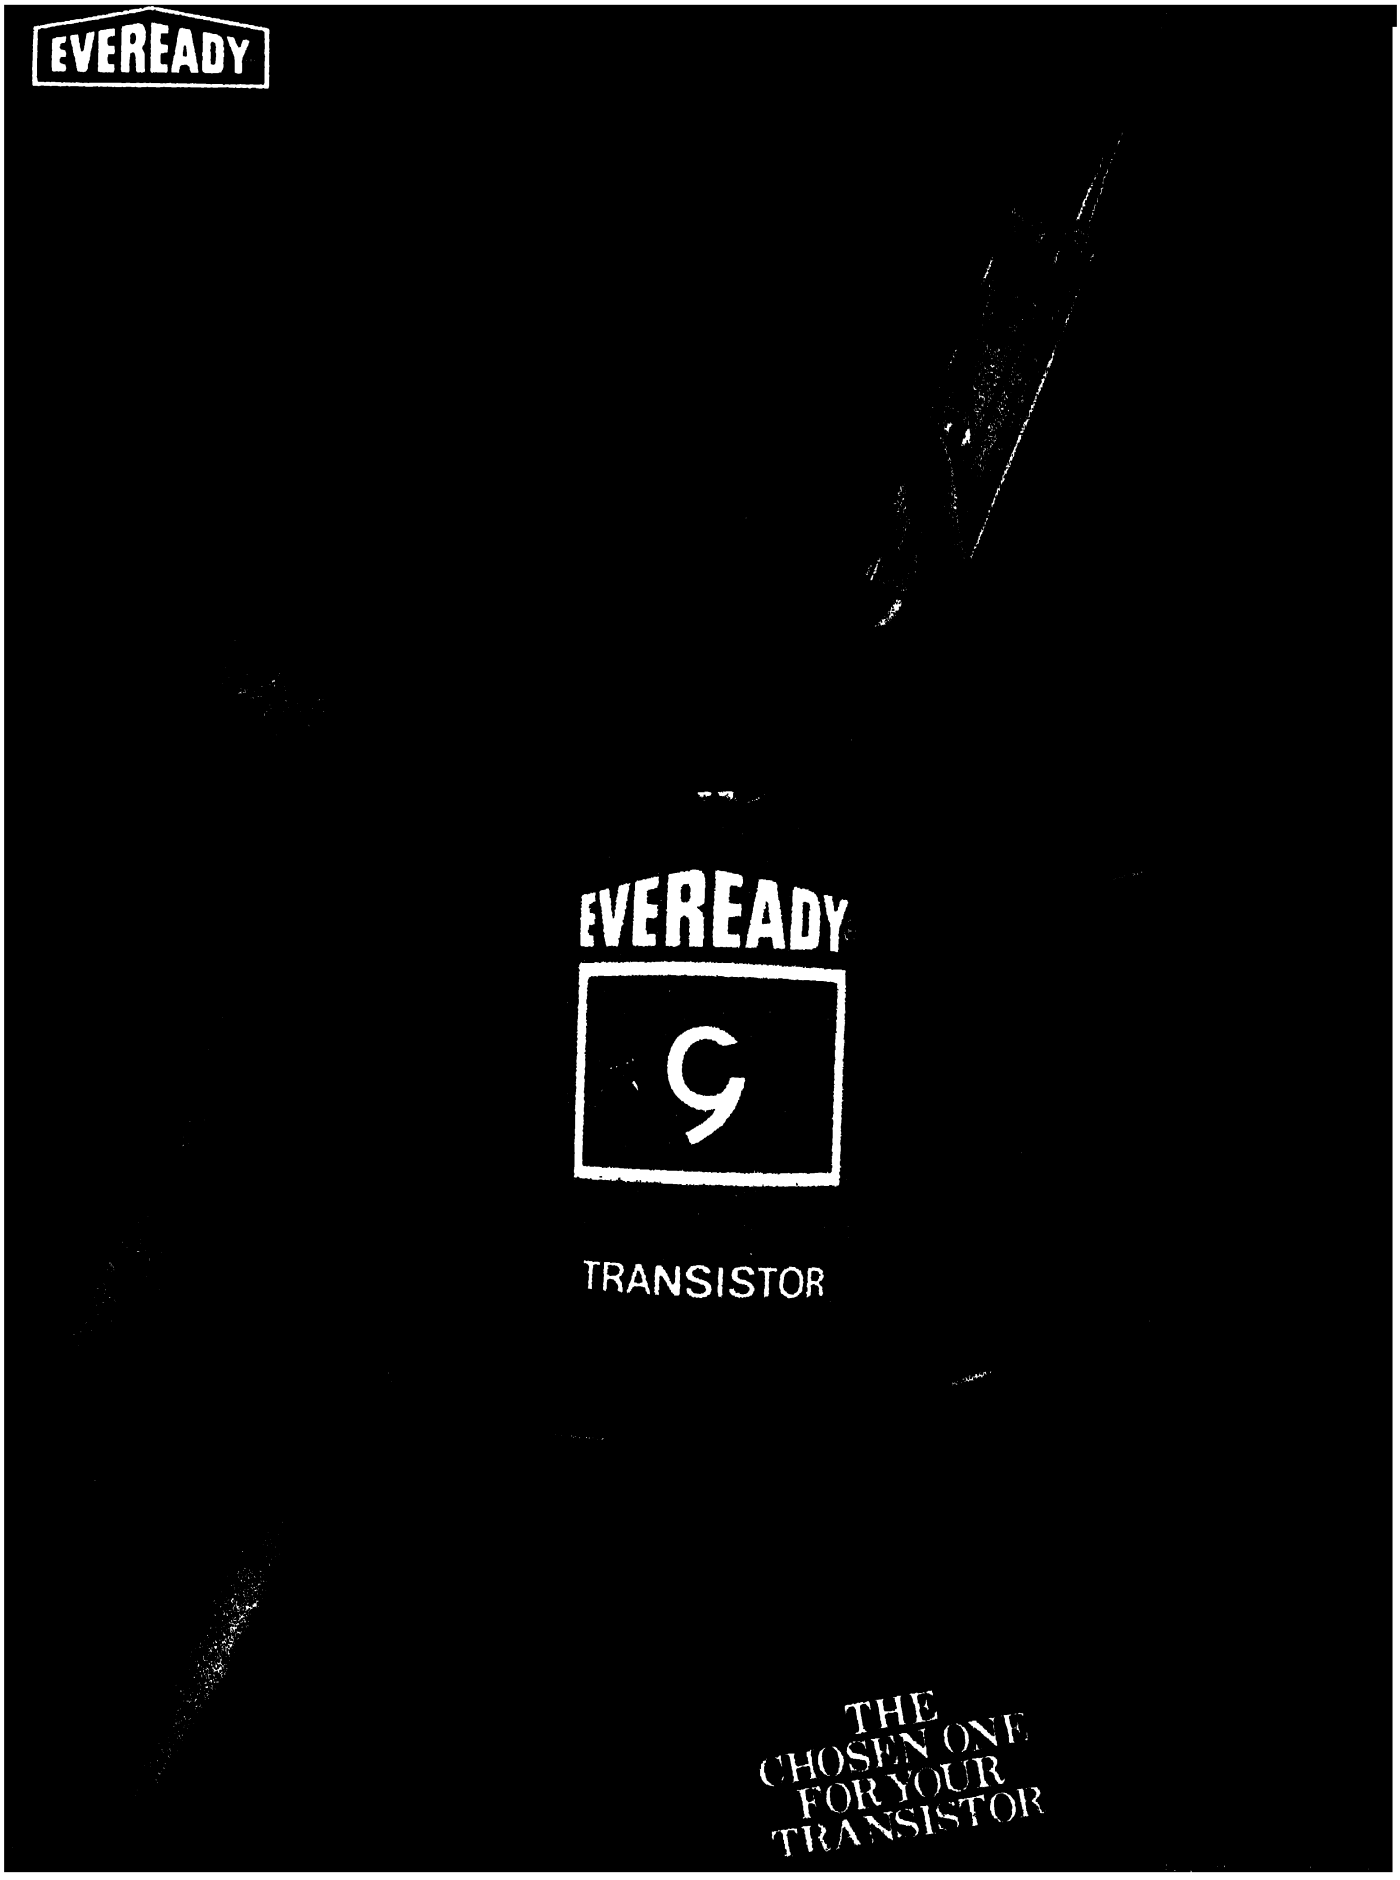
Declares Nambiar triumphantly: "By the start of the Asian Games, Usha will be at her peak. Many people are feeling thrilled that Usha has been beaten. But has her record been broken?"

Sunil Abraham, when he's through with berating Nachappa for a clumsy start, agrees all too readily that Usha has the edge in the current battle. "Ashwini's win over Usha was a good sign," he concedes, "but she still has to mature a lot. She is not yet championship material. It has to be understood, however, that Usha is not Indian athletics and Indian athletics is not Usha. This should be made clear to her and the Indian press."

P.T. Usha, though, continues to behave like the big star. At the Escorts Masters Athletics Meet, for instance, Usha refused to participate in the 4×100 metres relay with Ashwini and Zenia, having gone into a deep sulk after her loss to Nachappa. Claiming that she was "terribly unwell", Usha watched from the sidelines as the quartet (with Saramma and Rachita Panda making up the fourth) clocked 45.50 seconds, qualifying for the Asiad by a fraction of a second. Usha was already assured of a berth in the Beijing squad by virtue of having crossed the qualifying mark in the 4×400 metres relay in the interstate meet.

Zenia Ayrton, despite the win over Nachappa in the 100 metres sprint, clocked 10.87 seconds at the Escorts tournament, falling short of the qualifying mark for the next Asiad. But the attractive Ayrton has consistently improved her timing ever since Adil Somariwala, a former sprinter, joined up as her "personal coach". And given the fact that she has very little exposure in international competitions, and her dedication at the track, she is bound to peak around 1994, when the Beijing Asiad is held. And then, she would give both Usha and Ashwini a run for their money.

Says Sunil Abraham: "Zenia has a good coach, has had a training stint in London recently and is showing great promise. But both Ashwini and Zenia are short and slightly built, and thus have a definite disadvantage over the earlier long-limbed group comprising Usha, Reeth, Shiny Abraham, Vandana Rao and Vandana Shanbagh."



But age is not on Usha's side. And well aware of this, the sprint queen had announced her retirement from athletics after the Seoul Olympics in 1988. After a particularly bad patch, when she was severely castigated for her poor show at the Games by the media and sports enthusiasts, she was coaxed out of her retirement to participate in the Beijing Games. The argument obviously was that she was still the best India had to offer.

Usha, however, insists that it will be all over for her after the next Asiad.

The Nineties, then, will undoubtedly belong to the brat pack. •

Ritu Sarin/Bangalore

EVEREADY

Another India

A highly readable collection of contemporary literary works

In Baburao Bagul's Marathi short story, Death Is Getting Cheaper, a poet friend of the narrator plans to write a poem celebrating Bombay and its role in the national movement and the modernisation of India: "I will chisel these diamonds and put them in the setting of poetry, and I'll give a precious ornament to Marathi poetry," he says. Inspiration does not come easily, and he and the writer go for a walk, which provides the moving stage for vignettes of dispossessed, brutalised, violent lives lived on the footpaths and slums of the city. At the end of the story, the poet sings a different song: "I'll throw away what I wrote. I'll keep just one line— 'This is Bombay. Here men eat men. And Death is Getting Cheaper'."

Modernism in the various Indian literatures has often taken the itinerary traced by Bagul's poet– the spectacular discontinuities in the national experience of modernity, and modernisation have moved writers towards concerns and experimental forms that seek to represent and come to terms with inequality and oppression. K. Satchidanandan's Malayalam poem, Bertolt Brecht And Gautama Buddha, has Brecht, the spokesman for a politicised creative consciousness, demand of the Buddha:

"What relevance can
Your Three truths and Eight ways have
To the child dying of starvation
How can Nothingness ever tempt
The nameless victims of exploitation?...
Old answers do not satisfy new times
I feel no answer lasts for all time."

The Buddha's response reasserts the timelessness of the mystic:

"The mighty movements for survival
And the forward leaps of history
Do not embarrass the Wise that know
The truth of life's evolution."

Variations on such dialogues exist both within and between the many poems and stories selected for this anthology, the diversity of creative methods and materials setting up fertile echoes and contrasts. In Nirendranath Chakrabarti's Bengali poem Fatal Evening, Arjun speaks from Vyasa's Mahabharata to recount a tale of disappointment and betrayal, while Nissim Ezekiel's English poem, Events, has a nameless urban businessman speak a strangely similar tale of alienation, loneliness and despair. The narrator of Arun Joshi's Kanyakumari swims out to Vivekananda's rock but finds no epiphanies or salvation anointing his belated presence there. Two writers of Hindi short stories, Vijay Chauhan in Birthday and Mrinal Pande in The Homecoming, both offer gently nuanced memorials to lives that have diminished as the structure of the extended family changes.

And then there is the exuberant extract from Krishna Baldev Vaid's novel Bimal In Bog, which reminds us of the mixed blessings of our colonial experience: the "English gave our early freedom fighters balls. Ballrooms. Ballbearers. Bridge. Bearers. Beer. Badminton." Such mockery and parody are key forms in which the modern Indian writer addresses a complicated historical and cultural inheritance and context—in Magan's Insolence Sitanshu Yashaschandra's wonderfully irreverent send-up of the literary establishment, he describes speakers at a meeting to felicitate Magan, the reluctant, rebellious poet:

"Each one of them spoke. What oratory!
Someone mentioned Kafka, another spoke of Mallarmeta and still another of Narsinhmeta.
Someone spoke of the love between a camel and a cow."

Nissim Ezekiel's poem, Events, is a nameless urban businessman's tale of alienation, loneliness and despair

The stories and poems anthologised in Another India all appeared previously in Vagarth, a journal of Indian writing, of which 25 issues were published in English between 1973 and 1979. There can be no better tribute to the journal, its editorial staff and its translators, than the fact that selected work from its pages should now add up to a highly readable and enjoyable collection. Many of the writers in this anthology are already well-known nationally, and their work is available in a variety of English translations. It is still very pleasant, though, to read representative work from each of them in quick succession.

What remains after reading this anthology though, are the inevitable questions that are skirted by the title of the anthology—Another India (is it symptomatic that the title was suggested by V.S. Naipaul?). Do literatures in different Indian languages, even if in English translations, add up to an Indian literature? Sitakant Mahapatra's Song Of The Hunter Jara shares a mythology with Nirendranath Chakrabarti's and Daya Pawar's poems, but what do their works share with the extract from Lokenath Bhattacharya's The Virgin Fish Of Babughat, with its nightmarish, Kafkaesque visions of a writers' concentration camp? Such instances can be multiplied, but perhaps the issue may be summed up in the suggestion of a different title for such a collection—Other Indias. For it is only out of the continuing dialogue between the "India" of nationalist discourse and the "Other Indias" of ethnic cultural consciousnesses that "Another India" will emerge. ●

Suvir Kaul

Another India. An anthology of contemporary Indian fiction and poetry, selected and edited by Nissim Ezekiel and Meenakshi Mukherjee. Penguin Books, New Delhi, 1990. Price Rs 55.

THE PEN IS MIGHTIER

Arun Shourie on the Express' battle with the Congress

In recent weeks, the Indian Express Group has come under unprecedented attack. It is also perceived as having changed its position and ceased to uncritically support everything that Prime Minister V.P. Singh does.

In this first person piece, extracted and abridged from his latest collection of articles, essays and lectures, editor Arun Shourie recounts why the Express was so implacably opposed to the Congress regimes of Indira and Rajiv Gandhi.

From the day—13 March, 1987—we published Zail Singh's letter to Rajiv Gandhi in which he accused the latter of misleading Parliament to the day—27 November, 1989—Rajiv was defeated in the elections, the Indian Express group was engaged in a great contest with the State.

I say 'the State' and not just 'Rajiv Gandhi' or even 'the government'. For numerous parts of the State were set upon the paper.

By the end over 230 prosecutions had been heaped upon the paper—by the Company Law Department, by the Directorate of Revenue Intelligence, by the Income Tax authorities, by the Customs Department, the Enforcement Directorate, the Chief Controller

BJP leaders A.B. Vajpayee and Rajmata Scindia outside the Express building: a show of solidarity; (above) Arun Shourie: fighting to the finish of Imports and Exports...Advertisements to the paper had been slashed. Banks were just not lending up to the credit limits which they had themselves sanctioned, they had stopped even answering letters, phone calls, to say nothing of receiving us for personal discussions. An attempt had been made to appoint government directors on to the Board of the paper.

Facsimilie circuits had been turned off in Bangalore. The Delhi edition had been successfully prevented from being published for 47 days—the building cordoned off by hired goondas as well as mounted police. Offices of the paper all over the country had been raided. The advisor to the Group and his associate had been incarcerated. Personnel had been beaten up—six by acid hurled at them. Passports of Mr Ramnath Goenka etc had been impounded. Their houses had been raided.

The Group and everyone connected with it had been calumnised no end—over the radio and TV, through the government's propagandists in the press....An assault on the Express as determined as the one Mrs Gandhi launched during the the Emergency, but one even more comprehensive...

By the end we were on the brink of collapse. But as had happened in the Emergency we were saved by the mistake of the rulers: like Mrs Gandhi in January, 1977, Rajiv Gandhi called an election, and he lost. The paper survived as it had the Emergency, with just months to spare

It would take a volume to set out the thrust and parry, the feints and counter-feints, the exhilaration and tearing despair, the sterling role of so many, the betrayals by others, how we used others, how others used us. All that would take a volume, and it would have to be written by someone who can bring the drama alive.

But the contest yielded many lessons, and there is value perhaps in setting them out just seriatim.

1. The rulers must be wrong, and you must be right. And right on every count. In the end it is the relative credibility of the regime and its critics which tilts the outcome. the rulers must be manifestly working against the interest of the people, you manifestly for their welfare Precisely because this was the way the average reader perceived the government and us, the assault on us in the end recoiled on the government. the assault itself became a public issue, it became an illustration in the public mind of the character of Rajiv's regime, and proof of what we had been saying about it all along. Several things follow For instance, once it has engaged the rulers it is even more necessary —it is a hundred times more necessary —than in normal times that the paper adhere to the truth Even a minor mistake will be seized by the rulers to assail the credibility of its work as a whole

2. Not just on issues, the the paper must be right on conduct. As the 230-odd prosecutions the rulers launched against the Express testify, the rulers will look for every chink they can find. We were greatly helped by the fact that the Group had been under the continuous scrutiny of successive Congress governments for almost 25 years This had led the group to be not just careful but more scrupulous than even an exceptional business house in India would ordinarily be There is a two-way relationship therefore : to fight the State our conduct must be impeccable, and the fight itself cleanses our conduct.

The rulers will certainly hit back They will hit back on a wide front. And given the condition to which our institutions have been reduced to there will be little institutional resistance—from within the bureaucracy for instance—to their assault. Therefore,

- We must have both the wherewithal and the will to say the fight;
- We must be prepared to lose all in the fight: apart from his great astuteness, his immense resourcefulness, his enormous resilience, this willingness to lose everything he has built up over seventy years has been the unique strength of Mr Ram Nath Goenka: in 1942, in 1975-77 and again in 1987-88 he staked

During the on-going battle between the State and the Express, the Delhi edition had been prevented from being published, the buildings cordoned off, personnel beaten up, the passport of Ramnath Goenka impounded. Offices of the paper all over the country had been raided

Time and tide do not wait because we have taken on the State. The fight had to be conducted inspite of illness. Ramnath Goenka, already 85, suffered a stroke. But the illness did not touch his indomitable spirit everything;

• We must worst them on every front: swaying public opinion, persuading the courts,outwitting goondas excavating facts...

4. While they will certainly hit back, we can engage the rulers with great confidence. The rulers could deploy much of the State apparatus to crush us, but as we are still a free and open society there was a limit beyond which they could not go: they had to stop short of physical violence for instance. And in the arena short of violence, the State apparatus is so inept that one can fight it with great confidence. They commenced so many prosecutions. They had the entire panoply of the legal, bureaucratic, intelligence and enforcement establishments to nail the paper on these.

This assault was stemmed in effect by just two brilliant, young men—S.Gurumurthy and Arun Jaitley—under the guidance of two or three senior lawyers—Ram Jethmalani, F.S. Nariman. Just these four or five brilliant men, and the avalanche was stalled long enough Many factors account for this. Many who had been set on us—like the scores who would come to raid our offices –did not have their heart in it. The key men, of course, had, they were out to finish the Group But they were so incredibly ham-handed, so mediocre. The only reason they—for instance, the law officers—got so far was the condition of the institutions: we would have the lawyers, the law, but they ever so often would have the judges. That such mediocre dolts were subjecting the paper to all this, and that the custodians were cringing before them—both were infuriating. They drove one to tear one's hair in frustration.

We would be in court and Jethmalani would make an absolutely brilliant presentation: the CBI lawyer or the then Solicitor General of India. G.Ramaswamy, unable to answer a single point of law or fact or a single inference would just read, and re-read,and re-re-read the charge sheet and the judge would give the order the government wanted. It was infuriating as hell at the moment. But soon enough we gathered confidence for we saw that while many a judge was shamelessly willing to do what the Ramaswamys and Katres wanted him to do, the latter were not clever enough to lead him to the thing that would injure us.

5. And there is another reason for confidence. At the time so many used to say, 'You are fools. How many read your paper? How can you people counter the massive reach of the radio and TV? In any case, no one cares.' But as the election showed, the message does travel—right across the whole of India. And people do care. Every single dodge the rulers attempted, every single fabrication they tried to pass off, the people saw through every single one of them. And they drew the correct inference—that these were not isolated goofups, that they were not aberrations, they were the woof and warp of Rajiv's regime.

6. We learnt too that the State is not a monolith: ever so often, help came from within the apparatus—the 15-year-old circular which we did not know about but which completely demolished what the government was asserting in Court, the fascimilie of the which nailed the minister's lie, the long suppressed, tightly held report of justice Thakkar which enabled us to open another front, High Courts such as that in Bombay which stayed the hand of government...Each of these came from officers of State, and in each case the officers reached out to us of their own accord.

7. But not just from within the State. Ordinary citizens—a retired Land and Development Officer, a Land and Development Officer under suspension for years, lawyers in the know, a Director of big companies, the students who at great cost to themselves helped us re-enter the Express building in Delhi in December 1987 —they reached out. Some of them had experienced persecution at the hands of the rulers. But most of them reached out to the paper because they too wanted to reform 'the state of things entire'. Some of them were doing what they could in their own localities and spheres. Many others were hemmed by various constraints, and could not; they reached out to the paper with suggestions, with tips, with information because they saw the paper doing what they wished they were. Journalists often take more credit than is their due for excavating secrets. In fact, once the paper is seen to be taking up public causes, once it is seen that if information gets to it and checks out no one will be able to pressurise the paper into suppressing the facts, people reach out to the paper themselves.

8. But there is an allied lesson. More information certainly flows in, but naturally much of it is wrong: the informant may be going by hear-say; he may, in his enthusiasm for the cause have deduced more from the facts than is warranted; he may be out to settle a personal score; the rulers will certainly try to plant false stories on the paper so as to blow them apart and thereby make readers disbelieve the other things the paper is saying about them. Thus, even as more information comes in spontaneously because the paper has joined issue with the rulers, checking and re-re-checking become doubly important. And, whenever the paper errs, the swift and unambiguous andopen admission of the mistake.

9. Just as many will reach out and help, several will not be able to stay the course. A few will do worse: they will betray you, inform on you, mislead you. We had our share of the Hindujas, of the Chandraswamys. Bitterness over their conduct saps one in the extreme, almost as much as self-pity. The only sensible thing to do is to follow the counsel Gandhiji gave when his associates felt bitter at the turnaround of Mohammed Ali and Shaukat Ali: we should not be bitter that they have left us mid-stream, he taught; instead we should be grateful that they have struggled by our side thus far.

10. We should not look for fights, but once one is forced on us, we must fight. And go on fighting. The latter is as important as the first. To take up cudgels and, when the rulers hit back, to yield, is doubly destructive—for it demoralises others who might have stood up, 'see what happened to...'But if you persevere, the rulers are apt to rush to your aid, to complete the work you have begun. The moment you point to a shortcoming and urge its rectification, instead of setting it right—something they could do ever so easily—they will make it a point to compound what they were doing. That you have urged a course makes it anathema for them. For them it is more important to demonstrate that they don't care for what you say, that you are nobody, that they have nothing but contempt for you.

11. If only you persevere, you can rely on the rulers to commit THE GREAT MISTAKE. I remember October-November 1976. The movement against Mrs Gandhi had all but completely died out. It seemed that the Emergency would never end. 'But we can always rely on her to commit mistakes,' Mr Goenka told me. 'We have to just hold out'. She did: she called the elections on 18 January, 1977, and she was out within 3 months. This time, as there was no Emergency, we could do more than just hold out. We were able to keep up an assault. There was not a week in which we let off. Rajiv reacted by compounding his conduct, thereby proving our point. And eventually he too committed THE GREAT MISTAKE: he too called the elections, and was out within forty-five days.

12. In both cases the decisive mistake was the calling of elections. And elections became necessary only because we are a free and open society. Mrs Gandhi had the Emergency to delay them, and all effective opposition to it had subsided. But she felt she had to call elections to seek legitimacy. Stalins and Pol Pots don't feel the need. Operating in what had been a free society Mrs Gandhi felt the need. And once the people had spoken neither she nor Rajiv could do a Marcos or a Noriega, neither could annul the results and continue. Hence, the greatest imperative: to keep our society open and free, one in which rulers shall not feel able to cross a limit—resorting to physical violence for instance—one in which they shall feel compelled to seek the people's endorsement, and one in which the people retain their sense of decency, of what is right, and what is wrong.

13. Thus, keep up the pressure. But be patient. India is enormous and so it takes a long, long time for the message to get across. Millions are consumed by the struggle to merely survive: hence the misdeeds must become truly grotesque and monstrous for the people to spare attention. And rationalisations for remaining inert come so easily.

14. Those who are engaged in a battle are apt to get impatient, to throw up their hands,'Why the hell does no one care? Why aren't they doing something?' to fly the air. But the people wait. For the fly to sit. And then, 'SWAT'. We must be patient and remember that each struggle of this kind passes through many ups and downs. A precise description of the progression which I found therapeutic to bear in mins provided as usual by Gandhiji. Reflecting on the course of the non-cooperation campaign he wrote.

Every good movement passes through five stages: indifference, ridicule, abuse , repression, and respect. We had indifference for a

The Indian Express was saved by the mistake of the rulers: like Indira Gandhi in January 1977, Rajiv Gandhi called an election and lost. The paper survived, as it had in the Emergency

Arun Jaitley

S. Gurumurthy

The state had the entire panoply of legal, bureaucratic, intelligence and enforcement establishments to nail the paper. But the assault was stemmed by two brilliant men—S. Gurumurthy and Arun Jaitley—guided by Ram Jethmalani few months. Then the Viceroy graciously laughed at it. Abuse, including misrepresentation, has been the order of the day. The Provincial Governors and the anti-non-cooperation Press have heaped as much abuse upon the movement as they have been able to. Now comes repression, at present yet in its fairly mild form. Every movement that survives repression, mild or severe, invariably commands respect which is another name for success... This repression, if we are true, may be treated as a sure sign of the approaching victory. But, if we are true, we shall neither be cowed down nor angrily retaliate and be violent. Violence is suicide. Let us recognise that power dies hard, and that it is but natural for the government to make a final effort for life even through repression. Complete self-restraint at the present critical moment is the speediest way to success.

(Young India, 9 March, 1921)

15. In such ups and downs, the issue changes from moment to moment. 'R.K. Dhawan and the Thakkar Commission' becomes 'the Press and the Official Secrets Act', and that in an instance becomes 'the Speaker shielding the liars'.On this roller-coaster,

- You must worst the rulers at every turn;
- You must not just worst them, you must show them up to be the fools they are;
- And having done so, immediately bring the focus back to the main issue—their character as rulers, what they are doing to the institutions of State—showing that the particular issue which had surfaced was but an example of what they habitually, compulsively, inevitably do.

16. In pursuing the contest through these ups and downs, in pursuing these ever-changing issues one's tactics naturally must vary with the issue, the phase. To recall one of a score of such changes we went through, we saw that one must at times be audacious enough and courageous enough to brave persecution, and physical danger, and calumny, and to be in the forefront—we had to brave each of these when we had to break as-under the government-sponsored closure of our Delhi edition in October-December, 1987—and one must have the humility and practical sense to remain in the background at others.

The government had succeeded, and our work too had succeeded, in isolating us from the rest of the press by mid-1988; the moment Rajiv brought his Defamation Bill in August 1988 we saw that it was not just wrong and had therefore to be fought, we saw that it was a golden opportunity to turn the tables, to unite the press and isolate the government; but the sine qua non to accomplishing this was that, though organising this move today and that tomorrow, each of us remain well in the background. Similarly, we were at first upset that The Hindu had got the Bofors documents and we had not. That was natural. Mr Goenka with his great pride in his paper too was upset

But for him no defeat is a complete defeat, no victory a complete victory. In each defeat he sees the point of advantage, the foothold on which one may stand to fight back; in each victory he detects the seed of future trouble. He therefore rallied in no time. 'It is good,' he said. 'It is better this way. They will praise The Hindu—to condemn us, if for nothing else. But doing so they will propagate the documents, they will own up to them.' That is exactly what happened. We were all amused in the following months when the paper which had been most strenuously propagating the government's smears—and rationalisations—'destabilisation', 'scurrilous', 'not journalism', 'corruption is only an elitist issue'—namely, The Times of India in every editorial it wrote mocked at us: 'And be it noted that it is The Hindu and not those who had been shouting the loudest which got the documents,' or words to that effect. Whether we were mocked or not, the government's apologist gave currency to the documents!

17. Time and tide do not wait because we have taken on the State. The fight had to be conducted in spite of, in the midst of illness, of traumas, of dislocations of various kinds. Mr Goenka, already 85, drove himself into a stroke. It disabled him. At times he had to be shielded from public view. The government had its emissaries who came ostensibly to wish him well but in fact to ascertain how able he was to carry on. It sent the Hindujas, it sent relatives of Mr Goenka, it sent Murli Deora, that middleman of an MP, to persuade him in his weakened condition.

As Mr Goenka fought back to reasonable health, all realised that the illness, though nearly fatal, had not been able to touch his indomitable spirit. He was as he had been in 1980. Mrs Gandhi had returned to power. And had immediately recommenced the assault. She had tried to take over the Delhi building, income tax cases were being reopened... Srichand Hinduja came over to Mr Goenka with an offer: part with the paper...any price you name...Mr Goenka asked him, 'Have you come on behalf of the Devi? ' meaning Mrs Gandhi. 'You may draw your own conclusion,' Srichand said. 'To kya main apni gave apne hi haath se kasai ke ghar pahuchaun?' Mr Goenka asked him, 'So, should I with my own hands reach my cow to the butcher's house?' And with a cup of tea despatched him off.

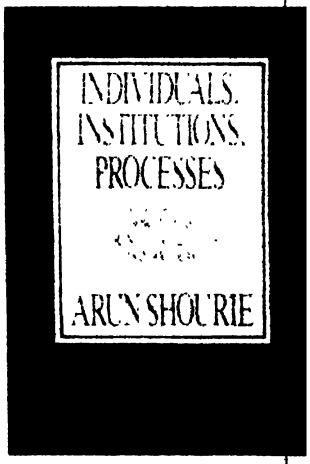
18. I do not want to suggest by any means that such spirit and doggedness are enough, or that the Express as an organisation was in fighting fettle. On the contrary, organisationally we were in very, very poor shape. To take just one instance, while nothing would have seen the light of day but for hundreds doing their job—from the typesetter to the rotary operator the key w ork —of excavating and garnering the facts, of writing, of fighting the cases, of looking after the ailing Mr Goenka, of attending to the myriad tasks that are needed for keeping an organisation going—all this had actually to be done by just a handful. As this handful got enmeshed in fire fighting cases, tax demands, fomented 'strikes', raising money—the paper was less and less able to attend to the basic tasks of a newspaper. It is of course an achievement that even in this situation the paper put out so much data—original, hard to get, and of the highest public importance. But that it was crippled even in its editorial work is also true.

19. Apart from the disabilities which followed upon the key personnel getting caught up in fighting fires, there were other costs even in regard to the editorial content of the paper. The paper had taken up the task of cleansing public life, of restoring accountability, of infusing institutions with life. It had engaged the Rajiv Gandhi government on these issues with great vigour and tenacity. Rulers like N.T. Rama Rao in Andhra and Devi Lal in Haryana were also doing everything they could to suborn institutions.

The paper, specially the editions based in the respective states, was eager to take on these rulers. But the intensity of the fight against the central government disabled us from doing so. There would have been no difficulty if we were operating in a country where governments brought to account by the press adhered to norms, where they were restrained by notions of things done and not done. But as noted above Rajiv and his government had thrown all norms to the winds. And there were no institutional restraints to hinder them. NTR and Devi Lal would have reacted in the way Rajiv had to assaults on them. We concluded that we could not take them on till we had dealt with the principal task at hand. 'Be Arjun', became our beacon.

20. In India, being merely good professionals is not enough. In other countries a paper publishes a story, other papers carry it forward, the legislatures, the courts, civic groups immediately act on the matter. In India it is the exact opposite. Other papers pull a blanket over their heads, hoping the reader too will not notice... Many others do worse: they broadcast the government's falsehoods for it, they paste motives...The legislatures and courts are in the rulers' thrall. Three things follow :

- One has to persevere much, much longer with the matter than would be the case in other democracies;
- One must deafen oneself to calumny, and assiduously avoid getting side-tracked into debates with the side-kicks of the rulers;
- One must be prepared to do a variety of tasks—from summarising things for members of Parliament, to preparing writs for courts, to helping ensure that Congress candidates would be opposed by only a single opposition candidate...



All this involves great trouble. It drives one to exhaustion, often to despair. And one can persevere only if one is a citizen first, and not just a professional. That is, if one is imbued with the spirit of reform and sees work in the paper as but part of the general work being done in the country to improve the state of affairs.

21. That brings me to the vital point. Some join the contest, others are pushed into it and then get locked into it for a variety of reasons; one because he had been pursuing one target and did not anticipate that the latter could and would marshal the State to shield himself, another because his rival had got an unfair advantage; and third because he had been outraged by a particular step of the rulers; a fourth because he saw the inter-connectedness and traced it all to the suborning of institutions. A movement arises when the moves of the rulers bring about this conjunction of individuals and groups, each driven by a separate reason to the conclusion, 'enough is enough'.

22. But while in this case we came through, there can be no guarantee that those who set out to arrest wrong always will. And so in addition to internalising this sense of purpose, one must be a bit distant from that purpose too. By the middle of 1989 the contest had ceased to impose even a little strain on me. It may be that this was so because Rajiv's assault had been stemmed. It may be that the whole thing had become routine. But I also like to think that although each of us continued to work for the purpose, we also achieved a degree of detachment from it, we came to see that the outcome was not in our hands, that it depended on millions of others. And so we acquired, if I may be presumptuous, considerable equanimity in the midst of all the hustle and bustle. Service consummated in personal deepening.

But that is just to reach the last word: like millions before us, we too learnt how very wise is the counsel of the Gita.

March, 1990 ●

Individuals, Institutions, Processes—How One May Strengt en The Other In India Today by Arun Shoune A Penguin Publication Price Rs 175

V GANGADHAR

Out, damn Agenda

This page in The Times of India gives way for hard news

Call it Agenda, Comment, Op-Ed. The page facing the edit page in a newspaper, is often not restricted to hard news, but also views and interpretation. Calcutta's The Telegraph always had a strong and interesting op-ed page, but the best was in Bombay's Indian Post when it was being edited by Vinod Mehta.

The Times of India, always slow to change, finally introduced the 'Agenda' page, around two years back. 'Agenda' occupied half of the op-ed page and usually consisted of two long articles spread over six columns. The other two columns were used for letters, rural news, a bit of New Delhi gossip and occasional translations from the regional press.

But from 1 September, 1990, 'Agenda' was out. The reason offered is that, in view of the rush of events at home and abroad, it has become necessary to accommodate more hard news.

Frankly, 'Agenda' never clicked and very few readers will mourn its departure. Its major drawback was the deadly dullness of the articles. Of course, they were scholarly, informative and most of the times topical, but always unreadable. Written by experts and intellectuals, the comments were often cloaked in obfuscation and pomposity. As such, the edit page in most of the newspapers, abounds in dullness, moralisings and pseudo-intellectualism and when those spill over to 'Agenda' or 'Comment' the result is obvious. We need not mourn 'Agenda', it never had any life.

A couple of days before the announcement was made, the 'Agenda' column carried a fascinating piece by Satish K. Mehta, obviously a marketing hot-shot of the Times Group. Commenting on the special quality of his product, Mehta went into raptures: "The buyer usually has great expectations from the paper. A newspaper can be his archangel, professor, mentor, friend, informant or even his pet. Everyday, he does not merely read it, he fondles it, folds it, carries it and even talks to it."

Delightful, isn't it? Who knows, some of the readers could have 'talked' like this to the Times:

Out, damn Agenda, out I say
Who would have thought the page had so much dullness in it!

Richard Nixon like V.P. Singh had a Vinod Pande (left), whose name was Bob Haldeman. But Bob did not make astrological predictions about the durability of his government or silly comments about women

'Tricky Dick' Singh

V.P. Singh as 'Tricky Dick', Richard Nixon? At least M.J. Akbar says so. In his widely-read column, Byline, Akbar points out that Richard Nixon too had a Vinod Pande whose name was Bob Haldeman. Bob, of course, was slightly different. He did not make astrological predictions about the durability of his government or make silly comments about women.

Totally loyal to the 'boss', Haldeman along with his colleague Bob Ehlrichman, was known as the Praetoria Guard to the President. Chief of staff at the White House, he was often labelled by the press as Nixon's 'Nazi' hatchet man. Describing what he would do to a Nixon enemy, Haldeman once said that "he would leave the enemy twisting, slowly in the wind." V.P. Singh, points out Akbar, is doing exactly the same to the man who put him on the Prime Minister's gaddi, Devi Lal.

The Haldeman-Vinod Pande comparison is fascinating. Extreme personal loyalty to those in power can lead to frightening attitudes.

Akbar's comments open up endless possibilities. Does V.P. Singh have a Plumber's Unit as well? Nixon operated through one during his Watergate days. One of its members an ex-CIA hit-man was even prepared to assassinate 'enemies' which included columnist Jack Anderson.

It's a fascinating area for research. Political pundits have their jobs cut out. If Vinod Pande could be Bob Haldeman, who are the counterparts of Bob Ehlrichman, John Dean, Jeb Stuart Magruder, Chuck Colson and Gordon Liddy? Important members of Nixon's dirty tricks brigade, they all went to jail over Watergate while their boss slowly acquired the status of a senior statesman, while making millions from his books. And will Prem Shankar Jha make an effective Ron Ziegler, the Nixon press secretary, who was often caught lying while trying to protect his boss?

Interviewer-interviewee

Business executive, art collector, novelist, Gurcharan Das, is allowed to have his cake and eat it too. In its Independence Day special, Sunday Review, carried a piece where Das answers questions asked by himself! Naturally, he is against licences, permits and controls. Foreign investments must be encouraged to get the latest technology and know-how. We should not be scared of multinationals. Import duties should be lowered. Do away with the MRTP Act.

It is the typical business entrepreneur's lingo. Had the questions been raised by someone other than himself, Das could not have been so glib. Why do our factories produce so many sub-standard goods? How is it that many units fall sick and why do the owners of these units swallow even the provident fund amounts of the workers? Blaming the government is all right, but why is there so much dishonesty among our businessmen? Do we have to permit foreign investment just to obtain technology and know-how which are totally out of date? Okay, let us invite multinationals, but should we forget what happened to Chile and its president, Allende?

Das should now do a book on the ethics of our businessmen. And market it as fiction!

With a straight bat

The Indian cricket team's tour of England is over and along with most of the players, the cricket correspondents are back. They were a busy bunch. When not covering the matches, the scribes were busy interviewing and writing about some of the great English cricketers of the past.

Of course, not all of them made good copy. Lokendra Pratap Sahi of The Telegraph and Ayaz Memon of The Independent (Bombay) were easily the best. Their interviews with David Gower, Alvin Kallicharan and South African Eddie Barlow, brought out different facets of the game.

Had the questions been raised by someone other than himself, Gurcharan Das could not have been so glib

One feels particularly sorry for the dimunitive left-hander, Kallicharan, who was as good a batsman (even better playing spinners) as Gordon Greenidge, Viv Richards and Clive Lloyd. Yet, despite holding the West Indian team together during the Packer days, Kalli was shunted aside by the West Indies Board when Lloyd and Co. came back. An aggrieved Kallicharan decided to tour South Africa and was lost to Test cricket. If only he had continued to play for Windies, who knows, he might have tackled Australian leggie, Bob Hollan, and our own, Hirwani, much better than Richards and Co.

Sahi's write-up on Gower reveals the character of the man who had to put up with poor form, injury, desertion of girlfriend Vicki and shock treatment from the selectors. A well-read and intelligent player, Gower talks sense about his problems, captaincy and his own future in the game. That, happily, has been settled with his hundred against the Indians at the Oval and the Australians had better watch out!

David Gower: coping with poor form, injury and his girlfriend's desertion

Less cheesecake please

Nari Hira's Parade marches on, hitting a circulation of around 80,000 in just two years. The magazine has also started a mail order system, trying to build a network of subscribers.

Parade should not be labelled a poor, country cousin of the Reader's Digest. It has developed its own slot in the magazine world, carrying an interesting mix of articles on various issues. Parade has enough variety to please the discriminating reader.

Parade , of course is not perfect. When it has access to several international magazines, why does it ignore topical political prices, hard-hitting profiles, medical dramas and of course some light, humorous stuff? It can also do with less cheesecke. But make no mistake, Parade has arrived. ●

Mixed fortunes

Despite losing the Test series, the Indian cricket team's England tour was not a complete disaster

Was our cricket team's just-concluded tour of England a total disaster? While pundits may differ on the magnitude, all are agreed that from the Indian point of view, this visit is best forgotten.

A brief flurry in the initial stages—when we won both the one-dayers—was all that India had to show through the entire tour. A huge, though inconsequential 600-plus runs in the last Test only served to prove that the tracks in England could be as dead as the ones in India.

The British, of course, have gone overboard in praising the Indians. This, of course, is the routine whenever a visiting team does not perform as well as the home side. But more credence could be given to the letter Colin Cowdrey wrote to the Board of Control for Cricket in India (BCCI) president, Biswanath Dutt. The chairman of the International Cricket Council (renamed from the earlier International Cricket Conference)—the controlling authority for the game in the world—eulogised not only the performance of the team, but commended the behaviour of the players on and off the field as well.

In brass tacks, however, this tour was actually a sad medley. Poor team selection, in some respects, was aggravated by one of the weakest bowling line-ups India has ever had. To compound matters, impetuosity and lack of application, largely negated the exciting batting potential of the squad.

And yet, India had got off to a cracking start. The one-dayers were exciting—and extremely satisfying from the visitors' point of view. England batted first on both occasions and India managed to overhaul totals of 229 in the first instance and 282 in the second. All the batsmen were in form, Dilip Vengsarkar at the top and Sachin Tendulkar at the bottom, emphasising that there was no difference between the mature and the young in the Indian squad.

The limited-overs matches evoked great interest proving once more that they are here to stay.

But for the players, the transition is not always easy. Cricketing officials the world over could consider putting the lighter brand of the game after a Test series is over.

For the Indians, at least, it may have been a good idea. They went into the first Test at Lord's with more hope than preparation. Captain Mohammad Azharuddin carried his hangover into the vital toss. He won and, on a plumb, easy-paced surface, asked England to bat. He had done so in the one-dayers, and decided to do so again.

Bishen Singh Bedi, manager of the Indian team, told a friend that he had nothing to do with the toss, a remark that prompted columnist Sunil Gavaskar to demand his resignation. Bedi, of course, has in the past shot off several statements he had to either deny or twist when accosted later. On the New Zealnd tour, he had said the Indian team should be thrown into the Pacific Ocean. The bitterness in the statement was later twisted to just an "off-the-cuff remark made without malice".

Of course, Gavaskar's tirade also seemed out of tune — until one considered the running battle between these two former stars of Indian cricket. Each has taken turns in lambasting the other in a verbal duel that has ultimately led to the BCCI deciding to ask Bedi for an explanation. Stung by Gavaskar's demand for his resignation, Bedi had seized the opportunity afforded by Gavaskar's refusal of membership offered by the MCC. In his personal capacity, Bedi could have expressed any opinion. But he signed an open letter, which was disclosed to the press, as manager of the Indian cricket team.

The BCCI did not take kindly to this. The working committee empowered secretary Ranbir Singh to write to Bedi the moment he returned to India, asking him to explain why he had signed the letter as manager of the Indian team.

But all that came much after the hullabaloo over the Lord's Test was over. Azharuddin's mistake cost India dearly. England, aided by Graham Gooch's tenacious 300-plus, amassed 653 for four wickets. India managed to reply with 454. When England declared again at 272 for four in their second knock, they left India the task of scoring 472 in the fourth innings to win. The team just crumbled to a 247-run defeat, giving England just their second victory in eight years at Lord's.the only other coming against Sri Lanka.

Graham Gooch: runs and runs and runs

Kapil Dev: a timely ton

Moving on to Old Trafford in mid-August didn't help the Indians much. England batted first again this time accumulating 519 runs in the first innings. The Indians replied with a respectable 432, but England once again tried to force the pace, declaring at 320 for four wickets. Again, this meant scoring over 400 in the fourth innings. But India managed to salvage some pride by scoring 343 for six wickets.

The last knock also opened the floodgates of praise for the young Tendulkar, whom many were prone to place above Gavaskar in terms of potential. Sachin scored an unbeaten 119, with masterful strokes all around the wicket.

But all that was heady stuff, not meant to last. That Tendulkar will have to curb his impetuosity was amply demonstrated in the last Test at the Oval. As India piled up 606 for nine—the highest-ever against England—Tendulkar fell for just 21. It was an unfortunate stroke that ended his innings just when it was promising to turn out to be another dazzler.

But this last Test has done wonders for two veterans—Kapil Dev, knocking a century after almost two-and-a-half years and the other, Ravi Shastri, falling just 13 short of what would have been a deserving double century. Kapil, whose bowling has lost its edge, needed this knock to stay in contention for a berth in the Indian team for the winter schedule. Ravi Shastri, of course, has now strengthened his claim to captaincy.

That India had gone on the tour with a very innocuous bowling attack was admitted by all. While the British press preferred to call the bowling "friendly", Bedi was categorical in saying that it was incapable of bowling out England twice in a match. Captain Azhar held the same view.

BCCI president Biswanath Dutt felt, however, that India's performance was not too bad. Quoting Cowdrey's letter to him, he said that if the people watching the matches in England were all praise for the Indians, there was no reason for him to think otherwise.

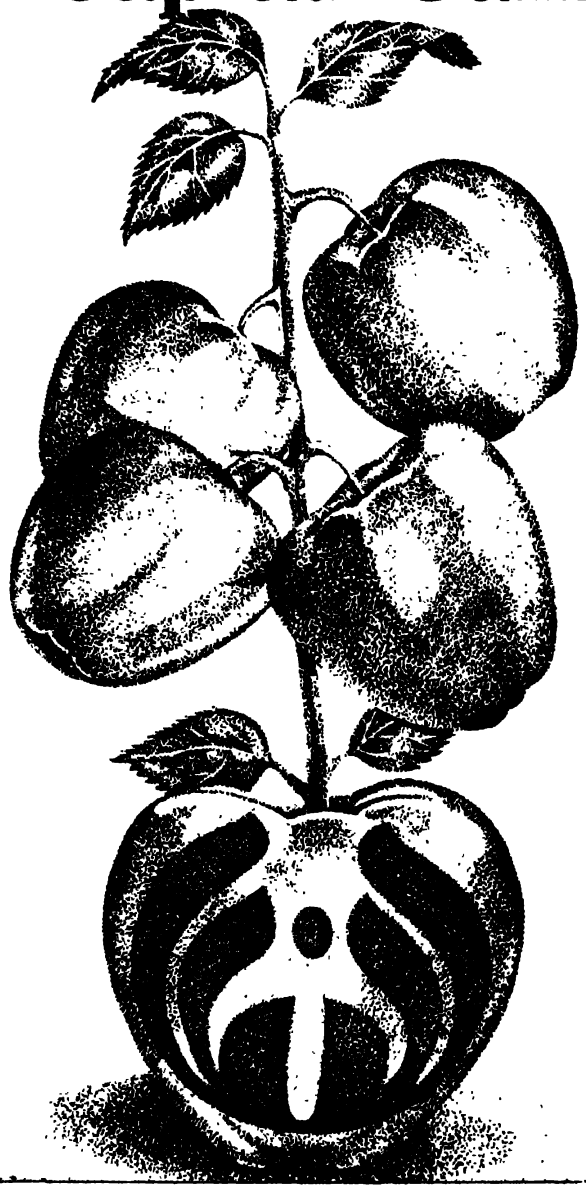
But Dutt did admit that the bowling was not up to the standard. "Yes, if we had bowled better, we may well have had a different result. Penetrative bowling was what we lacked. Our batsmen did well, but there was no follow-up. And, if we had batted first at Lord's, we may well have won the series."

But this optimism was lacking elsewhere. With Kapil Dev losing his sting, it was left to Manoj Prabhakar and Sanjeev Sharma to spearhead the attack. But as things turned out, it was Atul Wasson who caught the eye. But even his pace—the fastest in India at the moment—could not cover up his lack of direction. In the spin department, Maninder Singh was certainly missed. Hirwani still doesn't have the guile that could win matches on unfriendly pitches. Kumble is just starting out and has a long way to go. Only Ravi Shastri and Kapil Dev continued through the Test series to take wickets, albeit at a trickle, proving that experience alone could carry a bowler forward, even if marginally.

A lot of the problems India faced on the tour could have been avoided if more experienced players had been included. The selection of the squad for England has caused considerable resentment in certain circles, which is just one more reason why Messrs Raj Singh and company are likely to be axed when the general body of the BCCI meets in Calcutta in the third week of September.

But then, the selectors can merely lead the team to the edge of the field. Thereafter, it is the capability of the cricketers that matter. In the recent past, the BCCI had axed players, sometimes for reasons other than cricketing ones. The time has come for it to come down heavily on some out-of-form players. •

Arijit Sen



Shastri (left) with Azhar: a fruitful tour

Sachin Tendulkar: dazzling display

IDBI Capital Bonds
An attractive instrument for exemption from Capital Gains Tax.

- Available at par throughout the year.
- Exemption from Capital Gains tax under Section 54E of the Income Tax Act, 1961.
- Exemption from Wealth tax under Section 5(1) (xvie) of the Wealth Tax Act, 1957
- Income tax benefit under Section 80L.
- Interest at 9% p.a. payable half yearly.
- At the investor's option, interest for the full period of 3 years can be paid in advance on discounted basis.
- No deduction of tax at source.
- Outstation cheques accepted and cost of collection will be borne by IDBI.

For further details contact the nearest IDBI office or write to Manager

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK OF INDIA

IDBI TOWER, Cuffe Parade, Colaba, Bombay 400 005.

Sobhagya-8/IDBI/89

ODDS AND TRENDS

Small is beautiful

■ Calligraphy is the art of beautiful handwriting. Kushal Das of Calcutta, however, is a calligrapher with a difference—he inscribes words on tiny objects, such as a single grain of rice or mustard or a strand of hair! And what's more, he even paints pictures on these minuscule objects—a map of India on a grain of mustard or the figure of Charlie Chaplin on a grain of rice.

Das took to this unusual hobby about four years ago when he began to practise script calligraphy (the art of ornamental writing) all on his own with a little help from the various books (on the subject) available in the market. Soon, his initial interest developed into an obsession as he began to specialise in not merely script calligraphy but in microcalligraphy—the art of writing/painting minute figures on tiny objects. And four years of hard work have finally paid off, for not only has Das mastered all forms of script calligraphy, but he is now an expert in pictorial microcalligraphy. And what makes his feat even more astonishing is that he does it all without the help of magnifying glasses.

Das is now not only gearing up for a place in the Guinness Book Of World Records, he is also trying to organise an exhibition to display his works. But the problem with his tiny exhibits is that they are too small to be seen by the naked eye—unless, of course, seen from very close quarters—and if each specimen is to be magnified with the help of lenses, it makes the whole venture extremely expensive. But Das is hopeful that sooner or later his work will gain recognition.

SEPARATED AT BIRTH?

Chimanbhai Patel

Swraj Paul

Good Samaritan

■ With nearly a third of the world's leprosy patients living in India, the disease is a major health hazard in the country. Apart from control and eradication what is needed is increasing awareness of the problem.

Photo-journalist Pranab Mukerji has been working to this end for the last two decades. On 1 January, 1988, Mukerji began a series of mobile exhibitions of photographs taken by him to educate people about leprosy. Comprising pictures taken in remote villages, congested city slums and rehabilitation centres, etc., the exhibition was recently held in the Academy of Fine Arts in Calcutta, on 20 August. Inaugurated by the West Bengal minister of health, Prasanta Sur, the exhibition was jointly sponsored by the National Insurance Company Ltd and the Catholic Relief Services.

MILESTONES

DIED: Chitra S. Narayanaswamy, noted industrialist, in Madras on 25 August of heart failure.

DIED: Sumitra Devi, veteran Bengali and Hindi film actress, on 26 August at a private hospital in Bombay, after a protracted illness. She was 67.

DIED: Ujjwal Narain Sinha, former Chief Justice of the Patna High Court, in Patna on 29 August. He was 81.

DIED: B.B. Gurung, vice-president of the Gorkha National Liberation Front (GNLF) and vice-chairman of the Darjeeling Gorkha Hill Council, in Calcutta after a protracted illness. He was 66.

KILLED: Krishnan Lal Sood, BJP district (rural) secretary of Punjab, in Nakodar on 29 August, by his bodyguard—SPO Subhas Chandar.

WON: Manoj Kothari, the Arthur Walker Trophy and was crowned the World Amateur Billiards Champion on 25 August in Bangalore.

WON: Ramesh Krishnan, tennis player, the OTB international tennis tournament, beating Kelly Everden of New Zealand at New York on 26 August.

CELEBRATED: Mother Teresa, her 80th birthday in Calcutta on 27 August.

DRAWN: The third and final Test of the series between India and England at the Oval on 28 August.

SELECTED: Mark Tully, the BBC bureau chief in India, for the 11th Munshi Prem Chand National Award for creative writing and excellence in journalism by the Shimla-based All India Artists' Association on 25 August in Shimla.

RESIGNED: Vishwendra Singh, Janata Dal MP, from the Lok Sabha in New Delhi on 30 August to express his dissatisfaction with the government's decision to implement the recommendations of the Mandal Commission.

SUSPENDED: Irengbam Tompok Singh, from the membership of the Manipur Assembly on 29 August for four years for urinating on the chair of the Manipur Assembly Speaker.

POSTPONED: The telecom engineers' strike which was to begin on 28 August, following an assurance by the department of telecommunications of speedy implementation of the agreement reached between the two sides in May.

BEGINNING 9 SEPTEMBER 1990 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (21 March—20 April)

Success lies in store for you this week. Social activities, speculation and business deals are well indicated. Married people might have a few problems. Be cautious on the domestic front.

Good dates: 9, 12 and 15
Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: South

TAURUS (21 April—20 May)

A week of mixed fortunes lies ahead of you. Businessmen should be cautious with their deals. Your problems will tide over. Do not ignore your friends or the elders of your family.

Good dates: 10, 11 and 14
Lucky numbers: 5, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: West

GEMINI (21 May—20 June)

On the professional front, a fair measure of success lies in store for you. Businessmen can forge ahead with new deals and contracts. The domestic front does not look bright. Keep an eye on your health.

Good dates: 11, 12 and 15
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: East

CANCER (21 June—20 July)

This is not a bright week for you. Romance and matters relating to the heart are not on the cards. You will be able to recover your money from your debtors. Take care of your health.

Good dates: 9, 10 and 12
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 5
Favourable direction: North

LEO (21 July—20 August)

Financially, this is a bright week for you. You will be able to repay your debts. On the professional front, there may be a few setbacks. Your current assignment may fall through. But do not be disheartened.

Good dates: 12, 13 and 15
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: South-west

VIRGO (21 August—20 September)

The stars are favourable for lovers. Your partner will be extremely helpful. The time is ripe for marriage. You can go ahead with your expansion plans, but avoid investment and speculation.

Good dates: 10, 12 and 14
Lucky numbers: 5, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: West

LIBRA (21 September—20 October)

This is not a favourable week for you. There might be problems on the professional front. An elderly member of your family might cause concern. Your spouse will not be particularly understanding.

Good dates: 9, 11 and 13
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: North

SCORPIO (21 October—20 November)

A favourable week lies ahead of you. Financially, this is a rewarding phase. On the professional front you will face competition, but your confidence and luck will see you through.

Good dates: 11, 13 and 15
Lucky numbers: 6, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

SAGITTARIUS (21 November—20 December)

This is a good week for love and courtship. Problems will be resolved and you might get married. Children will be a source of joy. The domestic front will remain calm. However, be on your guard against deceit.

Good dates: 12, 13 and 14
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: North

CAPRICORN (21 December—20 January)

A favourable week for romance. But marriage is not in the offing. On the professional front, postpone your plans for the moment. Be cautious on the domestic front for there might be a few problems.

Good dates: 9, 11 and 12
Lucky numbers: 2, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: South-west

AQUARIUS (21 January—20 February)

This will be a week of changes. A sudden turn of events is likely to relieve you of a great deal of anxiety. Businessmen are likely to make steady progress. Friends and relatives will contribute to your happiness.

Good dates: 10, 11 and 12
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 6
Favourable direction: West

PISCES (21 February—20 March)

Keep an eye on your health. This is going to be a hectic week for you. The financial front looks bright. Romance is on the cards. Friends and relatives will be helpful. The domestic front will remain calm.

Good dates: 11, 12 and 13
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: East

STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—CAPRICORN

The Capricorn man will be appreciative of the Scorpio woman's efforts in making life enjoyable and comfortable for him. The couple will be well off financially. This will make the union happy and stable.

Who needs the press?

The Raja hasn't just turned casteist. He has also turned virulently anti-press.

At a recent Cabinet meeting, Vinod Pande pointed out that, perhaps, the implementation of the Mandal Commission report hadn't worked out as well as expected. Instead, it had succeeded in alienating the media from the Dal government, with all the major publications in the country taking an anti-reservation stand.

Sharad Yadav: it's only the Express

Sharad Yadav objected to that. No, he clarified, it was only the Indian Express which was against the Mandal report. And that, only because it wanted to wreck the government.

Pande disagreed. The Express was not alone, he insisted, all the magazines and newspapers were trotting out the same line.

Before the argument could get any further, the Raja intervened. Only to snub his cabinet secretary.

"What difference does it make if newspapers oppose the government's reservation policy?" he asked Pande petulantly. "Everyone knows that they are run by the capitalist lobby, which has very little credibility with the people."

Pande saw the point, and kept very quiet for the rest of the meeting.

And no, he didn't give any interview to The Hindustan Times afterwards, either.

HEARD ON DELHI'S STREETS

Inky, pinky, ponky.
V.P. Singh is a donkey.

AN ANTI-RESERVATION SLOGAN

Doctor in trouble

There seem to be troubled times ahead for video doctor J.K. Jain.

First, Atal Behari Vajpayee raised the matter of Jain's fast at the BJP parliamentary party meeting. How had Jain unilaterally decided on such an action, Vajpayee wanted to know. And if he hadn't, who had given him the necessary permission.

Madan Lal Khurana defended Jain, or at least, attempted to. And only succeeded in getting into a sharp exchange of words with Atal Behari.

Barely had the good doctor recovered from this trauma that trouble erupted in Madhya Pradesh. The Patwa government had allotted Jain some land in an area reserved for journalists. And the media was up in arms at the thought of the doctor availing of the press quota when he didn't belong to the profession.

Atal Behari Vajpayee: did he ask permission?

The MP government's defence was that Jain had been producing video films for various politicians and therefore, he did belong to the electronic media.

But nobody's buying that. And if the adverse publicity gains strength, Jain will find it difficult to keep up the brave facade he's been presenting to the world this past fortnight.

For old times sake

The youthful Syed Ashraf, who'd enjoyed a remarkably close relationship with V.P. Singh before they fell out rather messily, now finds himself on the wrong side of the Dal regime.

So much so, that the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) recently raided his houses in Delhi and Sira (about 100 kms from Bangalore). Says Ashraf: "In the beginning I did not even know about the raids. Later I found out that they had searched my houses while investigating a forgery."

Apparently, the forged letter that had led to Devi Lal's ouster from the Cabinet had also led the CBI to Ashraf's door.

The former Raja aide pleads innocent, disclosing: "When I asked the DIG of CBI how I was connected with the forged letter, he had no answer."

But these protestations don't seem to be having much effect on his former mentor. For Ashraf continues to be shadowed wherever he goes and receives threatening calls by the dozen. "They are after my blood," he says. "I have information that the government's goondas are planning to eliminate me physically."

But surely the Raja wouldn't do this to his former blue-eyed boy.

If only for old times sake.

MANDAL-WATCH

Chief ministers and the Raja's reservation policy

■ Biju Patnaik: The Grand Old Man of Orissa has announced that he will not implement Mandal's recommendations in his state. No, not even if party unity depends on it.

■ Chimanbhai Patel: The Gujarat chief minister believes that the KHAM (Kshatriya, Harijan, Adivasi, Muslim) coalition has broken down. And that even if the Raja comes up with a new caste-combine, it will not work.

■ Jyoti Basu: The Marxist leader could have forgiven V.P. Singh anything but this. Claiming that the Raja was setting up caste barriers instead of breaking them, the West Bengal CM has distanced himself from the Dal.

■ Mulayam Singh Yadav: He owes his rise to prominence to backward caste support. Not surprisingly then, the strongman of Uttar Pradesh is squarely behind the Prime Minister on this one.

■ Laloo Prasad Yadav: The Bihar chief minister has been lobbying for the implementation of the report even when he was a lowly member of the Lok Dal. Is pleased with the Raja's decision, because his community—the Yadavs—stands to benefit most.

Ek ya do, bas

After the Emergency experience, the Congress regime was always a little ambivalent on the issue of family planning. But, obviously, the Janata Dal does not share its apprehensions.

Recently, during Question Hour in Parliament, health and family welfare minister Rashid Masood was holding forth at length on the Dal's ambitious plans to solve the nation's population problem. The

Laloo Yadav: nine is the upper limit members heard him out patiently enough, but his grandiose schemes proved too much for some BJP backbenchers.

Provoked into interjecting, they asked Masood how he could make such tall claims when a chief minister of his party, Laloo Prasad Yadav of Bihar, had as many as nine children.

Even before Masood could recover his wits and retort in an intelligible manner, textiles minister Sharad Yadav was on his feet. "The chief minister has been instructed not to expand his family any further," he announced grandly.

When it comes to family planning, at least, the Dal pulls no punches.

The sins of their fathers..

Everybody seems to be having reservations about reservations.

HEARD IN CENTRAL HALL

Reservations should come into play when the prime ministership is decided as well. That way, even Sharad Yadav and Ram Vilas Paswan will be in with a chance.

A DISGRUNTLED JANATA DAL MP

Yes, even the progeny of the esteemed ministers of and secretaries to the Government of India.

If sources in the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) are to be believed, the daughter of a senior Cabinet minister (belonging to the erstwhile Jan Morcha group) and the son of a secretary in the finance ministry have masterminded the anti-reservation stir which paralysed Delhi for three days.

Lesser functionaries of the student movement include the children of at least six Union ministers and more than a dozen bureaucrats of secretary-level rank.

Not only do these teenagers make no secret of their support for the agitation, they are in the forefront of the groups putting up road blockades and generally making a nuisance of themselves on New Delhi's streets.

But despite the manifest annoyance of the PMO, there doesn't seem to be any way of disciplining them.

Or if there is, it hasn't occured to Vinod Pande yet.

CHECK-LIST

More New Delhi feuds

■ Romesh Bhandari vs Natwar Singh: Are related to each other by marriage and have been great enemies since their Foreign Service days. Natwar joined politics first and did better than Bhandari. But now, the Foreign Service view that he is a lightweight seems to have spread to the Congress. Bhandari, on the other hand, is in the ascendant.

■ R.K. Dhawan vs Shiv Shankar: Dhawan holds Shankar responsible for his persecution at the hands of Justice Thakkar. Since his return to favour, he has spent his time thinking of new ways to torture the hapless Shankar. He is currently engaged in getting his protégés in the Rajya Sabha to flout Shankar's authority as leader of the House.

■ Madhavrao Scindia vs Sardar Angre: According to Scindia, Angre's influence over his mother has created schisms within his family. Angre says that Scindia is a coward who failed to stand by his mother. Each accuses the other of persecution: Scindia says the BJP government in MP is out to get him; Angre says the Congress regime victimised him.

■ Sanjay Singh vs Arun Nehru: Singh saw himself as one of Sanjay Gandhi's men and resented Nehru's rise to prominence during the post-Sanjay era. During the Rajiv period, he did his best to spread stories that Nehru was conspiring against his cousin. Now, Nehru is resolutely opposing his entry into the Cabinet.

■ Devi Lal vs Inder Gujral: Nobody knows what the Tau has against the unfortunate Gujral, but he has hated him from before the election. When they were colleagues, the Tau would sneer at him at every Cabinet meeting and when Gujral resigned over Chautala's return, Devi Lal phoned to threaten to beat him up.

The room next door

Now that the Tau is out of government, his ground floor office in Parliament House is up for grabs. And there are many contenders for the room, situated as it is next to the Prime Minister's office and in the VIP special security zone.

Home minister Mufti Mohammad Sayeed, who works out of the next room, wants to expand his office by adding Devi Lal's den to it. But his minister of state will have none of that. Subodh Kant Sahai, who does not have an office of his own and meets visitors in the Mufti's room, insists that he will be the one moving in.

Mufti Mohammad Sayeed: will he get the Tau's room?

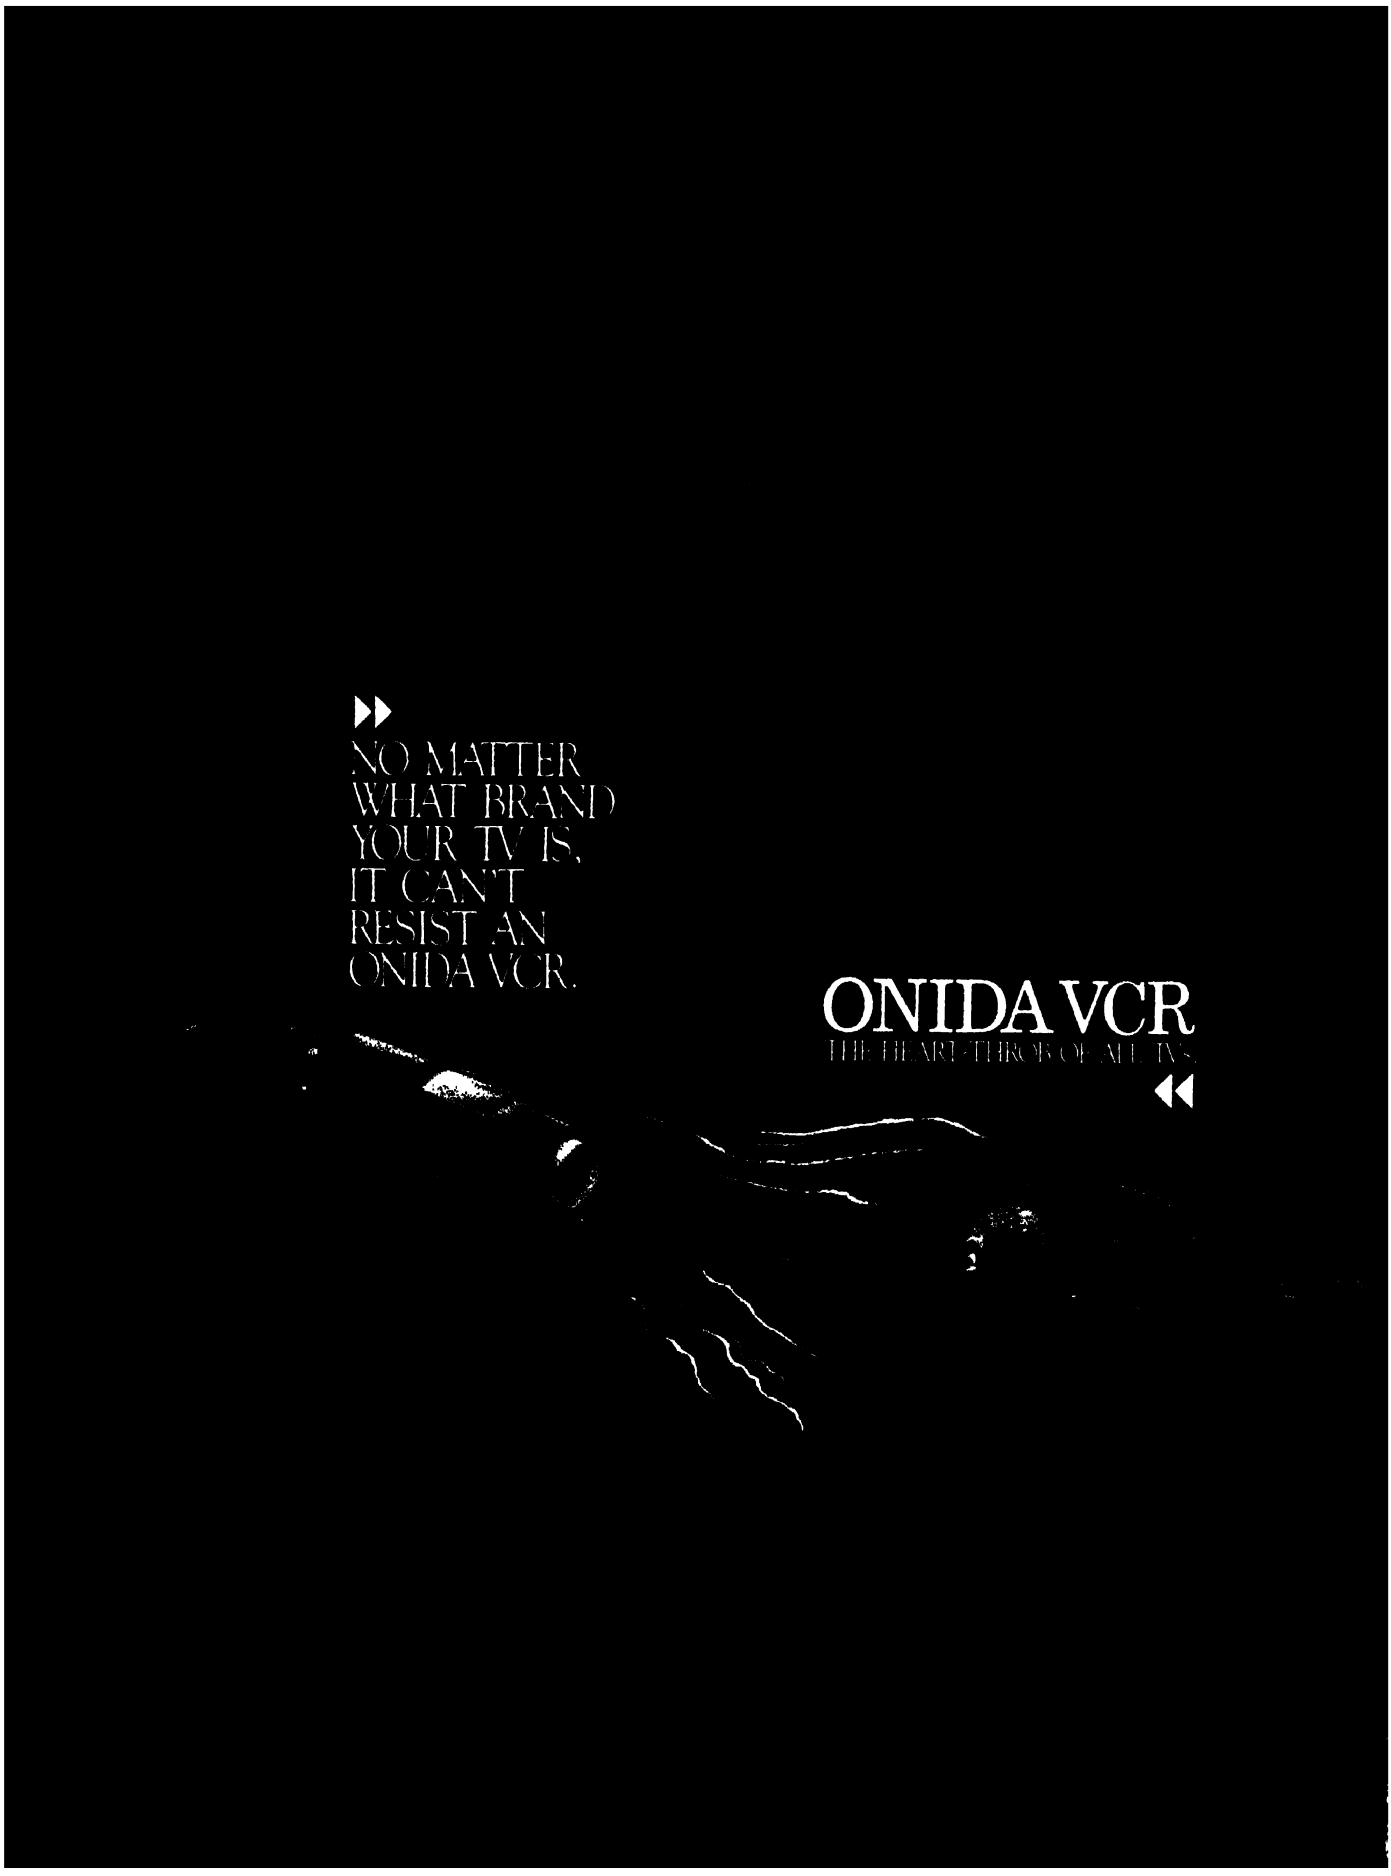
Only to come up against textiles minister Sharad Yadav and labour minister Ram Vilas Paswan. Both of them declare that they are specially close to V.P. Singh, and that they should, by rights, be allotted the room next door.

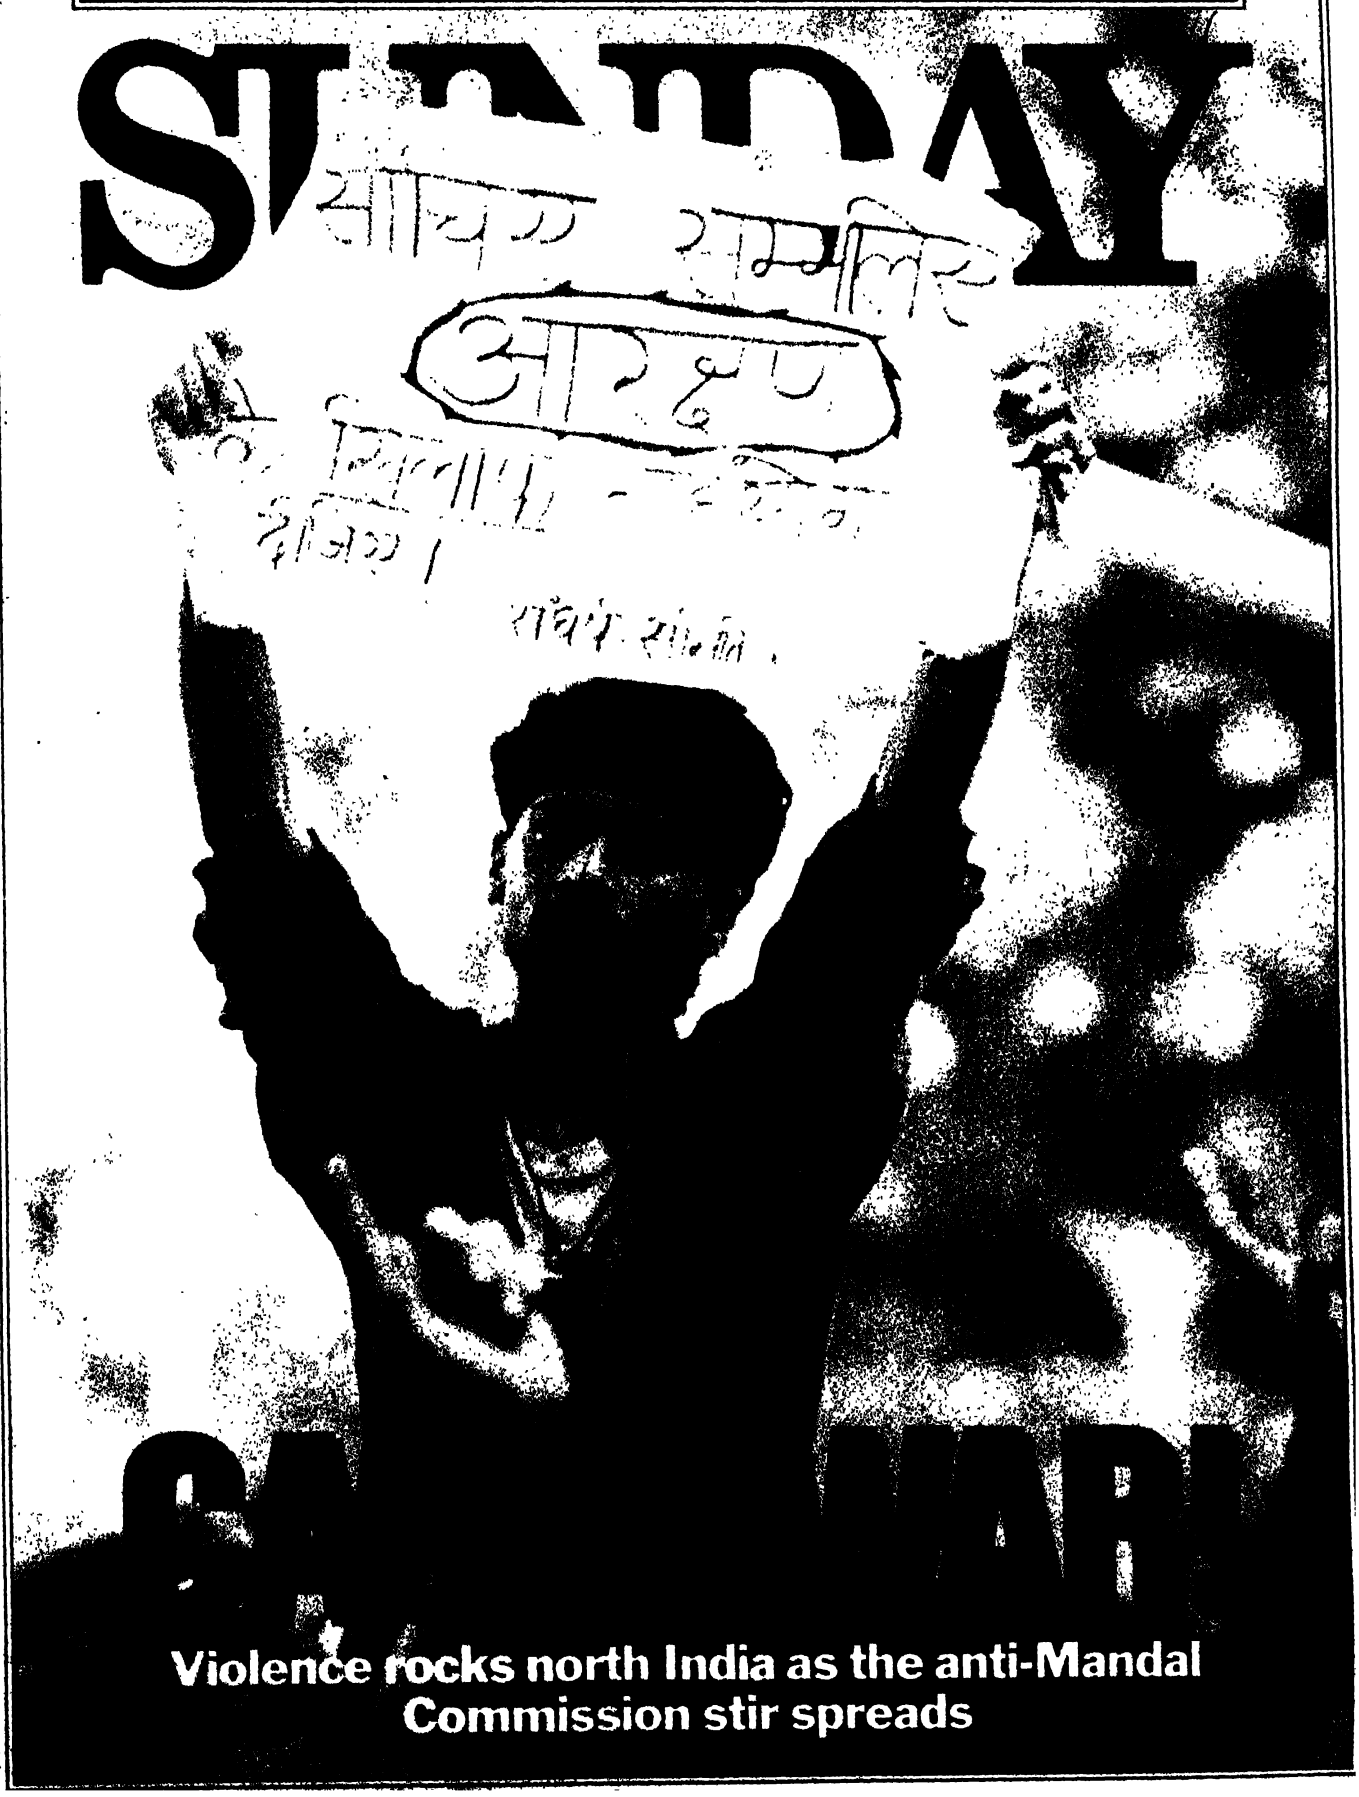
The Raja has yet to give his verdict on this one.



For the gracious people

Quality that's forever

A BRAND OWNED
BY I.T.C. LTD.
MADE IN INDIA



CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

NO MATTER
WHAT BRAND YOUR TV IS,
IT CAN'T RESIST AN ONIDA VCR.
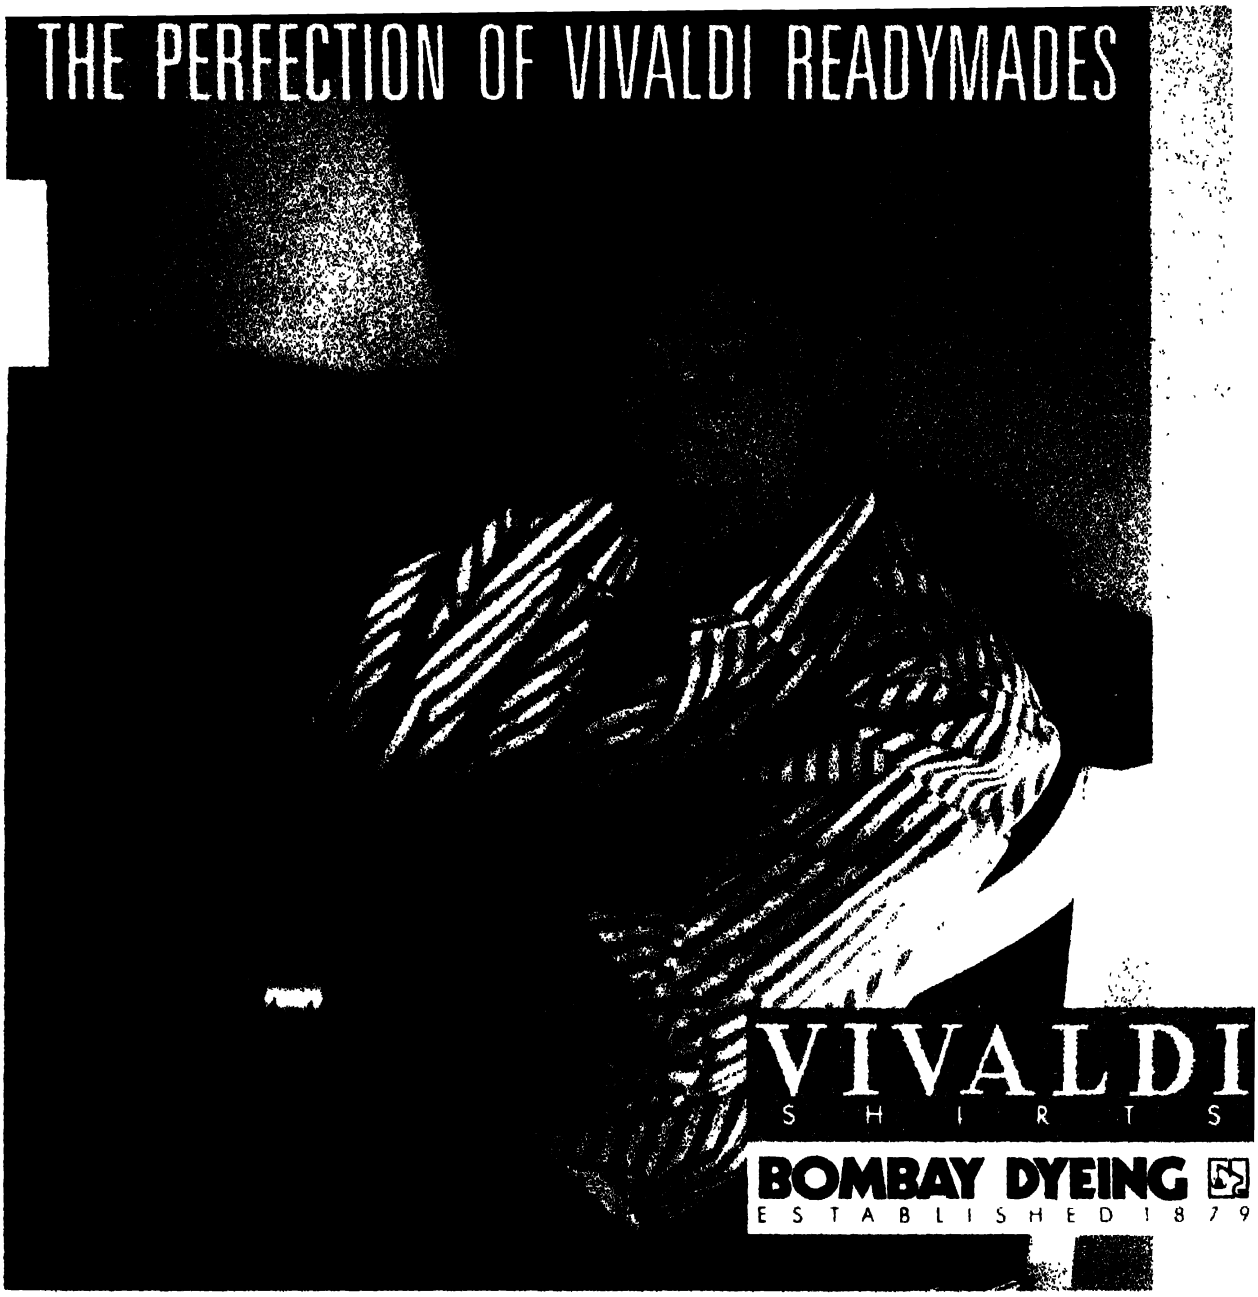
ONIDA VCR
THE HEART-THROB OF ALL TVs

16—22 SEPTEMBER 1990 □ AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION □ RS 7.00



BASU'S BENGAL: CHAOS AND COLLAPSE

SUNDAY

Violence rocks north India as the anti-Mandal Commission stir spreads

THE PERFECTION OF VIVALDI READYMADES

When the people who excel in shirting fabrics decide to excel in tailoring them — the result is readymade perfection. Vivaldi Shirts from Bombay Dyeing. From the selection of fine cotton and polyester cotton fabrics, right down to the last button, you won't find a thing out of place in a Vivaldi Shirt. What you will find, shirt after shirt after shirt, is a perfect fit. At Bombay Dyeing, the attention to quality is absolute. Because we know that the professional in you expects it.

--------VIVALDI. THE THREAD OF QUALITY RUNS RIGHT THROUGH--------

CONTENTS

SUNDAY

VOLUME 17 ISSUE 37 RS 7.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION
16—22 SEPTEMBER 1990

27
COVER STORY
Caste war!
Violence rocks north India as the anti-Mandal Commission stir spreads

11
SPECIAL REPORT
Basu's Bengal
After thirteen years in office, the legend is crumbling—and so is Bengal.

22
SCIENCE
Enter, the Hyperplane
Indian scientists have designed an aerospacecraft that will revolutionise space travel.

48
BUSINESS
"India needs the US"
A frank interview with Abid Hussain, India's ambassador to the US.

67
ENVIRONMENT
Campus greens
In Madras Christian College students fight for plants, not jobs.

72
BOOK EXTRACT
Girls on film
Elisabeth Bumiller on Bombay's actresses.

82
CURTAIN RAISER
Go for gold
The Indian squad gears up for the Beijing Asian Games.

LETTERS 4
GOSSIP SWEET AND SOUR 7
COUNTERVIEW 8
SIGHT AND SOUND 10
BODYLINE 18
SOUTH BLOCK 19
PROFILE 38
Apply, apply, no reply
MANI-TALK 40
SPOTLIGHT 46
BUSINESS DIARY 51
NEWS 54
MEDIA MUSINGS 62
DE JURE 64
TELEVISION 81
Buddhism is best
SPORTS 84
It's not cricket
CAPITAL MATTERS 85
THIS INDIA 86
SUNDAYWEEK 87
RANDOM NOTES 89
DELHI DIARY 90

Cover transparency: Rajesh Kumar

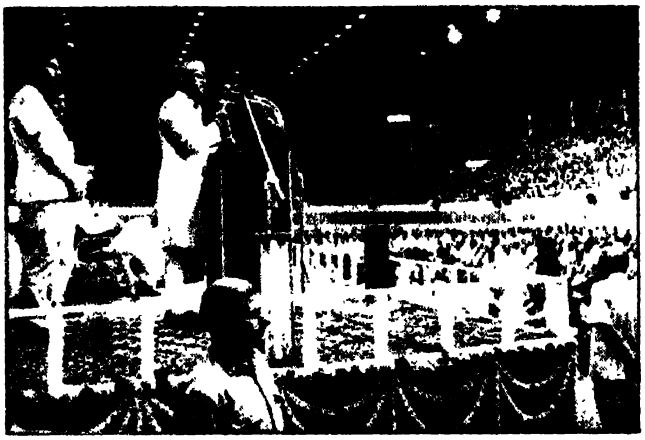
Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Brij Kumar Basu and edited by Vir Sanghvi from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001 Air surcharge for Srinagar ex Delhi and Tripura 20 paise, North eastern states. 30 paise

Bound to collapse?

A (Mid-term poll?, 26 August—1 September) mid-term election will certainly be suicidal for the National Front government. It is high time V.P. Singh did something to improve his tarnished image. Instead of embarking on grandiose projects like the reservation of backward classes, conservation of petrol by idiotic policies, the Prime Minister should do something constructive. He should try to contain the high rate of inflation and solve the problem of unemployment

The Prime Minister should be wary of his main opponents —not Rajiv Gandhi or Devi Lal or Advani— Chandra Shekhar, who is highly ambitious, cunning and ruthless. He has masterminded most of the moves against V.P. Singh and if he is not checked, the Front government is bound to collapse.

Dr U.S. Iyer, Bangalore (Karnataka)



■ The cover story was bold, timely and informative. The people are really disillusioned with the way the National Front government is functioning. The recent price rise, the implementation of the Mandal Commission report, all account for the failure of the government in keeping to its election promises. The Prime Minister's Independence Day speech was quite impressive and one hopes that he will shake off his lethargy and get down to business rightaway.

B.N.Bose, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ The cover story raises a very important question, which is vital for both the nation and the National Front government. If one goes by the performance of the government, then the Front might be on a sticky wicket, if a mid-term poll is called. The recent price hike, the agitations against the implementations of the Mandal Commission report and the failure of the government in resolving the Punjab and Kashmir problems, are clear indications of the Front's dismal track record.

V.P. Singh should realise that he is left with no other alternative other than opting for a mid-term poll. For, L.K. Advani of the BJP has already made his intentions clear. Advani feels that it is the opportune moment to distance his party from the National Front government. Therefore, in these circumstances, it would be absolutely right for the Prime Minister to seek a fresh mandate from the people.

Kallicharan Banerjee, Calcutta (West Bengal)

V.P. Singh at a rally: time to wake up

Rare breed

The profile of Arif Mohammad Khan (The loyal soldier, 12—18 August) was a remarkable piece. He belongs to the rare breed of politicians who stand by certain principles and also truly believe in value—based politics. Arif was instrumental, along with his mentor Arun Nehru, in helping V.P. Singh to take a tough stand regarding the Chautala incident and also urged him to sack Devi Lal from the Cabinet.

Arif will be remembered by one and all for his secular and principled stand in life and politics. He is one of the few who made a genuine effort to practise what he preached.

Harekrushna Mahanta, New Delhi

Arif Mohammad Khan: a value-based stand

Jai kisan!

The article (Rallying around Lal, 19—25 August) is timely. It is unfortunate that someone, who has worked more than any of the contemporary leaders for the uplift of the rural people and the downtrodden has fallen prey to the conspiracy of vested interests.

It is not Devi Lal who is trying to create the so-called rift between rural and urban India, but some power-hungry capitalists who have all along exploited the rural poor since Independence and this is the latest example of their evil designs. If India wants to progress in every field, then such imperialist forces should be defeated and destroyed at all costs.

Devi Lal: the farmers' man

Bijendra Singh, New Delhi

The lost emperor

The interview of Rajiv Gandhi (An Indian perestroika, 19—25 August) was shocking. According to him, if the present government had not advocated a policy of drift in Kashmir, we would not have faced the problem that presents itself today. This leads one to believe that Rajiv was responsible for the present state of affairs, though he is accusing the present government. Also, that Gandhi has not learnt any lessons and he still has that same arrogance and imperiousness that characterised him earlier. One wonders how such a person managed to rule the nation. And still aspires to make a comeback.

S. Chhina, NOIDA (Delhi)

Truth hurts

Chandra Shekhar was excellent in his interview ("Devi Lal would make a better Prime Minister", 26 August—1 September). The astute politician that he is, Chandra Shekhar will certainly make a better Prime Minister than both V.P. Singh and Devi Lal. He will definitely get the cooperation of the majority of his partymen if Shekhar:coming clean?

he really aspires for the top post. And one also hopes that support from the BJP and the leftists will be spontaneous.

K.V. Rajagopalan, Madras (Tamil Nadu)

■ Chandra Shekhar's interview was not only interesting but also meaningful. He made a clean breast of everything. Unlike V.P. Singh, who is an artful dodger, Shekhar is not the man to mince words. In fact, this put him in a lot of problems and has led to a considerable tarnishing of his image. Owing to his outspokenness, he has made more enemies than friends. For truth always hurts. He is right to say that overambitiousness at the cost of the country's interest is not good.

R.K. Gulati, Siliguri (West Bengal)

A320: bad grades

Enough is enough

Your report on (Time to fly, 15–21 July) on the Airbus A320 was very disturbing. I am sure that the various bodies involved have vested interests, and are deliberately 'leading' or 'misleading' the court of enquiry with technical jargon into semantic mazes, so that no blame comes to either the organisations themselves or their equipment. In this process, the nation is suffering. With the Airbus A320s grounded, there is great uncertainty as to whether the purchase of additional aircraft will be shelved or not, and what's to be done with the aircraft we already have.

What puzzles me is that in the interest of 'economy', our government, in all its wisdom, disbanded the National Transportation Safety Board, which had earlier done a commendable job in various enquiries of air/train crashes etc., and was perhaps the only body in the country capable of taking a fair view, without being influenced by considerations which colour the perceptions of the DGCA, Airbus Industrie, National Airport Authority, pilots associations and other vested interests.

Ashok Bhargava, New Delhi

Rule of the average

The implementation of the Mandal Commission report (Promoting mediocrity, 19—25 August) is certainly a very serious matter for students and workers in various establishments. It not only amounts to promoting mediocrity but sanctions criminal discrimination against 'upper castes'.

The Prime Minister must have won the hearts of the backward classes, but he has certainly alienated a major section of society. The backward classes should be provided with better educational facilities, so that they can compete with the others.

Prabhakar S. Harsole, Indore (Madhya Pradesh)

■ The protests and agitations in various parts of the country against the Mandal Commission recommendations are very much reminiscent of the anti-apartheid demonstrations in South Africa.

If discrimination in South Africa is based on colour and race, in India it is based on caste and creed. There is certainly no excuse for saying that our Constitution has made provisions for discrimination, because even the South African Constitution has made provisions for apartheid and that country's Supreme Court has upheld its validity. Therefore, whatever the means being adopted by the anti-reservationists, they certainly deserve our sympathy.

K. Ramachandra Rao, Mysore (Karnataka)

Paswan's Box

The interview of Ram Vilas Paswan ("We will not yield to pressure", 26 August—1 September) reveals the true character of Paswan. He is a senseless

Paswan: too much too soon hypocrite who is bent on pitting one section of society against the other. According to him, 74 per cent of the country's population constitute these "special Hindus". Then what about the 'normal' or the 'ordinary' Hindus and the religious minorities? One hopes that these people are not as mentally backward as the powers that be make them out to be. Therefore, why this discrimination?

Samir Banerjee, New Delhi

Indian reprints of limited edition foreign / Indian titles, now available at unbelievably low cost. Check out the titles under the Lowcost Book Scheme.

DICTIONARIES	PRICE
Business Dictionary	40.00
Dictionary of Computing	40.00
Dictionary of Criminology	40.00
Dictionary of Ecology and the Environment	40.00
Dictionary of Cost and Politics	40.00
Dictionary of Information Technology	40.00
Dictionary of Marketing	40.00
Dictionary of Personnel Management	40.00
Dictionary of Printing and Publishing	40.00
Elementary Scientific and Technical Dictionary	45.00
Everyman's English Pronouncing Dictionary	60.00
Illustrated Computer Dictionary	40.00
Illustrated Electronics Dictionary	40.00
Law Dictionary	40.00
Medical Dictionary	40.00
MANAGEMENT
Effective Interviewing	[illegible]
How to be an Even Better Manager	40.00
How to Give Quality Service to Your Customers	[illegible]
How to Plan Exhibitions and Conferences from A to Z	[illegible]
How to Talk so People Listen	[illegible]
Never Take No For An Answer — A guide to Successful Negotiation	25.00
Practical Problem Solving for Managers	40.00
Productivity Plus + — How today's best run Companies are gaining the competitive edge	40.00
Selling to Win — Tested Techniques for Closing Sales	40.00
Superordinate Through Self-Talk	45.00
The Ethics of Management	45.00
The 44 Most Common Management Mistakes and How to Avoid Them.	25.00
The Wall Street Journal on Management	40.00
The Wall Street Journal on Marketing	40.00
Tomorrow — Global Executive	40.00
SELF-IMPROVEMENT
Arabic for Beginners	40.00
How to Boost Your Brain Power	45.00
Improve Your English	[illegible]
Improve Your Wordpower	25.00
Very simple Grammar of English	25.00
Yoga Postures for Higher Awareness	[illegible]
"PROVEN SUCCESS METHODS" SERIES
Here's Help! To Get Rid of Your Problem	45.00
How to Get Whatever You Want	45.00
How You Can Get Richer — Quicker!	45.00
Thoughts to Build On	45.00
SCIENCE/COMPUTERS
Basic Computer Programming	25.00
The Usborne Book of Science	150.00
The Usborne Science Encyclopedia	175.00
GENERAL
Adventures of Sherlock Holmes	25.00
Astrological Predictions of the Major Countries of the World The Next Twenty Years, 1990-2010	45.00

To Buy Books through the L.B.S.: Step 1: First tick the books you want to purchase from the given list. Step 2: Fill your name and address in the coupon. Step 3: Tear out this ad and mail it to UBS at the address given below along with your Money Order/DD/Cheque/VPP (post free). That's it, we will then send the books to your address free of delivery charges.

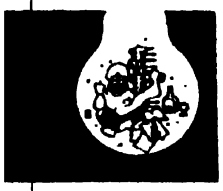
Yes, please send me the books ticked in the list above. I enclosed please find my Money Order/DD/Cheque/VPP (post free).

Name: _____

Address: _____

UBS Publisher's Distributors Ltd.
5, Ansari Road, New Delhi-110 002
Branches: Bombay, Bangalore, Madras, Calcutta, Patna & Kanpur

UBS



India's last word on book distribution worldwide.

Available at all leading book stores

Pen a Tra : ud 2 8

KHUSHWANT SINGH

Navratan Abdur Rahim

Facing Nizamuddin along the Delhi-Mathura road, there is a large mausoleum of red sandstone with a massive dome which has been denuded of all its tiles. The archaeological department has been able to save it from total destruction but with its limited funds not been able to restore to its original glory. When it was first built, in the reign of Emperor Akbar, it rivalled in grandeur the neighbouring Humayun's tomb. It is the resting place of Abdur Rahim Khan-e-Khana (Lord of Lords) one of the navratans (nine gems) of Akabar's court, amongst the most powerful pillars of state of his time and renowned poet in Turki, Arabic, Persian and Hindi. He was also fond of classical Indian music. Historians have not given him the importance he deserved, being more taken up by wits like Birbal, sycophants like Abul Fazal and administrators like Raja Todar Mal. Some amends have been made by the publication a few days ago of a biography Khusrau Kitab Ghar by Sheikh Saleem Ahmed of the bureau for the promotion of Urdu. Saleem Ahmed has written on Amir Khusrau and the Sufis and is also a writer of short stories.

Abdur Rahim, born in Lahore in December 1556, was the son of Bairam Khan, a Shia Turk who helped Humayun to recover his throne. He was also the victor of the Second Battle of Panipat and tried to persuade young Akbar, then only eleven years old, to hack off the head of the vanquished Hemu. Bairam Khan ran the state till Akbar was old enough to take over. With some intrigue Akbar was able to get rid of Bairam Khan and was relieved to hear that he had been murdered on his way to pilgrimage to Makka. Abdur Rahim took his father's place and led Mughal armies to victory in Gujarat, Golconda, Mewar and was made Khan-e-Khana and then Prime Minister. Most of his service years were spent in the Deccan. He was involved in the War of Succession but was rehabilitated by Jehangir. He was taken ill at Lahore and brought to Delhi for treatment where he died at the age of 81. All his four sons had died in his lifetime.

Abdur Rahim being a Turk certainly knew his mother tongue as well as Persian and Arabic. He was said to have had an aptitude for languages and spoke many Indian dialects. His literary achievements remain somewhat of an enigma. There is a corpus of poems in Persian and Hindi ascribed to him on the assumption that he used the poetic pseudonym Raheem and its variation Raheeman in many couplets. His Hindi dohas were on people's tongues as much as those of Bhakta Kabir. Some scholars are of the opinion that they are from the pen of Khan-e-Khana. Others believe the Raheem of the Hindi dohas was some other person. I can add to their confusion by drawing attention to one quoted by Saleem Ahmed which is almost identical with a couplet ascribed to the ninth Sikh Guru, Tegh Bahadur, which was incorporated in the Granth Sahib (compiled in 1604 A.D.) by his son Guru Gobind Singh sometime between 1700-1708 A.D.

Dukh mein simran sab karey, Sukh mein karey na koi
Jo Sukh mein simran karey, dukh kaahey ko hoi?

In times of troubles everyone prays, no one prays when he is happy

He who prays when he is happy, why should sorrows afflict him?

Did Guru Tegh Bahadur take these lines from a Raheem who lived before him? Or Raheem, who came later, take them from the Guru?

Perhaps I am overstepping my bounds.

Sheikh Saleem Ahmed

Khusrau Kitab Ghar

Abdur Rahim was a renowned poet in Turki, Arabic, Persian and Hindi. Though historians have not given him his due, some amends have been made by the publication of his biography Khusrau Kitab Ghar

Jaisee kisee ke buddh hai, taisee kahey banaee
Tako bura na maneeai, lein kahaan ko jaae?

Let a man measure his speech by his knowledge; Take not ill the speech of one who oversteps his bounds. Where can he go to find what he does not know?

Film-struck Madras

In Madras it is usual for bus passengers to refer to bus stops by names of cinema halls closest to them. Amby Kaushik of Delhi was not aware of this practice. He took his seat behind two ladies. When the conductor approached them, one replied, "Shanti". He clipped a ticket for her. "Devi", replied the second and got her ticket. When the conductor came to Kaushik, he said "Amby"

(Contributed by Shashank Shekhar, Meerut) •

VINOD MEHTA

The Mandal bungle

But V.P. Singh can't get out of it now

During a brief visit to Delhi I got within hailing distance of Vishwanath Pratap Singh twice in one day. Since then I have been observing him rather closely on television. He looks a sad, harassed man. Dark rings have emerged under the eyes, the smile is forced, even that magnificent razor-sharp moustache shows signs of wear and tear. Not a bit like our Rajiv who never let Bofors or Zail Singh or a thump on the head with a rifle cloud his beaming face. A Janata Dal minister close to the Raja confessed that what had hurt V.P. Singh most was not the riots over reservations but the viciousness of the personal attacks against him by those he considered friends and allies.

The minister, not a rabid Mandalite, then discussed the sociological origins of the attacks and sagely concluded that the class composition of the ruling elite and the English press made antagonism inevitable. What we were watching, he said, was an aristocracy on the run, an aristocracy incapable of recognising anything but its own privileges and now alarmed at the prospect of losing them. Just before I left, the minister admonished, "You people are angry because you feel betrayed by a man you thought was one of your own. If Mulayam Singh Yadav had been Prime Minister and announced that he was going to implement the Mandal Commission Report, the reaction in the press would have been qualitatively different." By then I had received enough lecturing for one day and did not tarry to ask him what he meant by qualitatively different.

George Orwell once wrote that the vocabulary of politics is as important as the politics itself. If language is corrupted, the ideology that language purports to debate cannot remain unpolluted. I may be wrong, but I don't think in the last ten years a Prime Minister has been as mercilessly mauled as V.P. Singh has been over Mandal. I make no value judgement, but simply report the facts as I see them. From this assault it would be reasonable to conclude that the new reservation policy announced by the government has divided the Indian polity as never before.

Mr V.P. Singh's perception that he has been stabbed by India International Centre intellectuals is unexceptionable. He has always been sensitive—too sensitive in my view—to the opinions and prejudices of this group. (I am not being disparaging about these gentlemen and a few ladies; some of my best friends are India International Centre eggheads.) Privately, the Prime Minister has been telling friends that the vehemence of the abuse heaped on him, by the Indian Express in particular, has shocked him. In the past, when V.P. Singh spoke about the unholy nexus between big money and the press, he was referring to Dhirubhai Ambani's efforts to hire some of India's best journalists and then neutralise them. Last week in Parliament when the PM made a similar reference he was clearly pointing to the Express.

Meanwhile, at the India International Centre a heavy air of gloom and despair pervades. I popped in one afternoon and found that the sense of betrayal was, if anything, greater. Mandal was seen as such a hydra-headed, all-pervasive, unqualified evil that the defeat of the Raja and the return of Rajiv Gandhi was considered preferable. The battle lines, then, are clearly drawn with no possibility of moderation or climb-down by either side.

If V.P. Singh submits his government's resignation, the President, R. Venkataraman, is constitutionally bound to invite Rajiv Gandhi. Once that invitation is offered, the permutations and combinations are endless. And Rajiv Gandhi is sure to succeed

The sad, harassed look on V.P. Singh's face reflects the poignancy of his self-inflicted predicament. He is in a no-win situation. Whatever the Janata Dal's election promises, it is now quite obvious that the prolonged Devi Lal boxing match left the Prime Minister terrified. On 7 August, two days before the Haryana patriarch's Boat Club Rally, he pulled Mandal out of a hat, convinced by God knows who that it would cut his foes, actual and potential, down to size. It would also give him a ticket to guaranteed electoral victory. Perhaps some pints of blood may be spilt, but that could be explained to the electorate as the unfortunate consequence of radical social engineering.

Alas, it has gone wrong, horribly wrong. Not only has Vishwanath Pratap Singh irrevocably lost the sympathy and support of the urban middle class and the intellectuals, a constituency largely responsible for bringing him to power, but even the election mastercard is turning out to be a non-starter. For two reasons.

V.P. Singh cannot pass a magic wand and dissolve Parliament. He heads a minority government and if he submits his government's resignation, the President is constitutionally bound to invite Rajiv Gandhi. Once that invitation is offered the permutations and combinations that might emerge are endless. There is at least a 50 per cent chance that Mr Gandhi will succeed in luring the requisite 60 MPs needed to form a new government.

The second reason is even more crucial. Whatever their sentiments on the Mandal Commission, the 144 National Front, 86 BJP and 43 Communist MPs, not to mention the MLAs, are petrified of a fresh election. A BJP Member of Parliament told me he was sure he would be thrashed with "chappals and shoes" if he went back to his people so soon requesting re-election. Thus, even if V.P. Singh plans an early poll, the rank and file of the Janata Dal, BJP and CPI(M) will resist the move. The Prime Minister is, therefore, left with a mastercard he cannot play.

What does he do with Mandal, then? He can't back down because he is riding a tiger. It is easy to get on the Mandal tiger, impossible to get off. Indeed, given the presence of dangerous hot-heads like Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav in the Union Cabinet and two equally belligerent Yadavs in UP and Bihar, any backtracking on the reservation policy could mean a civil war in India. Such is the Prime Minister's dilemma that even the option of delaying implementation of Mandal by a year or so, through the appointment of, say, another commission to look into the huge and numerous inconsistencies in the report, is not available to him

Some backtracking is visible even now, but not at the expense of Mandal. The Prime Minister is handing out lollipops to every passing lobby. You are upset about caste being the basis of preference, we will add economic criteria and reserve another ten per cent. You are upset that Muslims, Sikhs, Christians are excluded, we will make the necessary provision by reserving a quota for them too. Women, ex-servicemen, physically handicapped, in fact any group with a social, economic or bodily disability can make a representation, and chances are V.P. Singh will find ways and means to accommodate them with quotas. At this rate, forget the 50 per cent Supreme Court ceiling, we may end up with 105 per cent reservations for 100 per cent of jobs and admissions into educational establishments. If it weren't so deadly serious it would be funny. And all because Mr V.P. Singh dare not go back on his famous 'promise'.

So, with no possibility of playing the mastercard or reneging on his 'historic' commitment to 52 per cent of the population, and with mounting caste strife spilling on to the streets and continuing vilification in the press aimed directly at him, what does V.P. Singh do? I can see very little room for manoeuvre. Even the disarray in the Congress, exacerbated by Rajiv's ineptitude, is no help because this is essentially an internal crisis of the Janata Dal—and it must be resolved internally.

In the past, Mr V.P. Singh has shown dazzling expertise in managing contradictions, an art which he claims is the essence of governance. Well, if he can manage to get out of this blind alley he will have earned the sobriquet, Houdini of Indian politics. ●

R K LAXMAN/THE TIMES OF INDIA

■ These are bad days for me, and I receive brickbats and abuses with a laugh

SANJAY SINGH, Rajya Sabha MP

■ If I have to choose between power and the rights of people. I would opt for the latter

V.P. SINGH, Prime Minister

■ He has this dangerous habit of saying or telling you whatever you want to hear

M J AKBAR, Congress(I) spokesman, on V P Singh

■ This is not a political stunt, what I am performing is a national stunt.

MULAYAM SINGH YADAV, Uttar Pradesh chief minister, on having mastered a few Tamil words

■ The people are acknowledging the National Front as a disciplined body and this gives the government the security it needs.

N.T. RAMA RAO, National Front chairman

■ Whether illegal or legal, I am not going to push them back into Pakistan.

BHAIRON SINGH SEKHAWAT, Rajasthan chief minister, commenting on the hundreds of refugee families which have arrived in Jodhpur from Pakistan

■ It is like renting a house and then throwing out its owner. .

MAHENDRA SINGH TIKAIT, BKU leader, commenting on Devi Lal's ouster from the Cabinet

■ I do not believe in violence.

SHARAD YADAV, Union textiles minister

■ A fraud and a cheat like Hegde is hard to come by easily, even in the annals of history.

SUBRAMANIAM SWAMY, Janata Party president

■ If it is good enough for the 15 crore Muslims in the rest of India, so is it not good enough for the 49 lakh Muslims in Kashmir?

JAGMOHAN, former Jammu and Kashmir Governor, on why the Act forbidding the misuse of religious places is not extended in Kashmir

■ I love journalists. In my next birth, I will be one.

AMITABH BACHCHAN, actor

■ You have to be cold-blooded to play chess.

VISHWANATHAN ANAND, national chess champion

Basu's Bengal

After 13 years in office, the legend is crumbling—and so is Bengal

SUNDEEP SHANKAR

Marxist chief minister Jyoti Basu (above) at one time was the embodiment of decency. He stood for democracy and ethics in political life. Today, his policemen do not hesitate to assault women if they happen to be political opponents

Calcutta is not exactly notorious for roadside assassinations, transistor bombs and motorcycle gunmen. The city might be a living hell but terrorists have so far kept away. Yet, there is one locality in Calcutta which is guarded like a fortress. Every evening, armed constables of the Eastern Frontier Rifles (EFR) posted at the mouth of every road leading into this residential colony peer into passing vehicles, occasionally stopping one for a thorough inspection. This routine, familiar to Delhi-ites, is totally incongruous in Calcutta, and a little mystifying considering that burglaries in the area continue unchecked. Not too many people know who exactly the police are guarding and the purpose of the checkpoints is yet to be officially explained.

However, it requires just three sets of facts to clear the mystery. One: the locality is Salt Lake, a sprawling residential township, where the West Bengal chief minister's son has built a house. Two: the chief minister visits his son virtually every evening. Three: the CM has of late become obsessed with security. The facts in themselves do not suggest anything unusual. The strange part is the Marxist chief minister Jyoti Basu's recent transformation. For, Basu has grown up in a hostile political environment: he has lived through the Naxalite years, been arrested, faced angry mobs and, for most of his life, has battled the establishment. He had ultimately succeeded in emerging as a people's leader and the undisputed patriarch of Bengal. The irony is that the street-fighting Basu, in his September years, has himself become the symbol of the establishment, not secure even within the cordon of Special Branch policemen and haunted by fears of possible assassination.

Two decades ago, Basu broke the barricades, led the protests and threatened to storm the bourgeois bastions. Today, he is the bastion, assailed by hordes of protesters and threatened by shadowy extremists. In the past, Basu rallied Calcuttans against fare hikes, he railed against police brutality, protested against electoral irregularities and vociferously denounced successive state governments for neglecting West Bengal's economic development. Today, his policemen do not hesitate to beat up women or fire at unruly mobs; the biggest bus and tram fare hike in the city's history has been ordered by his regime; it is his party that openly subverted the Calcutta Municipal Corporation elections this July; and it is his government that presides over a state that increasingly appears to have missed the economic growth path. It is Animal Farm all over again. Only, more banal and more tragic.

The ironies have become more than apparent in recent months. Even till the first quarter of this year, Basu was God. Then, something happened. Public perceptions about Basu changed almost overnight. Suddenly, the impeccable bhadralok in his starched, white dhoti was not so dazzling after all. It was not that people all over the state were beginning to abuse him or preparing to come out in open revolt. The transformation really had more to do with attitudes, and not with anything directly measurable. It was reflected in small things: conversations in buses, local street-corner meetings and, most dramatically, in the way people responded to the two bandhs called in protest against the fare rise decision.

ALOKE MITRA

The first bandh, called by the Congress(I), which happens to be the largest opposition party in the state, was a runaway success, contrary to the expectations of the state's Marxist rulers. The overwhelming majority of traders kept their shops closed and Calcutta roads on that day (16 August, 1990) looked grim and deserted.

Marxist musclemen deployed to maintain 'order' failed to inspire public confidence; what they did was attack and grievously injure ex-Congress(I) MP Mamata Banerjee. The unabashed attack on the female Congress(I) leader and her subsequent hospitalisation showed how brutalised the CPI(M) ranks had become. There was talk of a 'Red Mafia' taking over Calcutta and the Bengal countryside.

Perhaps the most significant part of the 16 August bandh was the tacit support it received from members of the CPI(M)-controlled State Government Employees Coordination Committee. Judging from the abysmal attendance even in the state secretariat, the Writers' Buildings, hundreds of Coordination Committee members had absented themselves from work. This staunch middle class segment has traditionally been a faithful supporter of the left, but its fervour is clearly waning. The bandh, in retrospect, was immensely successful not because of the Congress(I), but because of the growing disillusionment of the common man. Jyoti Basu, the Left Front and Marxism are no longer the exciting vanguard of a new age. They increasingly represent the old, decaying, twilight order.

Just how dispirited the [illegible]age person in Bengal had become was evident when a fringe political outfit, the Socialist Unity Centre of India (SUCI), called a second statewide bandh on 3 September against the fare hike. The SUCI is far from being a major political player in Bengal, yet its bandh call was a stupendous success. Newspapers reported that the bandh had been total in Calcutta, Howrah, North and South 24 Parganas, Nadia and parts of north Bengal. This was unprecedented. But chief minister Basu claimed that the people had rejected the bandh, and argued that if shopkeepers had downed shutters it was because of a "general sense of panic" created by the Opposition. The chief minister did not seem to realise that he was admitting to a certain failure, that his own administration could no longer make the people feel safe. He refused to admit that people had lost all faith in his police force and in his party cadres. In fact, the word 'cadre' had become synonymous with 'muscleman'.

Every sign indicates that the masses are becoming more and more discontented. Small one paragraph reports in local newspapers on spontaneous demonstrations—against power cuts, kerosene shortages or the poor maintenance of public buses—are appearing with increasing regularity.

The conflict is sharpest in Calcutta, a city that has been woefully neglected by the Marxists. For the first time in decades, a group of civic-minded citizens have decided to hold a silent, torchlit procession to protest against routine power cuts. A leaflet produced by the protesters declares: "For almost 20 years we have lived with what is described as the power problem. We have listened to the reasons and we have waited. But now we are fed up." That about sums up the public mood. And the people are not fed up merely with the power shortage. In 1977, when they swept Basu and his Marxist colleagues to power, they had voted for freedom and change. Thirteen years later, they have realised they had only manoeuvred themselves into a blind alley, walled in by a defunct ideology and a dogma that spells stagnation.

Basu's fall was not gratuitous. At least four distinct factors contributed to it. And everything happened almost at the same time. The first had to do with democracy: the Marxists had always talked loudest about democratic rights and had successfully campaigned against the blatant rigging resorted to by the Congress regime in 1972. The left pretended that it stood for ethics in political life. By denouncing the Naxalites for their strategy of armed struggle, the CPI(M) leadership openly sided with the advocates of parliamentary democracy and won over a sizeable section of the middle class intelligentsia. Jyoti Basu, in those years, embodied everything decent and bhadrolok in a polity that was dominated by the murderous Naxalites and the unprincipled Congress.

The use of armed musclemen and terror tactics in the Calcutta Municipal Corporation polls held in July this year successfully demolished the Marxists' democratic image. Earlier, the CPI(M)'s political opponents had cried themselves hoarse, alleging electoral malpractices which included systematic deletion of names from the voters' list by the Marxists. But nobody had quite believed that the Marxists could deliberately subvert the electoral process. Now, the average Calcuttan at least is prepared to believe the worst.

Not only are the Marxists ready to fix elections, but they also seem to have no compunctions about stifling dissent and using muscle power to intimidate political rivals and the media. There have been numerous instances of press photographers and television cameramen being manhandled or assaulted. Photographer Tarapada Banerjee of the Bengali daily Anandabazar Patrika, who managed to record the attack on Mamata Banerjee on 16 August, had his arm smashed by furious CPI(M) supporters. Doordarshan, cowed down by the CPI(M)'s constant threats, meekly omits airing any news of CPI(M)-inspired violence. But newspapers continue to frontpage news of the 'Red Terror' that appears to be sweeping through the state. One of the most appalling incidents occurred on the outskirts of Calcutta at a spot called Bantala this May: two female state government employees were sexually assaulted, one of them subsequently strangled to death, and the driver of the car brutally killed by a group of CPI(M) anti-socials.

The street-fighting Basu is a figure of the forgotten past. At one time, he led protests and courted arrest. The image of a solemn Basu behind bars (far left) had once stirred Bengal. Today, Basu has become the very establishment that he fought all his life. He uses a helicopter for his election tours (above) and at times uses a Toyota (left)

The second factor that has contributed to the growing disenchantment with the Marxists is the feeling of fundamental insecurity that has gripped the people of the state. After Bantala and a couple of other stray incidents, Basu's one-time boast about women in Bengal being safe sounds terribly hollow. The state administration has failed in its basic commitment to ensure the safety of life and property. The debilitated police force, riddled with unionisation and corruption, is hardly an institution that the common man can turn to. Even filing a First Information Report (FIR) with the police without paying

Basu had made his career by campaigning against authoritarianism. He maintained that Congressmen were hoodlums. Today, CPI(M) goondas are accused of beating up Congress(I) leader Mamata Banerjee (above) and demonstrators are routinely tear-gassed (top) and lathi-charged (left) for protesting against basic issues, such as the bus fare hike some form of bribe has become impossible. Increasingly, justice is available only to the influential and the rich.

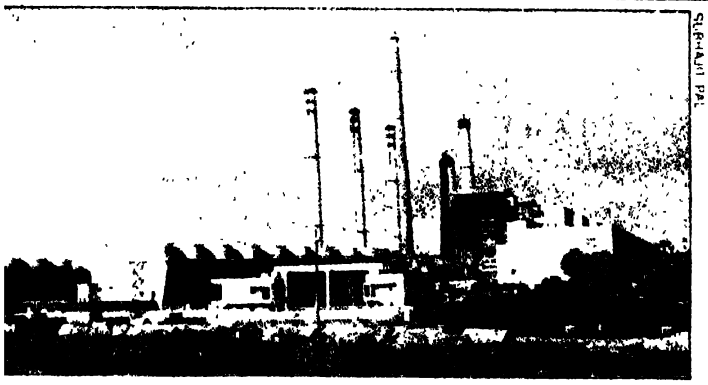
Thirdly, there is the farce about the 'friendly' government at the Centre. For 13 years, the Marxists had expostulated against the injustices of the Centre, blaming it for all of West Bengal's economic ills and for 13 years, the state's inhabitants had patiently listened. After the November 1989 elections, the Marxists declared that they would support the National Front government because Vishwanth Pratap Singh had pledged to fulfil the long-standing demands of the left. Many of the 19-odd points raised by the left parties related to the economic development of West Bengal and it seemed that the state could expect a better deal at long last. But the expectations were largely belied



True, the state government managed to rope in the Tatas for the ambitious Haldia Petrochemicals project and compelled the Centre to okay Soviet participation in the Bakreswar thermal power project, but nothing else materialised. On the contrary, the chief minister's promise to reopen closed, sick units like Bengal Potteries backfired with Union industry minister Ajit Singh declaring that he was opposed to nationalisation of sick units. The demand for the end to the discriminatory freight equalisation policy on coal and steel seems to have been forgotten. The state government has also stopped making an issue out of financial demands like the writing off of central loans and increasing central monetary transfers to the state. This, despite the fact that people like the former state finance minister, Dr Ashok Mitra, had made a career out of these demands.

Chief minister Jyoti Basu had at one time been the strongest advocate of the view that Centre-state relations should be drastically altered. He had berated both Mrs Indira Gandhi and her son Rajiv Gandhi for being authoritarian and not allowing state governments to fulfil their role in the Indian federation. All these demands were quietly buried once the National Front came to power. Basu was silenced with promises of a slice of power at the Centre.

Now, there is not even a murmur of protest from the Marxists when the Union government starts soft-pedalling plans for the modernisation of major West Bengal-based public sector units like the Indian Iron and Steel Company (IISCO) at Burnpur. Nor is there a word of protest from the state government when the Centre unilaterally stipulates that the entire foreign exchange required for the Haldia project would have to be raised through exports by that unit. This, and the condition that the Haldia unit would have to raise foreign exchange required for importing its basic raw materials through export, have effectively rendered the project unviable. But Basu is more busy

In the past 13 years, Calcutta has turned increasingly nightmarish. During this period, the Left Front has not been able to complete the state's solitary power project at Kolaghat (left) and the Second Hooghly Bridge (above left). People are less inclined to accept the state government's failures. A recent pamphlet (above) declares: "...we have waited. But now we are fed up" holding briefs for dubious industrial tycoons like Dhirubhai Ambani and the Hindujas, who happen to be one of the principal accused in the Bofors kickbacks case.

The sense of stagnation is highlighted by the return of prolonged daily power cuts throughout the state. Even after 13 years of undisturbed rule, the Marxists have proved utterly incompetent about running their power plants. At a time when the Centre is being blamed for not sanctioning fresh power projects for West Bengal, the fact that the state government has been unable to complete its major power project (the 1,260 mega watt Kolaghat Thermal Power Plant) in 13 years is conveniently underplayed. At any rate, the suffocating power cuts that plunge vast areas of the state into darkness every evening are symbolic of the stagnation perpetuated by Jyoti Basu and his comrades. An entire generation in Bengal has grown up with 'loadshedding' and it is time to ask questions: what have the people got from the Marxists? Not democracy, not law and order, not economic development—not even electricity.

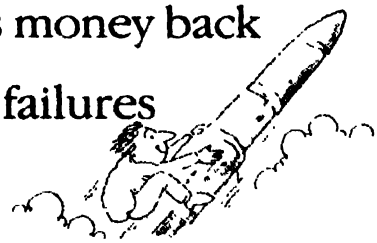
The tragic part is that the election of the Left Front to power 13 years ago had initially promised a new era. On assuming office, Jyoti Basu acted fast: hundreds of political prisoners, including Naxalites, were freed; the rights of trade unionswere restored; education upto the middle school level was made free, moribund panchayats and municipalities were revived through elections, land reforms were implemented, and a massive programme for institutionalising the tenancy rights of sharecroppers (the famous Operation Barga) was introduced. The left brought with it not just hope but a breath of fresh air. Here at last was a political party that was non-sectarian, non-parochial, non-communal and devoted to the uplift of Bengal.

In the first few years, the Left Front did manage to infuse many sectors with a new dynamism. After winning the 1982 Assembly polls, a radiant Jyoti Basu declared: "The unlimited love and affection of the people for our party, the Left Front and the government is what we have gained." In a similar vein, writing in the CPI(M) organ People's Democracy, Basu commented: "I hope that as we have developed over the years with the support and love of the ordinary people to become an invincible force in West Bengal, in the same way, in the near future, we will be able to draw them towards us in all the states of the country." That, in retrospect, was too optimistic a statement.

If Basu seriously thought that West Bengal would set a shining example for other states, he was mistaken. Jyoti Basu might have earned respect all over the country for being a relatively clean, non-sectarian head of government

We've covered cricket matches
When the pundits forecast rain

We've paid out bills of hospitals
And helped to ease the strain



Gompa in the Himalayas
Can now protect his yak

If Kondiah loses his boat
He could get his money back

Offshore wells and crop failures
Rocket launchings too

And now a great new venture
That's tailormade for you

GIC GRIH VITTA LTD

Together we shall make your dream come true

General Insurance Corporation of India
Bombay-400 020

National Insurance Company Limited
Calcutta 700 071

The New India Assurance Company Limited
Bombay 400 023

The Oriental Insurance Company Limited
New Delhi - 110 002

United India Insurance Company Limited
Madras - 600 014

GGVL Service Centres :

Bangalore GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at United India Insurance Co Ltd., Regional Office, Shankaranarayana Bldg., 25, M G Road, Bangalore - 560 001 Tel. 573617/573583 Bombay GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at The New India Assurance Co Ltd., New India Bhawan, 2nd flr, 34-38, Bank Street, Fort, Bombay - 400 023 Tel 2861621. Calcutta GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at: National Insurance Co Ltd., Everest House, 4th floor, 46C, Jawaharlal Nehru Road, Calcutta 700 071 Tel 44-2651/54 Dir 44-0107 Hyderabad GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at: United India Insurance Co Ltd., Regional Office, P.B No 1020, 3-5-817 & 818 Basheer Bagh, Hyderabad 500 029 Tel 231996, 231894. Lucknow GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at The Oriental Insurance Co. Ltd., Lucknow Regional Office, 43, Hazratganj, Lucknow - 226 001 Tel - 234886 Madras GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at United India Insurance Co. Ltd., Head Office, 24, Whites Road, Madras - 600 014. Tel - 473993/473007 New Delhi GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at The Oriental Insurance Co Ltd., Regional Office, 86-88, Janpath, New Delhi - 110 001. Tel: 3329233. Panaji GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at: The New India Assurance Co. Ltd., Panaji Divisional Office, Velho Bldg., 3rd floor, Rua Conda - De Torres Nouas, Panaji - 403 001. Tel.: 3770, 4297.

Multimedia Aquarius/GGVL/2/90

RAJIB BASU

ASHOK MAITRA

Yesterday's vanguards have today switched places with the former oppressors and are having to train their guns on the masses (top). Even the media is not spared intimidation (left) but he cannot exactly be admired for the performince of his regime. Calcutta, the seat of the state government, has become one of the world's most depressing cities. Nothing works. The Second Hooghly Bridge that has been under construction for as long as anyone can remember continues to haunt the Calcutta skyline, the roads remain rutted; phones do not work; traffic moves at a crawl; and the buildings, obscured by ugly hoardings, look more derelict with every passing year

The Marxist-controlled Calcutta Municipal Corporation, which is supposed to ensure that the city works, has become a den of corruption, according to admissions of CPI(M) leaders themselves. Virtually every institution—from the city police force to the universities—has been thoroughly politicised. Development work by the Calcutta Metropolitan Development Agency (CMDA) has virtually ground to a halt.

The Left Front government has, at times, argued that the countryside—and not Calcutta— is their priority, despite the fact that one-fifth of the state's population lives in and around this metropolis But, the Left Front cannot today claim that it has transformed the countryside either. True, it has revived the panchayati system, poured crores into providing education, built warehouses, markets and village roads. But in two principal areas, it has largely failed: irrigation and power supply to the rural areas. The area irrigated by government canals actually declined from 10.17 lakh hectares in 1980-81 to 10.06 lakh hectares in 1986-87. Even today, barely a third of arable land in the state is irrigated. Without assured water and power, agricultural production continues to be erratic. Also, immense poverty, landlessness and illiteracy continue to prevail in the Bengal countryside.

The Marxist dictum that the point of all philosophy and power is to change the world has conveniently been forgotten. The bourgeoisie is out and the people's government in, but little has really changed. And today, the police are guarding te vanguard. The retreat has begun. ●

Indranil Banerjie/Calcutta

BODYLINE

RAVI SHANKAR

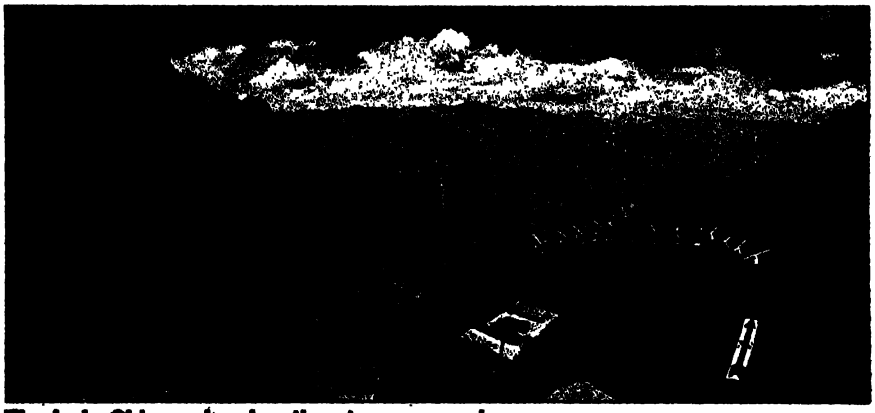
INDER MALHOTRA

Off the back-burner

It is high time India took China's policy shifts seriously

On the morning after the meeting between Inder Kumar Gujral and the visiting Chinese vice-foreign minister, Qi Huaiyuan, only two of the five leading national newspapers I read every morning found this news worthy of the front page. One of the two disposed it off in three short paragraphs. Every evening I take three major outstation English language papers. All of them, too, had pushed the significant encounter—between the Indian foreign minister and the leader of the Chinese delegation to the second meeting of the joint working group—to an inside page. So much for all the claptrap about "Asian giants", the world's two most populous nations anxious to live in peace and harmony with each other despite 1962 and what have you.

Contrast this with the front-page space devoted by the papers to the earlier talks between foreign secretary Muchkund Dubey and his Pakistani counterpart at that time, Tanvir the Terrible, who has since been deservedly kicked aside to the Pakistani Embassy in Paris, and the point I wish to make becomes clear. It is that the swadeshi Fleet Street is no less remiss in comprehending and projecting this country's interests and concomitant foreign policy priorities than other relevant institutions such as Parliament, political parties, think-tanks and, of course, the foreign office itself.



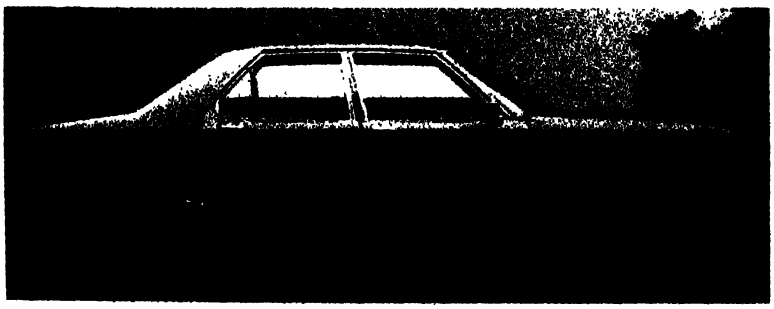
By the time the latest round of the India-China dialogue ended, the publicity situation had improved, but only marginally. This was so presumably because no spectacular results flowed from the conversations except for the institutionalised arrangements between the military commanders of the two sides to maintain peace and tranquillity along the line of control. But no great results should have been expected for the simple reason that India, convulsed by a series of grave internal problems and ruled by a minority government, is not yet in a position to state what kind of a compromise on the vexed boundary question can and should be accepted.

However, if the boundary question is placed on the back-burner, as it should be until we can do our homework, prospects of better understanding and purposeful cooperation with China can surely improve.

Scepticism about a rapid improvement in India-China relations, even in the event of the border issue being sidestepped for the present, cannot be dismissed out of hand. There have been several false starts before. Of late, the atmosphere between the two countries has become more pleasant—with the visit of a delegation from the National Defence College this summer, military contacts with China were resumed after an interval of 30 years and a reciprocal Chinese military delegation is expected in February. However, in substance, very little has happened so far. Caution is, therefore, in order.

However, in recent days, there have been small and subtle but significant indications of a Chinese willingness to put a little more pep and content into the hitherto verbal goodwill. Just before the arrival of Qi, who is not only the first vice-foreign minister (equivalent to our foreign secretary) but also a member of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party. Chinese sources were heard saying that his mission was not confined to discussing the border only. He was, they said, interested in an across-the-board comparing of notes with India on all global, regional and other problems of mutual interest.

If this is a correct appraisal of the situation, the opportunity surely needs to be seized. And the projection of the Chinese policy may well be correct if we read it along with the major speech to the Chinese National People's Conference by Prime Minister Li Peng. In this, Li Peng clearly stated that with the US-USSR détente and allied developments, there had been an 'imbalance' in the world that needs to be corrected. It is also noteworthy that while China, as a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council, has voted for all five resolutions on the Gulf, on the need to avoid the unilateral use of force by the US, it has been talking the same language as India.



The Indo-Chinese border: time to compromise

It is also instructive that despite much greater hostility between China and the Soviet Union than between this country and China, the Sino-Soviet parleys have progressed faster and further in two years than the India-China dialogue has in a whole decade. This is another 'imbalance' requiring correction. Mikhail Gorbachev's suggestion is for a triangular cooperation between India, China and the Soviet Union. For the Chinese this could at best be a very distant goal. For the present, their overwhelming emphasis is on bilateralism by which India has also sworn over the years. •

The Contessa Classic. Usually found parked

Contract HM 22166A

Accessories shown in the picture are not part of standard equipment.

A Limousine to every other car

at the final milestone on the road to success.

Measuring a man's success has always been difficult. And while most successful people have grabbed wildly at every passing status symbol, a few have resisted the temptation.

The Contessa Classic is their car. And makes a more forceful statement about them, than any of their other possessions.

A fuel efficient 1.8 litre Isuzu engine displays their ability to use power.

Five forward gears, including an overdrive, indicate just how fast they can move.

An impressively responsive steering places them in complete control of any situation.

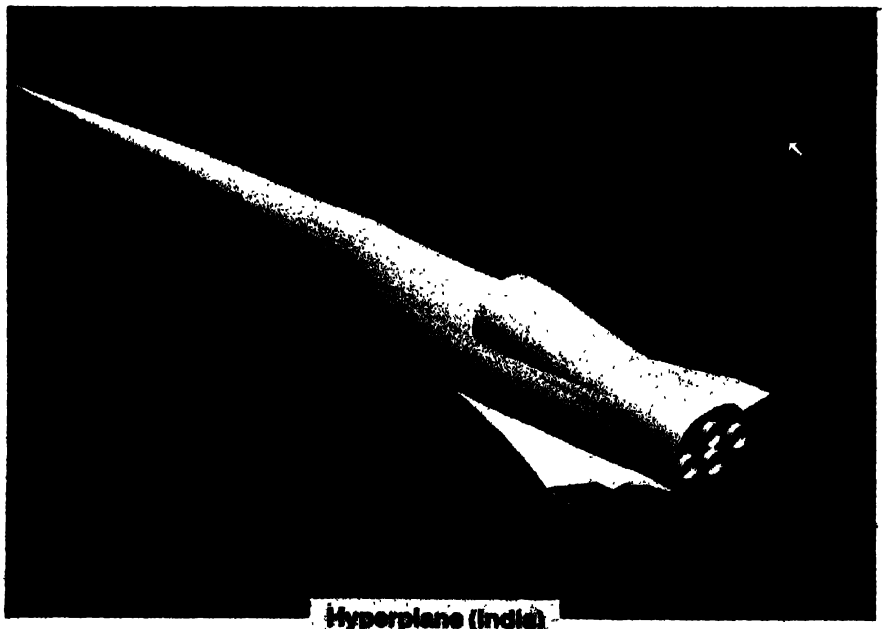
Power disc brakes help them respond to any possible contingency safely and smoothly.

And, of course, a plush interior, an independent suspension and air conditioning show an appreciation of the finer things in life.

But there's really much more to the Contessa. So why not get in touch with us. And take a closer look at a car that spells success quite differently.

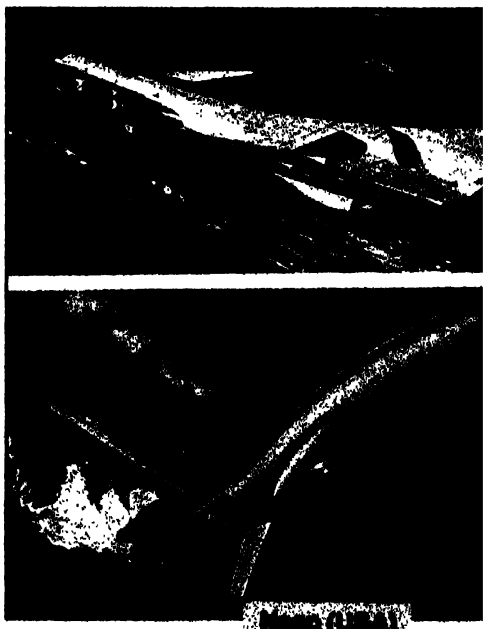
Contessa
Classic 1·8 GL

Enter, the Hyperplane



Indian scientists have designed an aerospacecraft that could revolutionise space travel

It looks like something out of sci-fi: a hybrid machine for some Darth Vader to speed through the reaches of outer space. Only, this half aircraft, half rocket, has not been conjured up by any special effects wizard. It has been painstakingly constructed out of several hundred mathematical equations run on a computer by a team of Hyderabad-based scientists. It is the Hyperplane—unreal only to the extent that it is still just a concept projected on computer displays. And this concept, proved by years of hard theoretical work, could well revolutionise thinking on space travel. Air Commodore R. Gopalaswami, the scientist-technocrat who has led research on the Hyperplane, says that their concept, far from being fanciful, represents a breakthrough in space technology and has even been acknowledged worldwide. "The concept is fantastic and we know it will work," adds Dr A.P.J. Abdul Kalam, director of the Defence Research and Development Laboratory (DRDL) and head of the successful Indian missile programme.



The excitement over the Hyperplane stems from the fact that the era of giant rockets is gradually coming to an end. Even the superpowers are beginning to lose interest in the great conquest of space, an idea that had spurred a feverish global race in the 1960s and 1970s. Several countries, chief among them the United States, the Soviet Union, China and France, had been building larger and larger rockets. Visionary scientists had drawn up plans for gargantuan space stations: the slowly revolving hollow wheels populated by human beings and aired by hothouse plants. The more pragmatic space technologists worked on ways to trap solar energy, conduct scientific experiments, grow weird crystals and metals, or construct giant anti-missile lasers in space. But all these grand ideas increasingly crashed against a basic constraint: the limited capacity of conventional, chemically-powered rockets to haul large masses into the orbit. It gradually began dawning on policy-makers throughout the globe that the massive costs involved in sending men and material into space was just not worth the effort, time or money. Most of the space programmes today consequently are aimed at placing relatively lightweight satellites for telecommunication, remote sensing and spying purposes into the orbit.

And that is the way things are going to stand in the foreseeable future. That is, unless the concept of the Hyperplane takes shape. The Hyperplane's creators claim that they have found a new design concept which will allow them to transcend the limits imposed by chemical rocket engines. Their machine promises to be a safe, reliable, low cost means of mass transportation to space. In a paper presented to the International Astronautical Congress two years ago, Air Commodore Gopalaswami and his team members pointed out that the world's most advanced rocket launchers' maximum payload capacity is only 2.5 per cent of the total launch weight. For example, the American space shuttle, which uses the world's most advanced rocket engines, has a launch weight of 2,000 tonnes of which the payload is only 30 tonnes. The cost of conventional launches is even more because at best only a small part of the launcher is re-usable. The Hyperplane concept, in contrast, promises a way out of all these dead ends.

WORLD AEROSPACECRAFT

Hyperplane (India)

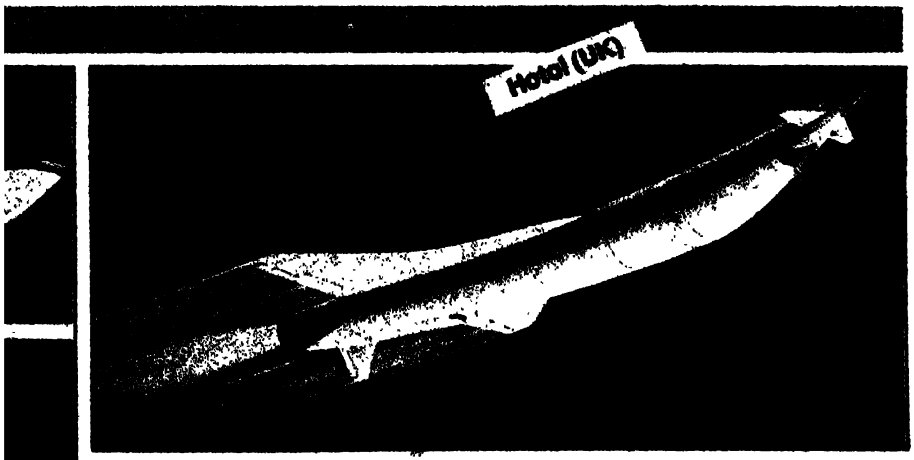
Instead of blasting off like a conventional rocket, the Hyperplane is designed to take off like a normal aircraft using air breathing turbojets and cruise to an altitude of 50 km. During the cruise phase, it would suck in atmospheric air and convert it into liquid oxygen (Lox). In conventional rockets as much as 70 per cent of the total launch weight comprises Lox, which combines with liquid hydrogen to provide thrust (power) for the rocket. The Hyperplane would be much lighter than a conventional rocket because it would not lift off with a massive Lox load; instead, it would acquire the Lox required while in flight. Once in the outer reaches of the atmosphere, the rocket engines would be fired and the Hyperplane would roar out to a 300-km orbit. After completing its mission, the aerospacecraft would gently glide back into the atmosphere and land like an aircraft. The significant part is not the Hyperplane's novelty but the fact that its payload capacity would be dramatically higher than that of other spacecraft. In fact, the payload could be as high as 15-25 per cent of the total launch weight. This means that the Hyperplane carrying the same payload (30 tonnes) as the US space shuttle would weigh ten to 16 times less than the shuttle. This, according to the Hyperplane's designers, would constitute a strategic leap forward in the greater utilisation of space.

"The concept is fantastic and we know it will work"

Dr A.P.J. Abdul Kalam, director, DRDL



"The Hyperplane would help begin the colonisation of space"

Air Com. R. Gopalaswami, Hyperplane's designer

The idea of a 200-tonne aerospacecraft ferrying 30 tonnes into space effortlessly like an aircraft appears too good to be true. Not surprisingly, when the design was first unveiled it was greeted with scepticism. "The impressive design is so far only on paper," Dr Rogen Elo of the University of Berlin dismissively commented. Cambridge University's propulsion expert, Dr Graham Dorrington, declared that the Indian concept was an old one and added that the design was seriously flawed because even the largest liquid air plant in Britain could not produce Lox one-tenth at the rate required for the Hyperplane. He said it would be impossible to build a plant weighing only 2 tonnes that could turn inlet air at 1,500 degrees centigrade into Lox. While much of the criticism was predictable, it was not entirely justified.

"What we have shown is that the concept is workable and different from any other similar concepts floated earlier," says Gopalaswami. The idea of an aerospacecraft taking off and landing like a normal aeroplane has occurred to others: Great Britain plans to develop a somewhat similar craft named the 'Hotol' and the United States is working on an aerospacecraft termed 'Nasp'. The Soviets, on the other hand, are in the process of developing a colossal aircraft that could carry a re-usable spacecraft into the upper reaches of the atmosphere for launch into the orbit. The Indian, the British and the US aerospacecraft , however, only have surface similarities. The Hotol is rocket-propelled and incorporates air collection to a very limited extent. The Nasp uses air breathing engines for atmospheric flights but does not consider air collection at all. The Hyperplane, on the other hand, visualises the use of both air breathing engines and massive air collection during atmospheric flights.

The Indian, the British and the US aerospacecraft only have surface similarities. The Hotol is rocket-propelled and incorporates air collection to a very limited extent. The Nasp uses air breathing engines for atmospheric flight but does not consider air collection at all. The Hyperplane, on the other hand, visualises the use of both air breathing engines and massive air collection.

The Hyperplane's design is innovative to the extent that nobody has considered the possibility of massive mass additions during atmospheric flights. Most scientists had presumed that it would be both theoretically and practically impossible to collect oxygen from the atmosphere and convert it into Lox during flight. Gopalaswami's team, however, has proved that this is not an impossibility. As a matter of fact, one of the team members, M. Nagarathinam, has already applied for a patent for an air collection and liquification machine. While the actual fabrication of such a unit will take years of difficult engineering work, new advances suggest that super conductor-based thermoelectric cool-

The Berlin wall wasn't the only European barrier to fall last year!

In Germany, France, Belgium, Italy, the Netherlands, the UK and Switzerland another kind of change swept over.

In these countries, an Indian company, in its very first year, exported over 50 percent of the yarn it manufactured.

A company as Indian as Indo Rama, manufacturer of the finest quality yarn in the country. Spun at a 25,344 spindle plant that is equipped, quite naturally, with the very finest in machinery. Manufacturing yarn that is electronically-cleared, spliced, knot-less and contamination-free.

And while premium Europe welcomes India, we allow ourselves a small smile.

After all, we have the entire future to look forward to. And many more yarns to spin!

INDO RAMA SYNTHETICS (I) LTD.

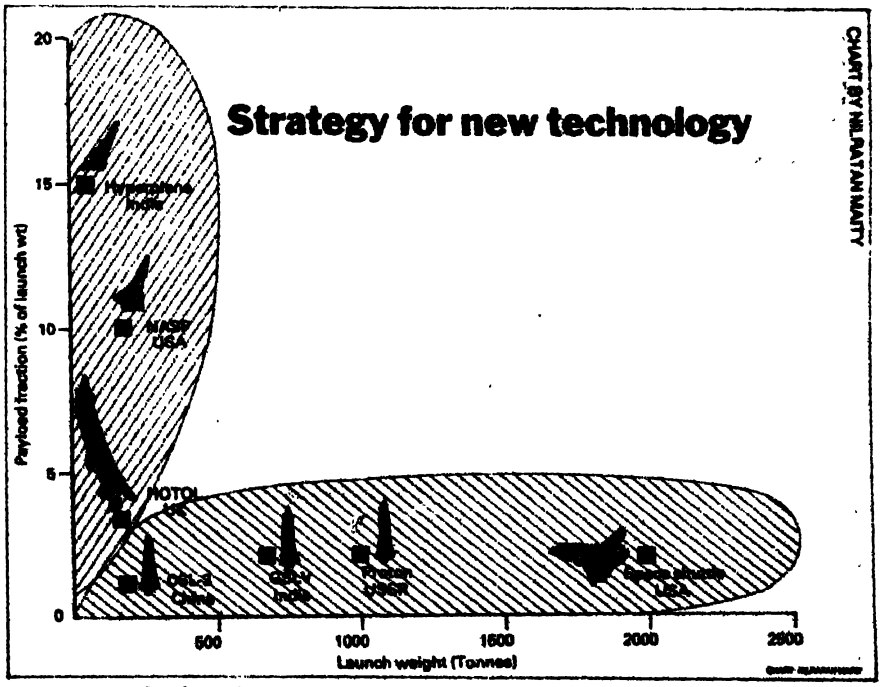
We / have / only / scratched / the / surface

R K SWAMY/IRS/5895

ers and cryogenic heat exchangers could be used to successfully build the Hyperplane's liquefication plant.

"There are three key areas where we need to do further research and hone our concepts," explains Dr Abdul Kalam. Apart from the Lox generation plant, considerable work needs to be done in the fields of materials development (i.e., development of the composites and alloys required) and propulsion systems. "We need to involve many laboratories and research institutions to work on the Hyperplane's various subsystems," Kalam adds. For the moment, Gopalaswami and Kalam are trying to identify the areas that require further research and study. "We are going to deploy people within our organisation—the DRDL—to further research the concept and then we will take the project to the government," says Kalam.

Despite Kalam's optimism, considerable uncertainty hangs over the ambitious project. The most daunting part of the Hyperplane project is the cost involved. After studying other space programmes, Gopalaswami and others have worked out that they will need a total of Rs 5,000 crores over the next 7-10 years. That is big money and the Indian government is in no mood to commit that kind of funds for a space project. The Hyperplane's designers feel that if the Indian government cannot afford it, then it should rope in foreign participants or the United Nations for a project which would benefit mankind as a whole.



Would it be worth it? Yes, say the dream machine's designers. For one, if the Hyperplane is a product of international cooperation, it would not be the monopoly of any one nation and the chances of it being used for the militarisation of space would be low. At another level, it would take far less time to complete the project if know-how from all over the world is pooled in for the project. And in the ultimate analysis, the world would have a low cost means to build beneficial installations in space. The per tonne cost of payload carried by the Hyperplane would be only 1.6 million rupees compared to 25 million rupees for the space shuttle, which is the most advanced conventional spacecraft today. The Hyperplane, moreover, promises to be far cheaper than the huge rockets currently being built by the Indian Space Research Organisation (ISRO). For example, the cost per flight of the Hyperplane will be 25 times less than

It has been estimated that the Hyperplane project will need a total of Rs 5,000 crores over the next 7-10 years. But the Indian government is not willing to commit that kind of money for the project that of ISRO's Geostationary Satellite Launch Vehicle (GSLV). ISRO, however, has not shown the slightest interest in pursuing the Hyperplane project.

A couple of foreign agencies, Aerospatiale (France) and the space agency of the Soviet Union had exhibited considerable interest in the Hyperplane. Experts from the two countries had flown down to Hyderabad to study the designs. Aerospatiale went to the extent of working out a memorandum of understanding with DRDL to develop a Hyperplane in collaboration. The Americans were also interested but the Indians were wary on account of the much publicised Star Wars programmes and they did not want to share any information that might help a superpower built military stations in space. Both the French and the Soviets also backed out at the last moment. The Indian scientists were flabbergasted. For, the foreigners had taken their designs and billion dollar ideas and disappeared with lame last minute excuses. "We will continue to get exploited till the time we develop our own technology in key areas—if that happens, then foreigners will be compelled to share information and the project might fructify," feels Gopalaswami.

The real problem, however, seems to be one of vested interests and inertia. Like NASA, Aerospatiale and other space agencies, ISRO too has invested vast amounts of money in developing conventional, chemically-powered rockets. The Hyperplane or any such aerospacecraft project envisages an entirely new line of thinking, which if pursued could render all of ISRO's work irrelevant. It is clear that no space agency in the world, least of all ISRO, is going to change tracks on its own, or without considerable resistance. The stakes are too high. But then the world does not always plod along; at times, circumstances compel it to take revolutionary leaps. With the global energy and environmental crises threatening civilisation, the day is perhaps not far off when India along with the rest of mankind will have to take a headlong leap into outer space. And when they do that, it will not be on mammoth rockets but on the Hyperplane or one of its versions. ●

Indranil Banerjie/Hyderabad

No ban, no challenge... just a burning desire.

CASTE WAR!

As violence rocks north India, the anti-Mandal Commission stir spreads

30 August: Police open fire on an anti-reservation procession in Cuttack, Orissa. One person, Alok Mahapatra, is killed and four others are seriously injured in a separate incident at Ravenshaw College Square.

1 September: The situation in Orissa takes an even more serious turn as five more deaths are reported in cases of police firing in Puri district. Agitators set a train engine ablaze and then, prevent fire tenders from reaching the spot.

3 September: A 12-hour Ranchi bandh is called in protest against the implementation of the Mandal Commission Report. Six persons are injured in sporadic incidents of violence and at least 30 persons are arrested for trying to forcibly close shops and offices and for stone-throwing.

3 September: Jagdish Prasad Mishra, a Ph.D. student attempts self-immolation in New Delhi. The police arrest him for attempted suicide, but not before he has incurred minor burns.

4 September: An anti-reservation rally in Patna turns violent. The police move in and three persons die of bullet wounds. The fourth succumbs to injuries sustained in a bomb explosion.

5 September: In Andhra Pradesh, anti-reservationists set fire to a bogey of the Rayalaseema Express. They also ransack the railway station at Machilipatnam, and delink bogies of a passenger train.

6 September: In Jaipur, Rajasthan, a dharna is staged against the police firing which resulted in the death of one person. A 100-odd people are taken into custody for violating prohibitory orders.

The setting may have been different, but the story was much the same. All over the country protesters took to the streets to express their unhappiness over the Raja's decision to implement the Mandal Commission Report. And predictably enough, the agitation turned violent as the anti-reservationists clashed with the police, who were under orders to put down the stir whatever the cost. Whatever the official figures for the dead and the injured, there was no doubt in the minds of anyone that India was witnessing a caste war of tremendous proportions. And whoever emerged the victor, the country would never be the same again.

SHOOTER

The scene in Patna, for instance, was very reminiscent of the heydays of JP's Total Revolution movement. With one difference: this time the crowds were out to agitate against the decision of a government which swore by his ideals day in and day out.

Even heavy rain failed to dampen the spirits of the anti-reservationists as they gathered in Patna on 24 September for a massive rally. The turn-out was impressive, and according to some more than what Jaya Prakash Narayan was able to command at the height of his popularity. With feelings running high, the meeting held at Dharna Chowk couldn't remain peaceful for long.

The police asked the students to disperse as they were violating prohibitory orders. Instead, the students threw stones and brickbats and nearly broke through the police cordon. Umesh Tyagi, among the processionists, was brutally assaulted by the police and left lying in a pool of blood. He later died.

And as the agitators became violent, the police went quite berserk. In the two-hour long pitched battle, no less than 30 rounds were fired and as many as 125 tear gas shells were brought into use.

Result: four students lost their lives on the spot, while another, Guddu (14), died of injuries sustained after a beating by a rifle-butt.

The students extracted due revenge, smashing roadside kiosks and billboards. They then gave vent to their anger by storming the police posts between Gandhi Maidan and the Dak Bungalow, crossing and destroying the barricades set up at the Bailey Road - Secretariat intersection. The students later alleged that at least 11 persons had died and that the police had whisked away the other bodies in order to keep the death toll down.

In Uttar Pradesh, Mulayam Singh Yadav, already up to his neck in the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid mire, found that he had his share of violent students to contend with. And in the face of the UP chief minister's uncompromising stand on the implementation of the Mandal Commission's recommendations, the situation in the state got progressively worse.

In the face of continuing violence the two hill universities of Kumaon and Pantnagar closed down as did the Lucknow varsity. In Nainital, the students of the Pantnagar University set two jeeps belonging to the institution ablaze and set up road blocks in Maldwani, Nainital and Muaali. Soon, government jeeps and buses were being attacked.

In Lucknow, the railways were singled out for attack. The computerised reservation office at the Badshahnagar station was ransacked and the computers destroyed. On 4 September, four railway bogies were burnt down in Gorakhpur, two in Deoria and one in Siddharthnagar. In Jhansi, the agitating students attacked the houses of railway officials, ransacked the railway station and set fire to a parcel godown. Result: goods worth Rs 50 lakhs were destroyed.

The attacks culminated in the gutting of the Meerut cantonment railway station on 7 September. A group of students doused the station master's office and adjoining rooms with petrol and set them on fire, to register their protest against the Raja's move.

The militant elements of the student unions of various universities got together to form what they called 'commando forces', to stoke the blaze even further. In Lucknow, on 2 September, they lobbed a crude bomb into the power transformer of the state guest house, located in the heart of the city.

Fortunately, however, the police defused the bomb in time, and no grave damage was inflicted. On the same day, the 'commandos' hurled a bomb at the residence of the vice-chancellor of Banaras Hindu University.

In such a scenario, the police could hardly be expected to exercise restraint. On 3 September, a mob of about 1,500 marched towards the police station in Salempur town, after damaging two police vans and setting fire to a couple of buses belonging to the state transport corporation. Unable to control the procession, the police opened fire, killing one and injuring many others.

THE ANTI-RESERVATION STIR ■ Protesters all over the country take to the stre

SHOOTER

The capital witnessed a massive student turn-out for days on end, as the disgruntled upper castes took to the streets to register their protest against what they regarded as reverse discrimination of the worst kind. As Delhi schools and colleges suspended classes, the students took up positions at the busiest intersections of the city in order to disrupt traffic. They succeeded admirably, as all of Delhi was thrown completely out of gear.

Initially, at least, the police stood around as mute spectators to this drama of discontent. But as the situation worsened with the stir dislocating life even in west and east Delhi (only the university areas were affected at first), the law and order agencies swung into action. Pitched battles were fought between the students and the Delhi police force. While no clear victor emerged in these skirmishes, one thing was clear: it would be some time before normalcy was restored to the capital.

Bandhs, lathi-charges, rallies, demonstrations and police firing were the order of the day. If the anti-reservationists took to the streets on one day, the next saw the pro-reservationists trying to outdo their show. Giving a helping hand to the agitators in attracting crowds were sundry ministers, lesser politicians and leaders of various political parties. The most prolific speaker was, of course, labour minister Ram Vilas Paswan, who addressed two rallies on consecutive days.

But, by far the most significant event was the joint show of strength by farmers and students on 4 September at the Boat Club. Braving the pouring rain, at least 10,000 people turned up to denounce the Mandal Commission. Jeans and dhotis, cigarettes and hookahs, sneakers and jootis, mingled together on the lawns as the Tikait-led Bharatiya Kisan Union (BKU) supporters joined the students of Delhi University in this "fight to the finish". The slogans ranged from the slickly yuppie ("Inky, pinky, ponky, V.P. Singh is a donkey") to the robustly rustic ("Yamunaji ke ghat pe, mila ek insaan. Hamne poocha naam to bole, main Mandal beimaan").

The star speaker was, without a doubt, the BKU vice-president Captain Bhopal Singh. "The students, like the farmers," Singh declared, "should be ready for any sacrifice in the cause of justice." The Captain extended an invitation to the students, asking them to join the panchayat at the BKU headquarters in Sisauli on 17 September, when the future course of action will be decided. Said the aggressive Singh: "Farmers will not allow parliamentarians and legislators to enter the villages if the Centre does not withdraw the Mandal Commission."

The rally, organised by the Anti-Mandal Commission Forum, was also addressed by the Panther Party president, Bhim Singh, who asked the government to refrain from taking recourse to the divide and rule policy popularised by the British.

With enthusiasm running high, a decision was taken to call a 50-hour bandh from 6 September onwards. The duration was later reduced to 24 hours, but even so, it came as somewhat of an anti-climax. Taxis and auto-rickshaws plyed as usual, though DTC (Delhi Transport Corporation) took around 1,000 buses off the roads.

There was trouble in the university area, though. The police forcibly entered Jubilee Hall and lathi-charged students. Tear-gas shells were lobbed into the building and as many as 70 people were injured. The police later blocked all gates out of the building and took 214 persons into custody to bring the situation under control.

Not surprisingly, the situation in the campus remained volatile for days after the police excesses. "They didn't even ask for permission before entering the building. Such an act is absolutely unprecedented," said a furious warden of the hostel. But Delhi police, which had pulled out all stops to control the agitation by now (all leave for personnel stood cancelled and a force of 50,000 was out, manning the streets), remained unrepentant.

But the anti-reservation agitators had cause for cheer, nonetheless. The much-talked about pro-reservation rally, organised by the National Union of Backward Castes, was quite literally a wash-out. About one lakh people were expected to turn up at the rally, to be addressed by Union ministers Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav among others, but no more than 2,000 people were in attendance as the show got underway.

Not daunted, Paswan got into the act with a vengeance: "People get married on the basis of caste, but when we talk of reservations they say that we are breaking the country. These anti-reservationists talk about dividing the country on the basis of caste, but everything is computed on the basis of caste anyway."

Yes, even the Raja's electoral calculations. And never mind if the country's youth goes quite wild on the streets in the bargain. •

Minu Jain/Delhi, Radhika Ramaseshan/Lucknow and Subodh Mishra/Patna

THE FINAL TABOO

V.P. Singh is the first Prime Minister of India who does not believe in a casteless society

It was Sharad Yadav who bragged that hereafter, Indian politics would be divided into pre-Mandal and post-Mandal phases. Last week, as a bloody caste war swept across north India, Yadav's prophecy began to seem uncannily accurate. Not one party was willing to get up and say what the press had been hollering for weeks: that reservation was not the way to solve the problem of poverty. But at the same time, no party would support the implementation of the Mandal recommendations either.

It was almost as though Prime Minister V.P. Singh—aided and abetted by the likes of Yadav and Ram Vilas Paswan—had broken the last taboo of Indian politics. Nearly every party accepted that there were votes to be won by playing the caste card, but because most serious politicians recognised that to do so would be to mortgage India's future, consensus against the politics of casteism had developed.

Now, V.P. Singh had challenged that consensus by staking his career on a nakedly casteist move that he hoped would win him the next election. Other national politicians reacted with outrage. Jyoti Basu warned of the danger of stoking the fires of casteism for short-term electoral gain. L.K. Advani reiterated the BJP's opposition to simple caste-based formulas. And Rajiv Gandhi actually got up in the Lok Sabha and called the Prime Minister a casteist.

But however genuine their indignation, India's politicians also came to terms with one uncomfortable fact: to oppose the principle of reservation for backward communities was to play into the Raja's hands and to give him the opportunity he needed to sell himself to the cow belt as the Thakur who loved the lower castes.

And so, while north India burned and policemen clashed with violent demonstrators only a few miles from New Delhi's Parliament House, the debate in the Lok Sabha took on an artificial, curiously unreal air. Vasant Sathe lambasted the Prime Minister for playing with fire, but his rhetorical flourishes seemed empty and meaningless when V.P. Singh stood up and asked him point-blank what the Congress' stand on reservation was.

It was as though everybody knew what the Prime Minister was doing was wrong, if not immoral, but nobody was willing to come right out and say it. And so the debate floundered turgidly on the exact nature of the reservations, on the manner in which Mandal had identified his backward castes, on whether there should have been a white paper on the proposal and on other such peripheral issues.

Outside Parliament, agitating students chanted: "Inky, pinky, ponky, V.P. Singh is a donkey." But inside the House, the Raja's position seemed unassailable.

And yet, as our politicians danced gingerly around the reservation time bomb, there were encouraging signs that even in a poor and largely illiterate country, the way of the demagogue did not hold unchallenged sway.

As the anti-reservation stir spread, supporters of the Mandal proposals warned that the silent majority—composed allegedly of those backwards who would benefit from reservation—would strike back. In fact, if such a majority did exist, then it was remarkably content being silent. A pro-reservation rally called in New Delhi by the two bearded demagogues of the Cabinet—Sharad Yadav and Ram Vilas Paswan—drew only 2,000 persons though the organisers (along with another failed demagogue, Syed Shahabuddin) had expected a crowd that ran into lakhs. Afterwards, Paswan was at a loss to explain the poor turnout. "Well, it rained heavily, didn't it?" was the best he could do.

(From right) Syed Shahabuddin, Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav at a pro-reservation rally: poor turnout

Within the Cabinet, there were growing fears that V.P. Singh had made the first major miscalculation of his career. Whereas earlier, the opposition to reservation had come from Arun Nehru and his friends, now, the dissenters were drawn from nearly every camp. At the last meeting of the Union Council of Ministers, V.P. Singh sat silently while his colleagues took the Mandal report apart. Among those who expressed grave reservations were Srikant Jena, Inder Gujral, Nathuram Mirdha, Raja Ramanna, M.G.K. Menon and M.S. Gurupadaswamy.

The views of Arun Nehru and his friends (Arif Mohammad Khan, Satyapal Malik, Ajit Singh, etc.) were already well-known. So finally, the Raja was left with just Paswan and Yadav along with Nitish Kumar, a Union minister of state from Bihar. That break-up—more than anything else—drove home to him the extent to which he had cut himself off from the Indian

V.P. Singh: playing the caste card

Forty-two years after the assassination of Mahatma Gandhi, caste is back in politics. And an unsavoury breed of politicians is defiantly upholding regressive values political consensus.

He responded in two ways: with concessions and bravado. The concessions were relatively minor. After Raja Ramanna pointed out the dangers posed by reservations to our scientific establishment, V.P. Singh announced that the Mandal recommendations would not apply to services related to science, technology, space and atomic energy. Ramanna was only partly mollified: his criticisms had been general in scope and not related solely to his own field.

It was the bravado that V.P. Singh was really counting on. Casting himself as a messiah of the backwards he told Parliament that each time anybody came forward to help the downtrodden, vested interests always opposed his endeavours. There was no caste war, he told incredulous MPs with a straight face, the scattered violence was the inevitable consequence of a revolutionary change directed at assisting the poor and the dispossessed.

This was nonsense, of course. SUNDAY has learned that before V.P. Singh announced his government's acceptance of the Mandal Commission Report, he had asked his trusted cabinet secretary Vinod Pande to prepare a paper on the subject. Pande sent him a 40-page note, predicting that a kind of caste war would result.

V.P. Singh disregarded this paper because he needed an effective populist stunt to counter Devi Lal's kisan rally. The cabinet secretariat was given 24 hours to prepare another note. This time Pande left the drafting to his subordinates and a seven-page paper in favour of the report was duly forwarded to the Prime Minister.

The Raja was pleased with its contents and went ahead and announced that the government was accepting the Mandal recommendations.

In the case of Vishwanath Pratap Singh, there is very little doubt that he regards the Mandal report as nothing more than a means of ensuring his political survival. Though his enemies have sought to portray him as a casteist, the truth is that V.P. Singh has never really thought in terms of the advancement of Ahirs, Kurmis and Yadavs. What caste sympathies he has demonstrated in the course of his career have been those that have benefited his own caste: the Rajputs.

Last week, Rajiv Gandhi embarrassed the Prime Minister in Parliament by digging out an interview he had given a few months ago. Asked about reservation, V.P. Singh had said: "The Mandal report is a political strategy and it would be foolish to implement it." Why had the Prime Minister changed his stand, asked Rajiv. V.P. Singh had no answer.

The way most national politicians see it, the issue goes beyond reservation and into the nature of Indian politics. Because of the influence of Mahatma Gandhi and Jawaharlal Nehru, India managed to move away from a society that was based on caste and create a political structure in which caste became less and less important. The sole exception was made for the Harijans because it was reckoned that Hindu society had treated them so appallingly that some positive discrimination was called for.

Now, by recasting society in terms of caste, V.P. Singh was creating a situation in which caste would never be forgotten and in which, everybody would have to know which caste his colleagues were. The Gandhian ideal of a casteless society had been junked.

It could have been said of V.P. Singh that he had not thought the issue out in detail, but remarkably, when Rajiv Gandhi asked him on the floor of the Lok Sabha if he believed in a casteless society, the Raja chose not to respond.

Finally, that was what was worrying. For the first time in its history, free India had a Prime Minister who had let political expediency drive him so far from the post-Independence consensus that he no longer found it necessary to affirm his faith in a casteless society.

It did not help matters that his chief lieutenant in his latest enterprise was a naked casteist. Intervening in the debate on the Mandal report, Sharad Yadav told Parliament that everybody believed in the caste system. As MPs looked shocked, he challenged: "Is there anybody here apart from Rajiv Gandhi who has married outside his caste?"

It was the audacity of the approach that astonished MPs. Forty-two years after the assassination of Mahatma Gandhi, caste was back in Indian politics. And under the pretext of packing government offices and medical colleges with Yadavs and Kurmis, an unsavoury breed of politicians was defiantly upholding those regressive values that the liberal society had pledged to uproot.

The tragedy was that the Prime Minister of India had reached the stage where he would let them get away with it if he could cling to his South Block desk for a few more weeks. ●

Rajiv Shukla/New Delhi

That's my seat

Is it? Complaining workers, students and politicians feel the Raja's moves on reservation are political, not practical

"Respected Rashtrapatiji, By the grace of God Almighty, I have got the privilege of presenting this report to you..."

If the late B.P. Mandal knew what his 1980 letter to Neelam Sanjiva Reddy, submitting the Backward Classes Commission report would do to the country a decade later, he might have invoked divine benediction of a very different kind. Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh is luckier. He may yet have the opportunity.

But only just. Ever since the Raja decided to implement the Mandal Commission's report which recommends a 27 per cent reservation for 'backward' classes in government jobs—over and above the 22.5 per cent that already exists for Scheduled Castes and Tribes—the country started to come apart at the seams.

Scores of people have died in anti-reservation riots, hundreds have been injured and thousands arrested. As grave as the body count, the administration regularly grinds to a halt in various parts of the country—when the privileged and the underprivileged face off in a row as old as the caste system itself—closing down government offices, paralysing trade, stalling education and disrupting citizens' lives in every way. Graver still, for V.P. Singh and his shaky, nine-month-old government, is the distinct possibility that the end is near.

"Merit kahan paida hota hai?" (Is merit born anywhere?) "...if injustice is being done to the people, we should not withdraw"

—V.P. SINGH, defending the additional 27 per cent reservations

"What Mr V.P. Singh has done in the name of reservation to the backward classes is a total fraud on them

—RAJIV GANDHI

"One should not speak with an eye to catch votes. One must speak realistically..." how can you improve the lot of these people by only reserving a place?"

—JYOTI BASU

For one thing, the reservation issue over 'other backward classes' (OBCs) is enough to turn political friends into cornered enemies. For another, to turn one section of a sympathetic vote-bank into avenging angels.

Janata Dal heavyweight and Orissa chief minister, Biju Patnaik, flatly refused to implement the Raja's will in his home state. Communist Party of India (Marxist) don Jyoti Basu, the chief minister of West Bengal and a key central government supporter, reacted acidly. "One should not speak with an eye to catch votes," he said. "One must speak realistically." For Basu, like numerous other politicians wary of antagonising constituents, reality meant holding off the central diktat.

The Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) was dismissive of the recommendations and plainly angry at another of the government's suggestions: for adding a further ten per cent reservation for minorities, which will bring the reserved bracket up to 59.5 per cent. "Why not declare the entire Indian people backward?" remarked BJP president L.K. Advani.

As for the avenging angels, violence appeared to be the only way out for a chance of redressal (see story on page 27).

The signs are ominous. For instance, a 30-year-old officer in New Delhi's ministry of defence points out that if the OBC quotas become effective in his department—in addition to the SC/ST quotas—he will get his next promotion at the age of 53. As a result, the army captain is on the lookout for a private sector job—some National Front politicians are keen that reservations apply to the private sector, too, but that will mean an all-out war—and is catching up on his reading at work. Like most of his colleagues. Says he: "We have lost the will to work."

PROTEST: V.P. Singh's decision has sparked off countrywide agitations

If this sentiment applies to the Air Force and the Indian Navy—besides the millions employed by the central and state governments—India could be facing its worst crisis since Independence. "Most of the beneficiaries of the Mandal Commission are just like any of us," says a senior, non-quota defence ministry official. "Extending reservations to the OBCs would mean that a good number of well-educated and well-off employees would get quicker promotions. I ask you, is this fair?"

The implicit suggestion is that sometimes, thanks to the quota system, undeserving people can get ahead of the better qualified simply by taking advantage of the reservation rules. This, say critics, would ruin efficiency completely. And casteist horror stories are already doing the rounds: do not go to a SC/ST/OBC doctor, goes one, because he is sure to kill you, he simply does not have the expertise. Do not go to a 'backward' architect, because the house he builds for you will surely fall down. Do not hire a quota-qualified engineer, he probably cannot use a calculator, and so on down the professions.

The Anti-Mandal Commission Forum, a New Delhi organisation that cropped up mere days after the government's pro-reservation policy went public, reacted caustically. It called the report a "farce in the name of social justice, a slap in the face of education and merit, a vote-catching measure based on censuses taken in 1891 and 1931 and misuse of power by the minority government...we Indians do indeed face a bleak future if we do not rise in unison against this injustice and blatant violation of the Fundamental Right of Equal Opportunity".

The anti-reservationists may have been still more upset if they knew what Mandal nearly recommended. "The population of OBCs, both Hindu and non-Hindu, is around 52 per cent of the total population of India. Accordingly," says the report, "52 per cent of all posts under the central government should be reserved for them." Perhaps the Commission, realising what a furore this would create, cut back in the very next sentence: "But this provision may go against the law laid down in a number of Supreme Court judgements wherein it has been held that a total quantum of reservation under Article 15 (4) and 16 (4) of the Constitution should be below 50 per cent...in view of this restraint, the Commission is obliged to recommend a (OBC) reservation of 27 per cent only, even though their population is twice this figure."

So, keep it all down to 49.5 per cent, a mere 0.5 per cent below the constitutionally debated limit, and all is well

This probably explains why students are at the forefront of the anit-Mandal agitation, afraid of losing out to quota-based compatriots in the rat race for better education and better jobs. Conversely, it also explains why there are as many pro-reservationists on the streets today as anti-reservationists. The "bleak future" that the Forum cites is as much applicable to the under-privileged as it is to the privileged.

M. KISHAN

ANTI-RESERVATION RIOT: setting the country aflame

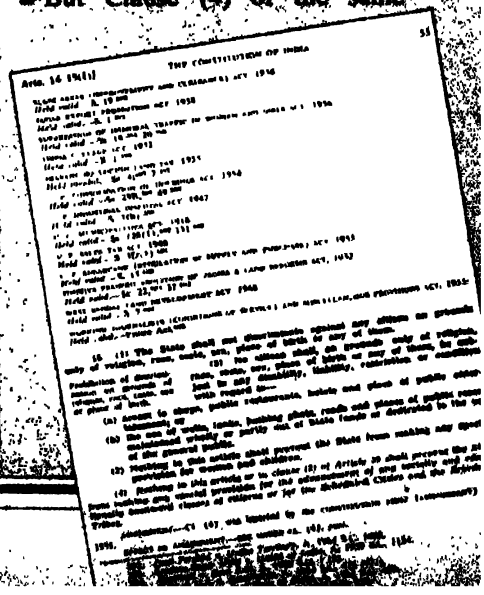
And in India, the under-privileged are larger in number. A reason why the Raja, despite all sorts of protest, has stuck to his guns. "So long as 22.5 per cent population of the country (SC/ST) have just eight per cent employment in the A and B categories of the central government services," the PM told the Lok Sabha, "and so long as the backwards, despite their being 52 per cent of the population, have just four per cent share, the privileged few will continue to say that Manu has been forgotten." But what about merit? "Merit kahan paida hota hai? (Is merit born anywhere?)" shot back the Raja, saying that surely, all the Scheduled Castes, Tribes and OBCs were not completely devoid of merit.

Granted, the PM has a point, and a noble one. One that speaks of the best intentions of any developing society—especially one so one-sided and fractious as India's. But provided the PM went about doing it the right way. Or, had the Mandal Commission gone about it the right way.

"The Mandal Commission Report does not constitute a policy," says professor Veena Das of the Delhi School of Sociology. "It is a very populist measure and the report is severely flawed on methodological and sociological counts." The government, says Das, has taken up rhetoric of the

Going by the book

The Indian Constitution is not much help on reservation—there are far too many possible interpretations



"In India, the State is by far the largest employer and the greatest dispenser of all sorts of patronage. Employment under the State and admission to various technical and professional institutions represent to an Indian citizen (the) two most important opportunities to participate in the life of the nation."
—Mandal Commission Report of the Backward Classes Commission, 1980.

The State recognises this fact. So does the present administration, who pushed through with the Mandal Commission's recommendations after two successive governments kept it on hold for a decade. The Indira and Rajiv regimes were prudent, say V.P. Singh's critics, decrying the Raja's implementing the Mandal Commission recommendations literally—for political ends. The Gandhis realised that patronage is the order of politics, they had to be selective about it, playing the cow belt against the south, playing for the minority vote while keeping the majority pacified, and so on.

The Raja is different. He has gone for the majority—"Twenty two point five per cent of the population (Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes) have eight per cent of the jobs, 52 per cent of the population (backwards) have just a four per cent share," etc.—citing socio-economic inequalities and constitutional rights. Only, it has backfired. The PM's additional 27 per cent reservation targeted at other backward classes (OBCs) has kicked off a massive, nationwide row.

And the Constitution is not much help for sorting things out, because while it guarantees against discrimination of any kind, it lays itself open to any number of legal interpretations, thanks to any number of provisions and sub-clauses. Prosecutors can have a field day. So can the defence.

- Article 15 of the Constitution prohibits the state from discriminating on grounds of race, religion, caste, sex or place of birth.
- But Clause (4) of the same backward classes in a cynical way, "and this has become the substitute for real policy measures". The government, says Das, has announced benefits, but not done any homework as to who the real beneficiaries are.

Or, it is spreading falsehood. "(Labour and welfare minister Ram Vilas) Paswan says that Shudras are the most oppressed. But it is a heterogenous category which includes the rich peasant class and is very often responsible for the oppression," says Das.

PRO-RESERVATION STIR: afraid of losing out

Some reservation flaws:

■ The identification of backward classes by caste was done on the assumption that "caste being the basic unit of social organisation of Hindu society, castes are the only readily and clearly recognisable and persistent collectivities..."

Right two thousand years ago, but misleading today. Hindus are not the only Indians, low caste people hold ministerial jobs, as does Paswan, the labour minister.

■ Shudras are the lowest of the low, so they need reservation.

According to our flawed caste system, yes. But according to today's reality, no. While caste wars run rampant in places like Bihar, with Thakurs and Brahmins killing Harijans, etc., this does not prevent them getting jobs. Incidentally, 16th century India saw a number of Shudra kingdoms.

■ Defining a caste group as being permanent. The fact that caste boundaries are not solid structures any more should have been recognised. Similarly, the fact that the OBC tag is a constantly shifting one and it is virtually impossible to pin down a person as an OBC, especially from decades-old information.

■ Not recognising backwardness as an economic malady.

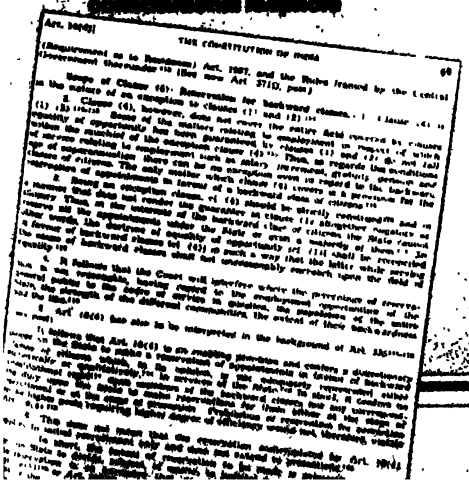
Ultimately, a person is underprivileged on economic grounds, anywhere in the world, except for South

Article specifies that nothing shall prevent the State from making any special provision for the advancement of socially or educationally backward classes, or for SC/STs.

■ However, there is a catch to the Clause. While it may appear to be a blanket provision, the basic problem is how to identify a 'legitimate' backward class. Besides, such "special provisions" may be struck down if they clash with the Fundamental Right of Equality guaranteed under Article 14 of the Constitution. For instance, according to Law Commission member P.M. Bakshi, reservation of an excessively high percentage of seats in technical institutions for such classes would be void. In fact, he says that reservation in excess of 50 per cent of available seats may not be upheld by law. (Including the Commission's recommendations for OBCs, total reservation exceeds Bakshi's premise.)

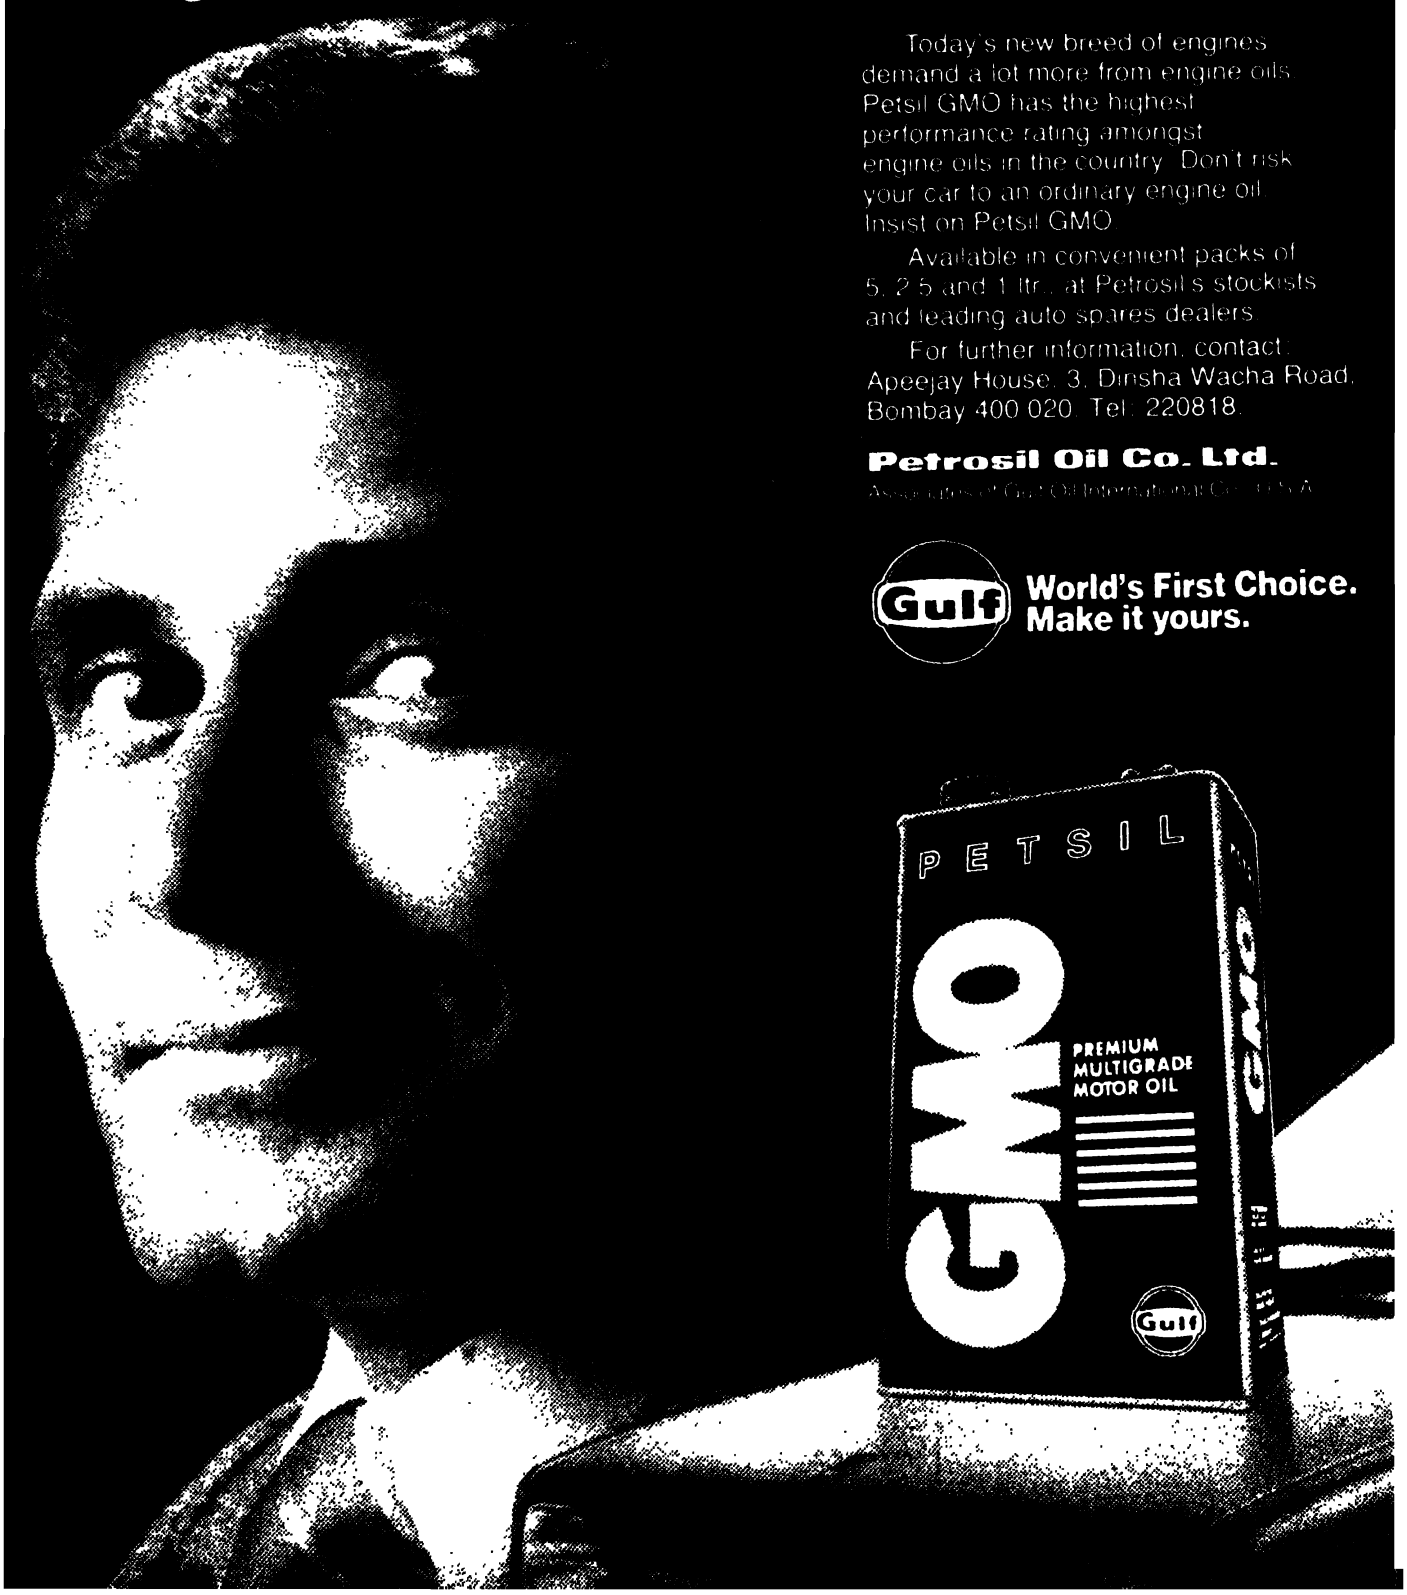
■ Judgements in at least four Supreme Court and High Court cases support the view that reservations made by virtue of Article 15 (4) cannot be "unduly wide". This is because Article 15 (4) has to be read with certain other provisions.

■ However, Article 46, a Directive Principle of State Policy, decrees that it is the State's obligation to promote, with special care, the educational and economic interests of weaker sections, particularly SC/STs. Article 16 (4) backs this up, favouring reservation of posts for "any backward classes" which, in the State's opinion, are not adequately represented in government service.



■ On the the other hand—and this is a major anti-reservationist plank—Article 335 lays down that reservation claims shall be considered in consistency with the "maintenance of efficiency in administration, in the making of appointments to services and posts in connection with the affairs of a union or a state". The Supreme Court has virtually held the efficiency of the administration as a limitation on Article 16 (4).

On the reservation count, say numerous legal experts, the Constitution can be used any which way to make a point in court.



But even the Constitution—and the law—require constants. Such as current, up-to-date lists of reserved classes to haggle over, if need be.

According to Articles 341 and 342 of the Constitution, the President may, by public notification, specify the castes, races or tribes to be included as SC/STs or backward in any state or Union Territory. The problem is, the Mandal Commission's lists relate to findings in 1980, and a decade is a long time for change. In Orissa, for example, 20 castes listed as OBCs by the Commission are already on the SC/ST list and several of the 224 castes and sub-castes on the OBC list are non-existent. Over to the Constitution, the Raja and Jaya-

CONTRADICTION: while Article 15(1) prohibits reservation, Articles 15(4) and 16(4) provide the constitutional loophole

"My car moves on petrol. My engine runs on GMO."

Today's new breed of engines demand a lot more from engine oils. Petsil GMO has the highest performance rating amongst engine oils in the country. Don't risk your car to an ordinary engine oil. Insist on Petsil GMO.

Available in convenient packs of 5, 2.5 and 1 ltr., at Petrosil's stockists and leading auto spares dealers.

For further information, contact: Apeejay House, 3, Dinsha Wacha Road, Bombay 400 020. Tel: 220818.

Petrosil Oil Co. Ltd.

Associates of Gulf Oil International Inc., U.S.A.

Gulf World's First Choice. Make it yours.

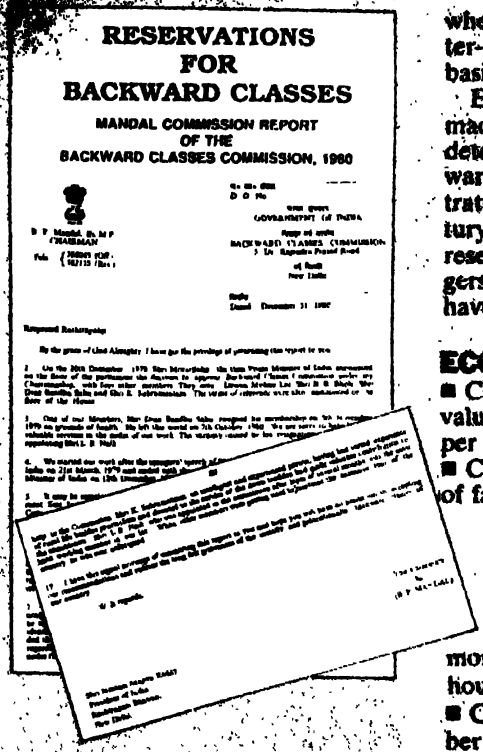
Who's what? And how

The Mandal Commission's yardstick for identifying 'backwards'



The Mandal Commission evolved 11 indicators for determining "social and educational backwardness". These were grouped under three heads—social, educational and economic—these were:

SOCIAL INDICATORS

- Castes/classes considered as socially backward by others.
- Castes/classes which mainly depend on manual labour for their livelihood.
- Castes/classes where at least 25 per cent females and 10 per cent males above the state average get married at an age below 17 years in rural areas and at least 10 per cent females and 5 per cent males do so in urban areas.
- Castes/classes where participation of females in work is at least 25 per cent above the state average.

EDUCATIONAL INDICATORS

- Castes/classes where the number of children in the age group of 5-15 years who never attended school is at least 25 per cent above the state average.
- Castes/classes where the rate of student drop-out in the age group of 5-15 years is at least 25 per cent above the state average.
- Castes/classes amongst whom the proportion of matriculates is at least 25 per cent below the state average.

RESERVATIONS
FOR BACKWARD CLASSES
MANDAL COMMISSION REPORT OF THE BACKWARD CLASSES COMMISSION, 1980

CONTROVERSIAL: sociologists claim the report is flawed

The educational parameters appear to be sensible. As far as the economic indicators go, the drinking water provisi encompasses vast stretches of the countryside. And with increasing breakdown of civic amenities, big chunks of cities, where drinking water—any water—is unavailable on a regular basis.

Even if the entire government machinery was put to work to determine exactly who is a 'backward', it would take the administration till well into the next century to figure out eligibility for job reservations. The courts, the foreigners and the vote-banks should have interesting times ahead.

ECONOMIC INDICATORS

- Castes/classes where the average value of family assets is at least 25 per cent below the state average.
- Castes/classes where the number of families living in kuccha houses is at least 25 per cent above the state average.
- Castes/ classes where the source of drinking water is beyond half a kilometre for more than 50 per cent of the households.
- Castes/classes where the number of households having taken consumption loan is at least 25 per cent above the state average.

Of the lot, some yardsticks are plainly nonsensical. For example, if a rich person thinks a less well-heeled soul is beneath contempt, then the latter, according to the Commission, is a 'backward'. This would include everyone in the country, except the richest person.

Africa, where the colour of skin plays a larger role. The Mandal Commission cites vague generalities such as those regarded as socially backward by "others" to determine OBCs. Incredibly, both the Commission and the Raja played down the economic side to the story.

Says Das, the sociologist: "A policy of reservation which signals that merit and excellence are at a discount will encourage a brain drain amongst students and scientists which the country can ill afford."

This comment may sound a little far-fetched, snobbish and a little like playing the prophet of doom, but this future is not impossible. Perhaps a way out, suggests Manoranjan Mohanty, a professor of political science at the University of Delhi, is to make reservation a part of a wider range of policies. "For real development of the deprived sections," says Mohanty, "the government has to formulate special education programmes, special employment drives, land reforms, increase small industry capacity. Productive assets have to be created and made available to this section." He adds: "Without these, it is futile to talk about their share in the power structure. In fact, the government has not even spoken about reservations for the Eighth Plan."

Perhaps, the government would be better off implementing the various national missions—immunisation, literacy, oilseeds, drinking water, etc.—to improve the lot of the people, all the people, rather than restricting itself to proselytisation through reservation. Even the Mandal report suggests criteria on economic grounds (see box: Who's what? And how).

The fact that the present regime has slowed down on the missions and the fact that the Raja has totally discounted reservation on economic grounds lend credence to the argument that the entire OBC issue is nothing but the election stunt of a government which senses its doom. ●

Nirmal Mitra and Minu Jain/New Delhi

Issues, not personality

Madhu Kishwar replies to V. Gangadhar

V. Gangadhar's comments in Untruth Involves Us All (Media Musings 2-8 September) are such a confused jumble that virtually every paragraph contradicts some other. The writer has clearly not done his homework and displays a flagrant disregard for facts. It is, therefore, necessary to set the record straight, if for no other reason than to clear Mr Gangadhar's confusion.

Gangadhar attributes my critique of the Shourie style of journalism to a recent "fall out" and asserts that Shourie and I had till recently, been working together for "human rights, value-based politics". I do wish it was true. For, it grieves me no end that someone as talented, energetic and hardworking as Arun Shourie should have parted company with human rights and civil liberties groups so long ago. I am sure my disappointment at Arun Shourie's turning against human rights groups, beginning with Operation Bluestar in Punjab, is shared by many other activists fighting for the same cause. How we wish Arun Shourie had been worthy of the charge Gangadhar levels against him, and had actually been associated with all those who "vent their ire against state terrorism in Punjab and Kashmir". Had Gangadhar actually glanced through the Indian Express instead of simply "musing" over it, he would have known that Shourie, much to the consternation of human rights activists, consistently supported the strong-arm politics of state repression in dealing with the crisis in Punjab and Kashmir. There has been no change in this stance, whether Shourie was pro or anti-Rajiv.

In fact, as early as January 1986, I had drawn attention to Shourie's predilection for spreading hatred and mistrust of minorities especially Muslims. In my response to his three-part article on Jinnah (The Man Who Broke Up India), I had pointed out that under the guise of writing about the much-hated Jinnah, Shourie was actually using the past to (a) justify the state machinery's becoming more and more repressive (b) argue in favour of a highly centralised, authoritarian polity and (c) justify the increasingly communal and anti-minority standpoint being assumed by Hindus, in the name of national unity. (26 January, 1986. The Illustrated Weekly of India).

This is just to remind Gangadha, that the so-called "fall out" is neither sudden nor recent.

Gangadhar accuses Independent Initiative of being "selective in exposing corruption and poll malpractices" by focusing on "selected constituencies represented by people it does not like" referring to what he thinks was its pro-Janata Dal and anti-Congress bias. But then he himself admits that Independent Initiative reported widespread rigging in Ajit Singh's constituency Baghpat, i.e., it did not spare Janata Dal leaders when it saw evidence of poll rigging being done at their behest.

Independent Initiative was a short-lived coming together of various individuals and members of human rights organisations with diverse political inclinations. The only point of common consensus amongst us was that elections should be fair and peaceful, and malpractices if any, should not go unreported. I have no hesitation in admitting that most of us who volunteered for the Independent Initiative poll monitoring exercise, had strong misgivings about the continuation of Congress rule and feared that the party would use any means, fair or foul, to "win" the elections. Also since they controlled the government machinery at the Centre and in many of the states, rigging seemed more likely to take place on behalf of the Congress party. Hence the special focus on the constituencies of Congress stalwarts, especially Rajiv Gandhi's Amethi. However, even though a few members of Independent Initiative were close to the Janata Dal/ National Front, most of us were and remained distant and aloof from the present ruling party.

The chief flaw in the Independent Initiative effort was not its political bias but its poor organisation, ad hoc ill-planned manner of functioning, which meant it was able to monitor only a handful of constituencies, chiefly those within easy reach of Delhi. Most of us were very unhappy with this limitation which could have easily been overcome with some foresight

I have not been, and am not, a defender of (left) Devi Lal style politics, despite its pro-rural bias. But I am against the witch-hunt being carried out by the Arun Shourie-edited Indian Express with Lal as the target and systematic planning. But that is not what Gangadhar objects to. His charge relates to our wilful partisan reports and would be valid only if he could demonstrate that Independent Initiative teams resorted to untruths or deliberate cover-up exercises. Not even its harshest critics have alleged that Independent Initiative teams reported rigging where it had not taken place or that it failed to report poll malpractices in constituencies of non-Congress leaders despite being witness to them. Even though I was not among the founders of the organisation, but only one of the many volunteers who came forward to form teams for the polling-day monitoring, I can say with certainty that there was no resistance to our suggestions for including any constituency where Janata Dal leaders were likely to use strong-arm methods to get votes. That is how Devi Lal's Rohtak and Sikar and Ajit Singh's Baghpat came to be included.

Gangadhar accuses me of "ignoring the mass killings by terrorists in Punjab while giving vent to "ire against state terrorism in Punjab and Kashmir". It is distressing that 'media analysts' do not care to look at the record carefully, and stick to ill-informed generalities. Manushi and I have been unequivocal in condemning terrorist violence and have spoken openly against their indulging in gun battles in religious places as well as their attempts to foment a situation of civil war within the Sikh community. I suggest that Mr Gangadhar look at some of the previous issues of Manushi, especially number 30 (1985), number 32 (1986), number 41 (1987) and number 58 (1990).

Mr Gangadhar's contemptuous dismissal of the efforts of human rights groups in speaking against state repression is worrying. For, it represents a trend: of people becoming increasingly intolerant of articulation of grievances by groups that consider themselves wronged.

Finally, it really surprises me that Gangadhar should read my article in The Illustrated Weekly of India (19-25 August 1990) as a defence of Devi Lal and ridicule it as "the sudden awakening of rural consciousness among a section of our urban elite" born out of "a guilty conscience". I have not been, and am not, a defender of Devi Lal style politics, despite its pro-rural bias. The Operation Hush-Up following his granddaughter-in-law's death was no less reprehensible than similar attempts to extricate Sanjay Singh from his alleged involvement in the Syed Modi murder case. My purpose in writing that article was to protest against the witch hunt being carried out by the Indian Express and emulated by some others as well. There is cause for serious alarm at the increasing consolidation of the "Ramlila syndrome" in Indian journalism, whereby certain politicians begin to be systematically portrayed as the incarnations of evil and are sought to be destroyed like Ravanas as soon as they lose favour with the press.

It is not just Antulay who suffered this fate. Chandra Shekhar has been destroyed in a similar fashion. Likewise, Rajiv Gandhi. He was unnecessarily projected as a goody-goody Mr Clean when he first came to power. And then rubbished in a disproportionate manner when he lost favour with certain sections of the press. The tendency of newspaper editors to join different political lobbies to bring down rival politicians is a substantial hurdle in the way of their performing the job of disseminating information with some degree of impartiality and credibility. I, for one, would be no less comfortable if the Indian Express began targeting Bal Thackeray or L.K. Advani for "extermination" the way it went after Devi Lal, Antulay or Rajiv Gandhi.

As for the "awakening of rural consciousness" I would request Mr Gangadhar to confirm for himself that it is neither "sudden" nor born out of a "guilty conscience". Since 1978, when the first issue of Manushi was published, we have tried our utmost, with modest success, to focus on the life conditions of the most disadvantaged sections of India's women, namely, the rural poor. The inaugural issue of Manushi deliberately chose the picture of a peasant/Dalit woman from Maharashtra to put on the cover. We have maintained this commitment despite repeated protests from many of our urban readers that Manushi does not give adequate coverage to the problems of the urban middle-class woman, does not highlight enough "success stories". We do it not out of "guilt" but from a sense of enlightened self-interest. For, we believe, that the urban elite can ignore the problems of the poor and disadvantaged sections of this country only at its own peril.

Attempts to create islands of opulence in big cities while letting rural India rot due to neglect, will lead the country to an inevitable civil war, jeopardising our very survival, not just our privileges. In fact, my long-standing complaint against Devi Lal is that his commitment to bettering the lot of the rural population is half-hearted and erratic, that he is too engrossed in the politics of crumb-sharing to pay single-minded attention to improving the lot of the peasantry on whose behalf he claims to speak.

Unfortunately, our mass media is so deeply steeped in its pro-urban bias that it cannot stomach even the half-hearted, erratic, pro-rural noises of a Devi Lal and must hound him out in order to silence him. •

There is no cause for serious alarm at the "Ramlila syndrome" in Indian politics, whereby certain politicians are portrayed as Ravanas and then destroyed. Both Chandra Shekhar (right) and Rajiv Gandhi suffered this fate

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

Mandalam! Mandalam!

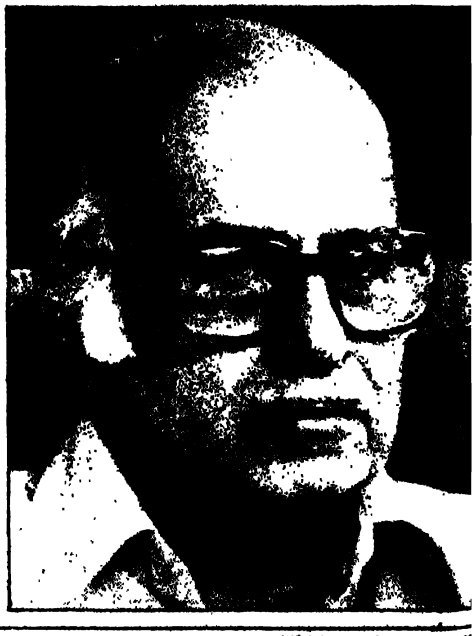
The Raja's latest mantra to enchant the electorate

Those whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. V.P. Singh is so beside himself with joy at having discovered what he thinks is the sure-fire way to rid himself of the Tau, Chandra Shekhar, Biju Patnaik, Advani, Jyoti Basu, Rajiv Gandhi and everybody else in one fell blow that he hasn't paused to consider whether Mandal is a cracker—or just a damp squib. And what boots us to mock him his moment of hope? For, the more he nurses the illusion that Mandal will lead him to Valhalla, the sooner can we all hope to see him come a cropper. Or, perhaps, it is because he knows the end is nigh that he clutches at the one straw that no one else wants to own.

If there was any sincerity to this government having put Mandal on top of the nation's agenda, surely one would have thought the Mandal Report would have warranted, at least, a section to itself in the National Front manifesto? But, no, all that the electorate got ten months ago in the NF manifesto was a throwaway line (comprising all of nine words!) tagged on to a turgid paragraph about the "weaker sections". No wonder neither ghostwriter Arun Shourie nor drafting committee chairman Chandra Shekhar paid it the slightest attention. And no wonder either that, Janata Dal MP, Ram Avadesh Singh Yadav (the very symbol of all that is—or could be—backward in our benighted land!) twice walked noisily out of Central Hall protesting the NF government's failure, in successive President's addresses to Parliament, to give any meaningful assurances on implementing Mandal.

And now, suddenly, nothing it seems matters more to V.P Singh than the precipitate implementation of a report gathering dust for the best part of a decade. His calculation is breathtakingly cynical. Since more than half the electorate (52 per cent to be precise) is "backward", bring them on board—and the battle's all but won. Add to this 22 per cent SC/STs—and that makes a nice three-quarters. Garnish with a twist of minority sentiment—and the count goes to 90 per cent. Throw in ten per cent reservation for the "poor" and VP has a full hand! There is no concern in any of this for the really backward. Merely an electoral stunt in the Master Acrobat's continuing display of vertebraeless twisting.

Hence too VP's shrill refrain: are you for Mandal? Or are you against him? Answer! As in this shibboleth lay the litmus test of political respectability.



Where, might one ask was VP himself all these years?

For 18 months after Mandal gave his report, V.P. Singh was chief minister of our largest state. Not a choo on Mandal escaped him in all that time. He then became a minister in Indiraji's Cabinet. And for the next two-and-a-half years kept quiet as a dormouse. Not even in debates in Parliament did he vouchsafe the country that his heart belonged to Mandal. Elevated to No. 2 in the Rajiv government, the Raja displayed his ancestral courage: not a murmur escaped him, not a sigh of dissent. He tells us now that he was too overawed to speak. To squeaks of delight from his yokels, he tells of how Rajiv Gandhi's dictatorial ways gave no scope for his conscience to give tongue. Which makes one merely wonder why this brave Thakur, scion of the 1000-year old House of Jaichand, clung as tenaciously as he did to his seat in the Cabinet. And, when Rajiv booted him out, went on yowling for months, "He is my leader, my only leader!"—in a desperate bid to be taken back in. The fact is that the Commission's Report was totally peripheral to VP's concerns—until the calculus of caste vote-banks woke him up to the [illegible] of Mandal! Far be it from us to tell him everything you wanted to know about casteism—but were afraid to ask.

Which brings us to V.P. Singh's next debating point: show us the way, he taunts the Congress, by ending caste-based reservations in Congress-run Andhra and Karnataka.

Not even Jawaharlal Nehru could stop state governments from succumbing to the populist folly of caste-based reservations. But he did all he could to inure the Centre from the disease. Which is why in August 1961, the Government of India formally rejected the Kalelkar Commission's lists of backward castes—pending the devising of "objective criteria" to identify the backward classes. The damage of caste-based reservations was thus contained. V.P. Singh has now reopened that Pandora's box. He is being utterly disingenuous if he can't see the difference between reservations in the states and reservations at the Centre.

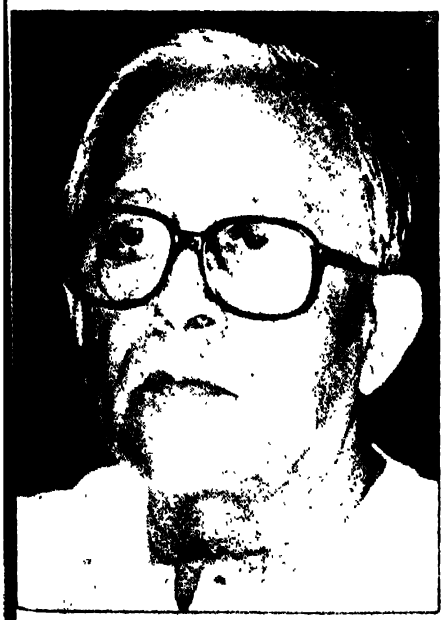
First, it is central services officers (IAS, IPS etc.) who man the top administrative posts even in the states. So, the damage done to administrative efficiency (and probity) by caste-based reservations in the provincial civil services has, for decades, been offset by the refusal to countenance such a basis for reservations in the all-India services. Now the sins of the states will be compounded by the sins of the Centre.

Second, the escape route from casteist reservations in the states has always been service under the central government. Now that route is blocked. It can only be unblocked if V.P. Singh is quickly sent packing.



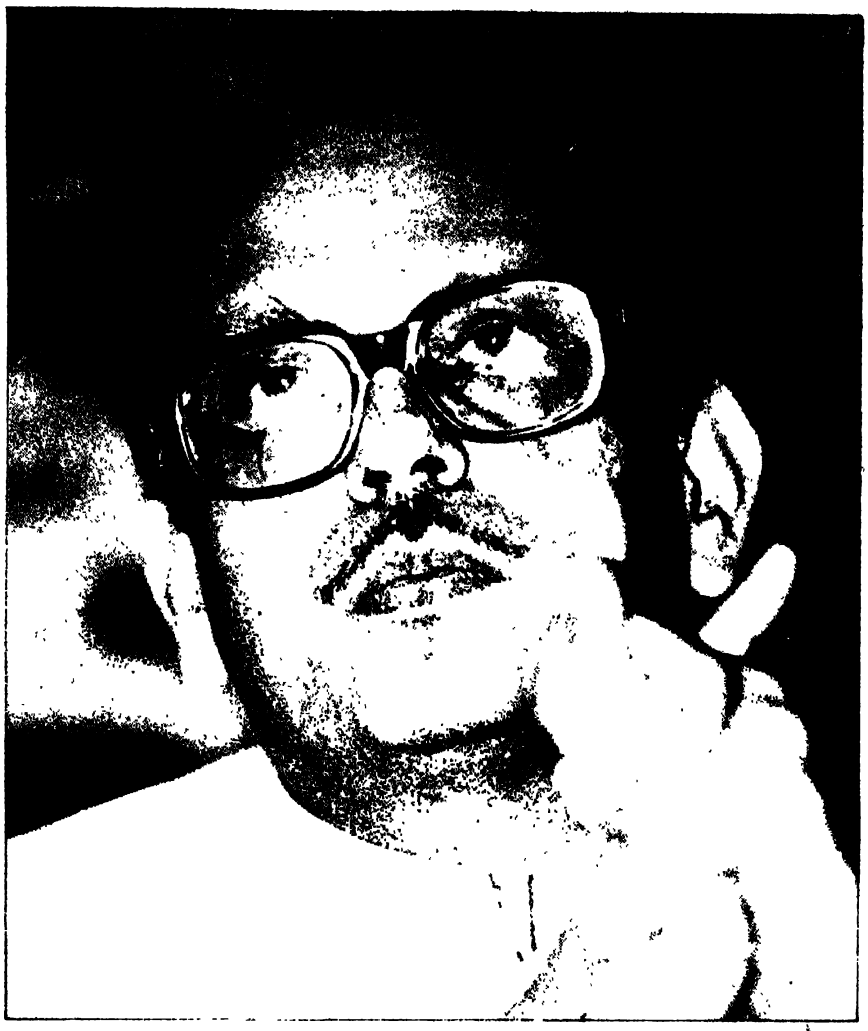
Third, the constitutional responsibility for ensuring the unity of the country vests in the Centre, not in the states. Caste-based reservations rend the fabric of our nationhood. What the states can get away with, the Centre can't.

It was from community-based reservations at the Centre that we went from unity to Partition. It is from caste-based reservations that the next greatest threat to our national integration arises. So, a word of advice in your ear, Raja Sahib: it is not enough to take the Jinnah cap off your head. It is over more important to remove Jinnah from your heart.

V.P. Singh is so beside himself with joy at having discovered what he thinks is the sure-fire way to rid himself of the Tau, Chandra Shekhar, Biju Patnaik, Advani, Jyoti Basu, and Rajiv Gandhi, that he hasn't paused to consider whether Mandal is a cracker or a damp squib

A Mandal alphabet

A if for AHIR
Whom VP says he adores
It's his vote that he's after
His real progress he abhors



B is for BACKWARD
Emblazoned on the Raja's flag:
"With elections round the corner,
The cat's in the bag!"

C is for CASTE
Our VP's new toy
It may take us to perdition
But for the PM is pure joy

D is for DIALOGUE
That VP eschews
For he fears that it might break
His dream of voters in queues

E is for ELECTORATE
VP's poor dupes
They thought he was straight
And now find he's all hoops!

F is for FORWARD
Who is challenged to fight
For Paswan says caste determines
What is wrong and what is right

The more V.P. Singh nurses the illusion that Mandal will lead him to Valhalla, the sooner can we all hope to see him come a cropper. It is because he knows the end is nigh that he clutches at the one straw that no one else wants to own

G if for GOD
Who must save us now
As we shift into reverse
So that forward we go

H is for HOLISTIC:
The Kalelkar/Mandal approach
Which VP's thrown out of the cupboard
Only on jobs to encroach

I is for INDIA
The dream of our youth
Our casteless society
Wrecked by amibitious uncouth

J is for JINNAH
Who cut us in two parts
A trifling matter for VP
Who's splitting us in four castes!

K is for KINETIC
Which is what "potential" becomes Unless quotas and restrictions
Mess up all the sums

L is for the LAW
As laid down by the Court:
"Don't mire us in caste, please,
Don't cut out future short!"

M is for MANDAL
He of noble aspirations
Alas, the Way to the Other Place
Is paved with good intentions

N is for NATION
Whose standard fluttered in the breeze
Until VP decreed caste and community
On which our nation must freeze

O is for OTHER
Backward Castes in the book
Never mind that it was "Classes"
At which the Commission was to look

P is for the POOR
Who VP says will "dilute"
The vociferous Backwards
With the deaf and the mute

Q is for QUOTAS
That are a matter of birth
For VP has little patience
With merit or with worth

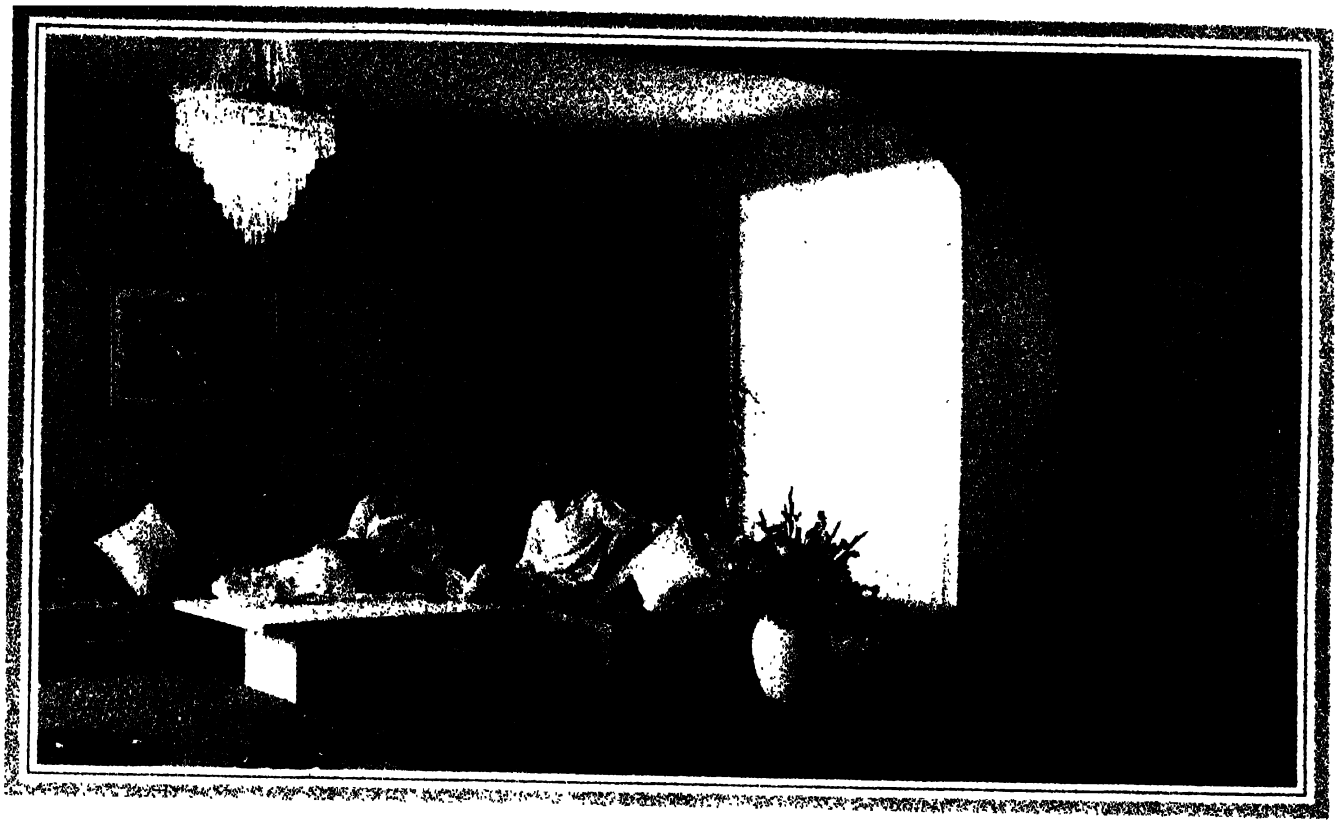
R is for RESERVATIONS
That VP will impose
To cobble an Ajgar together
As to the hustings he goes

S is for the poor STUDENTS
Bludgeoned in the streets
Fodder for the casteists
Who want quotas not feats

T, of course, is the TAU
The cause of it all
Scared Humpty Dumpty silly
Till he had a great fall!

U if for UNITY
The Mahatma's great gift
Born in '32 in Yervada
Now buried in VP's party rift

V is for VICTORY
Which awaits us at the end
When VP is banished
And we're back on the mend!



W is for the WARS
In which VP's plunged the country:
Caste Community and Language,
Dehati and Shehri

X marks the spot
Where a backward ceases to be,
Transmuted into forward
We must get there, mustn't we?

Y is for our YOUTH
Whose hopes have been marred
As VP chooses to play
His ace casteist card!

And Z is for ZERO
Our VP's preferred mark
For fear that anything higher Might pull us out of the dark! ●

The views expressed in this column are those of its author and do not purport to constitute an official statement of the Congress party's position

The Silk People. He loves crystal chandeliers. She loves the candlelight. Their walls love Luxol Silk.

Silk sheen . . . silken feel

Drape your walls with Luxol Silk — the richest emulsion in the world.

BERGER Luxol Silk

BERGER PAINTS

LINTAS (CAL)/BP/LS/P1/2019

In the Gulf, we've to take a little pepper while having a lot of wire rods

Not only in the Gulf, in the USA and in Australia, in Japan and in New Zealand, in Bangladesh, in China and West Germany and in many other countries, Tata Steel, today, is exporting a wide range of products.

The objectives are evidently clear. To ensure foreign exchange earnings, which are a national priority, and to establish a long-term quality leadership for the Company and the country in the global market.

In just six years, Tata Steel (with a turnover of Rs 146 crore) has become one

persuaded people

of the country's largest exporters. Its range not only covers engineering goods and raw materials but also commodities such as black pepper, coffee and black tiger shrimps. In spite of its large imports of equipment and raw materials for the on-going modernisation drive, Tata Steel, today, is a nett exporter. For 1985-86, the Company won the prestigious National Award for Exports.

Today, Tata Steel is spreading all its pioneering expertise and experience across the seas to build a long term base for India—all over the world.

Tata Steel Exports:

Steel and Steel-based engineering products	- Wire rods, re-inforcing bars, structurals, tubes, wires, bars, cranes, rolls, bearings, etc.
Raw Materials	- Chrome ore & concentrates, manganese ore, ferro-manganese, ferro-chrome, charge chrome, refractories, etc.
Commodities	- Black pepper, coffee, black tiger shrimps.

Discussions that are opening up new markets in the Gulf

TATA STEEL DECADE OF EXPORTS
1990 2000

TATA STEEL
The first and still the foremost

WHO'S THAT CHAP IN A GANDHI CAP?

The wisdom of asking film star Vinod Khanna to lead an India Day parade down Lexington Avenue, New York, is somewhat questionable. But the paunchy Bappi Lahiri look-alike took his role seriously enough to turn up in the standard politician's ensemble: a white kurta-pyjama, complete with Gandhi cap and designer dark glasses.

Vinod Khanna and wife Kavita at the India Day parade; (above) receiving a citation: no, he doesn't look any better in Western clothes

Only, unfortunately, the extremely large actor ended up looking like a villainous politico, straight out of Aaj Ka MLA. The only slightly incongruous touch was attractive wife Kavita (nee Daftary), tripping daintily by his side.

Playing the Grand Marshall of the parade organised by the Federation of Indian Association—with such stalwarts as Indian ambassador to the US Abid Hussain, Indian ambassador to the UN C.N. Gharekhan, Indian consul-general Rajendra Rai and New York Mayor David Dinkins in attendance—Khanna made a rousing speech from the review stand, lauding the Indians settled in the States.

They were, he said, not just "acting as ambassadors of their culture but also taking the greatest pride in it and keeping it alive in spite of the geographical distance".

In the evening, however, it was back to the regulation polo-neck shirt and jacket for Khanna, at the dinner hosted by the FIA.

Apparently, he draws the line at fancy dress after eight pm.

COURTING TROUBLE

That's not quite how he would have expected the Gandhi saga to end. But director Sir Richard Attenborough may well end up facing criminal charges, levelled by the Government of India.

Apparently, the director had entered into an agreement to hand over a portion of his profits to the Cine Workers Association Welfare Fund. As per this arrangement, Attenborough was to pay Rs 3.8 crores—out of Rs 6.4 crores which constituted his earnings—into the fund.

Only the director reneged on this commitment.

Sir Richard Attenborough: money, money, money

As of now, the government is exercising the soft option of conducting negotiations to work out a compromise. But, disclosed information and broadcasting minister P. Upendra, in the face of Attenborough's continuing intransigence, it may well have to institute a criminal case against the director.

SARA JAHAN MERA

"I don't want this serial to end," wailed Moheena Singh as the last episode of Sara Jahan Hamara went on the air.

Her despondency was understandable. The serial, in which the attractive Singh made her debut as director, had been an unqualified hit with prime-time audiences, with Dr Kamat and his little family charming their ways into the hearts of the viewers.

While the cast has dispersed, to either go back to school or move on to other projects, the chirpy director confesses to being dreadfully depressed, now that the serial's over. She has written to Mandi House, asking for an 13-episode extension. "But knowing Doordarshan," she says, "I don't think it will come through. And if it does, the kids will have become moms and dads by then."

Moheena Singh on location: dream debut

But Singh is not wasting any time mourning the attitude of Mandi House. She has already begun work on her next serial, Professor Vasan, based on real-life murder mysteries culled from police files.

But even here, Moheena will have a few kids running in and out of the frames. "I can't do without children," she discloses ruefully.

BAREFOOT IN THE MUSEUM

For Maqbool Fida Husain, it's now barefoot at the Victoria and Albert Museum, London.

Merging perfectly into the bearded Roman sculptures in the museum's gallery and sketching for all he's worth, Husain is currently engaged in raising funds for the Indian section, now nearing completion. (It is scheduled for a November opening.)

The rough sketches are only the preliminary work towards a major painting, of which the V&A will make a limited number of copies, each of them signed by the maestro. These will, then, be auctioned off, the money going towards the India Gallery.

Back in Bombay, there will be another auction of a Husain, on the occasion of the painter's 75th birthday, with editor of the Weekly and The Independent, Pritish Nandy, wielding the hammer.

But before that, the artist will be felicitated by his friends at his Mahalakshmi studio. At least, by those of them who can afford to shell out Rs 1,000 for dinner.

M.F. Husain: from one auction to another

ALOKE MITRA

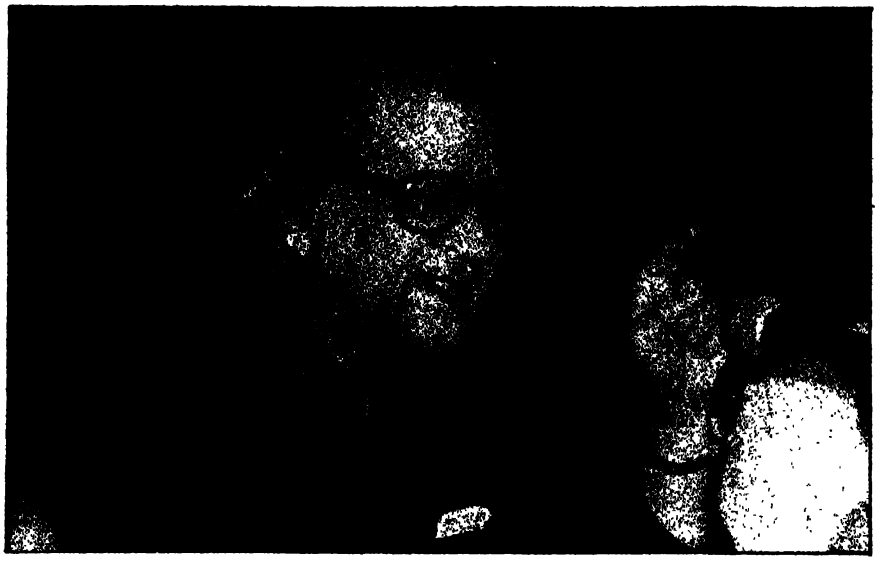
TAMIL LOVER

His first halt in Madras was at the Hindi Prachar Sabha office. Nonetheless, Uttar Pradesh chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav valiantly maintained that he had no desire to impose Hindi on the country.

He was, he informed the bemused Tamilians on his recent visit to their state, only against the use of English. And what's more, he had a special love for the southern languages, especially Tamil.

Mulayam Singh Yadav: Hindi is best, but Tamil's not too bad

The hype notwithstanding, the first question shot at the UP chief minister at his press conference was in English.



Please switch to Tamil, asked a piqued Mulayam Singh.

I'm sorry, retorted the newsman, my mother tongue is Malayalam. Can you find someone who can translate that into Hindi.

No, there wasn't anyone.

And Yadav answered the question in English.

But no, he hasn't learnt any lessons—neither in Hindi, nor in Tamil. ●

Abid Hussain

INTERVIEW

"India needs the US"

Abid Hussain on India's priorities

H.E. the ambassador of India to the US. This is quite a change for Abid Hussain, former industry and commerce secretary, and the country's most vocal planner. Hussain met SUNDAY's Siddharth Dube in Washington, and the outcome is a frank discussion, where the ambassador's appreciation of US economics comes through clearly. And his dissatisfaction about where India is going wrong. Excerpts from the interview:

SUNDAY: Is this your first extended stay in the United States?
Abid Hussain: Yes, the very first. And I've never been ambassador either.

Q: This is a major change for you, representing India instead of planning policy.
A: I would say it's a very different job from previous ones that I've held—especially those I've handled in India—whether as commerce secretary, industry secretary or member of the Planning Commission. Those were jobs that concerned planning and executing national policies.

Q: Have there been any challenges already in your tenure as ambassador to the US?
A: There have been a number of interesting challenges that I've encountered in America. When I came here, the first issue was of Super 301—that was the trade problem which we were having with the US. If the US was actually to take action under 301, then I think we would have been very badly hit, because for us, the US is a very important market. We are actually planning to have a higher level of trade.

Therefore, first of all to be c[illegible]d with Japan and Brazil was not [illegible] happy thing. Then, to remain a[illegible] that particular list when the other [illegible] were dropped became all the more obvious, and there was a nervousness in the market both here as well as in India. I'm very happy that the Bush administration was able to find a way out, and that it need not take action under 301.

Q: But the GATT (General Agreement of Trade and Tariffs) deadline...
A: Recently, I met ambassador (Warren) Lavorel, who is the chief negotiator of the US for GATT, and I was very happy that after the 14 June announcement by US trade representative Carla Hills, they have moved quickly to actually terminate Super 301 cases against India, while cases against Japan have not been terminated and simply remain suspended. Now, this is a sign of the US desire to bring a positive note into our relationship. We should capitalise on it and extend our areas of cooperation.

Q: But economic relations with the US are also dependant on India's political situation. Isn't that true?
A: Yes. The second challenge, which is a continuing challenge, relates to Kashmir. I must say that in the context of the changing international scene, we were able to be more effective than we were in the last few years. With the change in the geopolitical situation, with the Soviet Union and the US coming closer, and in the Afghan case a toning down of aggressive postures on both sides, has made things easier.

It is in the background of these geopolitical changes that we were able to convince the US administration, some important people on Capitol Hill and others that India has a good case when it says that secession cannot be tolerated, when it insists that the Kashmir issue should be within the framework of the Shimla agreement. We found that the US administration was responsive to our ideas. The Gates Mission did a marvellous piece of work; they told both the governments over there (Indian and Pakistani) that anybody who precipitated a war would be wrecking its relationship with the US. This was sound advice to some of the hotheads in Pakistan.

Also, we have made it very clear that India believes in freedom of speech and action, and that we have nothing to hide from anybody. But a state can't turn away from a situation where a small group of people are using rifles, bombs and evil equipment for enforcing their will. The state is getti[illegible]volved in a situation which is certainly costing human lives, and we are very unhappy about this, but it is not a question of our being indifferent to human rights but it is a question of our trying to be effective against terrorism. I think the Government of India took certain bold measures, such as permitting more foreign journalists to go to Punjab and Kashmir, and many of their reports datelined Kashmir and Punjab have convinced people on Capitol Hill that India is not averse to the suggestion that people who want to look into human rights concerns be permitted to do so. Subsequently, the Government of India lifted the ban on Amnesty International.

Q: What is your long-term view of things?

A: There is another challenge that is much more long-term than these passing phases. That is the mutuality of interests between India and the US. I for one definitely believe that the growth and development of India needs the support of the US. This is because the US is a treasure house of knowledge, the treasure house—inspite of financial difficulties—of investment, and also there is no market like this country's.

India has got to think in terms of having access to the US market. India has got to welcome and seek investments and technology from the US. This we can do by assuring people over here that there are very few countries in the developing world where you have a democratic government, a growing capital market, and the infrastructure for private investment to grow and prosper. Many people know it already, but more need to.

Q: These are extraordinary times for the US, with the relaxation of the Cold War, the possibility of war in the Gulf and concerns about a severe recession. What is your assessment of these changes?

A: The first important change is with relation to the Soviet Union. It is in that context that you will find that the US has not paraded its success over the closed market or command market economy of the Soviet Union. They no longer use the vocabulary of defeating the "Satanic Empire" or the "Evil Empire". There is a more sympathetic vocabulary being used for the Soviets. The Bush administration, at least to my understanding, is going all out to accommodate the difficulties of the Soviet leadership and in trying to help them to re-establish themselves in the new context. This is something my predecessors would not have seen. The earlier arrogance is not there.

Even in the Middle East you will see that after taking a decision, the Bush administration did not try to go all alone. Everywhere, they are trying to involve many more countries.

Q: Is there anything for India to learn from the US?

A: One lesson that I have learnt and which I would stress, is we should understand that in order to enrich the poor we don't have to impoverish the rich. And in order to strengthen the weak we don't have to weaken the strong. This lesson must be clearly understood. Unless a country becomes rich in both resources and production, unless its rate of growth and productivity improves, you are not in a position to eradicate poverty. The idea that poverty can be eradicated first and then the growth process should be given an impetus is putting the (Indian) economy on its head. That lesson you can see from here.

The second lesson you get is that the problems of division of wealth will continue to haunt all economies whether they are at a low level or at a high level. It is in the very nature of development that certain disharmonies are created. That is where a state will continuously have to come in to see that private profit does not harm social benefit.

Q: But it would seem that the government here (US) does not intervene despite the enormous numbers of homeless and poor that you see in the country, and even a few streets away from the White House. Why is that?

A: That is because here they really believe that individuals must work out their destinies. They also believe that man is a selfish animal, that this selfishness creates problems, but also creates an incentive or motivation for work. They feel that to eradicate these defects, competition and more competition is needed. We feel, for instance, that the rich or the better off sections must be curbed by the state. In contrast, they (Americans) feel that only competition will pit one man against another in such a way that it will result in a good outcome.

Q: But.....

A: And they believe it. The best thing is that even if you ask the man who is without a job here, he will say "give me more opportunities". But those who are asking for dole are a load on society and they are not the people whose poverty can be eradicated. •

George Bush

"They (the US) have moved quickly to actually terminate Super 301 cases against India"

"In order to enrich the poor we don't have to impoverish the rich. And in order to strengthen the weak we don't have to weaken the strong"

V.P. Singh

What did Santa Claus of Iceland say to the Skypak Man?

"For an extra charge, could you also promise to wear a costume and a beard, when you deliver?"

We'll deliver. Wherever on earth. SKYPAK The worldwide couriers.

Skypak House, Off M. Vassanji Road, Marol, Andheri (E), Bombay 400 059.

Avenues:SC:570:90

■ Taxi tipple

Ever since talk of privatisation became the norm of the day, and private air taxi services began springing up, the race to woo passengers is on. Vijay Mallya, who runs Bangalore-based UB Air, a division of his UB Group of companies, is offering his passengers free booze, in a bid to outdo competitors such as Air Asiatic and Indian Airlines. Mallya isn't too worried about spreading the goodies around, as the Bacchanalian blessings come from his own stable, or should one say barrel.

This is a change for the dry-flying airlines crowd in the country. While small operations such as neighbouring Nepal's airline offer a range of liquor—free, of course—to even Vijay Mallya: cheers!

Economy Class passengers, Indian Airlines makes do with insipid canned juice, and Air India sniffs at the so-called Cattle Class. With UB Air showing the way to happy skies, others are sure to follow. Whoever said flying couldn't be fun?

■ Exit Zenith?

It's time for a bit of reorganisation, time for the streamlined look of the Nineties. That seems to be Zenith Ltd's conclusion. The flagship company of the Ashok Birla group, which is being managed by Yashovardhan Birla—after Ashok's tragic death in February—and his uncle Aditya, has a cash flow problem. To ease off, company officials are thinking of selling Zenith's steel division. Steel specialists Jindal, Mittal, Mukand Ltd and Mahindra Ungine Steel Co. are possible buyers, say industry insiders. The move follows an internal audit by Aditya Birla's finance team, which feels that Zenith has slowed down a bit, and as a group leader, needs to shake off its lethargy. So, the time-tested method of selling off units which are likely to fetch good prices to get some much needed cash. An acceptable move in the West, but one that is only now becoming fashionable in India. If only more companies realised that selling an unit is not a sign of weakness, but more a sign that things are likely to get better.

Aditya Birla: diet plan

STOCK QUOTE

"In India, being persecuted seems to be a good thing. Last year, Nusli Wadia made money hand over fist. This year, it's (Dhirubhai) Ambani's turn."

A senior—and surprised—finance ministry official

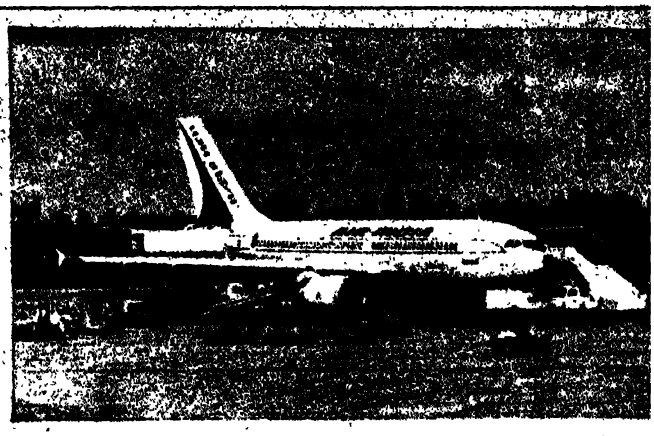
SHARE OF THE WEEK

Associated Cement Co.

ACC

● It's amazing. There may be ways to stop the stock market, but as things stand now, there doesn't seem to be any way at all to stop the skyward climb of ACC shares. The share has been climbing steadily for the last two months, and last week it crossed Rs 2,000 (on a par value of Rs 100) in kerb deals. The official rate was as impressive. On 7 September, the share opened at Rs 1,660 and zoomed to close at Rs 1,850. No amount of curbs have stalled ACC. While this makes for panicky stock exchange authorities, it makes for a very happy Nani Palkhivala. The ACC chairman has never seen his company's equity go so far so fast.

■ Something wrong, minister?



Last week in Calcutta, deputy finance minister Anil Shastri talked about radical tax structures and sweet nothings such as unless our outdated tax structures were not "totally overhauled" for the benefit of the common people, genuine tax payers would suffer. And fat cats will continue to get fatter. Oops, minister? Who is a genuine tax payer? And who exactly are common people? Do common people pay tax, people so common as our rich agricultural brethren, some of whom are ministers, even? Does this then mean that taxes go up? No, said Shastri, taxes will go down for individuals and industry. But tax revenue will go up, because the collection drive will get more efficient. Sorry minister, that won't happen because we haven't the manpower, the government has made a mess of cutting back on expenditure. And the government needs money, badly. So, the fat cats will get taxed, as will some in the salaried class. There will be no change, except that taxes will only increase. Try again. Genuinely.

Anil Shastri: talking taxes

THE BELEAGUERED CARRIERS

AVIATION

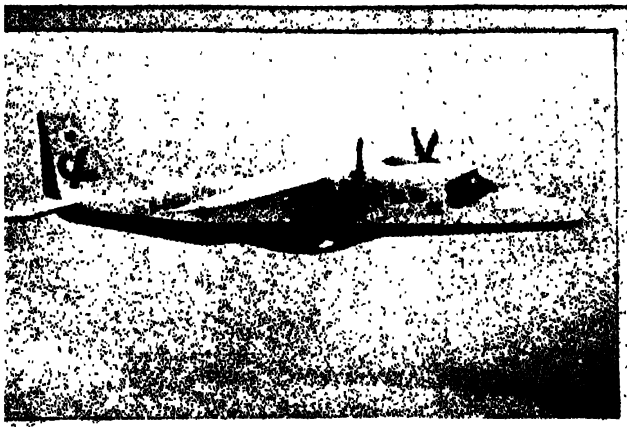
Chaos in the skies

Firings, appointments, cancellations and losses—the dismal state of our airlines

It is an unwritten rule of Indian civil aviation that just as things seem to be getting better, they get worse than anyone ever thought possible. Earlier this year, the aviation industry seemed ready for take-off. Air India was generating impressive profits, Vayudoot was spreading its wings, a new, efficient minister had taken over, and Indian Airlines' capacity problems were finally ending with the induction of the Airbus A320s.

Eight months later, the sad truth is that Indian aviation is an even bigger mess than before.

- Last week, Harsh Vardhan, Vayudoot's 34-year-old, energetic managing director, resigned at the suggestion of the ministry. A civil servant was asked to take temporary charge of the airline but it was clear that Vayudoot was now in for a spell of instability.
- Indian Airlines' schedules were disrupted throughout the country as aircraft were withdrawn from service to help evacuate Indians from the Gulf. The sudden cancellations caused [illegible] at airports because, in many [illegible] such as the already fully packed [illegible] Calcutta sector) capacity was [illegible] at a stroke.
- [illegible] which made a profit of Rs [illegible] year now projected losses of between Rs 50 to 80 crores this year. The Gulf evacuation was once again the main reason because the airline had cancelled flights on such key sectors as Bombay-London to release aircraft for the evacuation.
- In any case, Air India continued to be headless following the departure of Rajan Jetley, the chairman and managing director who turned it around. Subhash Gupte, who held temporary charge of acting chairman, was the obvious successor, and the ministry was believed to have decided, in principal, to confirm him. But the decision had still to be ratified by the Public Sector Enterprises Board (PSEB) and the Cabinet.
- This was not necessarily a routine matter. A few months ago, the PSEB had blocked attempts by Prime Minister V.P. Singh to foist Capt. Shekhar Singh, who used to pilot the UP government's planes, on I A . Despite the best efforts of cabinet secretary Vinod Pande, the PSEB refused to even shortlist Singh for the post.



Eventually, the job went to Air Marshal S.S. Ramdas, a serving officer in the Indian Air Force who had drafted a report recommending the re-induction of the grounded A320s.

- The A320s continued to remain a source of controversy (see Delhi Diary on page 90). Though they were being used to ferry Indians out of the Gulf, the government still clung to the paradoxical position that they were too unsafe for domestic use.

The controversy had led civil aviation minister Arif Mohammad Khan to lose interest in the department (which is, in any case, an additional charge) because the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) seemed determined to cripple Indian Airlines by insisting on grounding the A320s in an effort to boost the credibility of one of its FIRs (first information reports). Arif had asked the Prime Minister to relieve him of charge of aviation on four different occasions according to sources in the PMO but the Raja has always refused.

Earlier, it was believed that V.P. Singh was waiting for his badminton-playing relative Sanjay Singh to get elected to the Rajya Sabha so he could make him the new aviation minister. But now, with Singh's political career in smithereens, that no longer fit the facts.

The only explanation that made any sense was this: Prime Minister V.P. Singh had no interest in seeing that aviation was well-run. In the process, he had even exasperated Arif Mohammad Khan, widely regarded as one of the most efficient ministers in his Cabinet.

Just as things seem to be getting better, they get much worse than anyone ever thought possible

The big news of the week was Vardhan's resignation. The deceptively mild-mannered Vayudoot chief first came to prominence in 1982 when he was widely credited with turning Air India—then crippled by spiralling oil prices—around. At the time, he was only 26 and was designated executive assistant to the airline's largely decorative chairman, R.K. Dhawan-appointee called Raghu Raj. In 1983, Rajiv Gandhi, who had been impressed by Vardhan's performance at Air India, picked him to head Vayudoot, the floundering third airline.

Then, Vayudoot's operations concentrated on the North East and it was run like a step-child of Indian Airlines. Vardhan changed all that by aggressively opening up new routes and transforming the character of the airline to the extent that international aviation industry journals began to refer to it as the "the world's fastest growing airline".

This strategy had two drawbacks. One: his success made him many enemies in New Delhi, a city were anybody under 40 is automatically regarded as an upstart. And two: he was stuck with the wrong aircraft for such a fast-paced expansion.

Part of his fleet consisted of turboprop aircraft that had been junked by Indian Airlines because they were uneconomical to run. Moreover, they were still maintained by Indian Airlines whose officials had no particular desire to ensure that Vayudoot succeeded. The rest of the fleet consisted of the Dornier DO 228, perhaps the single worst buy in the history of Indian aviation. (The Dornier purchase was linked to the controversial HDW submarine deal.) Not only did the interest payments (in rapidly revalued Deutsche Marks) cripple Vayudoot's bottomline, but the aircraft also proved to be difficult to maintain in the Indian climate.

Consequently, Vardhan's critics were able to allege that Vayudoot's undesirable success was not reflected in its balance sheet and for all its talk of expansion, frequent aircraft failure meant that it sometimes could not keep to its schedules.

Vardhan was able to live with this criticism, but this year he made what now seems like a major tactical error: he took on Indian Airlines head-on After the A320s were grounded, Vayudoot chartered aircraft and began to run immensely profitable trunk services between India's major cities. This disconcerted Indian Airlines so much that its employees actually went on strike to demand that Vayudoot withdraw from trunk routes.

In this instance, Arif tackled Vardhan but it is clear that relations between the two men—who were once the best of friends—had deteriorated over the last few months. Vardhan's camp alleged that Arif looked for pretexts to hassle Vayudoot's managing director (including digging up a six-year-old vigilance report from his Air India days) while Arif's friends insisted that the minister had nothing against Vardhan, but that he could not keep defending him against a barrage of media criticism and from attacks by the likes of R.K. Hegde.

Harsh Vardhan: fall guy?

Finally, when Vardhan resigned, it was ostensibly over his absence at a meeting of the parliamentary consultative committee attached to the aviation ministry, but everybody conceded that the real reasons went much deeper than that.

By the end of last week, it was beginning to seem as though the mess in the aviation industry would not be cleared up—at least during the lifetime of this government. The choice of Ramdas to run Indian Airlines was widely welcomed (after all, the most successful boss in the airline's history had also been drawn from the Air Force: Air Marshal P.C. Lal) but there were doubts about his capacity to change things.

The airline's problems are beyond the capability of any one man. Even if the capacity goes up with the reinduction of the A320s (which, despite the Raja's delays, is inevitable), the management failure is so overwhelming that no single person can hope to change it. Because of its monopolistic position, Indian Airlines is able to treat its passengers with contempt. Its staff are sullen, inefficient and frequently corrupt. Because of the strength of staff unions, few managing directors have been able to take on erring employees, not even in the key area of safety where report after report has demonstrated that the airline has many failings.

Much the same is true of Vayudoot. Despite the hectic pace of its expansion and its high media profile, the airline was essentially a one-man show kept going by the force of Harsh Vardhan's personality. No other chief executive could have coped with defective aircraft, the hostility of Indian Airlines, crippling interest payments and a total lack of support from two successive governments.

If the aviation industry is to live up to the hopes evoked earlier this year, then the answer does not lie in a shuffling of managing directors. It lies in a drastic rethink and a complete overhaul of the organisations.

But where is the political will to do that? ●

Subodhra Rangamani

An Indian plot

The transfer of Tin Bigha to Bangladesh could give rise to complicated border problems

BORDER

In the small village of Kuchlibari, 40,000 people get ready for battle. They have one voice and one demand: "Tin Bigha will not be transferred. We won't allow it."

The reason is a recent Supreme Court (SC) decision. On 3 May, the SC granted permanent lease of the 178m - long and 85m - broad plot, known as Tin Bigha, to Bangladesh. This small strip of land connects Kuchlibari with Mekhliganj—both in Cooch Behar—and so with the rest of India. Honouring the SC verdict would mean that the 40,000 residents of Kuchlibari would be completely cut-off from the country they belong to—India. And the area would become yet another Indian pocket lodged in Bangladesh.

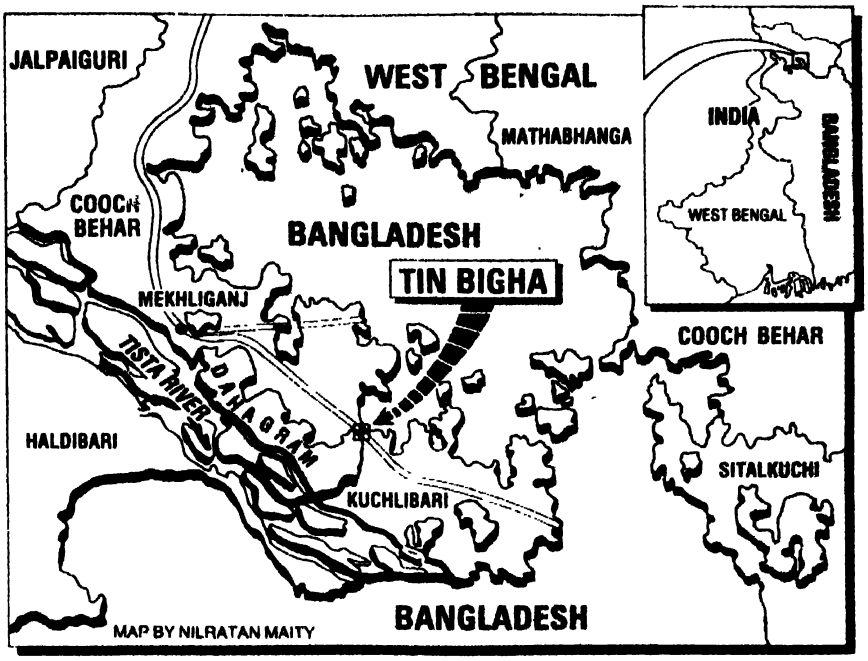
The trouble started in 1974, after the Indira - Mujib pact was signed. The local parties sprung into action. The Kuchlibari Sangram Committee was formed. Led by enthusiastic agitators like Narendra Kishore Nandi, Sukumar Sengupta and Motilal Kar, the Samiti launched a violent movement, whipping up support with the slogan: Rakto debo, tobu Tin Bigha debo na (We will give our blood, but not Tin Bigha).

And now, the new Tin Bigha Sangram Committee has called for a statewide bandh on 12 November. Before that comes an all-India convention at Calcutta on 27 October, demanding that the Indira-Mujib pact be scrapped. The last convention the Samiti had organised, at Mekhliganj on 28 August, went off pretty well. Thousands pledged to resist the transfer of Tin Bigha. And the state agriculture minister, Kamal Guha of the Forward Bloc (one of the constituents of the ruling Left Front), announced that he was ready to quit the ministry in the interest of his motherland.

But this is not the first time that ministers have made grandiose promises on this issue. During the chief ministership of S.S.Ray, the then Opposition leader Jyoti Basu had assured the Samiti that the transfer would not be allowed. In 1977, the then external affairs minister, Atal Behari Vajpayee, had promised to oppose any such move. And the BJP has already filed a writ petition with the SC against the Union government's move to hand over the strategic plot to Bangladesh. It has even threatened to launch a mass movement in the state if necessary.

And chief minister Jyoti Basu has gone back on his word. His assurance to Bangladesh that Tin Bigha would be handed over has created problems for his party. Says Subhas Roy, the CPI(M) upapradhan of Kuchlibari gram panchayat: "We are with the Sangram Committee not as CPI(M) men, but as residents of Kuchlibari. We are trying to convince our leadership of the dangers of transferring Tin Bigha."

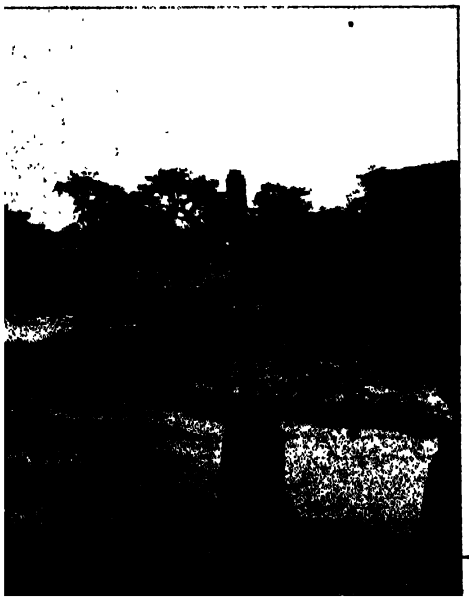
Like the CPI(M), the Congress(I) workers are in a tight spot too. "We can't oppose it since the agreement was signed by Mrs Indira Gandhi," says Motilal Kar, a panchayat Congressman. "But we have been fighting for the cause for the last 14 years, under the banner of the Sangram Committee, a non-political organisation. We have taken this up as the common man's movement against a gross injustice."



The government's response to all this is rather strange. "We are fully aware of the trouble we are inviting for the country in the event of the transfer of Tin Bigha," says a senior district official. "But we have recently issued orders to 22 plot-holders of Tin Bigha for the purpose of requisition of land for the proposed transfer at the instance of Writers' Buildings."

Undaunted, the people of the area, led by the powerful Forward Bloc, have now formed the Tin Bigha Transfer Resistance Committee. And its flag is wrapped around border pillar number 811, marking the end of Bangladesh and the beginning of India. Just three months ago, there was mild irritation over the hurried construction of a road by the Bangladesh authorities, which ended abruptly at border pillar 811. The Cooch Behar administration did not approve and after some official communications with Rangpur, Bangladesh, the subject was discreetly dropped.

The transfer of Tin Bigha would create problems in various spheres. It would be a security problem, for one.



BSF forces at Tin Bigha: anticipating trouble

Map showing the location of Tin Bigha (shaded portion: Bangladesh)

Intelligence reports on India would be easily available to Bangladesh. Guarding the border would cost at least ten times as much. "We might not be able to keep track of the whole thing," says a senior Border Security Force (BSF) official. It might give rise to another Kashmir, he added. Senior district officials agree that it would open the floodgates of infiltration from Bangladesh. Besides jurisdictional hazards, it would give a fillip to border crime and smuggling. As it is, dacoities and other anti-social activities are a regular feature of border areas. Bangladeshi dacoits, apparently with the cooperation of Bangladesh Rifles, frequently attack border blocks with lethal weapons. And if Tin Bigha is transferred, then for any crime in Kuchlibari, the residents would have to move the Rangpur district headquarters in Bangladesh.

Instead of the plot of land, a flyover is to connect the little bit of India to the mainland. "Merged with Dahagram-Angarpota, Tin Bigha would belong to Bangladesh and the proposed flyover can spark off trouble at any time," says a top intelligence officer. Another district intelligence officer agrees: "The flyover might be blown off any moment to sabotage the understanding—if any—between the two countries. And Kuchlibari will be cut off for ever from the mainland, adding to the list of Indian chhitmahals (enclaves) in Bangladesh."

At present, there are about 135 Indian chhitmahals in Bangladesh and 95 Bangladeshi ones in India. Tin Bigha, if handed over, would connect Dahagram--Angarpota, one of the biggest Bangladeshi chhitmahals in India, with Bangladesh.

Terrified of being foreigners in their own land, the villagers have geared themselves for a blood-bath. "There is no compromise," they declare. And the BSF, accordingly, is preparing for battle.

And responding to the determined resistance of the 40,000 due to be displaced, chief minister Jyoti Basu has promised to visit the area in October. Till then, a lot hangs in the balance. ●

Utpal Banerjee/Kuchlibari

Of bigots and bullets

Communal clashes mar Ganesha chaturthi festivities in Madras

TAMIL NADU

It was just another religious procession. Chanting mantras to the tune of nadaswarams, the devotees marched along with their Ganesha idols, on 2 September, after Ganesha chaturthi. All of a sudden, everything went wrong. And it left two Muslims dead of police firing and more than 70 injured in the riot.

The trouble began when the 300-strong procession approched a mosque on the Triplicane High Road. This was the regular route of such immersion processions and there had been no warning of communal disharmony in this area ever. So, when the police asked the procession to stop the noise so as not to disturb the Muslims reading their namaz, the Hindus found it strange. "But we waited patiently and peacefully for about 20 minutes and resumed the procession only after the police gave us the green signal," said M. Balasubramaniam, secretary of the committee which organised the march. "We were rudely shocked when chappals, stones, soda and acid bottles came flying at us from inside the mosque."

Another eyewitness has a different story. "The Hindus came armed with deadly weapons and stones, which they hurled at the mosque as we were praying," says Mohammad Basha, a local businessman. "But they were clever. When they saw the police come down, they disappeared from the scene. Our Muslim boys did not realise the danger when they attacked the police and got shot in the bargain."

Abdul Kalam, 32, a city civil court watchman and Mohamad Arif, 23, a local butcher, were shot dead. And for three hours the violent Muslim mob fought the police. Ignoring the community elders' requests to calm down.

The whole of Madras came alive with protests. The police got blamed enormously. "Their action was despicable and reprehensible," said the Indian Union Muslim League (Latheef faction) president, M.L. Latheef. "To say that chappals were thrown at the procession from inside the mosque, is a lie. It was the other way round. In fact, some policemen even removed clay from the Ganesha idol to fling it towards the mosque." Latheef believes that the police had no business in allowing the Hindu procession to pass the mosque, and if they did, they should have taken adequate precautions. He also alleges that one section of the police was inimical towards the DMK government and had thus allowed the tragic chain of events.

And the DMK government has been criticised by quite a few. Said P. Nedumaran, president of the Tamils National Movement, "Communal clashes which were till now confined only to a few districts, have finally spread to Madras as well." He blamed the DMK of being intimidated by the BJP and thus not checking the inflammatory speeches of certain Hindus.

And the BJP, for its part, has been viciously critical of Karunanidhi's "policy of appeasement of Muslims which has led to the present spate of communal violence". The BJP general secretary, Murali Manohar Joshi, voiced the need for a proper enquiry into the incident. Anti-national slogans were raised from within the mosque, he alleged, like "Pakistan zindabad". And AIADMK general secretary, Jayalalitha, has demanded that the chief minister own responsibility for the police action.

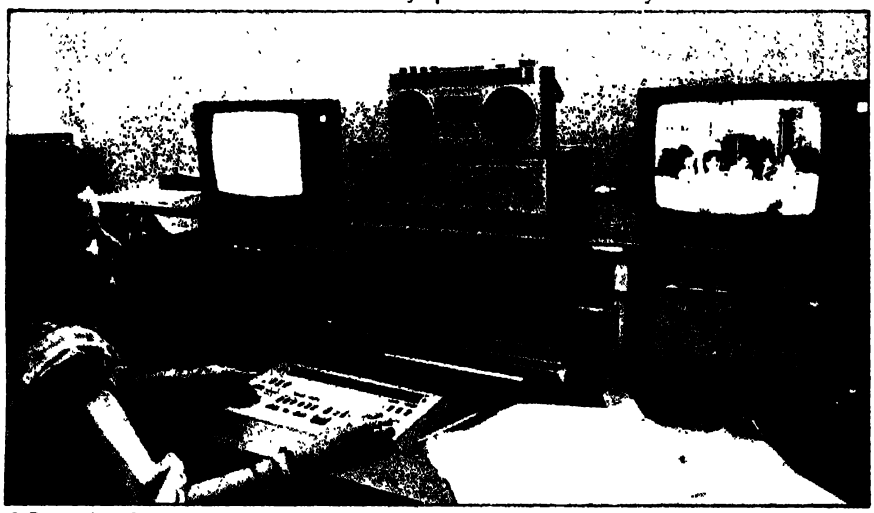
In an effort to soothe tense nerves, on 3 September, an 18-member peace committee met at the riot-affected area, with the police commissioner K.K. Rajasekaran Nair presiding. With members of the DMK and the Congress(I) and near equal representation of Hindus and Muslims, the committee members promised to go from door to door preaching communal harmony.

Significantly, there had never been the need for such an appeal in this Muslim dominated area dotted with temples and harbouring a large conservative Brahmin population. The 2 September clash was a bolt from the blue. And it might serve as a sharp warning, not only to the administration, but also to society at large. •

R. Bhagwan Singh/Madras

Free within bounds

Parliament passes the Prasar Bharati Bill, but will AIR and Doordarshan change?



DELHI

At last, the National Front government has ticked off one of its long overdue promises. The Prasar Bharati (Broadcasting Corporation of India) Bill has been passed by both Houses of Parliament—but not before the government made its position clear on the exact nature of autonomy granted to Doordarshan and the All India Radio (AIR). During the three-day debate in Parliament, the information and broadcasting minister, P. Upendra, clarified: "What we promised was autonomy,not unbridled autonomy."

A crucial part of the debate was the Congress(I)'s reaction while the bill was being passed in Parliament. As many as 100 amendments had been circulated by different parties, many of which were withdrawn. These included one circulated by P. Chidambaram urging to allow the private sector into the zealously-guarded terrain of television programming. Rajiv Gandhi had favoured privatisation too. But the Congress(I) withdrew the Bill proposed by Chidambaram. The Bill that was finally passed was, therefore, a truncated and rather disappointing version of the much-awaited autonomy Bill.

Before the Bill was passed, the Congress(I) performed a complete volte face in the Rajya Sabha. Despite voting in favour of the Bill in the Lok Sabha, the party declared it would oppose the bill "lock, stock and barrel". Just two days before the session closed, former information and broadcasting minister, Vasant Sathe declared: "The Bill is ill-conceived, badly drafted and will perpetrate more controls over radio and television than in existence today."

A Doordarshan recording room: happy days ahead?

And the automony that is being granted is certainly not unbridled. The parliamentary committee which will oversee the functioning of the Broadcasting Corporation will consist of 15 members from the Lok Sabha and seven from the Rajya Sabha, making it a super-constitutional body. In addition, there is to be a Broadcasting Council with a president and a team of ten appointed by the President of India.

Whether the small screen will exhibit a will of its own or not remains to be seen. Because, despite the Prasar Bharati, the financial control of the Corporation will remain with the government. The present staff will not be displaced. Except for a change in the panel of people in control, everything else will remain the same. Consequently, when one switches on one's radio or TV sets, the changes, if any, might not be striking. •

Ritu Sarin/New Delhi

Get set, go!

Patwa's sweeping transfers rattle the bureaucracy

MADHYA PRADESH

The BJP high command might have issued an 'okay' certificate to the Patwa government, but that hasn't stopped it from being concerned over the alarming transfer rate of government employees in the state. Recently, the party has set up a committee to work out the procedure and establish definite rules for such transfers.

Former MP and ex-president of the state Jan Sangh (now BJP), N.K. Shejvalkar,demanded the publication of a White Paper by the government, on transfers. Accusing the state administration of corruption and bringing about more than 50,000 transfers, Sushil Chandra Verma, retired IAS officer and ex-chief secretary of the state who is now a BJP MP, said that this process would only waste crores of rupees from the public exchequer. In the party meeting of BJP MLAs, the ministers were attacked on various fronts. Some MLAs even claimed that most ministers were inexperienced and immature, transferring off anybody at the recommendation of clerks. There were examples of people due to retire in six months being issued transfer orders. The MLAs charged the Patwa regime of violating the transfer policy worked out by the party earlier.

Not surprisingly, ex-chief minister Motilal Vora made much of the transfer issue in the Vidhan Sabha. He claimed that over one lakh transfers had taken place, squeezing about Rs 50 to 60 crores out of the public exchequer. The association of government employees alleged political motivation for these transfers. Atal Bihari Vajpayee, the veteran BJP leader and Rajya Sabha member, also expressed his displeasure and finally announced to the press the decision of the BJP Executive Committee meeting at Madras: a new committee would look into the transfer issue in BJP-ruled states.

In defence, the state government claimed that they had transferred only those employees who had stuck to the same spot for years and had been minting money from the times of the Congress government. The other excuse was that several employees had sought transfer voluntarily. The employees concerned, however, denied this. A lot of forgery and fabrication were alleged in this matter.

Of special interest is the fact that, in this shuffling, for the first time class four employees were transferred. This also included police constables. Former CM Vora and several officials expressed concern over this. Also, transferring a large number of doctors had paralysed the entire medical services, since the vacant posts were not filled up. As a result, these were stayed to allow the public health department some time to fill in the vacancies.

Despite the CM announcing that no transfer would be cancelled, Laxmi

Patwa: criticised by big brothers

Narayan Gupta, the revenue minister, cancelled all transfers fearing a virtual collapse in the rural administrative set up. In spite of all this, the Patwa regime is definitely a step forward, keeping in mind the transfer industry that flourished in the state during the Congress rule. There were virtual transfer melas, where, reportedly, hotels and lodges made big business, with everybody from ministers to petty party workers getting a share. The BJP government has put a stop to this. And if this committee works out, then there might not be a repeat performance in the near future. ●

M.V. Kher/Raipur

Patel: the image crumbles

Dog days

Chimanbhai Patel finds the going tough, as inner-party squabbles surface within the Dal

GUJARAT

Within six months of becoming the chief minister Chimanbhai Patel is a worried man. The reason: his party, the Janata Dal, which bagged 70-seats in the 182-member Vidhan Sabha and formed a coalition government with the BJP, has earned a bad name for itself, thanks to intra-party bickerings.

Patel gave top priority to refurbishing his own image that had been tarnished during the 1974 navnirman movement, a violent student agitation that led to his ouster. And a friendly vernacular press made his task easier by creating an impression that the politican wanted to form a naya Gujarat (new Gujarat) and that he could talk on equal terms with central leaders.

But people's hopes were dashed as prices of essential commodities soared, unemployment grew and the bureaucracy blazed no new trail to end their woes. On 15 August, Independence Day, while a Janata Dal MP from Baroda, Prakash Brahmbhatt, launched a 'Nav Nirman Manch' to fight the corrupt bureucracy yet another party legislator from the same city, Yogesh Patel, a confidant of Maneka Gandhi, floated a Lok Sangarsh Manch on the same day to bring down the prices by launching an agitation against hoarders and black mar-keteers. Both the Dal leaders received enthusiastic public response to their effort despite the fact that the state party chief, Narpatsinh Chavda, had warned them of strict disciplinary action. The two leaders now form a pressure group to keep Patel on tenterhooks.

Discontent within the Janata Dal, which was headed by Patel till he took over as CM, also surfaced when Ashok Punjabi, a controversial figure in the state's politics, was welcomed into the party last month soon after his expulsion from the CPI.

Earlier in July, differences in the Dal became evident when Patel tried for a unanimous election of the party president, but failed. The dissidents fielded, though vainly, a non-controversial, popular legislator, Babubhai Vasanwala to cross swords with the official nominee, Chavda, a devoted Gandhian but a political nonentity.

The chief minister also rubbed yet another party MLA, Liladhar Vaghela, on the wrong side, when he scrapped the six-year-old mid-day meal scheme from 1 August, even before Vaghela, who was asked to review its working, could submit his report. What's more, the employment minister, Pravinsingh Jadeja, a close friend of V.P. Singh, had opposed the idea on the ground that the abolition of the Congress-initiated scheme would render 75,000 people jobless. But Patel had his way.

A number of Dal leaders have also complained against Patel's trusted lieutenant, state home minister Narhari Amin. According to them, Amin was involved in anti-party activities. He is said to have helped a congressman win the election to the chairmanship of a co-operative bank and worked for the defeat of the Dal's candidate, Dasrath Patel.

The squabbles within the party were also reflected in the appointment of chairman for statutory boards and corporations. While the Dal's coalition partner, the BJP, wasted no time in naming the chiefs of 13 such bodies allotted to the party, the Janata Dal's infighting delayed the formation of such boards in its quota.

No wonder, the dissident minister Pravinsingh Jadeja, let off the steam before the interviewer of a Bombay-based Gujarat weekly and gave a bit of his mind about Patel's style of functioning, giving Patel sleepless nights.●

Mahesh Trivedi/Ahmedabad

Anticipatory jail

Mulayam Singh Yadav locks up agitating Congress leaders, apprehending breach of peace

UTTAR PRADESH

The Uttar Pradesh jails have been hosting VIPs, of late. For the last three weeks, former Union minister Sheila Dixit and veteran Congress(I) leader Balram Singh Yadav, MP, have been held captive. The state government has promised to let them out only on bail but Dixit and company have turned down the offer.

Instead, Dixit has moved a habeas corpus in the Lucknow bench of Allahabad High Court. The hearing, interestingly, has been postponed six times in ten days. The Congress high-profiles were first arrested as they demonstrated against the arrest of Congress leader Darshan Singh, on 16 August. They were released the same day. But, carrying out their threat of launching a jail bharo andolan if Singh was not released in 24 hours, Dixit, Balram Singh, former UP ministers Gauri Shankar and Behari Lal Dohare along with 500 Congress workers, courted arrest in Etawah, the home town of chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav of the Janata Dal. But this time they were in for a tough time. Instead of being released in a couple of days, as is the custom in such cases, they are still locked up. For apprehension of breach of peace.

The state government had jailed Darshan Singh, the Congress(I) opponent of Mulayam Singh in the Assembly elections, on the charge of forcibly releasing an alleged criminal from police custody. And the CM refuses to be soft with , as he puts it, the protectors of criminals. What the Congress is highlighting, however, is the personal relationship between Mulayam Singh and Darshan Singh. The two had been close political partners for the past couple of decades, till, last year, Darshan Singh defected to the Congress(I).

It seems that this defection was behind the CM's great interest in arresting Darshan Singh.

Instead of being released in a couple of days as is the custom in such cases, Sheila Dixit is still behind bars

SHASHI SAHAI

People believe that the state was holding Balram Singh especially since he was a Rajya Sabha member, and, if let out, could create a furore in Parliament. Now that Parliament is not in session anymore, he might be released soon. Both Balram Singh and Sheila Dixit have called the arrest illegal and the CM dictatorial. On the other hand, the state insists that in demanding the release of Darshan Singh, the agitating leaders are supporting crime, since Singh himself has been involved in quite a few criminal cases.

But the logic doesn't seem to please the Congress. "I refuse to give in to pressure," says an adamant Dixit. "And I shall continue my fight against this barbaric regime—whether I am in jail, or out of it." ●

Rajiv Shukla/New Delhi

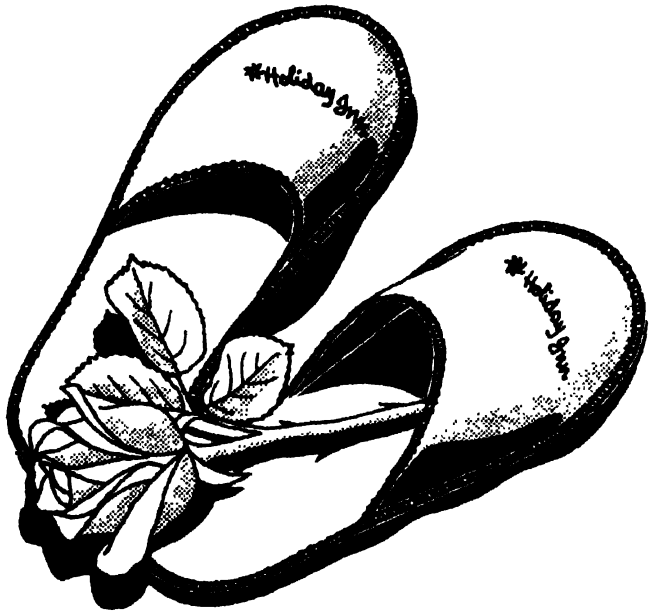
Aliens at home

Militants serve quit notices to non-tribals

MEGHALAYA

Non-tribals have overstayed their welcome in Meghalaya. The dead-line to non-tribal employees for vacating their posts had been set by extremist organisations at 30 August. The targets are being threatened, intimidated and assaulted. Even non-Khasi tribals are struck with terror. And the silent majority gives respectability to the criminal acts by accepting these as expressions of ethnic assertion.

On the other hand, political organisations give empty assurance, while the authorities remain indifferent. Recently, a top businessman of Shillong, Mahabir Prasad Goenka, narrowly escaped an attempt on his life. The Meghalaya United Liberation Army (MULA) has emerged as the most powerful extremist organisation of the state.



And the party seems to be very self-conscious. Declaring that they owed nothing to either chief minister B.B. Lyngdoh or the Khasi capitalists, they hold both the CM and the home minister, H.S. Lyngdoh, responsible for inefficiency. They blame the former for being too soft on the border issue and the latter for his failure to drive away the "foreigners". And "foreigners" means all non-tribals.

Of other parties involved in attacking non-tribals, the Federation of Khasi, Jaintia and Garo People (FKJGP) seems to be the most organised.

Although just the non-tribals are the targets now, smaller tribal communities are worried that they are next in line. So, 44 representatives of the Hajong, Koch, Rava, Bodo, Kachari, Mann, Dalu, Banai and other minorities in Meghalaya have recently formed a common forum, the Meghalaya Minority Tribals' Union. That might make things easier for minority tribes. But for those unfortunate enough to be not born a tribal, Meghalaya promises to be pretty dangerous. ●

Rabijit Chowdhury/Shillong

If you think you're staying at the Holiday Inn, Hong Kong, you're thinking half a continent too far.

Holiday Inn, Bombay, offers you the same international facilities as any Holiday Inn worldwide.

You'll find the King Leisure rooms at the Holiday Inn, Bombay, fully as luxurious as Holiday Inn, Hong Kong.

We offer fine dining, superior accommodation, conference facilities, inimitable service, and of course, the value for money you've come to expect from any Holiday Inn worldwide...

All the more reasons to choose Holiday Inn first.

* Holiday Inn
Bombay
The World's First Choice

ARTG-467-90

For information and reservation, please contact: BOMBAY: Holiday Inn, Balraj Sahani Marg, Juhu Beach, Bombay 400 049. Tel: 6204444/6202398. Tlx: 011-78411 HOLI IN/ 011-78404 HINN IN. Fax: (0091-22) 6204452 • NEW DELHI: Holiday Inn, Connaught Plaza, Tel: 3320101. Tlx: 031-61186 HIND IN. Tel: 3010211. Tlx: 031-65526 CLAR IN • BANGALORE: Tel: 77676/77931. Tlx: 845-8668/2354 MACH IN • CALCUTTA: Tel: 412009. Tlx: 021-5421 • AHMEDABAD: Tel: 448602 • PUNE: Tel: 661752.

Apply, apply, no reply

Why is Upendra such a flop?

Ask yourself this question: even before he became information and broadcasting minister late last year, why had we heard of P. Upendra? After all, his sole claim to fame was that he had been sent to the Rajya Sabha by N.T. Rama Rao and was, essentially, a politician without a base.

So, why was this man already a national figure of sorts?

The answer is simple enough: public relations (PR).

While Upendra's political experience is limited, his PR skills have been honed over the years. Before he joined NTR's Telugu Desam bandwagon, he served as public relations manager for the railways in Calcutta. Journalists in that city still remember him as a cheerful, safari-suited figure with an easy manner who was always ready to exchange a coupe on an otherwise fully-booked train for five column inches culled from his latest press release.

Upendra later shifted track from railways to politics, but he never forgot his public relations experience. When the constituents of the National Front were in Opposition, he provided a dial-a-quote service for journalists desperate for comments on late-breaking stories and took care to remember the first name of every hack who ever phoned him.

It was a strategy that ensured that he still got his column inches—though this time, for himself and not the railways—even when he had no coupes to hand out. He became a national figure and his media skills were the envy of his colleagues.

IT MADE superficial sense therefore for V.P. Singh to appoint him minister for information and broadcasting. For one, the Telugu Desam had to be represented and Upendra was the only TDP MP whose accent the rest of India could decipher. And for another, the Raja (in his pre-Mr Caste phase) owed his success to the press and needed a media manager who knew the rules of the journalism game.

Where V.P Singh (and nearly everybody else) went wrong was in misunderstanding the nature of Upendra's public relations. The National Front government needed a Svengali who could shape press coverage of the regime: instead, it got the classic public sector PRO whose idea of media management was of the order of "please sar, kill this item and I will get you two tickets on tomorrow's Rajdhani".

It is this public sector approach which, more than anything else, explains why Upendra has been such a disaster as information and broadcasting minister. He has neither the Janata Dal intellectual's commitment to free and fair broadcasting (though judging by the mood at the India International Centre these days, the Janata Dal intellectual is a dying breed anyway) nor does he have V.P. Singh's shrewd grasp of how to manipulate the press. (In fact, the only minister whose media savvy can match V.P. Singh's is Arif Mohammad Khan.)

At a personal level, Upendra is still immensely likeable. He will talk to any journo whose paper has a circulation of more than 200 copies; he will attend any function—even perhaps, the opening of a telephone booth—if there are photographers present; and he is still good for a quote, no matter how late the hour—unless you ask him about Khula Manch.

But as a minister, he has been a complete flop. Because his conception of journalism involves plants, spikes and lollipops, he has simply not understood how to give the Doordarshan newsroom any kind of freedom.

THE LATEST in a long line of disasters that have dogged Upendra's ministry is the Khula Manch fiasco. The idea was laudable enough if borrowed from Janvani. But while Vinod Dua coated even the most offensive questions with a layer of politeness and Congress ministers—in turn—rarely lost their cool on camera, the combination of Kewal Varma, George Fernandes and Karan Thapar was certain to ignite.

Those who were present at the Khula Manch taping say that while Varma was splutteringly angry and Thapar was icily contemptuous, Fernandes gave as good as he got. The results made for compelling television and would have proved two things. One: that the Raja's ministers were not zombies who mouthed a single party line. And two: that TV was at last free of government control.

A shrewd media manager would have seen that the advantages of telecasting the programme far outweighed any disadvantages: after all, everybody already knew that Pepsi Cola is George's very own dragon. But a public sector PRO, trained to avoid controversy at all costs, whose idea of 'good publicity' is a turgid press release, could hardly be expected to realise this. Fernandes—who has assiduously cultivated a media image as a dedicated fighter—is brighter than Upendra and pushed to have the programme shown unedited.

But in the end, the PRO won out ("controversy very bad thing, sar"), Upendra had his way, the programme was hacked and the government embarrassed.

The Khula Manch controversy had one unexpected fall-out. Upendra was so upset by the fiasco that he broke with all precedent and shut himself off from the press that he had courted for so many years. Last week, all of SUNDAY's efforts to get him to comment on the issue proved unsuccessful.

In a sense, he was reverting to another public sector stereotype. As they would say in government offices: apply, apply, no reply. ●

V GANGADHAR

Bofors. Ho hum!

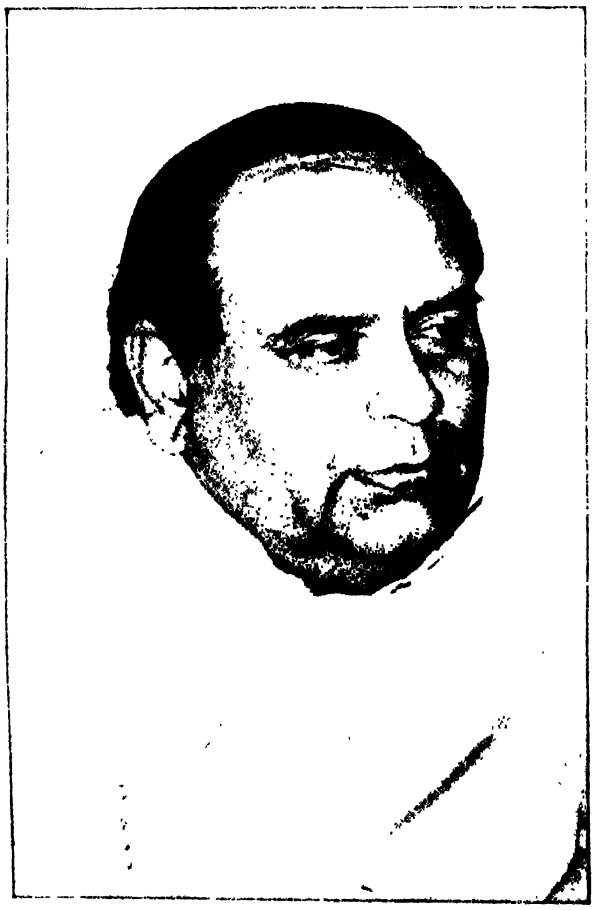
The scandal that won't go away

Remember the Hydra-headed monster, the killing of which was one of the labours of the mythical giant, Hercules? Everytime, he managed to cut off one of its head, another one sprang up in its place!

The Bofors investigation reminds me of this monster. One aspect is finished we presume, then suddenly something else sprouts up featuring a different personality. The latest, is of course, the alleged implication of Union minister for commerce and tourism, Arun Nehru

The Bombay-based The Independent, broke the story first. But it goes back a long, long time. Chitra Subramaniam, formerly of The Hindu then Indian Express and now of nowhere (there are sniggering remarks that very soon she will have to sell her Bofors exposes to the Confidential Advisor) had details to Indian Express of Arun Nehru's conversation with a Swedish official over the Bofors deal in June 1985 (nine months before the contract was signed), underlining that Arun Nehru may have played a crucial role in the negotiations.

The papers were made available to yet another votary of 'press freedom', The Statesman. Strangely enough, both papers did not publish the details. The Independent concluded that Express editor, Arun Shourie, found the new revelations damaging in view of the paper's new-found closeness to Nehru. It may be recalled that the Express and Nehru were cheer-leaders in the campaign to get rid of Devi Lal from the Cabinet and also share a common hostility to Prime Minister V.P. Singh, over his decision to implement the recommendations of the Mandal Commission Report.



Actually, there was nothing very new about Subramaniam's report. Even in March 1988, Shourie himself had referred to these documents which mentioned Nehru's involvement in the negotiations, his informing the Swedish officials they might get the order for the howitzer guns but must maintain a low profile, never mentioning the Prime Minister or his family in any connection with the deal.

Nothing very damaging here. Yet, why did Express fail to publish these documents? A new dimension arose when one of Express' showpieces, Ram Jethmalani suddenly came out with a signed front-page statement in The Independent that V.P. Singh must sack Arun Nehru over the contents of these documents. At a subsequent press conference the lawyer-cum-politician, while asserting he had not fallen out with Arun Shourie, claimed that Nehru was still his friend and that he hoped and prayed that Nehru was innocent.

But the press is not so gullible. The journalists questioned Jethmalani on the possibility of The Independent articles having been written at the behest of the Hindujas, with whom its editor is reported to be close. The Hindujas, are of course, related to Jethmalani too.

Calcutta's The Telegraph quoted sources close to Arun Nehru as confirming the genuineness of the documents but not implicating him in the kickbacks. After all, the documents had been circulating in New Delhi for over three months, but now were suddenly front-paged in The Independent.

Why? The Sunday Observer hinted at definite indications of the Hindujas attempting to divert attention from a likely adverse judgement from a Swiss court. The judgement, regarding the lifting of the ban on revealing names of Bofors kickbacks recepients, is expected very soon. Ram Jethmalani, of course, would do everything to help out the Hindujas, the paper con-

Noted Rajiv-baiter, N. Ram (above), who had once assisted Chitra Subramaniam in the Bofors investigations, now rushed to Arun Nehru's (left) defence. Said Ram Jethmalani, "He has proved himself to be an absolute simpleton by giving a clean chit to Arun Nehru." The attack on Ram continued cludes. And who can be a better fall guy than Arun Nehru, who is intensely disliked by the Hindujas?

Another leading figure in the Bofors investigations, N. Ram, however, gives a more or less clean chit to Arun Nehru by pointing out that there is no documented evidence against Nehru. But Jethmalani is not bothered with such niceties. "I can only say that I don't possess N.Ram's childlike innocence. He has proved himself to be an absolute simpleton with his latest article in The Daily (from Bombay) in which he has given a clean chit to Arun Nehru."

The revelations are becoming murkier and murkier with the journalists involved not interested in getting at the truth, but 'fixing' their 'enemies'. If Arun Shourie did not publish the documents because he wanted to protect Nehru, Nandy might be accused of highlighting them because of his grudge against Nehru over the Devi Lal affair.

There is also a feeling that Chitra Subramaniam could be something more than a journalist. The Independent protrays her as a martyr of editorial whims. She gives a long lecture on ethics in Indian journalism and is worried that her "sources in the West are beginning to raise valid questions about the ethics of Indian editors". These are the same sources, one presumes, who were leaking out judicially selected portions of the Bofors deal on a very selective basis, always on the eve of a major political happening in the country.

Joining the group of 'investigative' reporters, Karl Mehta of the Blitz, quotes Dr Pierre Schmid, federal officer of police matters, Berne and his assistant, Mr Gilloz. Both these gentlemen have often been quoted as 'authoritative and official' sources in the despatches by those keen to implicate Rajiv Gandhi and his family. Schmid even raises the question that Chitra Subramaniam could have been a direct contact for the Prime Minister. "At the beginning she was a very important person in the outcome of the elections in your country. She also came with the official CBI delegation to meet us, but was not part of it. Hence, we asked her to sit out." The Daily has already come to the conclusion that she is the mole of the Bachchans.

In a telephonic interview with The Independent, Subramaniam lambasts the ethics of Indian editors as "it stinks". Well, so might the role of some of our so-called 'investigative reporters'.

Giri told us so

Mr Girilal Jain, after reading all the anti-V.P. Singh stories even in the papers where he had been a hero till recently, may well smile and say 'I told you so!' Here is one political commentator who was never taken in by the Raja Saab, writing on the "Mandalising of India", Mr Jain observes, "Since the time, the Raja came to attract all-India attention as Rajiv Gandhi's finance minister, with his well-publicised raids on industrial houses and durbars in the grand Mughal style, I have never been able to shake off the first impression that he is not the kind of man one goes out shooting with, to quote the familiar English saying. In both his decisions to Mandalise India and bypass the allies and even senior Janata Dal colleagues, he has, in my view, acted true to form. It is not his fault that so many supposedly experienced politicians and commentators have not been able to see the face behind the mask. The mask for months had been pretty thin and the face all too visible."

Continues Mr Jain, "It is truly extraordinary that V P. Singh should have been compared with Chanakya, Chandragupta Maurya, Jawaharlal Nehru and Ambedkar. If a comparison has to be made, it should be with the former Aga Khan who led the deputation to Lord Minto for separate electorate for Muslims in 1905 and Jinnah, who pressed for Partition of India. There can be little doubt that history will repeat itself both as a farce and tragedy. The Raja is only for V.P. Singh and V.P. Singh is only for the Raja."

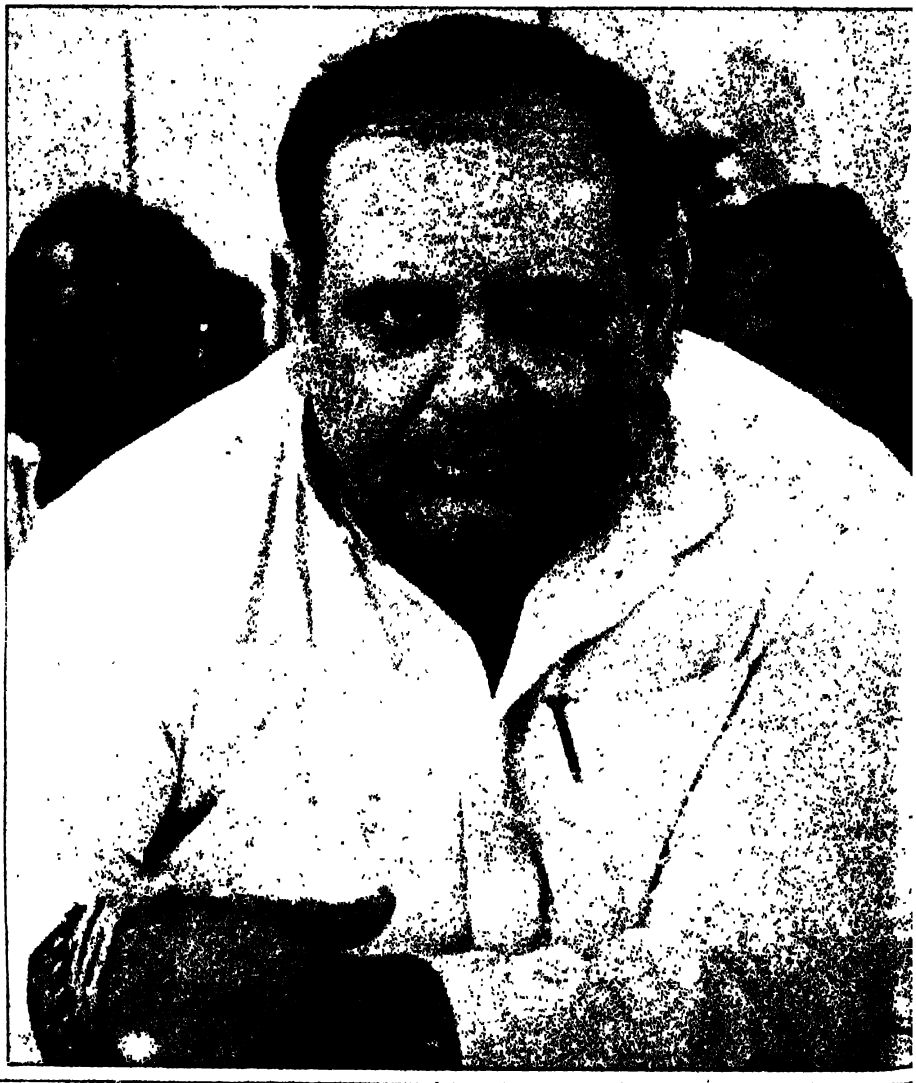
Says Girilal Jain (above), "It is truly extraordinary that V.P. Singh (left) should have been compared with Chanakya, Chandragupta Maurya, Jawaharlal Nehru and Ambedkar. The comparison should be with the former Aga Khan, who led the deputation for separate electorate for Muslims, and Jinnah, who pressed for the Partition of India"

Strange bedfellows

Journalism, like politics, also makes for strange bedfellows. The Ambani-owned Hindi The Sunday Observer has carried a full page report on the Mandal Commission authored by Arun Shourie with due acknowledgement to Indian Express. More such articles are likely to appear in the days to come. ●

MAHESH JETHMALANI

Time to come clean



Arun Nehru must reveal all he knows about Bofors

At the outset, a brief explanation to the readers of this column is in order. This is not a regular column on the sordid Bofors affair, although, two out of two columns devoted to that subject should surely warrant such an inference. There are three compelling reasons for persisting with Bofors. Firstly, the emergence of new documents which substantiate what many had only suspected to be true. Secondly, the depressing—and undoubtedly belated—discovery that the higher echelons of our defence establishment have proved to be highly vulnerable to the overtures of international arms merchants, a matter which cannot but have sinister implications for national security and the defence of the realm. And finally, the need to reappraise the role of important dramatis personae in the Bofors drama, hitherto considered to be innocent by-standers and even shining examples of men of honour.

There can be no doubt that Mr Arun Nehru stands squarely indicted in the Bofors affair by the despatches of Mr Rolf Gauffin, Swedish ambassador to India in 1985-86, to the foreign department in Sweden which were recently published by The Independent.

The documents unmistakably disclose that Mr Nehru performed the role of negotiator in the arms contract with both the Swedish government and Bofors represented by Mr Martin Ardbo; that he had conveyed the impression that he was the éminence grise in the matter; that he performed his role although it was no part of his function as minister of power; that his negotiations pertained not to contractual terms, but what he himself referred to "a political understanding in the widest sense"; that this latter phrase was a semantic smoke-screen for a kickback in return for awarding the arms contract to Bofors; that Mr Nehru wanted Bofors to exclude all middlemen, obviously because, their presence would mean a smaller quantum of bribes to those whom he had in mind as recepients; that the only middlemen, he was willing to tolerate were local agents in India who could be retained by Bofors for a small sum; that Mr Nehru wanted both, his name and that of Mr Rajiv Gandhi to be kept totally secret by the Swedish government and by representatives of Bofors; that he was himself conscious that he had no business to be negotiating an arms deal as minister of power; that he met Mr Martin Ardbo on 3 July, 1985 in India; that Mr Ardbo had flown to India as part of stage-I of the Bofors negotiations outlined by Mr Nehru to Mr Gauffin on 24 June 1985; that stage-I of Mr Nehru's scheme consisted of Bofors' sending its "number one man" to New Delhi in the first week of July (Ardbo came on 3 July) which person, according to Mr Nehru, must have "total authority" to negotiate all conditions; that during stage-I, Mr Nehru insisted, no experts were needed, because, "technicalities should be brought up later"; that talks between Mr Martin Ardbo and Mr Arun Nehru on 3 July were positive and "they talked frankly"; that, however, no detailed discussions took place during this meeting, but Nehru and Ardbo discussed the representative issue.

The despatches suggest that Mr Nehru was satisfied with his talks with Bofors. On 1st July, 1985, he informed Gauffin that he was no longer in the picture hereafter; he had done his part of the job. Thereafter, all discussions would take place with the ministry of defence. The irresistible inference is that Mr Martin Ardbo had satisfied all Mr Nehru's demands, during the talks on 3 July. These obviously pertained to the "political understanding in the widest sense" on which there were obviously "frank talks", and the issue of middlemen. Having been thus satisfied, Mr Nehru performed his part of the job between 3 July and the 11th, on which date, he informed Mr Gauffin that his role was over.

What role could Mr Nehru possibly play in ensuring that the howitzer contract was awarded to Bofors? The answer obviously is: influence the key players in the decision making process. The two most vital personae were the Prime Minister who also headed the defence ministry, and the top brass in the Indian Army.

To suggest that Mr Nehru's role consisted of informing the then Prime Minister assumes, of course, that Mr Nehru was on a frolic of his own when he discussed the arms contract with Mr Gauffin and Mr Ardbo. This, however, is a highly improbable scenario. It is hardly likely that Mr Nehru would discuss the Bofors deal with Gauffin and Ardbo without the then Prime Minister's authority. If Rajiv Gandhi entrusted Mr Nehru with the task of extracting a sizeable largesse in the form of a bribe from Bofors as a quid pro quo to awarding them the howitzer contract, then, the only task which the latter could possibly perform for Bofors was of skewing the decision of the top brass in the Indian army in favour of Bofors.

As a matter of fact, from July 1985, the top brass of the Indian army, contrary to six assessments by experts over the previous three years, ominously began to display a marked preference for the Bofors gun over the earlier choice, the French Sofma. General Sundarji testified before the joint committee of the Eighth Lok Sabha which enquired into the Bofors' contract, that it was in July 1985 that reservations about the French gun were first expressed, since it was found that the Sofma self-propelled gun could not be mounted on the Indian Vijayanta tank.

It should be a matter of little surprise that the decision of the top brass of the Indian army can be so easily influenced. We have General Sundarji's own testimony which suggests that almost every gun manufacturer has an active lobby working in its favour in the influential ranks of the Army. Indeed, General Sundarji's interview to India Today (15 September, 1989) is illuminating in the extreme. According to him, the express preference of the army, supported by the recommendation of the six expert committees for the Sofma gun, was not as objective as might appear. According to General Sundarji: "During 1983-84, somewhere along the line, the assessment got skewed to the extent of wanting to make the French gun the only gun...there was no fair competition. It was being tailored to become a one-horse race."

Similarly, General Sundarji would have us believe that the technical evaluation committee, headed by Lt Gen. Mayadas, which recommended the Austrian gun, was in fact "set up with the sole intention of pushing the Austrian gun". In such a set-up, surely, it was not difficult to procure the consent of army top brass, to award the howitzer contract to Bofors. We have General Sundarji's poignant cynicism to underline this fact: "Generally, many governments have been getting a percentage of money on these large deals, whether defence deals or otherwise, perhaps, for party funds...The fact is that irrespective of which weapon is chosen, if the intention is to cream a certain amount off the top for party purposes or whatever, it could be creamed off whichever weapon is chosen...

"As a matter of fact, if the French weapon had been finally chosen, perhaps, they would have got a similar percentage. Most politicians realise this and yet they act as if they are totally innocent. This being so, from my point of view, where is the compulsion to push one weapon or the other? This is exactly why as far as the army is concerned, we make sure that what goes into the shortlist is fundamentally acceptable. Thereafter, from our point of view, it is immaterial which one is chosen."

This sounds suspiciously like saying that in the matter of awarding Indian arms contracts, there are clearly demarcated areas of responsibility. The top brass of the Indian army—fortified by their various expert committees—has an exclusive right to decide the various arms manufacturers whose products find their way into the army's shortlist. The decision to select from among that shortlist, however, rests with the ruling political establishment. And, it no doubt depends on such wholly acceptable(!) considerations like the quantum of bribe bid by each contender.

Not surprisingly, General Sundarji is of the view that "in the JPC and subsequently, too much has been General Sundarji's (above left) question remains unanswered: who took the money in the Bofors arms contract? Do the despatches of Gauffin suggest the receipt of kickbacks by Arun Nehru?*

Morality, particularly in the public realm, admits of no exceptions. Rajiv Gandhi failed to realise this when he strove to protect the agent, the Hindujas made of the nuance-change in judging the qualities of the guns. This has led to an over-emphasis on the rationale, propriety and possible motives behind the nuance-change, rather than on the major issue, which is—who has made the money. The real question is: who took the money?"

In the light of General Sundarji's own professed cynicism about the awarding of Indian arms contract by the Indian political-military establishment, certain pertinent questions may well be posed to General Sundarji himself.

- Was General Sundarji's appointment as Chief of Army Staff in February 1986 (which was in fact announced as early as November 1985) a quid pro quo for his and the army's express support for the Bofors gun in preference to all other competing guns?
- Why did he so easily recommend the Bofors gun in February 1986 after assuming office as chief of the Indian army, when in his own earlier assessment, he had revealed a marked preference for the French Sofma gun?
- Does he really believe in his own proclaimed reasons for his volte-face—the failure of the Fench self-propelled gun and the shoot-and-scoot theory?
- In the light of his own revelations about the workings of the political-military establishment, particularly in the matter of awarding of arms contracts, would he consider it reasonable for anyone to suggest that General Sundarji performed his volte-face on the best gun for the Indian Army at the instance of a political boss who was merely exercising his right to choose among the army's shortlist, and not because of his professed reasons. Such as the failure of the French self-propelled gun and the shoot-and-scoot theory?
- In his interview to India Today, General Sundarji made a reference to a French lobby being active in the Indian Army in connection with the Sofma gun. As regards the souce of his belief, General Sundarji's unhelpful comment is: "I was told, there was a file and a French gun was being pushed. It was quite blatant." General Sundarji also suggests that this unholy lobby exerting itself for the French Sofma gun, was one factor which instilled a reaction in him in favour of the Bofors gun. Who told General Sundarji about the French lobby, so that, he reacted in favour of the Swedish gun?

General Sundarji's central question, however, remains unanswered: who took the money in the Bofors arms contract? It is for certain that the Hindujas are in the thick of it and the Bachchans not yet out of the woods. Do the despatches of Mr Gauffin suggest the receipt of kickbacks by Mr Arun Nehru?

I neither hold brief for, nor bear animus against Mr Arun Nehru. I have broken bread with him, and perhaps presumptuously, considered him a friend. I have prepared a suit for defamation against this very magazine, under instructions from Mr Nehru. But morality—particularly in the public realm—admits of no exceptions. Mr Rajiv Gandhi failed to realise this when he strove to protect the Bachchans and the Satish Sharmas of this world, at his own peril. I parted ways for the first time in my life with my father when he failed to recognise the logic of his moral crusade in Bofors when it came to his distant relatives, the Hindujas. I feel anguish at the selective morality that some of my friends and mentors in the press have displayed, in connection with Mr Arun Nehru, but, I cannot be a party to the same.

Mr Nehru must forthwith make a full and complete disclosure of what he knows about the Bofors transaction to the CBI (Central Bureau of Investigation). If he fails to do so, he can hardly blame his erstwhile friends and colleagues for concluding that perhaps, the Hindujas were right when they suggested that behind the veil of secrecy that surrounds AE Services, lurks the towering fire of Mr Arun Nehru.

Campus greens

At Madras Christian College they agitate for plants, not jobs

While the anti-reservation stir had the rest of the country in thrall, Madras Christian College was witness to an agitation of an entirely different sort. The students of the college—whose campus stretches over 375 acres of verdant green—went on strike to protest the management's decision to clear the scrub jungle around the main building. At a time when the entire student fraternity was preoccupied with protecting its rights from an increasingly casteist government, this overriding concern for the environment came as a pleasant surprise.

Recently, the management of the college cleared two patches of scrub near the St Thomas Hall and Heber Hall for use as parking lots for motorcycles and bicycles. The students objected to this. There was no justification for destroying valuable flora, they said, when there were two vacant plots closer to the halls.

The administration, however, refused to revise its decision. The argument went, that the plots suggested as alternative parking sites were too near the residential quarters of the students, and would cause unnecessary noise pollution. H. Francis Soundararaj, the principal of the college, insisted on going ahead with the scrub clearance.

As the attitude of the principal hardened, the students took to organising protest meetings at the gates. Soundararaj refused to budge from his stand, maintaining that their demands were "mostly irrelevant to students and hostel functioning and instigated by anti-social elements". The students refused to be cowed down, and the college was closed down as the two sides engaged in the now inevitable showdown.

Before ordering the closure of the college, however, Soundararaj dissolved the student council, holding it guilty of attempts to disrupt normal campus life, and sent off telegrams to the students' parents which read, "hunger strike risks health and police arrest. Take away your ward immediately".

Members of the student council, for their part, accuse the principal of being vindictive, in that he dissolved the council with impunity, once the agitation got going. When the students raised the issue of misuse of UGC (University Grants Commission) funds by the authorities, Soundararaj asked: "Who among the staff are instigating you?" Later, say the students, "he talked of our having the support of anti-social elements. Did he mean that there are anti-socials among the faculty?"

The row was settled after the intervention of a few alumni members. But the truce proved to be a temporary one. When the college reopened, the principal put up a signed note on the college notice-board, which informed the students that their council had been "reinstated" now that the strike was off. He invited members of the council to his house for tea "to demonstrate that we maintain cordial relations personally whatever be our differences on issues".

The council members, however, chose to boycott the tea party. The principal, they said, had no right to dissolve the student council in the first place, so how could he possibly reinstate it? "He cannot wash away the main issues with his tea. We are yet to get any assurance from him regarding the preservation of the scrub jungle and we have not got any clarification regarding the UGC funds," said a council member.

Madras Christian College: trees are more important than parking lots

Topping the list of the students' demands is an assurance that no more of the invaluable scrub jungle around the college would be cleared for any development/construction purposes. In fact, the students had boycotted classes on the same issue last September, when the management cleared about 11 acres of scrub jungle for a National Fair for Water Management in Agriculture, which was to be organised by the noted agricultural scientist Dr M.S. Swaminathan.

But the students strike persuaded Dr Swaminathan to move his show elsewhere. The scientist reportedly admitted that he had overlooked the ecological considerations involved in holding the affair on the Madras Christian College grounds, and also offered to reimburse the cost of replanting the cleared scrub. The college administration, for its part, promised that it would never again attempt to clear the flora in and around the campus.

PHOTOGRAPHS: MUTHUKUMARAN

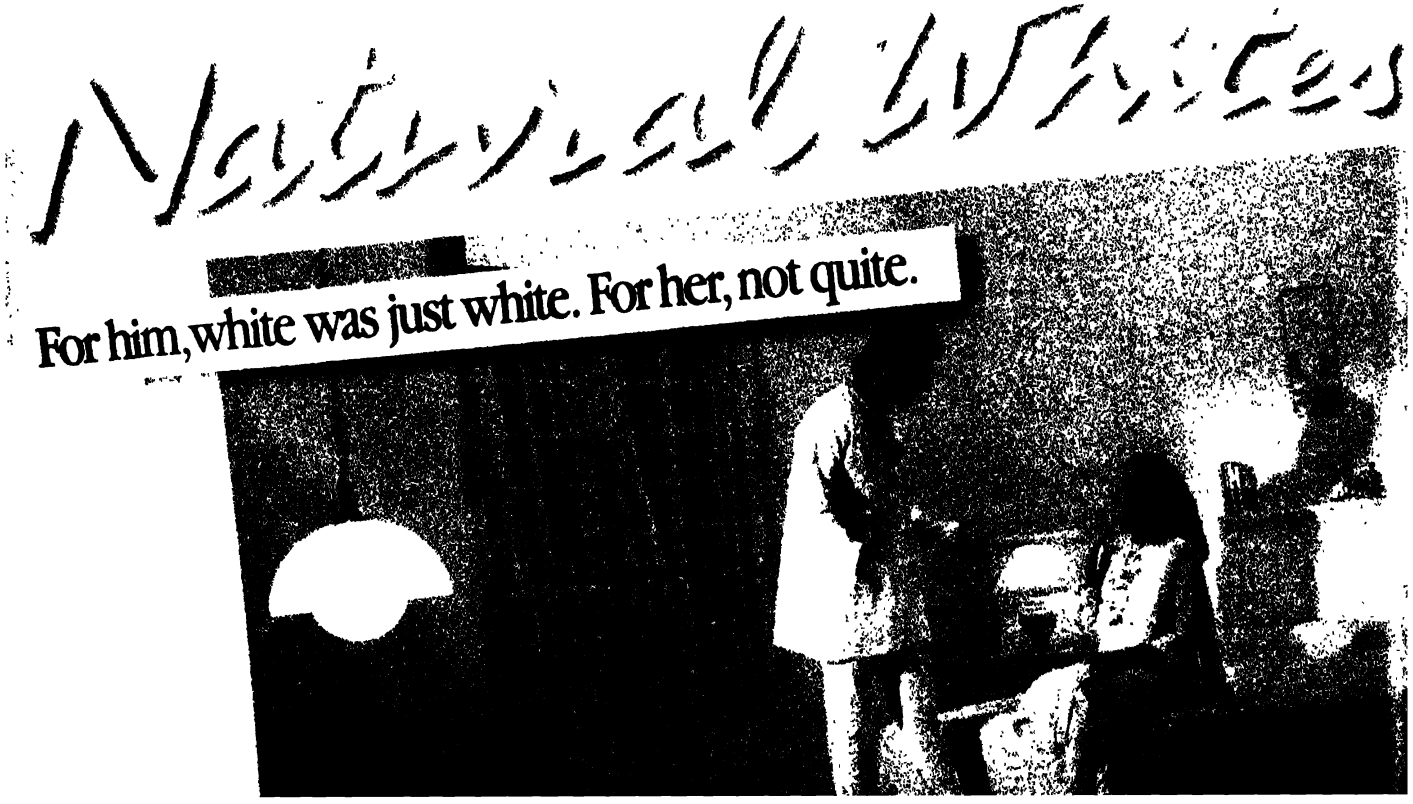
Now, principal Soundararaj complains: "The ecology issue was settled a year ago and yet they are raking it up again only to gain public attention."

But the fact remains that the authorities have now gone back on their assurance about the fate of the scrub. With reason, maintains the administration. The college has already initiated the process for the UGC to accord it 'deemed university' status, whereby it could award its own diplomas and degrees, rather than continue to function under the Madras University. "We are not a sanctuary over here." says Soundararaj. "We are trying for a 'deemed university' status and buildings must necessarily come up."



"We are not a sanctuary over here," says Soundararaj, the principal. "We are trying for a 'deemed university' status and buildings must come up"

The student representatives don't buy this. There are a number of barren patches on the campus area where construction can take place, they say, without disturbing the flora. "If this rate of denudation of the campus flora continues," adds one of the faculty members, "we will end up being a 'doomed university' not a 'deemed university'."

Most of the faculty members, in fact, support the students in their current agitation. Professor M. Gladstone, head of the department of zoology, says: "I was the curator in charge of the campus greenery for 11 years and I was forced to quit from that post after I protested against the clearance of the scrub jungle." According to the professor, about 70 acres of the 375-acre campus was precious scrub, quite unique in the east coast area and that this was now threatened because of the "lack of environmental awareness in the minds of the erring management".

Instead of concentrating on solving the problems in hand, complain students, the management is content to

"If this rate of denudation of the campus flora continues," says a faculty member, "we will end up being a 'doomed university'" issue such directives as the one banning the use of motorcycles inside the campus area. Principal Soundararaj declared recently: "On principle, no resident is entitled to keep a motorised vehicle. This will be implemented in a phased manner with all the first year and M. Phil students not being allowed to bring in their vehicles this year."

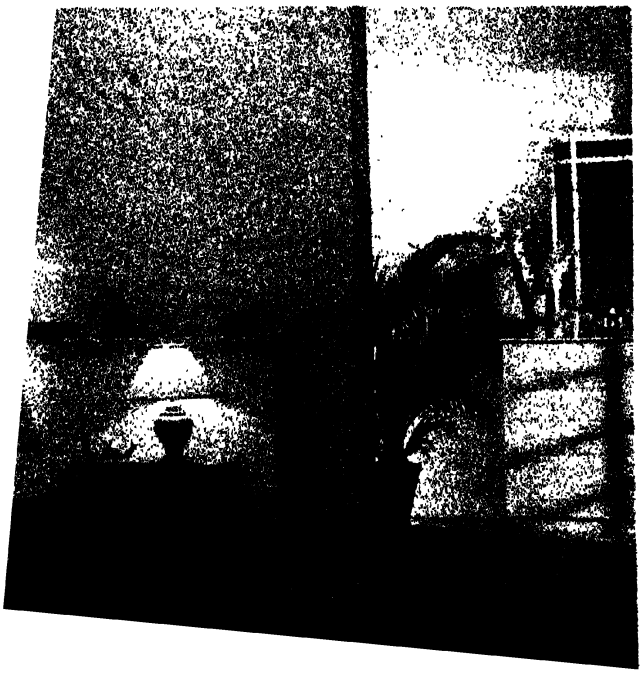
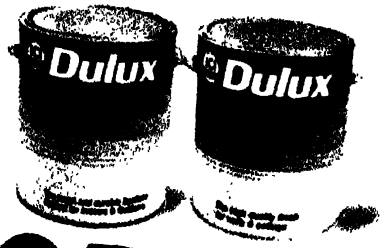
The decision, apparently, came because some students—and a number of outsiders as well—whizzed past the gates of the college, with their girlfriends on the pillion and rode into the woods for a 'bit of romance'. "Last year, I booked about five cases when they brought in outside women," says the principal. "I cannot allow this to become a promiscuous campus."



The students object to the ban, on the grounds that theirs is a coeducational institution and many bonafide female students come pillion-riding on their friends' bikes. "He could have our bikes checked at the gates rather than impose a total ban," wailed students.

But, to the great glee of the students, the ban was not implemented with any degree of seriousness, because of the lack of a proper security system within the campus. For the present, one of the college professors has been assigned guard duty and the students have a ball dodging the academician, trying valiantly to police the woods. Quipped one of the students: "Is the UGC paying these professors to teach us or to act as security guards, estate officers and so on?"

As the row rages, one thing is clear. Madras Christian College, once known for its high educational standards and its celebrity alumni (including such stalwarts as former President Dr S. Radhakrishnan, former foreign secretary A.P. Venkateswaran and former chief of army staff General K. Sundarji), will now be recognised as India's first green college.



And despite the strikes and closures, that isn't such an unwelcome development. ●

R. Bhagwan Singh/Madras

She was tired of plain white.
He didn't want anything bright.
She had an idea. Shades of white!
He was puzzled. Does white have shades?
Yes. The new Dulux Natural Whites Collection.
Bluebell for coolness. Barley for warmth.
Lily adds a glow. Softness of Rose.
Apple to refresh. Orchid for elegance.

The whiter shades of pale.
Fresh from Dulux.

ICI Dulux

What's with Dimple Kapadia? Even after having amassed a vast fortune the actress continues to be her stingy worst.

Recently, Dimple was spotted at the Ensemble, Bombay's most expensive designer boutique. The auburn-haired actress kept cribbing about the exorbitant prices and, finally, settled for an outfit from the 50 per cent discount rack.

At least, if Dimple showed some consistency in this regard, her miserly behaviour would be easier to take. But her attitude is quite different when sister Simple puts the price tags on her star sibling's clothes. Of course, then it is the hapless producer's turn to go blue in the face protesting against the prices, while the star exercises her prerogative of turning a blind eye.

After all, even little sister Simple deserves to rake it in on occasions.

Deepti Naval: switching professions

Salman Khan: the brattish star

Deepti Naval need not worry too much about being turned out of the Bombay film industry. Because the 'intense' actress can always go in for an alternative career in interior decoration.

Deepti's house itself is ample proof of her good taste. Not for her, the regular filmi, nouveau riche horrors that are all too common in Bombay.

And the appreciation her house has received from all quarters has made Naval quite ambitious. Ambitious enough, at least, to want to design a farmhouse for someone.

Any takers?

Success sure seems to have gone to Salman Khan's head. Recently on the sets of producer Nitin Manmohan's Baaghi the other Heartbreak Khan had a minor quarrel with Asha Sachdev which got him into a bad mood. So, the brattish Salman yelled "pack up" and walked off from the sets with the entire unit looking on in horror.

Of course, producer Manmohan diplomatically adds that Salman is not a bad kid. He just needs to be tackled properly.

Maybe Sangeeta could teach Salman's producers a lesson or two. ●

The beautiful way to get rid of your dandruff

Most people think that dandruff is just an irritation on the scalp. But it can also affect the way your hair looks. Dandruff makes it dull and lustreless. New Clinic Special gets rid of your dandruff gently. Gives you great looking hair. Its new international formulation loosens and lifts out dandruff from the scalp, where it really begins. And it has a rich, creamy conditioner which leaves your hair soft and shiny. So you can use it regularly even after your dandruff's gone. Use New Clinic Special to prevent your dandruff from coming back. And to keep your hair looking good.

NEW Clinic Special

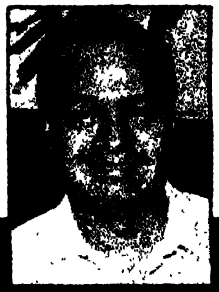
ANTI-DANDRUFF SHAMPOO

Selling Anjali

GV Films' marketing strategy initiates a trend

Hard-sell has always been part of show-biz. But rarely has it gone as far as in the south Indian film industry. Producer-distributor G. Venkateswaran (42) and his younger brother Maniratnam (37), the whiz-kid director of Nayakan, have succeeded in revolutionising the concept of movie making and marketing in the south.

Consider the facts: last year G. Venkateswaran (popularly known as GV in Madras) and his distribution company GV Films went public. The first time such a thing had happened in the 75-year old history of Indian cinema. What's more, its issue was oversubscribed three times over with a Rs 10 share going for Rs 30.



The decision to go public made sense, then, vindicating GV's credentials as a chartered accountant and financial wizard. But more impressive was the manner in which Maniratnam's latest film Anjali was marketed by his distributor brother.

The modus operandi adopted by GV would have done any advertising agency proud. And it certainly succeeded in whipping up an Anjali 'fever', even though the subject of the film wasn't one that spelt box-office success. The story revolved around a mentally retarded three-year-old and how her upper middle class family deals with her condition.

Instead Maniratnam, a great Steven Spielberg fan, adapted the special effects from Poltergeist and ET (children on a flying bicycle, etc); roped in Illaiyaraaja for the soundtrack (nearly two lakh copies of its audio cassettes have already been sold); and managed to churn out a super success.

Made at a cost of Rs 1.25 crore, Anjali is poised to make a profit of over Rs 3 crores. A confident GV predicts: "The share value of the film is around Rs 30. I expect it to go up to Rs 45 when the film completes 100 days."

Anjali was, without doubt, the biggest commercial success of the year. Says GV: "For the first time we marketed a film in India the way consumer products like soaps are sold. We followed the same techniques mastered by Hollywood studios to market their films." 'Nearly three months before the film's release GV held a big bash where chief minister Karunanidhi released the film's audio cassette. It was advertised as Illaiyaraaja's 500th film, though serious doubts were raised about that one. But whatever the truth of the matter, the public function held to felicitate Illaiyaraaja set GV back by Rs 3 lakhs. Later the songs of the film were popularised by radio spots. After this initial publicity hype, GV followed up with the release of an Anjali logo—a drawing of the profile of the mentally retarded Anjali with her hair down and her hands raised. Unlike most distributors, who depend on larger than life, hideous cut-outs of the stars of their films to draw in the crowds, GV put up 80 commercial hoardings all over Madras of the Anjali logo.

A scene from Anjali; (inset) G. Venkateswaran: hard-sell pays

A month before Anjali was scheduled for release, however, GV found out that his female lead Shyamalee had acted in a Malayalam film, Maloot, which may well be screened before his movie. Realising that his film would lose out if that happened, GV bought the dubbing and distribution rights of Maloot and delayed the film. Says the distributor: "Now I will release the film, which will do good business on the strength of Shyamalee and the succes of Anjali."

But GV achieved the biggest breakthrough when he convinced Liptons to launch a new biscuit called Anjali Milk Anna. Lipton proposes to use the Anjali logo to popularise the biscuit in south India. Pace Luggages has also decided to market its new range of canvas school bags with the Anjali logo.

Predictably, the success story of GV Film has captured the imagination of a host of other producers in Madras And the imitators have gone further than GV. For instance, Sajan Verghese is planning to launch a public limited company, Saj Vision, where stars will work for a fixed salary and a percentage of the profits—yet another Hollywood concept.

So, in the end, Anjali may prove to be more than just another hit film.

Sreedhar Pillay/Madras

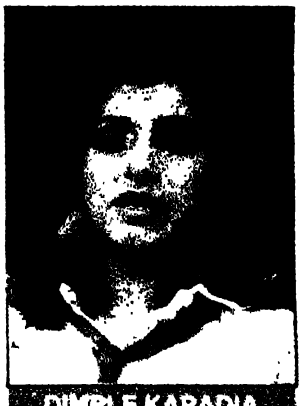
AMITABH BACHCHAN AND SRIDEVI

GAUTAM PATOLE

Girls on film

Elisabeth Bumiller on Bombay's actresses

Outside, the summer monsoon was turning Bombay into an impassable swamp, but inside, on the set of the Hindi film Dance Dance, they were busy making dreams. I had watched all day as one of India's top actors, a slim-hipped, blow-dried heartthrob, gyrated to a disco beat in a kind of subcontinental Saturday Night Fever. His co-star was Mandakini, a 17-year-old newcomer, who had made her movie debut the year before in a wet sari scene that male audiences and outraged feminists had still not forgotten. But the actress I found more interesting was the "dramatic" female lead, Smita Patil, at that moment stretched out in her dressing room, bored and exhausted. She was 30 years old, one of India's biggest stars, sensuous and striking, and a favourite of the highbrow art cinema. Yet there she was, at ten on a Sunday night, working on schlock so she could make a living. What was worse, lately her personal life had become more interesting to her fans than her films. The big news was that she was five months pregnant with the child of Raj Babbar, a well-known actor whom she called her husband. But Babbar, as anybody who read the movie magazines knew, was married to someone else.



"When we got involved, he never promised to leave his wife," Patil told me. "However difficult it was for me to accept certain facts, I still had to."

REKHA

SRIDEVI

DIMPLE KAPADIA

I was talking to her in 20-minute segments between shots. Despite the seeming contradictions in her personal life, Patil was one of the more intelligent actresses in Bombay, college-educated, with a feminist conscience and an awareness of the world beyond the studio gates.

For the day's scenes, Patil's costume designer had managed to create a dress that hid her growing stomach, but the strain of standing in front of the camera for hours in high heeled pumps was evident in her face. "My back," she said, grimacing. She was sitting on her bed, feet propped up on a pillow, with a front section of her hair in an electric roller. She nibbled at a piece of toast covered with an unappetizing mound of melted cheese and tried to fend off a director's assistant who came in to tell her they needed close-ups. "Close-ups?" she said, horrified. "When I'm looking like a dead cat?" The room, a mess of costumes and make-up, smelled stale. From this vantage point, her life did not appear to be a glamorous one, although it had led to the kinds of entanglements for which Patil was now famous. "Women who work in this industry have no time for any kind of normal life," she said. "You're working ten or twelve hours a day with different men all the time. You're constantly demanded to emote, and it tends to become a very high-strung existence emotionally, which leads into your personal involvements. The line is very thin."

ANCHOR®

SOCKS

WILLIAM INDUSTRIES
Anchor House, Nirnay Sagar Building,
T.J. Road, Sewri (W), Bombay-400 015.
Phone: 4137235, 4137321, 4130369.
Fax: (022) 4126556

In between her comments, the director's assistant walked in with Patil's lines for an upcoming scene. They had just been written on the set, which was standard procedure for Indian films. Patil had only a vague idea of the story line, but this was not a matter for concern. She knew that Dance Dance was essentially about a brother-and-sister song-and-dance act and that she played the sister, who got raped. It was not the sort of plot that would have impressed her feminist friends, but Patil had already done a half dozen rape scenes in her career—a modest number in an industry that regularly spiced up its films with battered women for the heroes to rescue. "Because, you see, the man has to be the saviour," Patil said sarcastically. "It's all for the sake of the man. The women have to continue being beaten." The rest of Dance Dance was a mystery to her. "If you ask me, I honestly don't know what happens," she said, shrugging. "It's a normal Hindi film."

MANDAKINI with Mithun

A slim-hipped, blow-dried heartthrob gyrated to a disco beat in a kind of subcontinental Saturday Night Fever with his 17-year-old heroine

Smita Patil worked in what was without question the largest and nuttiest film industry in the world. Every year, the Indian "dream factory" churned out close to 900 feature films, almost all of them frothy romances and bloody shoot-'em-ups, in Hindi and other regional languages, for an annual paying audience of no fewer than five billion. That was five times the number of people who saw the 230 feature films produced in 1988 in the United States. And even though Bombay, like Hollywood, had been hurt by video piracy and television, the dream factory remained in full production. This was one of the great ironies of an industry that always appeared on the edge of collapse. India's literate upper classes had for years avoided the low-brow entertainment of Hindi films in the country's run-down cinema halls, and by the late 1980s, more movies were failing than ever before. And yet more movies were being made than ever before. This of course made no sense.

A theory in the industry, virtually impossible to prove, was that accountants altered the books so that the films seemed to lose money, enabling producers to avoid the high Indian taxes on profits. Certainly the stars were notorious for receiving "black money", or cash fees paid under the table. Whatever the case, real-estate speculators, diamond merchants and expatriate Indians continued to finance new films with enormous sums of money from outside the industry. Like the tycoon in America who buys the local baseball team for the prestige and the chance to make friends with the players, the investor in Indian films was not completely rational. The glamour of Bombay was hard for many investors to resist, and they seemed willing to gamble that lush, big-screen movies would survive by offering escape in a country where most people struggled through impoverished lives on the edge of survival.

The three leading commercial Indian actresses throughout the mid and late 1980s were indisputably Rekha, Dimple Kapadia and Sridevi. Although their positions as numbers one, two and three shifted according to their most recent box-office hits and failures, no other commercial actress came close to touching their star quality. When I was in Bombay in the summer of 1986, Rekha, the longtime queen of the Hindi screen, who had been number one for years, had recently been surpassed by her younger rival, Sridevi (pronounced Shree-day-vee). Dimple, as everyone called her, had recently re-entered the film world after a disastrous marriage and was not yet in the running. Two years later, after Sridevi had suffered a few box-office flops, Rekha was back on top as number one and elder stateswoman. Dimple had come roaring back as well and had at times threatened to take the number-one spot for herself. This was all sometimes very hard to follow, even for those who made a career of it. "We find it difficult to keep up as far as the girls are concerned," admitted Nari Hira, the publisher of Stardust the leading film magazine.

The first actress I met was Dimple, who was shooting one afternoon at a bungalow in a high-rent section of Bombay. This was in the summer of 1986, when she was still down on the lower rungs of the film industry. Even so, most men, even intelligent, professional men who never went to the Hindi films, used to go into raptures over Dimple. When I first saw her on

DIMPLE with Mithun

NDRAJEET AURANGABADKAR

Another marriage was not in her future since she, too, was involved with an actor who, she said, would never leave his wife the set, I could see why. She was beautiful—tall, shapely, with enormous eyes, swollen lips and a dramatic cleft in her chin. She was wearing a curly long-haired red wig and a green-and-cream silk sari. The film was called Insaaf, or "Justice," and Dimple played twin sisters, one a nightclub singer, the other a doctor. Naturally the singer was raped, then jumped off a building out of shame. When I arrived on the set, Dimple was in the middle of a scene, shot in a bedroom, in which the nightclub singer was telling her lover, a former college professor, that she had just aborted his child. When the lover asked why, she replied that it was because they were not husband and wife. The lover, by now extremely agitated, declared his love and asked for her hand in marriage, at which point the singer admitted that she had made up the abortion story and that she was still carrying his child. At the melodramatic conclusion of the scene, Dimple burst into real tears.

"It just happens sometimes," she said afterward in her dressing room, still sniffling. "That scene was from within. Until yesterday, I didn't know where this character was at. But now I'm getting it. She wanted to be an actress and she couldn't make it, so she got into this nightclub scene." I asked her about her attempt to make a comeback after her failed marriage. "The comeback has been no comeback," she said flatly. "I don't know what people were expecting from me." Dimple had the straightforward, no-excuses manner of someone who had been through too much to put up a front. At least her life had provided abundant material for the scene she had just played.

At the age of fourteen she had starred in Bobby, a love story that became one of the industry's all-time hits. The film made Dimple into a sensation, but instead of using it to launch her career, she married, at the age of fifteen, the country's most popular leading man at the time, Rajesh Khanna. He promptly told his new wife that her acting days were over. "My husband believed that my place was at home," Dimple said. "It was not a husband-wife relationship—it was father-daughter." After two children and ten years of marriage, she finally walked out. "It's a big stigma to leave a man," she said. "I didn't expect to be accepted. But after I left him, it made a tremendous difference to me. The best part was that I was earning my own bread." I could see by now that Dimple was clearly pleased with her outburst of tears in the previous scene. "That one shot gave me a lot of pleasure," she said. "That kind of high I've never been able to experience with anything else in my life. And if I can get that high twice or thrice a year—I just love it." Another marriage was not in her future since she, too, was involved with an actor who she said would "never" leave his wife. I asked her why she stayed in the relationship. "I don't owe anything to anyone," she said. "If I'm happy, I'm going to do it."

Some days later I met Rekha, a stunning 32-year-old beauty, who that summer had seen her career eclipsed by her young friend Sridevi, in a widely discussed Indian version of All About Eve . Even worse, the dreaded Sridevi had the effrontery to be linked romantically with the leading man, who was said to have been Rekha's lover of many years. I decided it would be best to bring up a less incendiary topic first, so in Rekha's dressing room one muggy evening I began by asking her about one of her favourite subjects—Rekha, a mythic being she had come to see as larger than herself. "Nobody can take my position, not even myself," she announced to me as she draped her forehead with jewels for an upcoming scene. "Not even the human being that I am can ever take Rekha's position. No. That is only for her. She has taken that position for life." Although she viewed herself as a deity, Rekha was warm, friendly and so talkative that it was difficult to guide the conversation to a new topic. Listening to her voice, however, was lovely. She had learned to speak English with a smooth, almost musical upper-class Indian accent that veered toward the British.

SMITA PATIL

"If you ask," said Patil of Dance Dance, "I honestly don't know what happens. It's a normal Hindi film"

The goddess had arrived in Bombay from south India more than a decade before as "a round ball of flesh", as Rekha herself said. But she had ambition, she had street smarts and, most important, she had the quality called oomph in Bombay, which was the powerful sex appeal necessary for success. So her movies did well. As years passed, Rekha slowly transformed herself, changing her make-up, learning how to dress and slimming down with the help of Jane Fonda's workout videos. Soon she was starring in movies with Amitabh Bachchan, the male megastar. Even upper-class housewives went to their beauty salons and said they wanted to look like Rekha—full lips, dark, dramatic eyes, lustrous black hair. At the same time, the gossip magazines were chronicling Rekha's depressions, tantrums and periods of Garbo-like reclusiveness, which merely added to her appeal. When she did speak, she had the unfortunate habit of saying whatever came into her head, revealing on several occasions that all she read was Cosmopolitan magazine and Archie comic books. But then Rekha hit 30 and was immediately branded as "aging" by male audiences, who preferred, she said, "a child-woman, impish, bubbly, voluptuous". Rekha insisted to me that she still had that kind of appeal, but the talk in the industry was that she had in fact become, after all her workouts, much too sleek for the tastes of the masses. This set the stage for Sridevi, the more recent arrival out of south India, who was every bit as plump, popular and savvy as Rekha had been a decade before. Suddenly it was Sridevi's face that appeared on movie posters across India. Only 21-one years old that summer, Sridevi had already signed up for more movies than Rekha, which had earned her the title of Miss Number One in Bombay. "She's one of the number ones," Rekha corrected, with a tiny frown. "There are a lot of number ones." Both she and Sridevi continued to insist that they were friends, and they made a big fuss of greeting each other in public. A year before, when I had been on a plane from Madras to Delhi, I had watched as Sridevi and Rekha unexpectedly [illegible] to each other on the same flight. They squealed with delight across the cabin, throwing the rest of the passengers into an uproar. Such behavior was great entertainment for their fellow actresses in Bombay, who believed that the two were obsessed with each other and actually imitated each other in their films. The friendship, these other actresses told me, was more like detente—Sridevi was so afraid of Rekha's venom and Rekha was so fearful of Sridevi's success that the two refrained from clawing at each other in public. Rekha, though, had her moments.

"She's a cute kid," Rekha said when I finally got around to raising the issue of Sridevi's success. "She came into the industry at a time when I was thinking of stepping out. People missed me so much, and she almost had perfect timing in filling that gap. She is very intelligent. Of course, she's much more immature than me, but in no time she'll learn."

I found Miss Number One at another studio in Bombay, impatiently waiting for her next scene on the set of Mr India, a big-budget special-effects film with a bizarre plot twist in which she played a reporter for a newspaper called The Crimes of India who falls in

REKHA

When she came to Bombay, she said, she was "a round ball of flesh". But she slowly transformed herself, changing her make-up and slimming down love with an invisible man. The set, a futuristic grotto of aluminium foil that looked like Star Wars run amok, appeared to be the headquarters of a diabolical villain. The producers had hopes for a blockbuster, and when Mr India was released a year later, it quickly became a big summertime hit. I dragged an Indian friend, Bim Bissell, to see it with me. Bim worked at the World Bank in Delhi, had a son in an American university and was one of the many Indians who had stopped going to the cinema halls years before. I think she looked upon our excursion as a minor adventure. "I haven't been in this theater since I was in college," she told me as we took our seats. The theater was hot, gritty and smelly, but the movie, which had received something better than the usual disdainful reviews, turned out to be absurd fun. Much of its success was due to Sridevi, who was charismatic on-screen, especially in one memorable song-and-dance number when she was costumed Bombay-style in a clinging gold lame gown with a matching gold headdress.

Back on the set in Bombay, however, the Mr India star had been in a bad mood, annoyed with her director for keeping her until eight at night when she had been up since dawn. But when I asked Sridevi about her rival Rekha, the irritation gave way to a little-girl innocence. "We don't have any problems between us," she told me with a wide-eyed look. She was collapsed on the bed in her dressing room, a dusty refuge filled with costumes and half-eaten sandwiches, and up close had none of the seductive magic she projected on-screen. She was merely a young girl, pretty and plump, who had become an object of fantasy for her fans in the south who liked her that way. "I hate being a fatty," she sighed. "But if I were skinny, my fans in the south would kick me out." Most Indian actresses were equally fleshy, and even those viewed as slender were 20 pounds overweight by Hollywood standards. Only Rekha worked out at a health club. The others spent lots of time telling film magazines about the exercise programs they followed at home, but I had my doubts. The desired look for an actress in the film industry was soft and luscious, which implied leisure and wealth, and separated her from the lower classes in the villages, where the women were muscular and thin.

Sridevi began acting when she was five and had appeared in more than 100 films. She routinely worked 15 hours a day, seven days a week, and insisted she never tired of it. "I love this profession," she told me sweetly. "It's such a beautiful thing. Sometimes I feel I should take a day off, but by the afternoon, I get restless." It was only in recent years that she had learned English and gained some independence. "Now I talk to the press without my mummy," she informed me. Clearly she had picked up a few tricks since then, because when I asked her again about Rekha, Sridevi was as evasive as a Congress party politician. "She's very interested in her work," she said of Rekha. "She has a very lovely face."

In order to find out what was really going on between the two women, I made an appointment back in Delhi to see Amitabh Bachchan, the star who was at that time also a member of Parliament. At 44, he remained the single biggest phenomenon in the history of Indian film. I found him in his subtly decorated beige-and-cream office, all six feet of him folded into an expensively upholstered chair

He had bedroom eyes and a gentle manner and in person turned out to be nothing like the Rambo he played on-screen. He had grown up in cultivated surroundings as the son of a well-known poet and scholar in Allahabad and was a close childhood friend of Rajiv Gandhi. Despite his privileged background, he had risen to stardom as the quintessential cinematic "angry young man", whose swaggering manner and contempt for social niceties made him a symbol for an alienated generation of movie-goers who had left the villages and struggled to find work in the cities. "My fan is the man on the street who's looking to make it in life," Bachchan said. "I've always played the underdog who has single-handedly risen above all obstacles."

SHABANA with Javed

"I went through hell," said Azmi, "but it was only in the final analysis that I felt that nothing was worth giving up my man for"

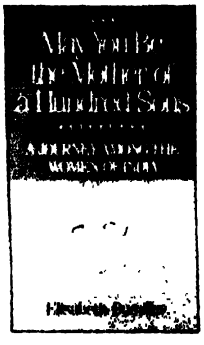
At the height of his success, Bachchan was making so many movies at the same time that he had had to "die" three times in one day—shot twice and stabbed once. ("It was deadly," he said.) Several years before, when he really almost died performing a stunt on a set, the nation went into mourning. Prime Minister Indira Gandhi paid her respects at the hospital, and All India Radio broadcast bulletins on Bachchan's vital signs as people fasted and prayed nationwide. "It's something I can never forget," he said. When he recovered, he found he was a bigger star than ever. In 1984, his friend Rajiv asked him to run for a Parliament seat against a particularly powerful and entrenched incumbent. Bachchan won easily, but after the election he never had the political impact that people expected, and by 1988 he had resigned amid allegations, never proven, that he was evading taxes by using his brother, a resident of Switzerland, to funnel his fortune out of the country. His health had also suffered, and he was undergoing treatment for myasthenia gravis, a muscular disease. But throughout it all, he had continued his acting career, for fees that were estimated as high as $1 million per film (Sridevi, the highest-paid actress, made only about $150,000 per film.)

I talked with Bachchan in his office for an hour, and he seemed happy to hold forth on the subject of films, Rekha and Sridevi, rather than discuss his political headaches. For years, Rekha and Bachchan were the unbeatable couple of Indian films, and the gossip magazines continued to write that the on-screen electricity between them was crackling off-screen as well. Bachchan was said to have exerted a sophisticating influence on Rekha, helping to polish her to her present sheen. Bachchan, who was married, casually denied any relationship with her. "Why only Rekha?" he asked me. "Why not the rest of them?"

Rekha had rather unconvincingly denied the relationship too, although she did say, "I wish I were" involved with Bachchan. She had never married. She also spoke very passionately about the married man who had been in her life for years, but whom she never named. "It's a lot of pain, no matter how independent you are," she said. "It's all very nice to live in a dream sequence and say, 'Oh, you are the mistress and you're having the best, you're more enticing and desirable to your man'. No, no no. You're giving up a lot."

One actress who kept some distance from the glamour scene was Shabana Azmi, the winner of more acting awards than any other

SRIDEVI with Vinod Khanna



DURGAPRASAD

In recent years Sridevi had learned English and gained some independence. "Now I talk to the press without mummy," she informed me female star and, in my mind, the reigning feminist conscience of Hindi films. More than most others , she had the ability to look at the curious world of the Indian actress with a degree of perspective and irony. Azmi was a serious artist who began her career in India's highbrow art films, then crossed over into the commercial cinema because, she said, "I saw it as something that would get me stardom." That it did, and her fees increased, although Azmi could never command the prices of Sridevi. Instead she shuttled between the serious cinema and shlock and argued that the name she made for herself in her popular movies brought more attention to the small-budget films in which she played strong women who fought back.

I first met Azmi at her beach cottage, a small house of dark wood that was decorated not in the usual Bombay style of gilt and chrome but with Indian textiles and other folk crafts. Azmi was 34 and had an intelligent face, striking but not classically beautiful. She was in many ways India's version of Meryl Streep, and Meryl Streep was in fact her favorite actress. Her status as an "artist", however, had not made her insufferable, and she turned out to be lively, gossipy and no more narcissistic than anyone else.

Azmi, like so many others, had fallen in love with a married man. But because she was a "serious" actress who espoused feminism, the gossip press made more of the affair than usual. Some fans even called her a hypocrite. "Here is a woman," Azmi said of herself, "who believes in liberation and women's rights, and then she just goes and snatches a man away from his wife?" Her case was more convoluted than most. The man, one of the industry's top screenwriters, was a lifelong Muslim who ended his first marriage by making the simple unilateral declaration prescribed by Muslim law. As a feminist, Azmi said, she found it difficult to accept his divorce because she felt Muslim religious law was unfair to women. But love triumphed and she married him anyway. "I went through hell," she said. "It was only in the final analysis that I felt that nothing was worth giving up my man for." Azmi had been able to ignore social conventions because of the unique culture in which she lived. "Actresses come into power, and then they have the ability to make choices, which most women in India don't," she said. This was the real advantage of being an actress in India, I thought, and Azmi was one of the few with a star's status who had the intelligence to articulate it. "An actress is treated like a real person," she went on. "She's handling her finances, she's employing people. In a sense, she's totally equal to a man. And you realize you have this in you, despite your sheltered existence and your cultural heritage. And you say, 'All right, if men have the freedom why can't we?'"

May You Be The Mother Of A Hundred Sons A Journey Among The Women Of India
by Elisabeth Bumiller
Published by Random House, New York, USA.
Distributed by India Book House Distributors.
Price: Rs 360

The melodramas in the actresses' private lives didn't stop anyone from buying tickets to see them, of course. In a country as poor as India, the stars were so fantastically out of reach that they really were idols, allowed to behave in ways that would not be accepted among ordinary mortals. The movies may have been moral guides, but the lives of the stars proved that people in India liked to have it both ways. The fans delighted in the scandals of the actresses in the same way that Indians had always loved the legends of their promiscuous deities. In that sense, the stars were simply continuing a tradition as old as the Hindu myths. "Clandestine relationships have existed from time immemorial," Amitabh Bachchan said. "Most of our gods have had two wives." ●

Buddhism is best

Channel Four telecasts yet another controversial film on India

The Western media remain obsessed with Indian stereotypes. Poverty, dowry deaths, floods and untouchability remain favourite themes. British television audiences, for instance, know almost all there is to know about untouchability in India. A few months back Channel Four television screened Mira Hammermesh's film Caste At Birth. Well-researched and slickly directed the film made a powerful impact on viewers.

But no sooner had the rave reviews about the Hammermesh film petered out than Channel Four came up with another movie on the same subject. But, to be fair, this film, In The Footsteps Of Ambedkar, was fairly unique. Instead of concentrating on bedevilling India's caste system, it dealt with those untouchables who had converted to Buddhism. The choice of Dennis Lingwood—a former British army private who became a devoted follower of Ambedkar and is now one of Britain's leading senior Buddhists—as narrator, made perfect sense.

Lingwood, born in England in 1926, was posted to India where he proceeded to desert the army in 1947. For the next 20 years he travelled in India completely bereft of any material possessions, initially, even without a passport.

Gradually he was drawn into the Indian way of life. He was ordained a Buddhist monk (his name became Sangharakshita, protector of the order) and he founded a monastry in which he lived and taught. Here he met Dr Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar, the creator of the Indian Constitution, who later inspired him to return to England, with the express purpose of setting up a Buddhist order.

Not only did Lingwood succeed in setting up such an order, he also established a supporting charitable organisation, the Friends of the Western Buddhist Order.

In The Footsteps Of Ambedkar deals with Sangharakshita's return to India in 1988 to pay homage to Ambedkar. It is an emotional homecoming. Ambedkar had died within six weeks of becoming a Buddhist in 1956 and it had been left to Sangharakshita to organise the conversion of the untouchables. He had worked with them for eleven years before returning to England.

Sangharakshita's bold remarks on Hinduism and Islam ("Hinduism has no heart. It does not think in terms of upliftment of those who live at the bottom of the social system." And "Islam has appeal because it is given to fanaticism.") led the Indian government, Congress (I) at that time, to refuse permission to the Western crew to shoot in the country. Producer-director Bob Mullan and his crew were initially refused a permit and although his crew managed to walk through customs with the camera and recorder, their film-stock batteries and other accessories were confiscated for a week. The determined unit, however, managed to obtain film stock locally and started shooting with the help of a 12-volt rickshaw battery. And eventually, it didn't just make Ambedkar. It also managed to shoot a second film on Bhagwan Rajneesh during this trip.

While the film itself lacks the power and sentiment of Hammermesh's Caste At Birth and the dialogue is for the most part quite muffled, Mullan achieves a certain poignancy in such scenes as when Sangharakshita is turned away from a Hindu temple in Elephanta. The scene concludes with the monk saying "Holy men were never excluded from entering a holy place. ."

The monk then stands outside the Bibi Ka Maqbara in Aurangabad and proceeds to denounce Islam for its fanaticism. He has a harsh word for Christianity, too, because it believes in one supreme God. Buddhism is the only forward looking religion in the world because it does not believe in one God, he says.

A scene from In The Footsteps Of Ambedkar: Sangharakshita returns to India

Sangharakshita continues his diatribe. Gandhi and Ambedkar are compared and predictably Ambedkar comes off better. The monk concedes that both men shared a concern for humanity but Gandhi wanted to preserve the caste system whereas Ambedkar wanted to demolish it. Ultimately Ambedkar had to seek refuge in Buddhism when he could not fight the Hindu caste system. The monk concludes by calling untouchability worse than apartheid because it has the sanction of age-old Hindu scriptures.

Not the sort of film you would like to see on a Saturday evening. But it does succeed in projecting a few unpleasant home truths—without causing too many people too much offence. •

Shrabani Basu/London

GO FOR GOLD

The Indian squad gears up for the Beijing Asian Games

For once, the names of the Indian squad were announced on time. And no, there wasn't any politicking and lobbying for a berth in the Beijing-bound team either. Not surprisingly then, this raised hopes that the Indians would come up with a far better performance in the forthcoming Asian Games than they had on the last couple of occasions. Morale in the training camp at Bangalore was high as the various sportspersons declared that their timings were better than ever before and that the country's tally of medals was sure to go up. This confidence wasn't just shared by their coaches: even the deputy minister for sports declared (see box interview) that India would win as many as 40-50 medals.

At the Seoul Games, star athlete P.T. Usha had picked up five gold medals. And even this time round, the country's hopes were pinned on her. The general assessment of experts was that Usha had a fair chance of clocking the best timing in the 400 and 200 metres sprint, but would face a tough fight in the 100 metres. Usha, for her part, was confident that she would be able to shake off her bad patch and go for gold. Her toughest challenge, she said, came from the Chinese, but she could deal with them, "I will just be running in the 100 metres for a chance at a medal," she admitted bravely. But, in this race, Zenia Ayrton, the up-and-coming sprinter, is expected to perform well.

Since three Indian atheletes, Usha, Ashwini Nachappa and Zenia Ayrton now run the 100 metres in under 12 seconds, the Indian squad stands a good chance of grabbing the gold in the 4×400 metres relay. Also, P.T. Usha will be participating in the 4×100 metres relay with her Kerala companions and their chances look bright in that event.

The 25-member athletic squad, then, was the best bet as far as medals went. Said Uday Prabhu, the coach for the male sprinters: "The squad will come back with at least 16 medals. Some of them will surely be gold." Among the medal prospects is Bahadur Prasad, the policemen-turned-athlete from Uttar Pradesh, who hopes to prune his timing to 3 minutes and 35 seconds in the 1,500 metres in Beijing.

In June, this year, the Indian hockey team had beaten the Pakistanis in the final of the BMW tournament in Holland, with the score reading 4-2. The psychological advantage thus gained should stand them in good stead at the Asiad, where they will be up against Korea, Malaysia, China, Japan and, of course, Pakistan, on the dreaded astro-turf. Said coach Jaman Lal Sharma: "If the players think that they can be slack even in the first five minutes while playing on astro-turf they are mistaken. There may be two goals in the interim and they would be out of the game."

What will work to the team's advantage, according to Sharma, is the fact that the substitute players this time round are as talented as the original 11. Said the coach: "When the game is on, the trainer will have no hesitation in calling in any of the substitutes. And that is a great feeling."

The authorities also expect their sportpersons to be among the medals in such events as archery, kayaking, canoeing, rowing, tennis, and at a crunch, boxing. Despite the fact that "We should get 40-50 medals"

Deputy minister for sports, Bhakta Charan Das, on India's prospects at the Asiad

SUNDAY: How do you rate India's chances in the forthcoming Asian Games?

Bhakta Charan Das: I think our chances will be much better than in the last Asiad. In terms of medals, I think we should be able to get between 40-50. The government has given a lot of attention towards the preparations and I myself have been monitoring the progress at the camps every week.

Q: But some top athletes like Reeth Abraham, Zenia Ayrton and Ashwani Nachappa could not qualify for their individual events.

A: Many of them had personal problems. Some of the girls have got married and had some personal physical problems. But the new athletes are doing better than them. There is talent everywhere in the country, only it has to be identified. I think the time has come when we should start talent-spotting from the junior and sub-junior levels.

Q: Why do female athletes dominate these days? How come we don't have a top male athlete?

NITIN RAI

At the training camp: going through their paces

the lawn tennis squad hasn't had much success in the four previous Asiads, there are high expectations of it, especially since the recent performances of Leander Paes and Zeeshan Ali have been very heartening.

Two disciplines—women's weightlifting and kabbadi—are being introduced at the Beijing Games and in both India has medal hopes. Kabaddi is, of course, a traditional Indian sport, and only six countries have sent in their entries for the event. But even the country's strong women, Kunjrani Devi (44 kilo category) and Jotsana Dutta (82 kilo category) prominent among them, are expected to add at least 10 medals to the final tally

Despite the upbeat mood in the training camp, the arrangements are far from perfect. In fact, even a month before the date of departure for Beijing, most of the athletes had not received their sprinting spikes. Of course, deputy minister for sports Bhakta Charan Das was assured on his visit to the Bangalore camp that the spikes "were on their way" But as is usual with assurances handed out to ministers, this one turned out to be false as well.

Asked Uday Prabhu, the coach of the male athletic team: "A pair of good imported spikes hardly costs Rs 1,000 each. And according to the arrangement agreed upon, each athlete is supposed to get a pair every six months. Tell me, why should they have to wait for such a small thing."

The hockey team had much the same complaint. Team doctor S.A. Cruze disclosed that the boys were yet to get standard astro-turf hockey balls and shoes. "For a pre-Asiad camp like ours, the government should have made arrangements for a bucketful of astro-turf hockey balls," he said "But all we have is two or three balls the players arranged for themselves."

Even P.T Usha and coach Nambiar, who are by all accounts accorded five-star treatment, have their share of grouses. According to Nambiar, the Indian team always looks shabby during the opening ceremony because uniforms are never ready on time. During the Asian Track and Field Meet, he reveals, the van with the uniforms drove up just as the team was ready for the marchpast. And then, it turned out that all the uniforms were of the same size. "It is always the Indian athletes who have buttons missing from their jackets or are wearing oversized trousers," Nambiar agonises. Usha discloses, amidst much laughter, that the uniform she wore actually belonged to an official.

But, then, as the Indian authorities would undoubtedly argue, good clothes do not an athlete make. Fair enough, but how far can our sprinters go without proper spikes?

We'll get the answer to that one when the Games commence. ●

Ritu Sarin / Bangalore and New Delhi

A: There is no doubt that the girls have been beating the boys. But the authorities are not choosing the right boys. For example, in the tribal pockets, boys are used to walking 40-50 kilometres a day. Those are the sort of boys who should be picked up. That is why boys do so well in athletics in Kenya. So just as prospective champions are picked up for archery in India, they should be picked up for athletics too.

Q: How do you propose to end the IOA (Indian Olympic Association) imbroglio?

A: It all depends on what the Supreme Court decides. In the interest of the nation we are hoping that the final verdict would be expedited.

Q: Are you happy with the annual budgetary allocations for your department?

A: It has yet to be cleared by the Planning Commission. But you know that the country's economic condition is at its worst and that inflation is very high, so I cannot have unrealistic demands.

Testing positive

Is Indian sport free of the drug menace?

There couldn't have been a worse moment for Indian sport. Weightlifter Subrata Pal won the gold medal at the 1989 Auckland Commonwealth Games, only to have his urine sample test positive for steroids. Pal returned to his country in disgrace.

But, if recent events in Bangalore are anything to go by, Pal's was not an isolated case. Urine samples of the various sportspersons at the Asian Games training camp were sent to a laboratory in South Korea and three of the women weightlifters tested positive.

While the officials at Bangalore are intent on hushing up the positive tests, athletes and coaches are far more forthcoming about the use of steroids and anabolic drugs. "I know some Chinese girls took drugs during the 800 metres race in the Asian Track and Field Meet," said P.T. Usha.

O.P. Nambiar, Usha's coach, agrees that performance-enhancing drugs are taken by most athletes. But that doesn't worry him: "I have myself seen coaches inject drugs in athletes in Prague and other places. But you see, if today Usha is running 11.39 seconds (100 metres) and the others are clocking 12 seconds and taking drugs, she cannot be defeated.

Nambiar may be quite sanguine, but the authorities are taking the yet unsystematic use of drugs by the country's sportsmen with the right degree of seriousness. The first drug-testing laboratory of international standards is to be set up at the Jawaharlal Nehru Stadium, New Delhi. And, it is hoped, that once it becomes operational, it will be easier to prevent drug intake.

It's not cricket

The Bedi-Azhar row sparks off yet another controversy

Mohammad Azharuddin executed majestic drives right through the season in England. And his century at Lord's was one of the best ever. But he played his master stroke after coming back to India. In his typically cool manner, Azhar told newsmen that the Board of Control for Cricket in India (BCCI) should abolish the post of a cricket manager.

This was the first time that anybody had dared criticise Bishen Singh Bedi, the manager of the Indian cricket team—even indirectly. That the Indian captain, who is generally regarded as a "good boy" should have been so provoked, has made the BCCI sit up.

"This is strictly a personal point of view," Board president B.N. Dutt hastily clarified, distancing the organisation from Azhar's devastating remarks. But it came as no surprise to the media, who had followed the recent India-England series. Apparently, Bedi did not bother to take "some of the load off" Azhar's shoulders as he had promised.

Instead, Bedi—ever impulsive and foul-tempered—only made matters worse for Azhar, who was captaining a series for the second time. The first Test match had already begun when Bedi told newsmen that he had nothing to do with Azhar's decision to send England in to bat, after India had won the toss at the Lord's in London. Local journalists were thrilled. It gave them a good story, but it triggered off shock waves in the Indian camp. It seemed inconceivable that the cricket manager would publicly run down his own captain.

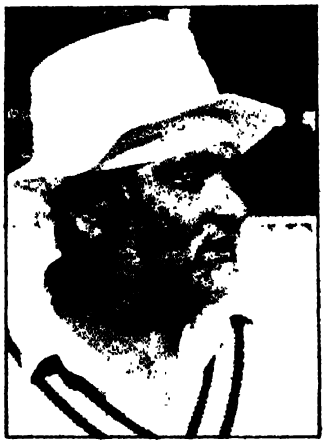
Intikhab Alam, the manager of Pakistan's cricket team, was shocked at Bedi's behaviour. "A manager is there to support his captain," said Alam. "In the dressing room, he has every right to make his dissent clear. Never publicly. And if it occurs, it not only shows a lack of confidence, but sends all the wrong signals. He added: "I wouldn't have done a Bedi."

There was, however, more to follow. Even before stumps were drawn on the last day of the Lord's match, Bedi sparked off yet another controversy. This time, by lambasting Sunil Gavaskar for turning down Marylebone Cricket Club's (MCC) offer of a life membership. Bedi wrote an open letter to Gavaskar, where he mentioned that the entire Indian community in England had been shamed by his action. Moreover, added Bedi, he had also let down the Indian team.

This was far from the truth. In fact, Indian players only learnt the next morning that they had been "let down" by the Little Master. Said Azhar: "Gavaskar's refusal wasn't discussed. The team has absolutely no comment on the matter...We're here to play cricket. Our brief doesn't cover acceptance and refusal of MCC memberships."

The British tabloids went to town on this, and the story doing the rounds was that Bedi was being paid by the tabloids.

Then came the second Test, at Manchester. And another controversy erupted. This time, however, it was Bedi's off-the-record comments which were published in The Sunday Times. Apparently, the cricket manager had criticised some of Azhar's field placements in the presence of a few scribes.



Bedi swore that he would sue the journalist—but this did not move Azhar, who maintained—rightly—that the appropriate place to "flay field placements was in a team meeting. Besides, say insiders, Bedi contributed little to strategy.

Obviously, Azhar's suggestion that the cricket manager's post be abolished stems from his disenchantment with Bedi's style of functioning.

However, it makes good cricketing sense to have a manager. One who looks after the team, chalks out strategy. But it is imperative that both the captain and the manager of the team are on the same wavelength. "If they are not," as former England skipper Mike Brearley noted, "it will mean disaster..." In retrospect, it appears that it did.

Perhaps, the BCCI gave the job to the wrong man. Even if one ignores Bedi's indiscretions such as scrapping with Gavaskar, his team's performance has hardly been something to write home about. One of his first statements on taking charge was: "Nine months is long enough to produce a baby. And so it should be long enough to prove myself. I have to produce the results and I guess my performance will be judged, football manager style, by the results I produce."

Azharuddin's suggestion that the cricket manager's post be abolished stems from his disenchantment with Bedi's style of functioning

The cricket manager's post will not be abolished, but Azhar's outburst ensured that Bedi will not get an extension. Bishen Singh Bedi was an extraordinary cricketer, and is regarded as one of the all-time greats.

Unfortunately, however, good cricketers do not necessarily make good managers.●

Lokendra Pratap Sahi/London

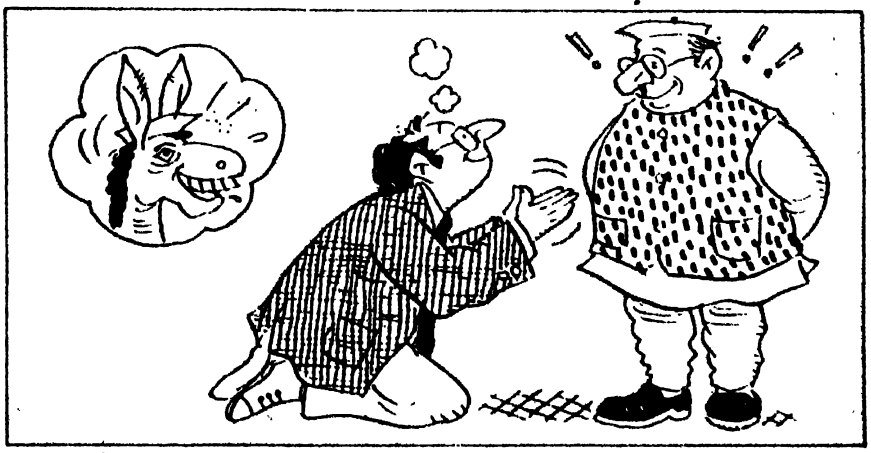
ANURAG MATHUR

Thou shalt...

The Indian bureaucrat's ten commandments

It isn't as easy being a bureaucrat as outsiders seem to imagine. The general impression is that a successful bureaucrat is one who has mastered the art of ignoring files. There is, however, much more to it than that, particularly at the senior levels.

The first rule is: "Thou shalt go by precedent." What happened earlier is good enough to be followed blindly thereafter. That is, of course, unless the minister desires the opposite course to be followed, in which case a new precedent or rule to be followed will have to be uncovered.The question of why the opposite course should be adopted, is one where the skills of liaison men come into play and is a story in itself.



"Thou shalt know more than the minister." This is critical to the running of the ministry since most ministers arrive absolutely innocent about their portfolio. In any event, the ability to give advice and list options requires at least the ability to fake knowldege effectively, even if there isn't that degree of expertise. So a corollary to the above is: "Thou shalt be able to fake it."

"Thou shalt, however, NOT appear to know more than thy minister." This too is important since ministers have sensitive, if overblown, egos and they dislike being made aware of their ignorance. They may well be aware of the actual state of affairs, but it is one thing to know and another to have it thrust upon you.

"Thou shalt never contradict the minister in public." This should be so obvious that it does not merit being said. But it is surprising how many bureaucrats commit the crime without being aware that the message is all too often being carried back to the minister. Of course, you can never contradict the minister in the press. The penalty for this is extreme, unless you happen to be Sam Pitroda. A contradiction in the press is seen as being the final sign of an internal disagreement and is usually seen as being a declaration of war.

"Thou shalt not appear more often in the press than thy minister." This holds true in general, but in these days of obscure ministers, or at a time when reshuffles are frequent, it becomes difficult to stick to this rule. In general, however, it can only be flouted if a bureaucrat has solid support in the Prime Minister's office, which will back him in the event of a conflict with the minister.

"Thou shalt cringe before the minister." Usually this comes naturally to any reasonable bureaucrat, but it bears repetition. It is not always easy to bow and scrape before a person, a bureaucrat may well consider an unmitigated ass, but it has to be done. Some bureaucrats have greatly endeared themselves to their minister merely by the humility with which they present files to him. So important is this function that, it would not be a bad idea for the Academy of Mussoorie to offer courses on the subject. What is the right way to enter a minister's room? The current technique in vogue is bowing as you offer a file. How to wait respectfully as the minister pretends to understand the notings on the file? These are all important subjects which cannot be left to a probationer's intuition.

"Thou shalt cringe before the minister," even if he is considered an unmitigated ass

"Thou shalt be nice to the minister's friends." Since ministers become essentially cut off from the world, they depend excessively on their friends for feedback, part of which is whether there are rumours that the minister has become too dependent on his bureaucrats and is being led by the nose by them. All ministers are sensitive about this. An angry friend may very easily suggest to a minister that a particular bureaucrat is gaining too much importance. Another fear that ministers have is that their bureaucrats are fraternising with the minister's enemies. This is another area that disgruntled friends can exploit.

"Thou shalt be wary of the minister's relatives." The role of relatives is a curious one for a minister. While many are certainly very close to him, this very closeness is a liability since any favours done for one is likely to boomerang if news leaks out, as it has a nasty tendency of doing. It is best not to take an independent line on this, but to be guided by the minister on the degree to which he wants his relatives to be helped.

"Thou shalt do small favours for the press." All ministers have their favourite press people and it is understood that they should be kept in reasonable good humour, within reason. This does not extend, of course, to the extent sought by one ambitious pressman who arrived with a foreigner in tow urging that the aircraft India was thinking of buying should be obtained from the company his foreign friend was representing. •

ODDS AND TRENDS

Nobody's children

■ For the 3,000 children living in the 82 brothels of Delhi's red-light area, G B. Road, home is a living hell. In an attempt to rehabilitate these unfortunate children, the government recently initiated a project. Already 85 kids have been taken away from the squalor and misery of the kothas and placed in village welfare homes and juvenile welfare homes, where they have been provided with food and clothing, and have surrogate mothers to take care of them.

Under this project, which is aimed at protecting the children of prostitutes from the unhealthy atmosphere of the kothas and the clutches of pimps, the mothers are allowed to visit their children on the first Monday of every month. The children are also permitted to spend important festivals with their mothers. However, they are not allowed to spend the night out as this creates too many adjustment problems.

Their troubles are far from over though. It has been observed in the past that the children rehabilitated in village homes (which are patterned on the SOS village homes) are brought up by a mother who treats them like her own But those confined to city homes are often handled insensitively, because of their backgrounds, by their surrogate mothers. Hopefully, the remaining 24,000 will be provided with a real home, a place where they feel they belong.

A unique achievement

■ Vitner, on the banks of river Tapi on the Maharashtra-Madhya Pradesh border, is just another Indian village. It might be backward as far as civic amenities go, but its way of life is certainly progressive. In the summer of 1989, this tiny, nondescript, hamlet elected an all-woman gram panchayat- -one of the seven villages in Maharashtra to do so. And what's more, the sarpanch and the upsarpanch—also women—apart from achieving phenomenal success in improving the civic conditions of the village have managed to get some, if not all, of the women in the village their rightful share of land.

Concerted efforts by the nine-member panchayat team are finally paying off. Over the past ten months, men of 127 families in Vitner have recognised the right of women to own a part of the family land. This is a tremendous achievement in a society where women often get beaten up or even killed for demanding their share of property.

And Vitner's remarkable feat has not gone unnoticed— the village was recently awarded the honorary title of 'Jyotiba Phule village' by Prime Minister V.P. Singh. For the proud villagers of Vitner, the award is a recognition of their silent revolution. The upsarpanch, Indibai Patil, sums it up by saying, "The award is not merely a tribute to Vitner, but to all womenkind."

SEPARATED AT BIRTH?

Pran

Vinod Pande

THIS INDIA

PATIALA: The Government High School at Channo village in Sangrur district has earned the dubious distinction of recording no passes in the recent Matric examination conducted by the Punjab School Education Board. All the 42 students who appeared in the examination failed. The panchayat staged a dharna in protest against the teaching staff—The Statesman, R.K. Krishnaswami, New Delhi

NEW DELHI: A railway commuter forced by penury to travel ticketless during the post-Partition years, has paid back the fares—interest and inflation well covered. The man, who calls himself Deep and is a resident of South Delhi, sent in Rs 300 and a letter to the railway minister, George Fernandes. The letter read, "Sending you Rs 300 towards the fare of local trains from Kandivilito Grant Road where I travelled after Partition for a few months without ticket. I was unable to pay at that time, but now I am sending three times the cost of that travel"— Indian Express, B.G. Manjunatha Rao, Hassan (Karnataka)

MADRAS: Justice K.S. Bakthavatsalam was in a dilemma as to whether he should speak in English or in Tamil at a function in the city. The dilemma followed a (bitter?) experience he had at the inaugural function of the integrated court buildings at Vriddhachalam, where he delivered his presidential address in English (as it was an official function) expecting all dignitaries to follow suit. But to his disappointment all preferred to speak in Tamil. (Electricity minister Durai Murugan went to the extent of criticising him for having spoken in English.) Speaking at the inauguration of the fifth anniversary of the Youth Association for Classical Music, he said that he was speaking in Tamil expecting the others to do so. But this time all the others spoke in English—Indian Express C.S. Loganathan, Coimbatore (Tamil Nadu)

BEGINNING 16 SEPTEMBER 1990 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (21 March—20 April)

A fairly good week for you. Those in service will win the praise of their superiors. You can go on a shopping spree. But avoid extravagance. Keep an eye on your health. The time is ripe for matrimony.

Good dates: 16, 20 and 22
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 8
Favourable direction: South

TAURUS (21 April—20 May)

A favourable week lies ahead of you. Friends and relatives will contribute to your happiness. The financial front is not very bright. A letter will bring good news. Romance is in the offing.

Good dates: 17, 19 and 21
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 6
Favourable direction: West

GEMINI (21 May—20 June)

An excellent week for you. The time is favourable for romance. Avoid unnecessary risks. For those in service, dramatic changes are forecast. However, be careful on the financial front.

Good dates: 18, 20 and 22
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: East

CANCER (21 June—20 July)

Businessmen can strike new deals. Be cautious and discreet with your elders. Avoid any controversy or dispute. Keep an eye on your health. You might receive gifts from unexpected quarters.

Good dates: 16, 18 and 20
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: North

LEO (21 July—20 August)

A fairly pleasant week is forecast. You are likely to inherit property but do not get carried away. A secret association or friendship may prove beneficial. Romance is on the cards.

Good dates: 17, 20 and 21
Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: South-west

VIRGO (21 August—20 September)

Good fortune awaits you this week. You will be in a position to pay your debts. Lawsuits will be settled in your favour. Friends will be very helpful to you, especially in matters relating to your work.

Good dates: 18, 19 and 20
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 8
Favourable direction: South

LIBRA (21 September—20 October)

This week will be an excellent one for you. You can forge ahead with your plans. Professionally, progress will be slow and steady. Be cautious and discreet with your colleagues and superiors.

Good dates: 19, 20 and 22
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: West

SCORPIO (21 October—20 November)

This is not a good week for you. Businessmen should not enter into new contracts. Those in service should avoid arguments with their superiors. Romance is not on the cards. Take care of your health.

Good dates: 16, 17 and 19
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: North

SAGITTARIUS (21 November—20 December)

An excellent week for most of you. A favourable time for romance. However, do not take anything for granted. You can clear off your debts. The financial prospects are very bright for you.

Good dates: 17, 18 and 20
Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: South

CAPRICORN (21 December—20 January)

Be confident and courageous in your dealings with those in authority. A letter you've been waiting for quite long will bring in good news. Socially, this is going to be a fruitful week for you can renew your old contacts.

Good dates: 20, 21 and 22
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: East

AQUARIUS (21 January—20 February)

This is going to be a successful week for you. By sheer hard work, you will be able to overcome your earlier setbacks and achieve outstanding results. Be tactful in dealing with your elders.

Good dates: 16, 19 and 21
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 8
Favourable direction: North-west

PISCES (21 February—20 March)

Make the best use of the opportunities that come your way. Professional, social and even domestic activities will prove successful. Those of you who have children should be careful with your expenses.

Good dates: 18, 19 and 21
Lucky numbers: 1, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: West

STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—CAPRICORN

The Capricorn man is absorbed in his career, where the Scorpio woman is more passionate than career conscious. Their union needs compromise from both partners if the pair is to be happy together. ●

IDBI

Investment Deposit Account Scheme

- Companies, Firms, Individuals & HUF, save tax on income assessable under the head 'Profits and Gains from Business or Profession' as covered under Section 32 AB of the Income Tax Act 1961.
- Deposits under the Scheme are deductible up to 20% of taxable income.
- The scheme is available for previous years ending upto March 31, 1990. Deposits should be made within 6 months of closure of assessee's accounting year or before filing of tax returns whichever is earlier
- Deposits can be made by post.
- Interest @ 10% p.a. will be credited to the assessee's designated bank account on 1st April every year without tax deduction at source and can be freely withdrawn for any use.
- Principal amounts of deposits can be withdrawn after one year for purchase of plant and machinery, computers etc. for the business or profession of the assessee.
- Outstation cheques are accepted and collection charges will be borne by IDBI. Date of deposit will be the date of receipt of cheque by IDBI.
- Demand drafts received by IDBI within 10 days of issue, will get credit from the date of the draft.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK OF INDIA
'IDBI Tower' Cuffe Parade, Colaba, Bombay 400 005.

Sobhagya-90

Reservations for sleazeballs too

The Congress(I) is extremely embarrassed by the attitude of Sitaram Kesri, its treasurer. When the Raja announced that his government had accepted the recommendations of the Mandal Commission, the Congress(I) reacted in one of two ways: half the MPs were worried whether this would swing the election for the Janata Dal and the other half were appalled by the Raja's opportunism.

Not Kesri. As his party colleagues watched horrified, he welcomed the decision and stood up for the principle of caste-based reservation.

Now, they are saying that he should at least have

Kesri: name a figure been discreet and avoided praising V.P. Singh so openly. But then teamwork has never been the veteran fund-collector's forte.

Clark and dagger

The Congress(I) has abandoned its old practice of blaming the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) for everything. Now its MPs have decided that there is no need to be content with the monkey when they can get the organ-grinder. RN

So, the attack is on the US ambassador himself. Last week, such Congress luminaries as Vasant Sathe and Dinesh Singh (along with the predictable Marxist rabble) grilled minister of state for external affairs, Har Kishore Singh, over the ambassador's visit to the Punjab.

Whose permission had he taken? Had he met any terrorists? What report did he send Washington? Which official of the Government of India accompanied him? And so on.

The short answer to this volley was: India is a free country and Clark can go where he likes. But Singh fought shy of giving a straight answer and finally his Cabinet minister Inder 'I'm no wimp' Gujral had to come to his assistance. When even this didn't work, Gujral personally went to the seats of the angry MPs and asked them to go easy on Singh.

HEARD AT DELHI UNIVERSITY

V.P. Singh, Charan Singh. One and the same thing.

SLOGAN USED BY UPPER-CASTES TO COMPLAIN ABOUT BACKWARD POLITICIANS

Inder Gujral: wimp? Not me

TELESCOPE

Bombay's hotels: who goes where

■ The Taj Mahal Hotel: Without a doubt, the finest hotel in India. Food and service standards have improved dramatically over the last two years. The smart crowd still sticks to the Taj. The Golden Dragon has recovered its old clientele and the Zodiac Grill flourishes.

■ The Oberoi: Small, exclusive and extremely well-run, it represents a discreet alternative for all those who fear the railway station-like atmosphere of the Taj's lobby. It has two excellent restaurants (the Brasserie and the Rotesserie) but has lost out because of its high-priced image: in fact, the old Taj is more expensive.

■ The Leela: It's now a Kempinski but its small unattractive rooms have more in common with the more downmarket Penta chain. Service and food standards vary but it has become the preferred hotel of the Bombay film industry.

■ The Centaurs: Rarely can a five-star hotel have deteriorated as dramatically as the Santa Cruz Centaur. The only people who stay there are passengers on layovers who have no choice in the matter. Oddly enough, the Juhu Centaur is not a bad hotel and gets a better class of person.

■ The Sea Rock Sheraton: For some reason, Welcomgroup's Bombay property has never quite made it. Even the film industry appears to be deserting it for the Leela. Perhaps, things will change now that it has opened what is probably Bombay's best restaurant: the Dum Pukht.

The raid Pandit

Every Prime Minister, it is said, falls in love with the Research and Analysis Wing (RAW). But now it is also obvious that every finance minister falls in love with the Directorate of Revenue Intelligence (DRI). RN Either that or Anil Shastri, the deputy minister at the finance ministry, is trying his hardest to emulate V.P. Singh. How else does one explain his behaviour during his last trip to Baroda? Shastri addressed tax officials and told them that total collections were not as high as they should be.

The officials wasted no time in promptly raiding all of Baroda's builders and blaming it on Shastri's directions.

Now, the Baroda unit of the Janata Dal is complaining that funds have dried up. With an election expected this winter, this could be serious. ●

Complex aeroplanes require complex responses

How safe is the A320? According to most people, it is a perfectly safe aircraft and the Bangalore crash was largely a consequence of pilot error. Not according to the Raja, though. V.P. Singh's view is that it is a flying coffin, that it was bought because the previous regime took kickbacks, that it should be grounded, that an FIR has been filed, etc., etc.

V.P. Singh: double standards

Fair enough? No, not quite.

Because the Raja is simultaneously passing himself off as this great crisis-manager who has had Indians evacuated from the Gulf and has not allowed anyone to harm one hair on their heads, etc.

There is only one problem: he has used the A320s for the evacuation operation.

Now, several Congress(I) and Janata Dal MPs have lodged an official protest with the government asking the obvious question. If the A320 is not safe enough for domestic travellers, then why have the lives of Gulf evacuees been risked?

Another contradiction to be managed?

HEARD IN CENTRAL HALL

Now that V.P. Singh and the Express lobby are divorcing, perhaps, they will fight for custody of Bhure Lal.

A CONGRESS(I) MP

Off with his head

Maneka Gandhi has won a round in her on-going battle with Nilamani Routray. The controversy over the youthful minister of state's alleged arrogance has been stoked by the publication of documents (see SUNDAY's passim) relating to the use of aircraft, etc.

Maneka's response had been to blame Mahesh Prasad, the environment secretary, who she accused of playing Narad Muni between Routray and her. Even the documents that had found their way to SUNDAY, she suggested, had been leaked by Prasad.

Maneka: wins a round

Routray: losing an ally

Now, cabinet secretary Vinod Pande seems to have bought Maneka's line that it is all Prasad's fault. The cabinet secretariat has instituted an enquiry against the secretary and Maneka's friends seem certain that he will be indicted.

PERISCOPE

Who does what in the PMO

■ B.G. Deshmukh: Only a few months left to go. Has never quite recovered his old clout after Vinod Pande, the Raja's favourite poet-cum-soothsayer, moved into the cabinet secretariat.

■ Montek Singh Ahluwalia: Made an astonishing comeback when the Cabinet adopted his industrial policy. But now that policy has been junked and poor Ahluwalia finds that his only calculations have to do with Yadav quota and Kurmi proportion.

■ Bhure Lal: They call him joint secretary (probe) so often that many people think this is his real designation. In fact, Lal has not been as closely identified with the investigations as he would like. (See Heard in Central Hall above.)

■ Ronen Sen: During the Rajiv Gandhi era, Sen was the single most important member of the foreign service. The Raja has kept him on because of his undoubted capability but Muchkund Dubey is too strong a foreign secretary for Sen to retain his old eminence.

■ Prem Shankar Jha: The Raja likes to give interviews to cronies, chamchas and cow-belt hangers-on, so there is little for the urbane Jha to do in the PMO. Nevertheless, he does prepare the daily press summary for the PM. And to his credit, has too much intellectual integrity to support his master's more opportunistic schemes, i.e., reservation for potential Janata Dal voters.

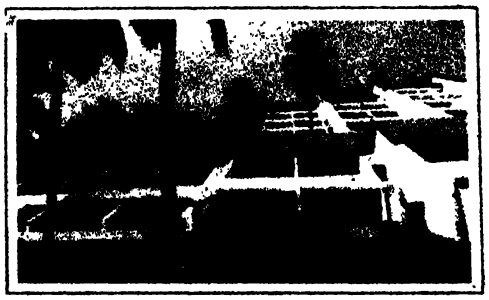
Lights, camera, padayatra!

Why has so little been heard about the Prime Minister's padayatra for peace in recent weeks? Remember the brief flurry of excitement when the Raja announced that the only hope for peace in the Punjab lay in his decision to wander aimlessly through its villages. ("If I am killed, bury my body there," he declared to the sound of imaginary violins.)

Well, there's a slight problem. The last time V.P. Singh addressed a public meeting in the Punjab, only a few hundred people turned up (and many of them were plain-clothes policemen anyway). So, how on earth does he hope to arrange mass participation for his march?

Now, a few MPs from the Nav Nirman Manch, a forum of Raja cronies, have been despatched to Bombay to try and persuade some film actors to join the padayatra. This is expected to draw the crowds.

So far, nobody has said "yes" but feelers have been sent to Shabana Azmi and Shatrughan Sinha.



Ashok and Radisson offer you new standards of world class hospitality at Kovalam

Radisson Hotels Corporation, with its dynamism, its philosophy 'Yes I can' is the fastest growing hospitality group in the world, with hotels at 240 locations

Ashok now joins hands with Radisson to bring you the finest international hospitality at Kovalam and three other places in the country. With a new work culture, a new ethos to ensure even greater consumer satisfaction

Other Ashok Radisson Hotels : Ashok Hotel, New Delhi, an affiliate of Radisson Hotels Corporation; Ashok Radisson Hotel, Bangalore; Ashok Radisson Lalitha Palace Hotel, Mysore

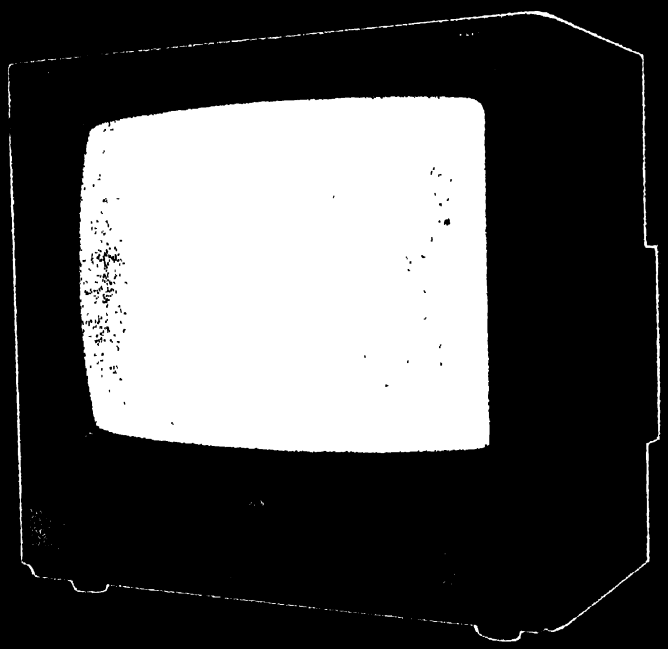
VISIT INDIA
TOURISM YEAR 1991

BF

Ashok Radisson Beach Resort, Kovalam

Trivandrum 695522 Tel 68010 65323
Cables TOURISM VIZHINJAM Telex 0435 216 KBHN
Fax 62522

AKSHARA/1171-216



INDIA'S HOST TO THE WORLD

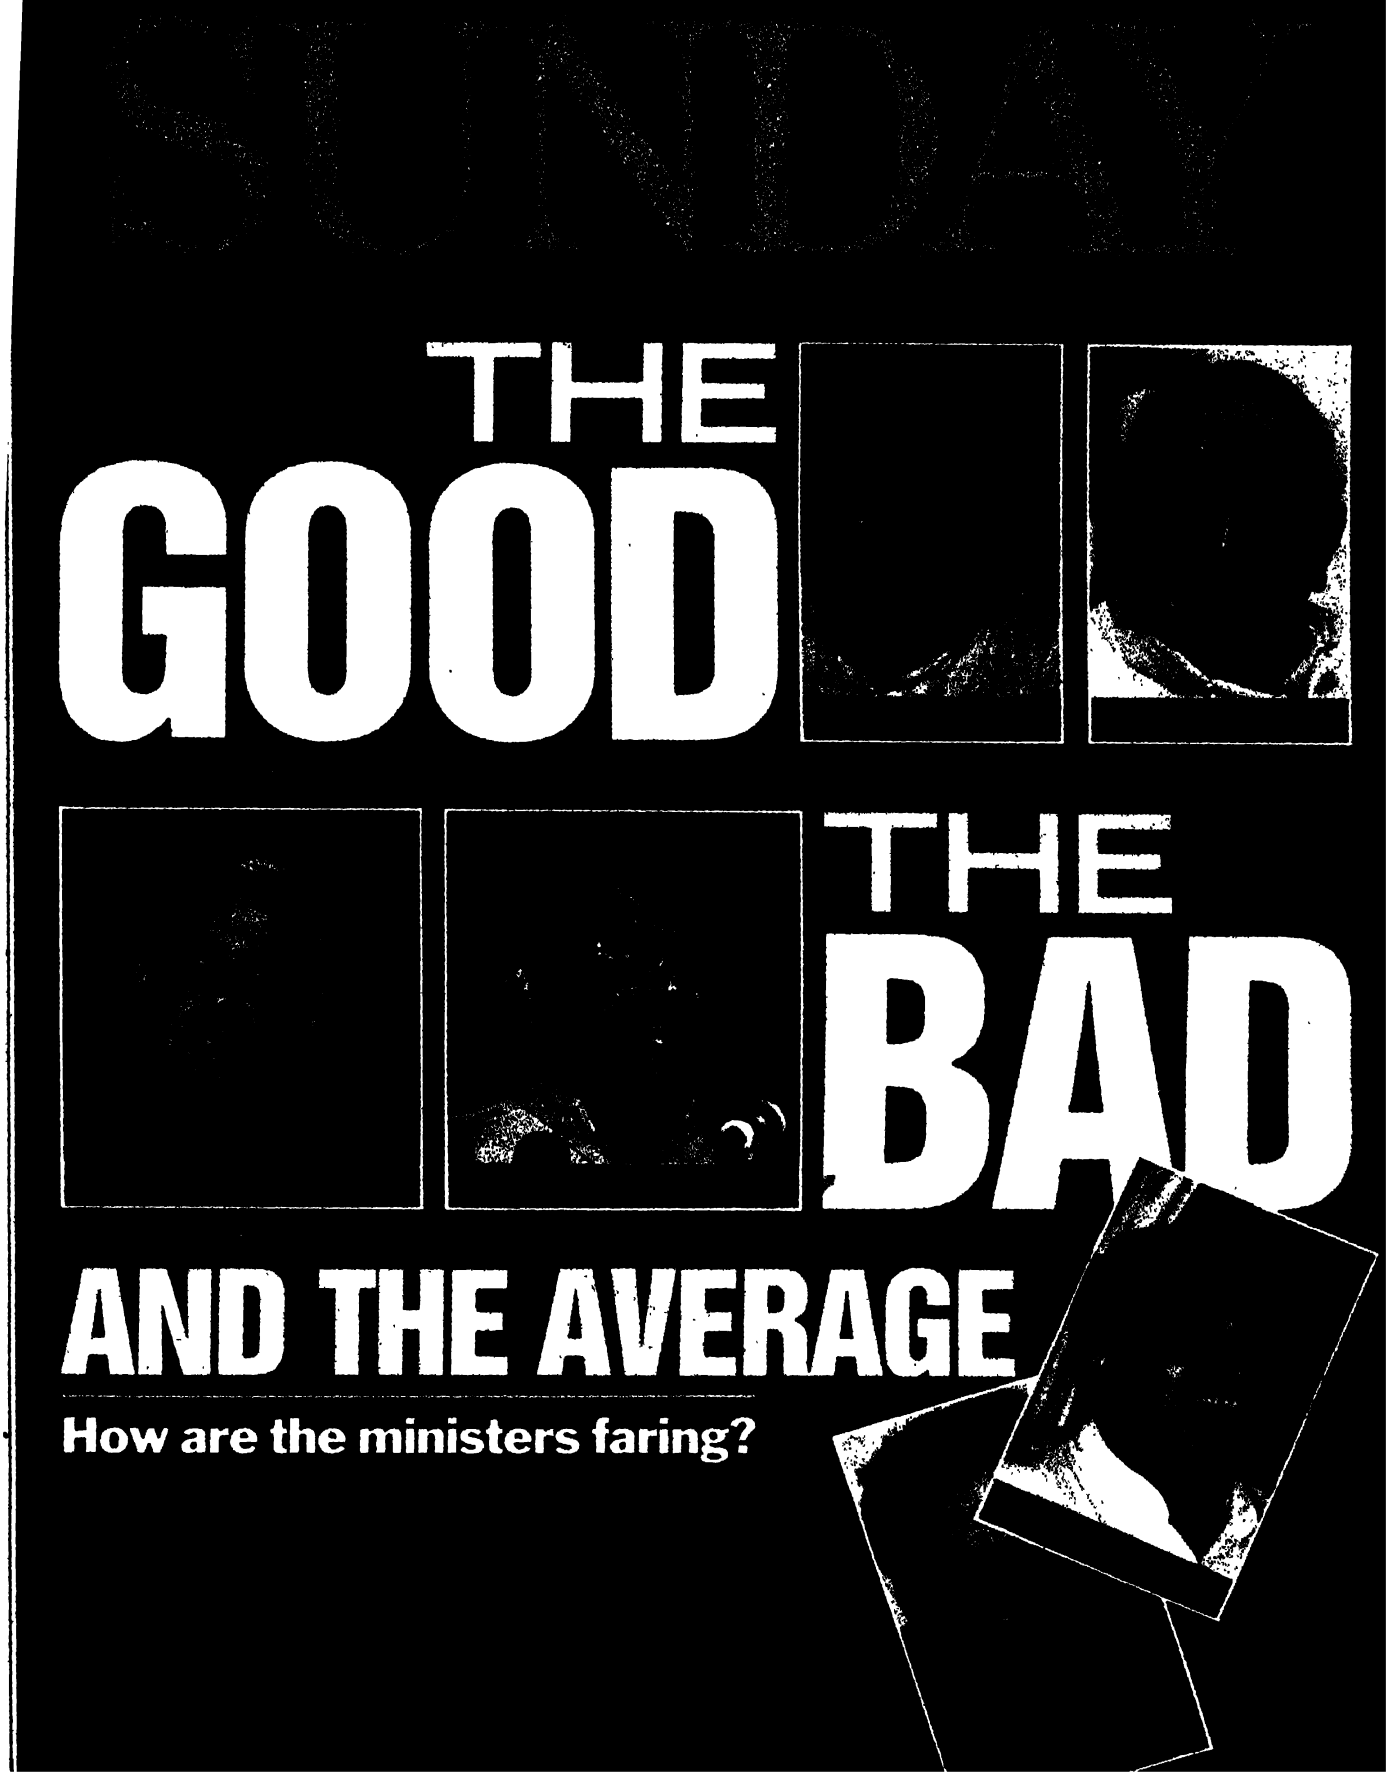
The name that spells is the name your home can trust. KONARK.

It's festival time again. A time for rejoicing. A time for fun. The ideal time to give your near and dear ones something they've always wanted for years. A really super-class, trouble-free TV set.



Konark is your solution to a highly difficult choice. Hi-tech features and perfect performance. Something for the family to share. Over years and years of happy viewing pleasure.

KONARK TV

The image of hi-tech quality

KONARK TELEVISION LIMITED : A Govt. of Orissa Enterprise
ELECTRONICS BHAWAN, Kasaikgarh, Bhubaneswar-751010

THE GOOD THE BAD AND THE AVERAGE

How are the ministers faring?

discovered then about the physiological and psychological effects of colour on human beings is today borne out by scientific experiments.

Colour and India - A Research & Design Vimla Desai

Navrasas
express their emotional colours

Navrasas
the nine moods or essences or flavours.
They cover the entire emotive response of human beings
These Rasas are born out of the thirty-six states of the human mind
Rasa in art is a sojourn into the inner world.

Seers envisaged that the psychological effect of certain colours enhanced the identification of the Rasas in artistic expression.

For example, each of the Rasas were assigned a specified colour

Adbhuta – Surprise – is yellow ochre
Sringara – Love – is deep purple
Roudra – Anger – is red
Veera – Valour – is yellow
Beebhatsa – Disgust – is deep blue
Hasya – Humour – is white
Shanta – Contentment – is moon white
Bhayanaka – Fear – is black
Karuna – Sympathy – is mud brown.

The ultimate enjoyment of any artistic expression is the identification of the Rasas.

Three decades of dedication have given us at Colour-Chem an indepth knowledge and understanding of colours and chemistry. Enabling us to serve you with the best. Dyes for textiles; pigments for paints, printing inks, plastics and rubber; organic chemical intermediates; leather chemicals.

However, our quest continues... to seek more colourful horizons in the chemistry of colour.

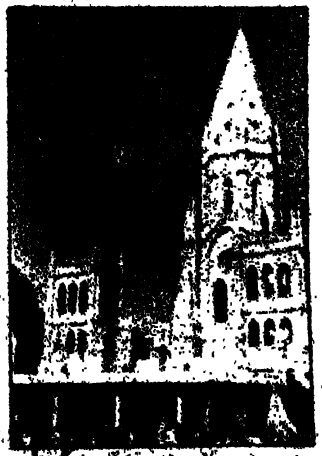
CONTENTS

SUNDAY
VOLUME 17 ISSUE 38 RS 7.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION
23—29 SEPTEMBER 1990

27
COVER STORY
The good, the bad and the average
How are the National Front ministers faring?

LETTERS 4
GOSSIP SWEET AND SOUR 7
SIGHT AND SOUND 9
COUNTERVIEW 10
SOUTH BLOCK 13
CONTROVERSY 19
The language game
NEWSWATCH 22
The first warning
PROFILE 42
The marathon man
SPOTLIGHT 44
BUSINESS DIARY 56
NEWS 57
MANI-TALK 64
PHOTO FEATURE 70
Family homes
KHAAS BAAT 74
THEATRE 75
Not all Greek
FOCUS 80
Behind bars
CRIME 82
A campus death
MEDIA MUSINGS 83
MILESTONES 86
SUNDAYWEEK 87
RANDOM NOTES 89
DELHI DIARY 90

14
NEWSBEAT
The aliens
Over 30,000 "stateless" subjects have been given citizenship in Sikkim. Who are these people?



34
SPECIAL REPORT
The siege of Jaffna
Fierce fighting continues between the Sri Lankan Army and the Tamil Tigers. An on-the-spot report.

48
BUSINESS
"Everything is for the moment"
An exclusive interview with Britannia chairman Rajan Pillai.

68
CINEMA
Southern offensive
Telugu stars Nagarjuna and Chiranjeevi, now try to make it big in Hindi films.

76 RELIGION
Crossing over
An exodus begins from the ranks of the Roman Catholic Church—to various breakaway groups.

84
SPORTS
Over to Beijing
But all is not well with the Asiad Games movement.

Cover transparencies
Arun Nehru: Rajesh Kumar
Madhu Dandavate: Nitin Ra
P. Upendra: Shooter Mufti Mohammad Sayeed: Durgaprasad Arif Mohammad Khan: Rajesh Kumar

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Biet Kumar Basu and edited by Vir Sanghvi from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001 Air surcharge for Srinagar ex Delhi and Tripura 20 paise, North eastern states 30 paise

The oil scare

The Gulf crisis (The oil crunch, 2–8 September) has severely affected the developing countries like India on the economic front. Though the government has taken precautionary measures by cutting down oil imports, the crisis has added fuel to the fire by the trade embargo being enforced by the UNO against Iraq and Kuwait.

As far as the Middle East is concerned, I see no prospects of Iraq attacking Saudi Arabia nor the forces of the US and its allies. Therefore, if the present situation continues in the Gulf, the economy of the developing countries is bound to suffer and might be in the doldrums in the not too distant future.

G. Vikram Goud, Warangal (Andhra Pradesh)

■ The cover story on the Gulf crisis has thrown light on Iraq and its total disregard for international rules and regulations. This act of Saddam Hussein has been condemned worldwide. The USA has sent troops to Saudi Arabia for safeguarding its interests in the Gulf. The UN Security Council has imposed economic sanctions as well as military sanctions against Iraq.

But the most unfortunate thing is that India, one of the largest democracies in the world, has failed to condemn this act of high-handedness. India might have reasons not to criticise Iraq's actions because of its long-standing friendship with the latter, and also because Iraq happens to be the main supplier of crude to India.

Whatever be the considerations behind India's stand, it is pathetic to learn that thousands of Indians have been uprooted overnight, thereby creating additional problems for India. At least in this context, India ought to have taken a firm stand against Iraq, especially on behalf of the Indians living there.

Kali Charan Banerjee, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Merit, not caste

The students in India have no other option than to protest against the Mandal Commission Report (Look back in anger, 2—8 September). The government's sudden decision to implement the commission's recommendations has put the careers of thousands of young men and women in jeopardy. If V P. Singh doesn't withdraw his decision then he might have to regret it for the rest of his life.

The Mandal report is biased, unjust, unconstitutional and is riddled with factual inaccuracies. The Prime Minister does not realise that he is going to lose much more than he stands to gain.

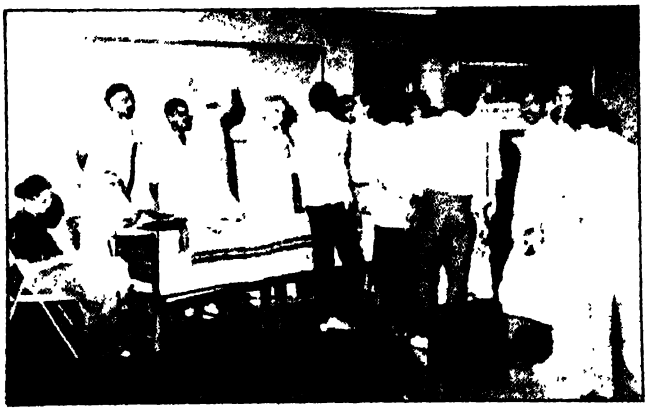
Merit has given way to class considerations. This does not augur well for the future of the country. The students should continue with the agitation until and unless some sense dawns on the V.P. Singh regime.

Amit Mathur, Sindri (Bihar)

Students protesting against reservations

Dark days ahead

The dismissal of Benazir's government (Fired!, 19—25 August) by President Ghulam Ishaq Khan has dealt a severe blow to Pakistan's democracy. Despite her faults, Bhutto represented the forces of modernism in an otherwise obscurantist society. She is a woman in a male chauvinist society, a Sindhi in a country where Punjabis rule the roost, and a liberal in a state where Islamic fundamentalists want to enforce the supremacy of the Shariat. It seems that military dictatorship is back in Pakistan. But given her resilience tempered by her long saga of suffering under Zia's rule, she might be able to stage a comeback. And this ouster, one hopes, will be a blessing in disguise.



Chiranjib Haldar, New Delhi

■ Benazir's ouster marks the beginning of another dark period of dictatorship in Pakistan. The new regime will not only bring instability but also try to create war hysteria in the country and foment trouble in the border states of India. Though Benazir is not a supporter of India's stand on Kashmir, the chances were better for New Delhi to enter into a dialogue with her. But now, with Jatoi as the Prime Minister, who is backed by the fundamentalists and the military, the talks will be

Benazir Bhutto: repenting

Indians returning from Iraq and Kuwait: uncertain fate meaningless. The silent coup in Pakistan will spell problems for regional peace and stability.

Vijaya Moorthy, Pune (Maharashtra)

The other side of Mamata

The profile of Mamata Banerjee (Joan of Arc, 2--8 September) seemed absolutely one-sided. She has been heaped with adulations but her negative aspects have been cleverly shielded. And that amounts to deliberate misinformation. This, however, is not to condone the physical assault on her which should be condemned in the strongest possible terms.

Mamata Banerjee: Joan of Arc?

Mamata had no hesitation in deceiving the electorate as the recipient of a fake doctorate degree from a university in the United States, which does not exist. During the Emergency, she led a violent mob of Congress activists to assault Jaya Prakash Narayan and to disrupt his meeting. Recently, she led another mob of unruly party supporters to forcibly occupy a police station in Calcutta.

Finally, it is wrong to say that she lost the last general election because the Muslims did not vote for her, for this is not true. She lost the election despite a normal trend in voting.

Mrinal Guha, Calcutta (West Bengal)

The wily politician

Chandra Shekhar's interview ("Devi Lal would make a better Prime Minister", 26 August--1 September) makes very bland and banal reading, which is very unbecoming of a man who claims to be a national leader. His style of speaking and his logic is so poor that it shows his lack of constructive approach.

He does not seem to praise Devi Lal for the latter's ability but only with the intention of putting V.P. Singh in trouble.

Niladri Das, Berhampur (Orissa)

Cadre raj

The article (A dangerous place, 2--8 September) was both informative and thought provoking. The pictures will serve as a mirror to Jyoti Basu, who is proud of his hoodlums. The misdeeds of his party cadres have thoroughly exposed him. The merciless assault on Mamata Banerjee, on the day of the Congress called bandh, points to the fact that Basu's government is in the hands of trained anti-socials.

The attack on Mamata following the Bantala and Birati incidents show that the dignity of women in the state is at stake. It is high time the Marxists realised their mistakes and did something to redeem their tainted image.

Jyoti Basu: losing grip

Pranab Hazra, Bankura (West Bengal)

Setting the record straight

Syed Shahabuddin had sent a copy of this letter to Rajiv Gandhi, who did not acknowledge it.

In his interview to SUNDAY (Time to be frank, 12—18 August) Rajiv Gandhi stated that one of the reasons for the Congress(I)'s defeat was its inability to counter the propaganda that shilanyas had taken place within the Babri Masjid and to project that shilanyas had been done outside the disputed land. But I think he was quite off the mark. For the basic reason for Muslim alienation was the government's decision to permit the shilanyas and to effect it under the protective umbrella of the government. Shilanyas—irrespective of whether its site was disputed or not—was an unlawful act for it meant the commencement of the construction of the proposed temple whose site plan covered the disputed premises. Thus the decision was not only contrary to the law of the land but a betrayal of the Muslim community which expected the government to adopt an impartial attitude.

Babri Masjid

I had cautioned Buta Singh orally and in writing against permitting shilanyas. I had begun to suspect that he was hand-in-glove with the VHP, perhaps without your approval. So I cautioned you through Mani Shankar Aiyar, but since the decision had already been taken in principle, the government continued to move forward.

Moreover, on 7 November, 1989, the Special Bench of the Lucknow High Court had declared that the status quo order applied to disputed plot no. 586. If on 8 November, the executive had come to the conclusion by comparing the rough sketch map before the court and the actual ground position that while the shilanyas site lay on plot 586, it was outside the boundaries of the plot as depicted in the sketch map, the executive should have sought clarification from the Bench and not adopted a unilateral interpretation and acted thereupon.

Every Muslim knew that the VHP was not going to demolish the Masjid on 9 November, because the VHP had made repeated declarations to that effect. In any case, that is how the Muslims and the secular forces saw it, to their dismay and anger.

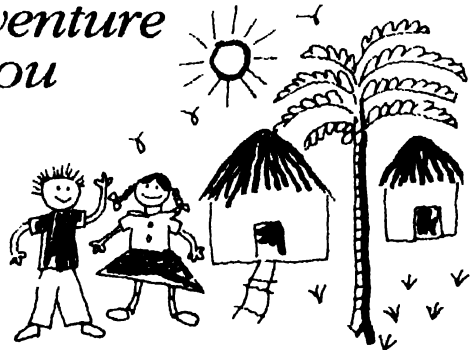
Syed Shahabuddin, former Member of Parliament, New Delhi

Khushwant Singh is on leave. His column, Gossip Sweet And Sour, will not appear for the next two weeks.

We've covered cricket matches
When the pundits forecast rain

We've paid out bills of hospitals
And helped to ease the strain

Gompa in the Himalayas
Can now protect his yak



If Kondiah loses his boat
He could get his money back

Offshore wells and crop failures
Rocket launchings too

And now a great new venture
That's tailormade for you

GIC GRIH VITTA LTD

Together we shall make your dream come true

General Insurance Corporation of India
Bombay-400 020

National Insurance Company Limited

The New India Assurance Company Limited

The Oriental Insurance Company Limited

United India Insurance Company Limited
Madras - 600 014

GGVL Service Centres :

Bangalore GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at United India Insurance Co Ltd Regional Office, Shankaranarayana Bldg., 25, M G Road, Bangalore - 560 001 Tel - 57361/573583 Bombay GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at The New India Assurance Co Ltd., New India Bhawan, 2nd flr, 31-38 Bank Street, Fort, Bombay - 400 023 Tel 2861621 Calcutta GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at National Insurance Co Ltd Everest House 4th floor, 46C Jawaharlal Nehru Road Calcutta - 700 071 Tel 44-2651 54 Dir 44-0107 Hyderabad GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at United India Insurance Co. Ltd., Regional Office, P B No 1020, 3 5-817 & 818 Basheer Bagh, Hyderabad - 500 029 Tel 241996, 251894 Lucknow GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at The Oriental Insurance Co Ltd., Lucknow Regional Office, 43, Hazratganj, Lucknow 226 001 Tel 24886 Madras GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at United India Insurance Co Ltd., Head Office, 24, Whites Road, Madras - 600 014 Tel. 473993/47300 New Delhi GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at The Oriental Insurance Co Ltd, Regional Office, 86-88, Janpath, New Delhi - 110 001 Tel- 3329233. Panaji GIC Grih Vitta Limited, Service Centre at: The New India Assurance Co Ltd Panaji Divisional Office, Velho Bldg., 3rd floor, Rua Conda - De Torres Nouas, Panaji - 403 001 Tel - 3770, 4297.

Multimedia Aquarius/GGVL/2/90

KHUSHWANT SINGH

With love from Pakistan

Amongst the earliest propagators of the two-nation theory and a separate Muslim state, Pakistan, was Z.A. Suleri of Meerut. He joined Jinnah's bandwagon in the 1940s, proclaimed him the Qaid (leader), published articles and edited papers extolling the Muslim League's point of view against that of the Indian National Congress. When Partition came, he migrated from India to Pakistan.

Suleri was a handsome man with leonine mane of hair in his head. He had a Muslim wife and a daughter. He went to England to win over British support for Pakistan. In London he ran into an attractive Welsh girl, pronounced talaq on his first wife and took on a second spouse. It proved to be a happy union producing a clutch of boys and girls. Suleri edited a succession of newspapers in Pakistan. He was in and out of jails in Karachi, Rawalpindi and Lahore on charges of sedition. His wife took on a job as a teacher of English in the Punjab University and kept the home fires burning till she died. Suleri now leads a retired life in Islamabad writing books on Pakistani politics and an occasional column for the newspapers. Sara is one of his daughters. She helped her father reading proofs of the articles he wrote. Mercifully, she did not pick up his turgid Whither Pakistan style of writing but what her mother had taught her: a sensitive Welsh ear for the music of words, the importance of an understatement to drive a point home, self-abnegation and a facility to turn out bejewelled phrases. Sara Suleri is currently associate professor of English at Yale University. Her first novel, Meatless Days, (Flamingo-Collins) is an absolute treat. It is a family saga of the Suleris set in the background of Pakistan under different rulers.

It is impossible to summarise a novel, like Meatless Days because it goes forwards and backwards in time, scenes shift from Karachi to Lahore, from Islamabad to London and the United States. At times the narrative sounds laboured to create an impression of profundity very much like the Urdu essays of Ahmed Shah Bukhari's Pitras Kay Mazaameen. The best I can do is to give some samples to show the skill with which Sara uses her words. She writes when she discovers that what she had been relishing all the years were in fact the testes of goats. She and her sister Tillat discuss it in some detail:

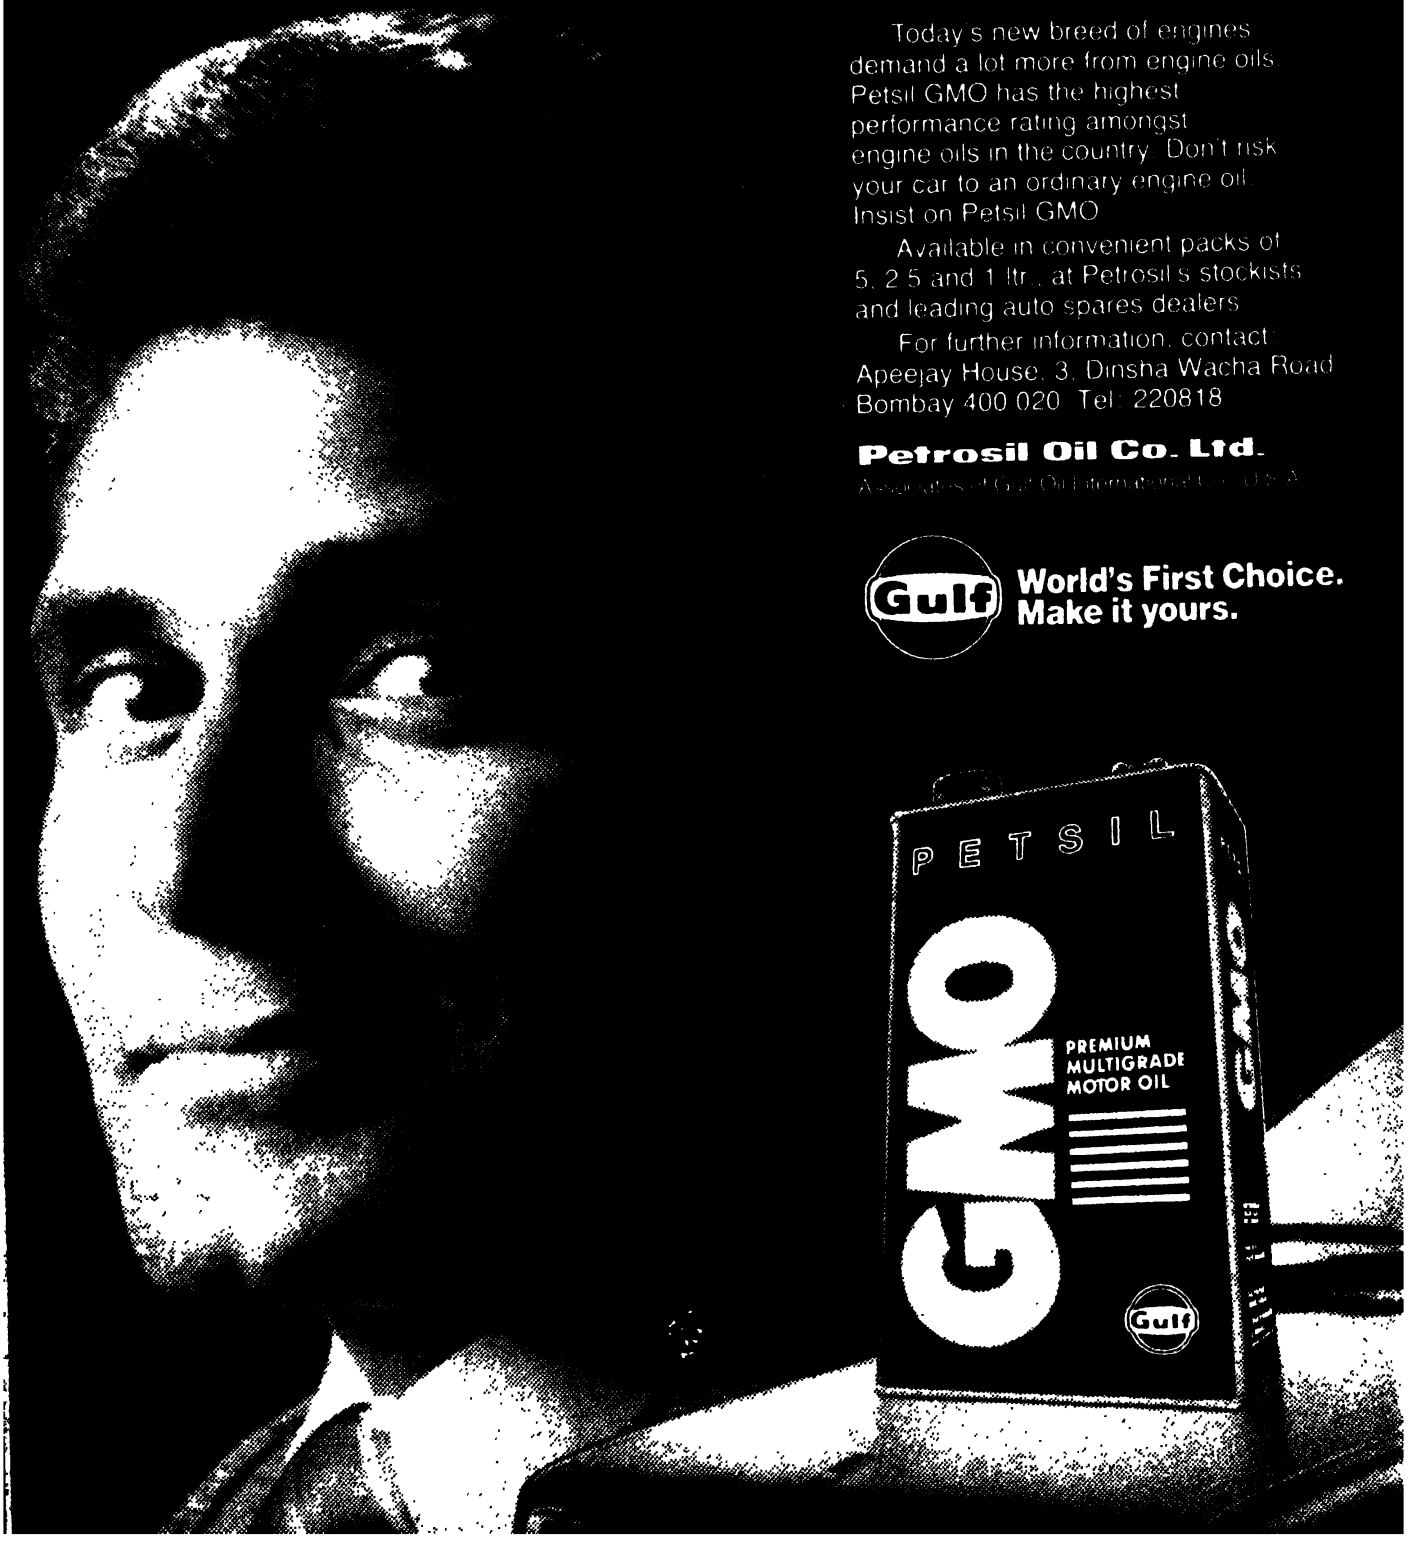
"Sara", said Tillat, her voice deep with the promise of surprise, "do you know what kapura are?" I was cooking and a little cross. "Of course, I do," I answered with some affront. "They're sweetbreads, they're cooked with kidneys, and they're very good." Natives should always be natives, exactly what they are, and I felt irked to be so probed around the issue of my own nativity. But Tillat's face was kindly with superior knowledge. "Not sweetbread," she gently said. "They're testicles, that's what kapura really are."

The topic is resumed when the sisters meet again in New York with other Pakistani friends.

"So, the next time I was in the taut companionship of Pakistanis in New York, I made a point of enquiring into the exact status of kapura and the physiological location of its secret, first in the animal and then in the meal. Expatriates are adamant, entirely passionate about such matters as the eating habits of the motherland. Accordingly, even though I was made to feel that it was to strip a food of its sauce and put it back into its bodily belonging, I certainly received an unequivocal response. Kapura, as naked meat, equals a testicle. Better, it is tantamount to a testicle neatly sliced into halves, just as we make no bones about asking the butcher to split chicken breasts in two. "But", and here I rummaged for the sweet realm of nomenclature, "couldn't kapura on a lazy occasion also accommodate something like sweetbreads, which is just a nice way of saying that pancreas is not a pleasant word to eat?" No one, however, was interested in this finesse.

Sara Suleri's first novel, Meatless Days, is an absolute treat. It is a family saga of the Suleris set in the background of Pakistan under different rulers

After kapura came kidneys. This time while she is busy eating them, the other sister Ifat intervened:



"Sara," said Ifat, her eyes brimming over with wonderful malice, "do you know what kidneys do." I aged, and my meal regressed, back to its vital belonging in the world of function. "Kidneys make pee, Sara," Ifat told me, "That's what they do, they make pee." And she looked so pleased to be able to tell me that; it made her feel so full of information. Betrayed by food, I let her go, and wept some watery tears into the kidney juice, which was designed anyway to evade cohesion, being thin and in its nature inexact. Then I ran out to the farthermost corner of the garden, where I could later go to hide my shame of milking time in a retch that refused to materialise."

Then there are golguppas, known to most Indians as paani poori:

"Golguppas are a strange food: I have never located an equivalent to them or their culinary situation. They are an outdoor food, a passing whim, and no one would dream of recreating their frivolity inside her own kitchen. A golguppa is a small hollow oval of the lightest pastry that is dipped into a fiery liquid sauce made of tamarind and cayenne and lemon and cold water."

While savouring kapuras, kidneys and golguppas, the same in Pakistan keeps changing constantly. "After General Ayub came Yahya; after Bhutto years came General Zulu (for Zia-ul) Haq." The litany pretty well sums up what the Suleri's thought of the last dictator is. •

"My car moves on petrol. My engine runs on GMO."

Today's new breed of engines demand a lot more from engine oils. Petsil GMO has the highest performance rating amongst engine oils in the country. Don't risk your car to an ordinary engine oil. Insist on Petsil GMO.

Available in convenient packs of 5, 2.5 and 1 ltr., at Petrosil's stockists and leading auto spares dealers.

For further information, contact: Apeejay House, 3, Dinsha Wacha Road, Bombay 400 020. Tel: 220818.

Petrosil Oil Co. Ltd.

A [illegible] of Gulf Oil International Inc., U.S.A.

Gulf World's First Choice. Make it yours.

R.K. LAXMAN/THE TIMES OF INDIA

■ If today conditions deteriorated to the same level (as in 1975), V.P. Singh will also be justified in declaring an Emergency.

GIANI ZAIL SINGH, former President

■ The British divided us and ruled us for long. Now we have a 'raja' trying to do the same.

RAJIV GANDHI, Congress(I) president

■ We can fight politically, intellectually, but must we hold the country to ransom?

ARUN NEHRU, Union commerce minister, on the infighting among political leaders

■ What merit is there in the case when a father makes his daughter the Prime Minister and then the mother makes her son the Prime Minister?

RAM VILAS PASWAN, Union labour and welfare minister, defending the government's reservation policy

■ If we fail to recognise the aspirations of the people, there will be a bloody revolution in the country.

S.R. BOMMAI, Janata Dal president

■ Appeasement (of minorities) is no way to promote national integration or communal harmony.

L.K. ADVANI, BJP president

■ V.P. Singh is a good man, a truthful man. He has kept all his promises since he has come to power.

SYED SHAHABUDDIN, Insaf Party president

■ The way V.P. Singh is conducting himself, the collapse of his government looks imminent, which would mean there is bound to be a mid-term poll.

BAL THACKERAY, Shiv Sena leader

■ They say ladies' fashions may change but their designs remain the same.

MADHU DANDAVATE, Union finance minister

■ To steady a boat which has been rocked too violently, and to restore professionalism.

D.N. GHOSH, Larsen & Toubro chairman, on his role

■ I like guys who are reckless, dangerous...I don't like normal people.

POOJA BHATT, actress

VINOD MEHTA

What comes first?

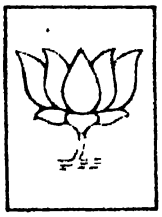
Elections to the Punjab Assembly or a crackdown on the terrorists?

Zipping around old Delhi, Sanjay Gandhi found his car tyre had burst. From a nearby garage a rough-looking mechanic emerged and quickly did the necessary repairs. He then offered to look under the bonnet. In a matter of minutes he reported back to the owner of the vehicle a number of minor faults. Sanjay was mightily impressed with the mechanic and expressed a desire to see his garage. The mechanic and Indira Gandhi's youngest son shared a common passion—tinkering with broken down cars—and soon a friendship developed. It was not long before the mechanic was invited to Sanjay's home for lunch. Quickly, he became a regular visitor. He called Indira 'mummy', while Indira announced she had found a third son. The mechanic's name was Sajjan Kumar.

It was this Sajjan Kumar who, two weeks ago, locked up an entire CBI team in his living room for seven hours as he hustled the Delhi High Court to grant him anticipatory bail. Reading reports of the imprisoned CBI team with several hundred Congress 'supporters' on the rampage outside vandalising public transport, blocking traffic and destroying vehicles belonging to the raiding party, brought back memories of Sanjay Gandhi in his heyday. The daredevil pilot would definitely have applauded the manner in which his friend foiled imminent arrest. If he had been alive, Sanjay would have hosted a stag party for his brigade (a bizarre group of school chums and old Delhi thugs) so that the success of goonda politics could be celebrated.

What does Sanjay's elder brother think of goonda politics? One cannot be certain of his opposition to the genre. Seventy-two hours have elapsed since Sajjan Kumar took the law into his own hands and not one word has been uttered by any Congress leader denouncing it. Indeed, I suspect, when words are uttered they will endorse the retaliatory action taken by the former mechanic/MP who will doubtless be presented to the nation as one more victim of vendetta politics. The Congress has heroically tried to protect its MPs and party members involved in the massacre of Sikhs after Indira Gandhi's assassination in November '84. But for how long can this contempt for the laws of the land continue, and what message does it send to the Sikhs of the country? These are questions Rajiv Gandhi must answer even as he is engrossed in his letter war with the Prime Minister over Congress participation in talks on Punjab.

Mr Gandhi has thus far steadfastly refused to join any discussions on the specious plea that the government has not revealed its proposals for solving the crisis. What Mr Gandhi asks can he discuss when there is no agenda for discussion? This is a juvenile ploy characteristic of the republic's juvenile opposition. The Congress is simply being obstructionist, opposing for the sake of opposing. Of course, there is an agenda: to announce elections or to extend President's rule? The difficulty is that the Congress, the principal culprit for the Punjab mess, is reluctant to commit itself to either course. Does it recommend an alternate strategy? Rajiv Gandhi hasn't enlightened us, all he does is parrot: when we were in power we had a definite plan to bring normalcy to the state, this government does not.



There is some substance to the charge that the National Front squandered away through lethargy the enormous goodwill created in the state by V.P. Singh's visit to Amritsar. The unfortunate and clumsy muddle over a new Governor didn't help either. However, the record is not totally black. Pensions for the 1984 Sikh widows have been enhanced, charges against army deserters have been dropped, there is a fresh urgency to bring to book those who perpetrated the November carnage in the capital—and there are V.P. Singh's highly charged pleas to the people of Punjab to forget the bitterness of the past and begin a new future. The hurt Sikh psyche must surely be a little less hurt

One can be sure that the Congress will ridicule V.P. Singh's (left) forthcoming padayatra as a gimmick. But, we must remember that Rajiv Gandhi, during his entire tenure as PM, went to Punjab on less than six occasions, and mingled with people from behind a bullet-proof box

The BJP is convinced that a popular government in Punjab would undermine the morale of the law and order agencies and uplift the morale of the terrorists now.

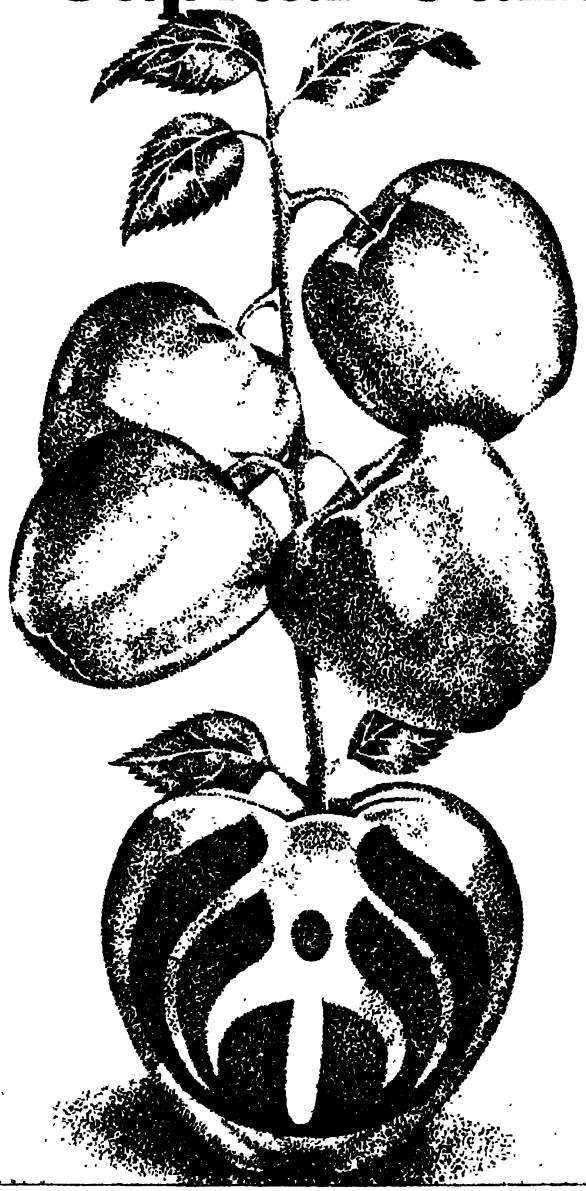
Yesterday I got a call asking me if I was interested in joining a delegation from Bombay to accompany the Prime Minister on his forthcoming padayatra through the troubled districts of Punjab. The dates for the walkabout have not been announced, but we know its duration (seven days) and its purpose (to get at first hand the grievances of ordinary Sikhs). One can be sure that the Congress will ridicule the gesture as a gimmick—which to a certain extent it is—but we must remember that the current leader of the Opposition during his entire tenure as Prime Minister went to Punjab on less than six occasions and mingled with the people from behind a bullet-proof box. Padayatra and the rest must be seen as confidence-building measures and they suggest that the government is about to take a major initiative in the state.

I am probably guilty of over-simplification, but the single issue in Punjab for some time has been whether to revive the political process or deal with terrorism. Which comes first, the chicken or the egg? It is an agonising dilemma, a dilemma on whose resolution we have spent over three years (the Barnala government was dismissed in May '87). The years in a sense have been wasted because even today we are no nearer an answer to the riddle. How can you have genuine elections when terrorists rule the roost in the state? On the other hand, how do you contain terrorism without resuming popular democratic activity and accountability? The message from different parts of the world is loud and clear: terrorism is not a police or army problem, it is a political problem. Suspend political activity and you create the perfect breeding ground for armed insurrection by a miniscule minority. Alas, the experience of the recent Lok Sabha poll in the state clearly indicates that those with the gun do influence the result of the ballot-box and make a mockery of elections. The success of Simranjeet Singh Mann's Akali party was to a large extent based on sheer terror. So, where do we go from here?



To elections, I hope. The BJP and (to a lesser degree) the communists are implacably opposed to reviving the Assembly. Their stand is honourable and goes beyond short-term gain. L.K. Advani and his party favour an extension of President's rule accompanied by an intensification of the campaign against militants coupled with stricter vigilance on the Indo-Pak border. The BJP is convinced that a popular government would undermine the morale of the law and order agencies and uplift the morale of the terrorists, since any government installed in Chandigarh would be hostage to them.

It is not easy to dispute such reasoning. Unfortunately, simply maintaining the status quo isn't going to get us very far. The reality of the situation in Punjab is that a handful of terrorists are holding the state to ransom. One directive from Dr Sohan Singh of the Panthic Committee, and the sword-wielding S S. Mann capitulates. He resigns his seat in Parliament, relinquishes leadership of his party and demands a plebiscite in Punjab under the auspices of the United Nations. Not surpisingly, the Panthic Committee has issued a straight threat: politicians in the state should shun elections or pay with their life. Such terror tactics cannot be allowed to succeed. We must call the terrorists' bluff and confront them, if necessary, with the might of the Indian Union and also with our most potent, but hitherto underused, weapon: the will of the people of Punjab.

It is going to be bloody and ugly. Elections will be held in conditions far from normal. Candidates will be shot, grenades will be dropped on innocents, election meetings will be bombed, votes will be cast under heavy police bandobust. But in the end, we will get a representative government, one which, hopefully, will have the support and sympathy of the Centre. Mr Barnala fell, not so much because of external factors and his own incompetence but, due to the machinations of the Rajiv government.

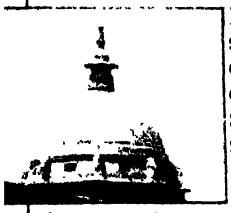
Happily, almost all the Akalis, excluding S.S. Mann, are for once united. They are pressing New Delhi not to take the easy (President's rule), but the hard option. Elections are no panacea for Punjab, but if the troubled state is to re-enter mainstream India, the people of that state must find a way to combat their most dreaded disease. Naturally, in this endeavour they must receive all assistance. But finally, only the Sikh panth can destroy the Panthic Committee. •

IDBI Capital Bonds
An attractive instrument for exemption from Capital Gains Tax.

- Available at par throughout the year.
- Exemption from Capital Gains tax under Section 54E of the Income Tax Act, 1961.
- Exemption from Wealth tax under Section 5(1) (xvie) of the Wealth Tax Act, 1957
- Income tax benefit under Section 80L.
- Interest at 9% p.a. payable half yearly.
- At the investor's option, interest for the full period of 3 years can be paid in advance on discounted basis.
- No deduction of tax at source.
- Outstation cheques accepted and cost of collection will be borne by IDBI.

For further details contact the nearest IDBI office or write to Manager

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK OF INDIA



IDBI TOWER, Cuffe Parade, Colaba, Bombay 400 005.

Sobhagya-B/IDBI/89

INDER MALHOTRA

The widening Gulf

India seems least bothered to resolve the crisis

Even before the Helsinki summit, this country's Gulf policy, such as it was and is, was fraying at the seams. Sorry for the mixed metaphors, it has since then blown into our faces.

After the seven-hour encounter between Presidents Bush and Gorbachev, it is crystal clear that any lingering differences between the two sides are one of nuance, not of substance. The US and the Soviet Union remain united in their resolve to terminate Iraq's indefensible annexation of Kuwait. And they are determined to do so by persuasion and sanctions, if possible, and through 'other means', if necessary. Since Saddam Hussein is hardly the person to be amenable to persuasion and would resist sanctions as best he can, too much imagination is not needed to guess how the Gulf crisis would end.

Most significantly, the two superpowers, in their joint statement at Helsinki, have also called for quick establishment of "regional security structures" to maintain peace and stability in the Gulf area. This is the key issue. But, surprisingly and sadly, New Delhi has not devoted any thought to it. Till the moment of writing, no Indian minister or official has even commented on an idea that would not only determine the future dispensation in West Asia but also affect Indian security.

Let us not fool ourselves. We must take note of rude realities of life. Assumptions about Indian security, valid uptil 2 August, now call for an agonising reappraisal. For instance, until the other day, it would have been entirely realistic to assume that there would soon be a political settlement of the vexed Afghan issue and this would be followed by a slow but steady diminution of American military supplies and support to Pakistan. Now, this belief has been knocked on the head. Pakistan, by its lightning decision to rush troops to Saudi Arabia, has now US gratitude and can be sure of American quid for Pakistani quo. Pakistan would be an integral part of any regional security arrangement the Americans may devise for the Gulf and West Asia. The US-Pakistan military relationship, renewed a decade ago when Russian tanks and troops rolled into Kabul, has come to stay. This is by no means all. The sudden slump in the Gulf remittances, the rising energy prices and fears of a global economic recession cannot but aggravate the resource crunch Indian defence planners face to their chagrin.

Presidents Gorbachev (left) and Bush: sharing the same perception

Why has the Indian government not paid any attention to this critical aspect of the Gulf upheaval? It bears repetition that New Delhi has got almost completely overwhelmed by its legitimate concern for the safety and safe evacuation of the 200,000 Indians stranded in Kuwait and Iraq amidst great misery. No one can be so heartless as to suggest that this problem should not be given top priority.

The crowning irony of the situation is that even the policy of somehow getting our people out of Iraq and Kuwait, at times by humouring Saddam, has backfired. The Iraqi dictator, behaving true to type, has gone back on his promise to Inder Gujral. The foreign minister had returned from Baghdad reassured that the Indians in Saddam's clutches would be allowed to come away unconditionally. But the wily Iraqi leader has demanded that ships and planes to evacuate them can go to Baghdad, Basra and Kuwait only if they carry food and medical supplies for the Indian population.

Although there is absolutely no guarantee that any food that India might take to Iraq and Kuwait (as distinct from Jordan, which is not under sanctions anyhow) would be given to starving Indians, the Indian government is quite keen to ship and fly cereals and drugs to Iraqi and Iraqi-controlled destinations. But here it has run into American opposition. The US insists that no food can be taken to Saddam's domain without the permission of the sanctions committee of the UN Security Council.

There is a lot in common in Indian and Russian positions on the question of humanitarian aid to the people of Iraq and Kuwait. But at Helsinki the two superpowers agreed that food and medicines can be sent there only with the UN's approval,not otherwise.

This is the state of the play as these lines are written and Inder Gujral is busy conferring at Belgrade with his Yugoslav and Algerian counterparts. But anyone expecting a worthwhile initiative from these confabulations would be the greatest optimist of the last decade of the century. •

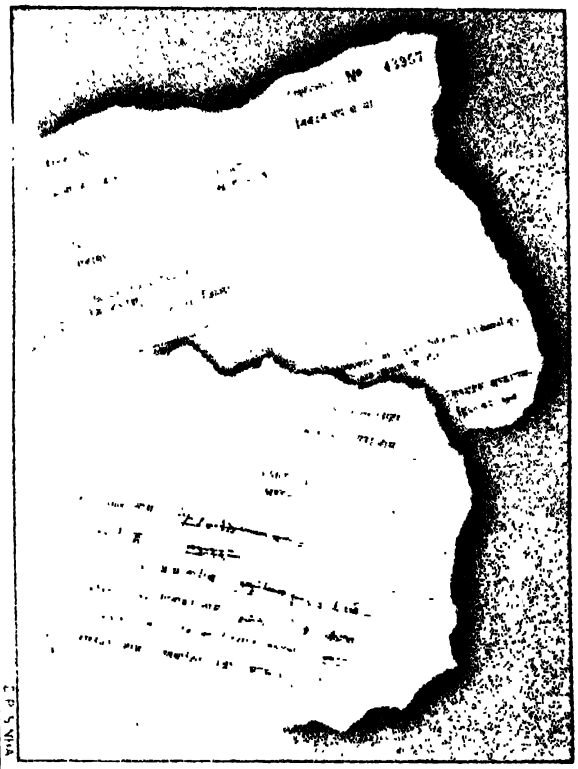
The aliens

Are foreign nationals being given Indian citizenship in Sikkim?

• Pawan Kumar Sharma, a 17-year-old student, has been living in Gangtok since his birth. His father, a teacher of a local primary school, is an Indian citizen by virtue of his name featuring in the Chogyal's – the former King of Sikkim – Register of Subjects, the document on the basis of which the Indian government conferred citizenship rights on the Sikkimese after Sikkim's merger with India in 1975. Logically, his son too, is an Indian citizen by birth. But last year, for some strange and inexplicable reason, Pawan Kumar was asked to fill up the Green Sheet – the citizenship form distributed among the so-called "stateless" people of the state by the Nar Bahadur Bhandari government. "Filling up the form meant that I was not an Indian citizen and would like to become one. But even though I saw no reason why I should do so, I had to give in to the pressures of the MLA from my area," Pawan Sharma says.

• Khara Nanda Bhandari (60) is a marginal farmer who makes a living by tilling the small piece of land he owns at Rumtek, a sleepy hamlet on the outskirts of Gangtok. Bhandari has been living in Sikkim for the last 50 years and had automatically become an Indian citizen after the Himalayan kingdom became a part of India 15 years back. But to his dismay, he too was declared "stateless" by the state government and asked to apply for citizenship. "Otherwise, they threatened to throw me out of the country," Bhandari complains.

• Poverty and unemployment forced Kiran Thapa, in his mid-twenties, to leave the land of his birth, Nepal, and settle down in Gangtok four years back. Today, he makes a living by doing odd jobs for the wealthy traders of the town. Last year, however, Thapa was faced with the prospect of being deported to Nepal after chief minister Bhandari threatened to throw out all "foreigners" working in Sikkim. A worried Kiran rushed to his friend, who "managed" a Green Sheet for him. He promptly filled it up and sent it back to the authorities. On Independence Day this year, Thapa was relieved to learn that he would be a citizen of India, without actually giving up his Nepalese citizenship. "But that doesn't worry me. After all, I am going to work and live here," Kiran Thapa proudly proclaims.



The list could go on. Men, women and children, who suddenly find themselves aliens—or "stateless" as the Sikkim government prefers to call them—in their own land. Some, like Kiran Thapa, are genuinely outsiders. But by a curious turn of events, Thapa, Sharma and Bhandari have been placed in the vague "stateless" category and some 80,000-odd people of Sikkim have been asked to prove that they are citizens of India all over again. The citizenship problem has been hanging fire for the last 11 years and has been the one issue that has kept Nar Bahadur Bhandari in power in Sikkim for over a decade. The fact that the wily chief minister has deftly exploited a bogus but emotive issue for political gains is another story. What is important is how Bhandari duped successive central governments to concede a ridiculous demand. On 15 August this year, chief minister Bhandari proclaimed proudly that the Centre has at last conceded one of his long-standing demands: some 40,000 nowhere people would be given Indian citizenship at last. The rest—another 45,000 people—too would be given the status soon, he thundered.

For 11 years, CM Bhandari spent most of his time and energy in trying to convince the Centre that the "stateless" people in Sikkim should be given Indian citizenship

It was indeed a personal triumph for Nar Bahadur Bhandari. For over 11 years now, the chief minister had spent most of his time and energy trying to convince the Centre that during Sikkim's merger with India way back in 1975, many people who were "unfairly" denied Indian citizen status should be given their due now. In fact, Bhandari had staked his credibility and political career on this one important issue. But every time the chief minister went to Delhi to discuss the matter, he had to return to Gangtok empty handed. The central government just wouldn't believe that so many "stateless" people lived in Sikkim. Before committing itself, the Centre wanted to verify the antecedents of those who claimed to be Sikkimese and wished to become Indian citizens. Especially, since influx from the neighbouring countries of Nepal and Bhutan into Sikkim was an accepted fact.

Last year, the Nar Bahadur Bhandari (left) government distributed around 1.5 lakh citizenship forms (above) among the so-called "stateless" people

Much of the problem, however, has to do with the circumstances under which Sikkim became a part of India. On the day the erstwhile Himalayan kingdom ruled by the Chogyals—the country was an Indian protectorate since 1950—merged with the Indian Union in 1975, the Government of India passed the Sikkim (Citizenship) Order, 1975, which detailed the persons eligible to become Indian citizens. It said:

- Every person who immediately before the 26th day of April, 1975, was a Sikkim subject under the Chogyal's Sikkim Subjects Regulation, 1961, shall be deemed to have become a citizen of India on that day

In the absence of any other document, the Indian government decided to give utmost importance to the Sikkim Subjects Register. All those whose names were in the list and possessed the Sikkim Subjects cerificate automatically became Indian citizens.

Such an arrangement did not satisfy a large chunk of the population, who complained that despite being Sikkimese, their names were deliberately left out from the King's register due to political and other reasons. In a memorandum to the then Prime Minister Morarji Desai, a number of legislators including chief minister Kazi Lhendhup Dorji demanded a revision of the Sikkim (Citizenship) Order to include the names of those who were left out from the Chogyal's register. By conservative estimates, the number of such "stateless" people was around 7,500.

But before Dorji could pursue the matter any further, he was thrown out of office and Nar Bahadur Bhandari, who had vehemently opposed Sikkim's merger with India, came to power under the banner of the Janata Parishad in 1979. Initially, Bhandari showed little or no interest in the problem. There was a compelling reason for this. Most of his party MLAs at that time were from the minority Bhutias, Lepchas and Limbus and the chief minister just could not afford to annoy them by pushing for the citizenship rights of people, a majority of whom were Nepalese. But once the minorities began moving away from Bhandari's fold—a number of Bhutia/Lepcha MLAs had actually expressed no confidence in the chief minister—he began looking around for other support areas to consolidate his position. Bhandari encouraged defections from the Opposition and a majority of those who switched allegiance were Nepalese—the people who were clamouring for Indian citizenship rights.

In 1981, the Bhandari government set up a seven-member Citizenship Committee under the leadership of the deputy speaker of the Assembly, L.B. Basnet. The committee examined the question of granting citizenship to those whose names were not included in the Sikkim Subjects Register and who presumably did not belong to any other state. Basnet and company submitted their report to the state government within three months. It also made a startling revelation: that over 30,000 "stateless" people—most of them Nepalese and were residing in Sikkim. Chief minister Nar Bahadur Bhandari promptly took up the matter with the Centre and demanded that all of them be given Indian citizenship status. Very few at that time could gauge that beneath Bhandari's sudden interest in

ASHOK MITRA

After the merger: people burn the effigy of the Chogyal in Gangtok the issue was his desire to build up a solid support base.

Not that no one saw through Bhandari's gameplan. It was around this time that the three ethnic groups of the state—the Lepchas, the Bhutias and the Limbus—began to raise their voice against the chief minister's move. They feared that if the 30,000-odd Nepalese were made citizens and absorbed into the Sikkimese society, their distinct identity would be threatened. The minorities got together and petitioned the Centre against Bhandari. Most of the so-called "stateless" people, they argued, were "foreign" nationals, who had come to Sikkim from Nepal and Bhutan.

The accusation was not altogether unfounded. Even before the merger, Sikkim has had to live with the problem of people crossing over from the two neighbouring countries. This has been even acknowledged by the National Commission of Population in its report submitted to the Centre in 1984: "The deteriorating economy of Nepal has forced an increasing number of Nepalese to emigrate outside the country. Their influx into the small state of Sikkim was more overwhelming..." Moreover, it was precisely due to this factor that the Election Commission treated Sikkim as "sensitive area" in 1983.

There were other reasons for New Delhi to be suspicious of Bhandari's motive. In 1981, he had said that there were around 30,000 "stateless" people in the state. But as the years went by, their numbers, according to the chief minister, swelled defying any logic of population growth. Thus in 1985, Bhandari made yet another trip to Delhi and demanded that the Centre should now confer citizenship rights on over 60,000 "stateless" people. And today, he says that their number has risen to well over 80,000 out of the state's total population of around 4.5 lakhs.

Most political observers feel that Bhandari has been able to bulldoze his way through as—after the 1989 Assembly elections in Sikkim in particular—he has met with very little opposition. In the state elections last year, the Opposition was completely routed with Bhandari's Sikkim Sangram Parishad winning all the 32 seats in the Assembly perhaps the first House in the country without any Opposition.

Before the 1989 Assembly polls, however, the minorities did try and focus public attention on this issue. The Denzong Peoples' Chogpa, a religious-political outfit which represents the tribals and the Other Backward Castes (OBC) of the state campaigned against Bhandari and even decided to boycott the elections. The party argued that since a sizeable chunk of the state's population as claimed by the chief minister were not citizens of India, they were not entitled to vote in the elections.

Soon after Bhandari's party swept the Assembly polls in 1989, he took up the citizenship issue with renewed vigour. And towards the end of last year, the state government distributed around 1.5 lakh citizenship forms—called the Green Sheet—among the "stateless" people. And at all public meetings the chief minister claimed that the central government had at last agreed to grant them citizenship status. Expectedly, there was a mad rush for the forms but not all who laid their hands on them were genuine "stateless" people. Many of them were migrants from Nepal and Bhutan. What is more, a large section of those who filled up the citizenship forms were Indian citizens already. But in the absence of any organised Opposition, nobody dared question the chief minister's move. Moreover, since the Centre had all along soft-pedalled the issue, there was a feeling that this time too, New Delhi would sit on the files.

They were mistaken. The National Front government proved to be more responsive than the previous Congress regime. The Union home ministry went ahead with Bhandari's proposal, and in the last session of Parliament, Subodh Kant Sahay, the Union minister of state for home, declared that the NF government had decided to grant Indian citizenship to 40,000 "stateless" people in Sikkim. An elated Nar Bahadur Bhandari celebrated this announcement in Gangtok with great fanfare. "The application of the rest were being processed. All of them will be made citizens of this country soon," he promised.

The ethnic Sikkimese: identity crisis

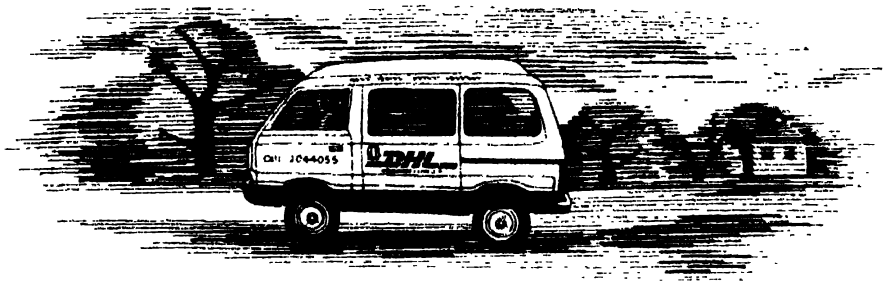
"I wonder how the central government could make such an announcement without even verifying the antecedents of the people," said Y.N. Bhandari, president of the Jan Mukti Morcha, a platform for all those opposing the chief minister on the citizenship issue. The Morcha was formed in March this year and most of its office-bearers are from the Rising Sun, a powerful Opposition grouping. Y.N. Bhandari is certain that the chief minister has perpetrated a fraud on the people of the state. But why did Nar Bahadur insist on handing our citizenship rights to those who were already Indians? Bhandari has the answer. He feels that this is just a gimmick to project himself as the saviour and only leader of the Nepalese. "Just look at how he is pressing for the inclusion of the Nepali language in the Eighth Schedule of the Constitution. After all, Nar Bahadur has lost the support of the ethnic Sikkimese and it is but natural that he would like to build up another base of his own," the Morcha president added.

And since most of the mainstream Opposition political parties like the Congress(I) are silent on the issue, the Morcha seems to be the last resort of the anti-Bhandari brigade. There are others too who are putting up individual show of defiance. Bharat Basnet is one of them. The energetic member of the All Sikkim Youth and Contractors Association went on a hunger strike on the day Nar Bahadur Bhandari announced in Gangtok that 35,000 "left out" people would be given Indian citizenship. In a strongly-worded letter to the state chief secretary, Basnet had said that the decision of the Centre would go against the interests of the Sikkimese as there were enough evidence to prove that many of the "stateless" people were actually Nepalese citizens. But true to his style, the chief minister promptly had Basnet arrested. The Jan Mukti Morcha, too, has other plans. According to a spokesman of the party, the Morcha is now patiently waiting for the state government to publish a list of all those who have been given citizenship status. "We will then expose the chief minister and his men," he said.

Nar Bahadur Bhandari, of course, dismisses such allegations with disdain. "They are baseless.. my critics are behind all this," he said. And the chief minister seemed least bothered by the fact that a large portion of the state's population are against the government's move. The elections are still far away. And public memory is indeed short. Moreover, Nar Bahadur Bhandari has perfected the art of buying peace into a fine art. Has anyone heard of a state Assembly without any Opposition members? ●



Rajiv Bagchi/Gangtok

FROM EASY CUSTOMS CLEARANCE,

TO PROMPT DESPATCH,

TO RAPID TRANSIT AND DELIVERY.

WE TAKE IT DOOR-TO-DOOR EVERYTIME.

STILL THINK WE'RE JUST A COURIER COMPANY?

RAKA:3150 C:90

21 years ago, we pioneered the air express industry. Since then, through a network spanning over 180 countries, we've become the fastest, most reliable way of delivering packages and documents worldwide. We offer you one door-to-door service, one all-inclusive invoice, and one truly global network. You can depend on the dedication of over 20,000 professionals, supported by over 7,000 vehicles and aircraft. So if you have any packages and documents that need to be in safe hands from beginning to end, call us for an immediate pick-up.

DHL
WORLDWIDE EXPRESS®

We are listed in the Yellow Pages/Telephone Directories

DHL. THE COURIER DIVISION OF AIRFREIGHT LIMITED.

The language game

The tug-of-war between English and the vernaculars continues

The fight is on. While certain Janata Dal and BJP leaders of the northern half of India, like Mulayam Singh Yadav and Sunderlal Patwa, continue their angrezi hatao movement, 72 Congress MLAs in Karnataka have launched an angrezi bachao campaign. The middle ground seems to be BJP chief L.K. Advani's stand that fighting English, as long as there is an English bias at the Centre, would merely put those opposed to English at a disadvantage.

First, the Anglophiles. In a memorandum submitted to Karnataka chief minister Veerendra Patil last month, 72 MLAs of the Congress(I) appealed for more English medium schools in rural areas. Not knowing English, they said, makes villagers more susceptible to discrimination. Their demand has rekindled the language issue in the state. In 1982, Karnataka had witnessed language chauvinism for the first time. The Gokak report, recommending the implementation of Kannada as the state administrative language, had found massive support. When the Gundu Rao government did not implement this, the state erupted with riots and demonstrations. This finally led to the downfall of the Congress government and the Janata Party, supporting the cause of Kannada, came to power.

But the Hegde government had not lived up to expectations, either. Slow in implementing the vernacular, it was already drawing flak from Kannada chauvinists, so when Hegde sanctioned the opening of 49 English medium schools there was a big din. And the memorandum of the MLAs has sparked off an acrimonious debate once again.

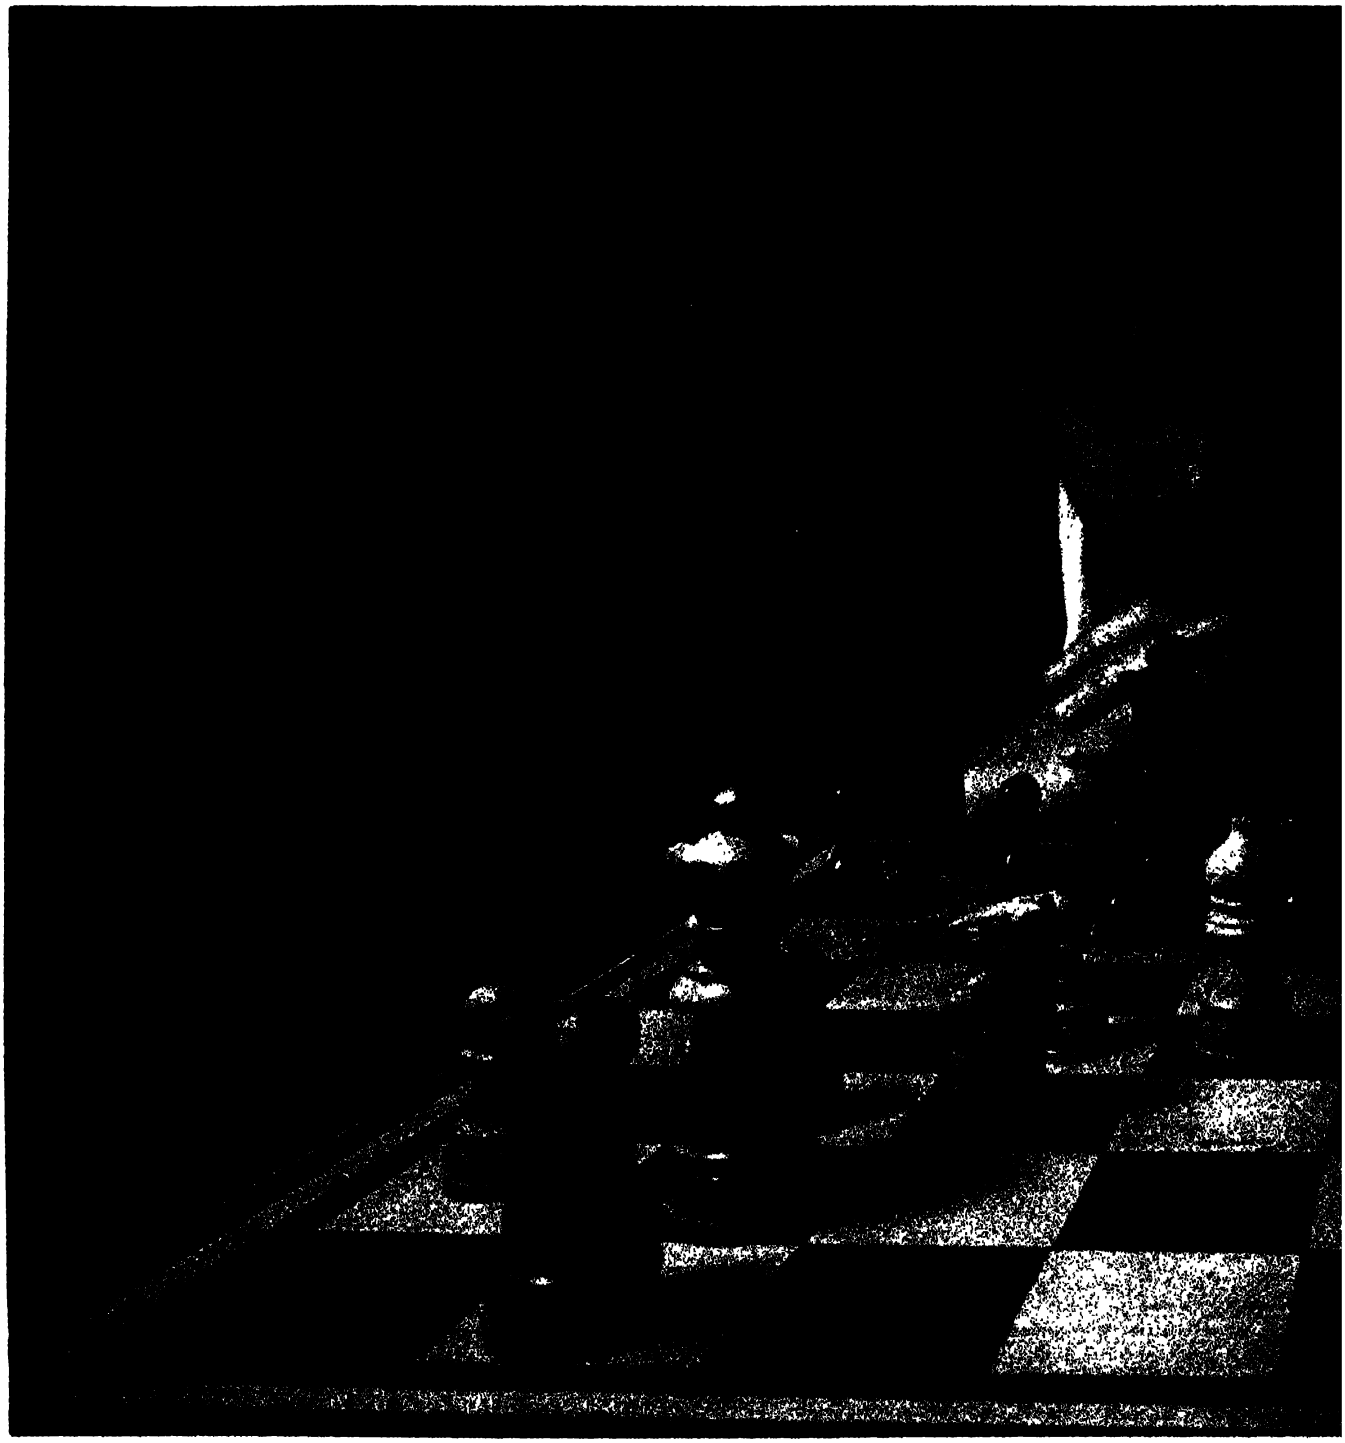
In the memorandum, the MLAs have not opposed the use of Kannada as the administrative language, stating instead, that it was the constitutional right of every citizen to study in an English medium school. "Since there are a number of languages in the country and considering the importance of English at international fora, it is best that the medium of instruction in schools be English," the statement said.

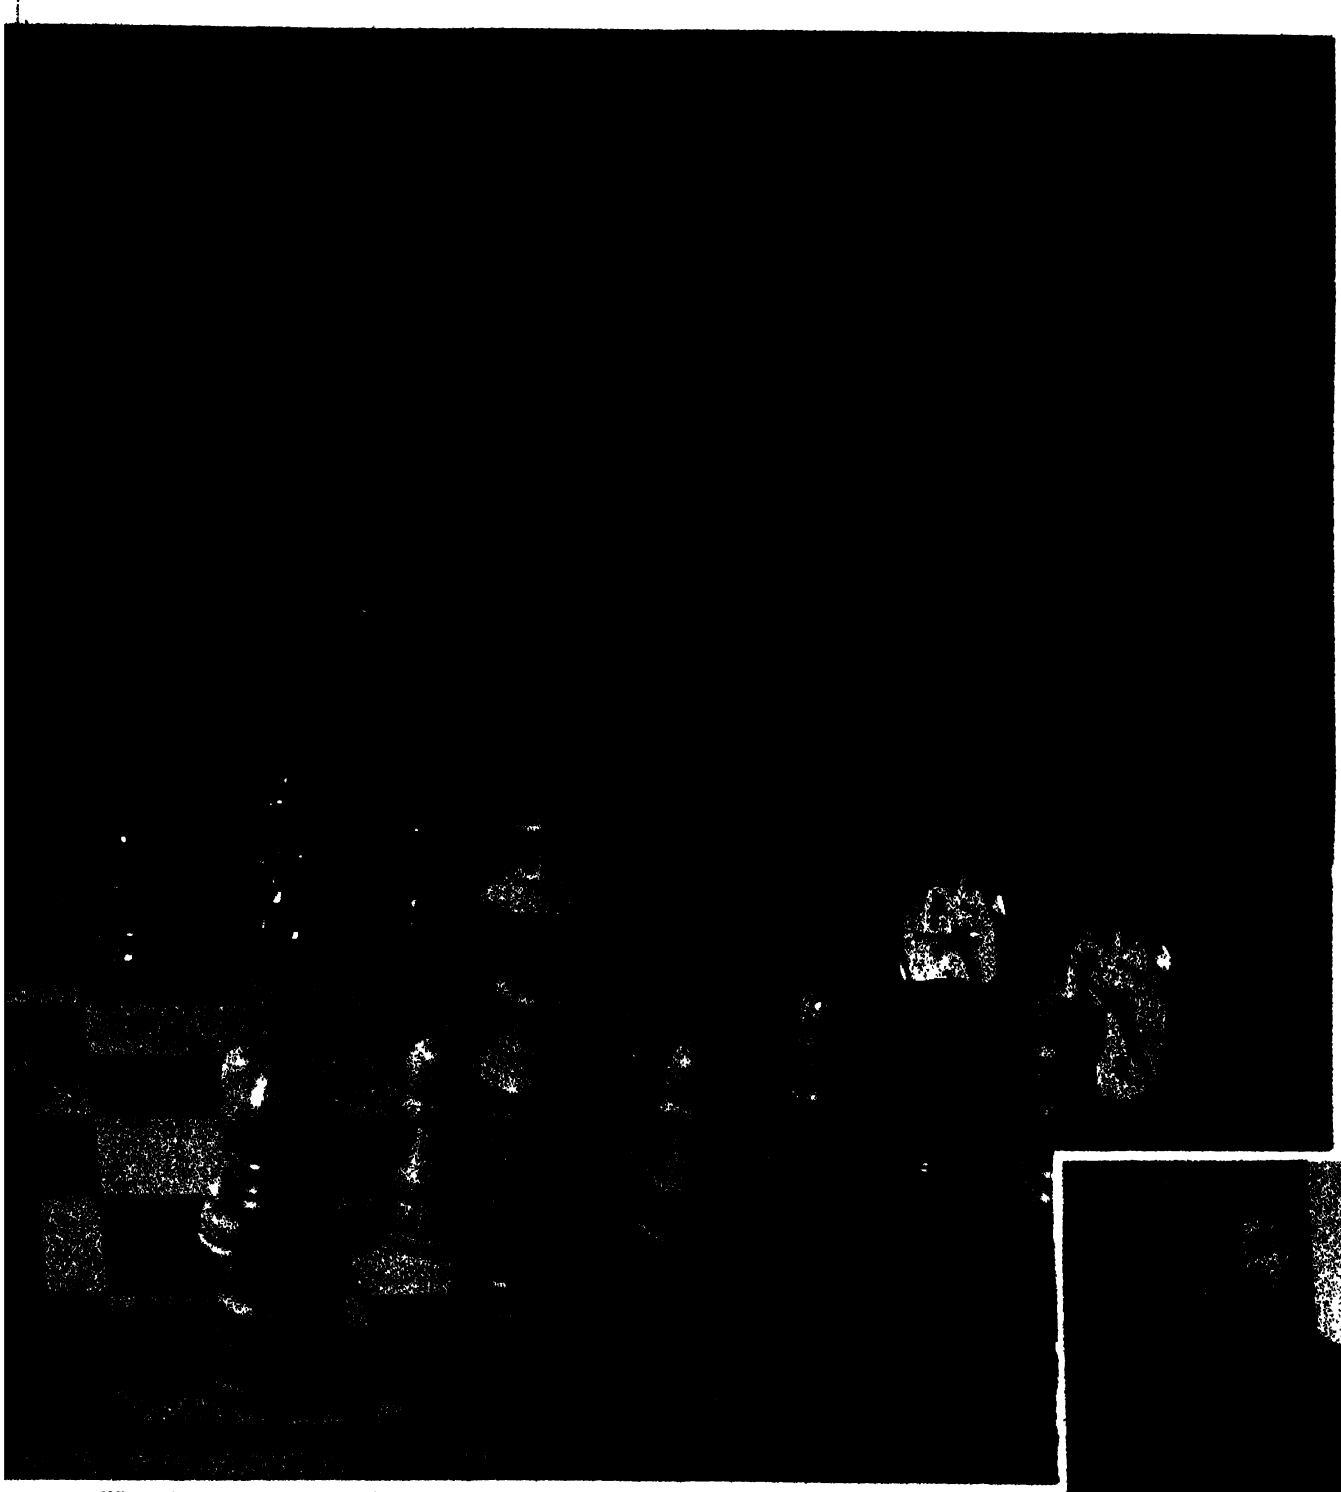
The demand has put Patil and his education minister K.H. Ranganath in a fix. The CM, who cannot deny the validity of the point raised, has not taken any step, positive or negative: "It is difficult to take a stand on this as it is such an emotional issue."

But true Anglophobes would not accept this. For example, the Angrezi Hatao Sammelan held at Indore sometime back, called for a crusade against English to successfully banish the language from the country. Organised by Lohiaite Socialists of the Janata Dal, mostly belonging to the Lok Dal, this meeting was star-studded. Former president Zail Singh, railway minister George Fernandez, chief ministers Mulayam Singh Yadav and Sunderlal Patwa were united in their fight against English. Urging the people to sweep away every remnant of English, veteran BJP leader and Speaker of the Madhya Pradesh Assembly, Brijmohan Mishra, reminded the mass of Ram Monahar Lohia's dream.

All this is in tune with the Madhya Pradesh government's firm clamp on English. Chief minister Patwa has practically banned English from government offices. Top bureaucrats have been repeatedly pulled up for speaking in English at official public functions. And so, when BJP chief L.K. Advani declared in a Bhopal press conference that CMs should not try to remove English from their states, a lot of faces must have turned red.

In 1966 and 1967, explained Advani, his party—then the Jan Sangh—was opposed to the two-language formula, then accepted at the Centre. For the sake of national unity, the party had accepted the formula although remaining critical of it. Since then, the Centre had issued several directives to encourage Hindi, but even so English dominated the central government. The veteran leader reminded people of the three-language formula that the BJP state governments had been directed to implement. Because, not knowing English would only make the going that much tougher for the people of Hindi-dominated states.





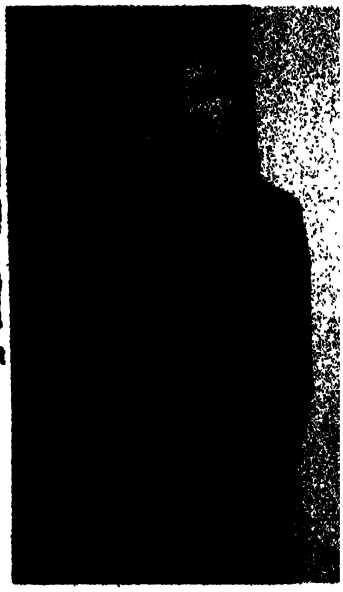
(From left) Zail Singh, Mulayam Singh Yadav, Sunderlal Patwa and Shanta Kumar at an English-hatao convention in Bhopal: the Anglophobes

Whatever the Anglophobes might believe, the abolition of English would be neither easy nor practical, at the moment. As the Kannada poet Ramakrishna Sharma says, "Abolition of English might mean Hindi imperialism. And imposition of Hindi south of the Vindhyas will have grave consequences. It might even divide the country." •

Gayatri Laxman/Bangalore and M.V. Kher/Raipur.

You don't have to be the world's youngest grandmaster to be a Raymond's man.

When, in 1987 at the age of 18, Viswanathan Anand became India's first grandmaster, he was also the world's youngest, launched on a brilliant career which would see him in 1989 beat former world champion Boris Spassky at the 4th International Games Festival in Cannes, France.



Too young to be checked by his own mates, still, he is not beyond making a few dashing moves when fittingly attired — e.g., in this blue/grey Jodhpuri made from a polyester-wool combination aptly called "Sapphire".

You don't have to be a jewel in India's chess crown to be a Raymond's man. For that matter, you don't even have to be a Raymond's man.

... but it helps.

Raymond's

Never say no to life.

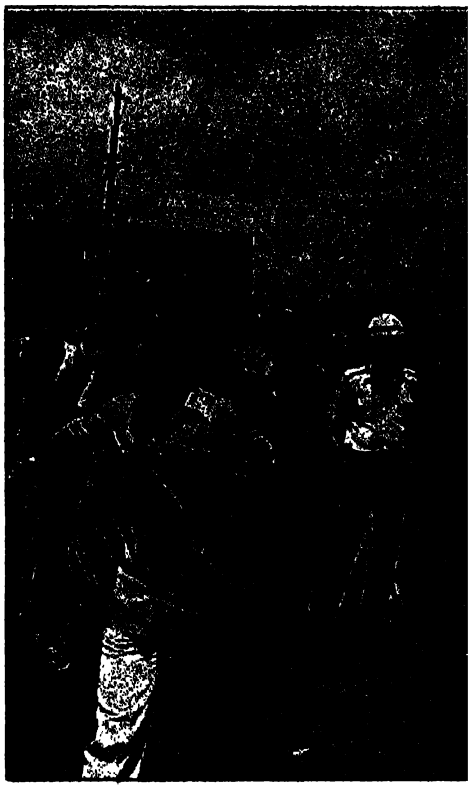
The first warning

The West Bengal Police Association speaks out against political interference

There is a limit to which a policeman can be made to bend; beyond that he tends to recoil viciously. And recent events in West Bengal suggest that the state's police force is fast approaching that limit.

The night of 3 September, a Tuesday, was charged with tension. At Tollygunge, in south Calcutta, a group of policemen surprised the local residents and the police administration by putting up road blocks to protest against the suspension of some of their colleagues.

The drama began earlier that day when Anandabazar Patrika front-paged a photograph that showed an injured SUCI (Socialist Unity Centre of India) activist lying chained to his bed in a city hospital. The man had been hurt the day before, when the police lathicharged a group of SUCI demonstrators during a bandh called by the party and 11 Naxalite groups. The strike was in protest against the killing of an SUCI worker in Calcutta, who died in police firing on 31 August.

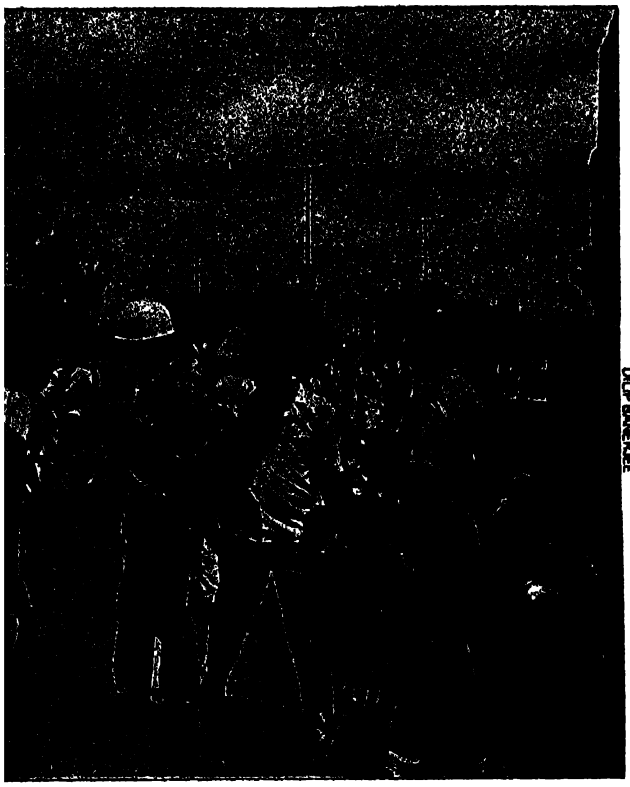


Chief minister Jyoti Basu reacted angrily to the police measure in the hospital, said it affronted civilised sensibilities and ordered the suspension of the policemen concerned. And that very evening, policemen of Tollygunge police lines under which Bangur Hospital is located, took to the street, set up road blockades, and disrupted traffic in a rare and portentous show of defiance.

The following day, 4 September, the agitation snowballed into a mini 'rebellion'. Agitated policemen belonging to the West Bengal Police Association(WBPA) and the CPI(M)-affiliated Non-Gazetted Police Karmachari Samiti gheraoed the superintendent of police, South 24 Paraganas, demanding the revocation of the suspension orders. A crisis was, however, averted when the leaders of the two unions intervened and promised to hold talks with the government. The policemen said that they had acted according to norms, as there were no instructions from the authorities against keeping hospitalised persons under police custody chained. In their defence they cited two earlier incidents where four policemen were suspended after ailing undertrials had managed to escape from the same hospital.

The demonstration by the policemen was not totally out of the blue. On 25 August the WBPA had cautioned the ruling Left Front of police discontent stemming from a lack of guidelines. The WBPA, at a meeting held at Bhawani Bhavan, the state police headquarters, had stated that its members were no longer willing to put up with political interference and the arbitrariness prevailing within the police administration.

And this came close on the heels of the Calcutta bandh (16 August), called by the Congress(I) to protest against the rise in transport fares and deteriorating civic conditions. To counter the general strike, the CPI(M) decided to let its cadres help the police maintain peace. But they caused serious embarrassment to the government by attacking peaceful Congress processionists and assaulting press photographers with impunity while



The allegations made by the WBPA appear to have been corroborated by the state's chief secretary. He has censured police officers for failing to keep the machinery in good shape the police looked on.

The WBPA argues that the police failed to take action because they had no clear instructions from their superiors about how to deal with party cadres. In an editorial in its journal, the association says that if policemen were to act according to law, a large number of CPI(M) activists would have been arrested. And, if that happened, the policemen concerned may have had to face punitive action later. "It is time the government chose between the police and the party cadre. If cadres are to be mobilised again, the government must define our role in writing," fumed Biswanath Chakravarty, the association's general secretary.

The WBPA meeting and the subsequent show of defiance by a section of the constabulary underscored the fact that the police were tired of being made the scapegoat for situations arising out of political interference and administrative shortcomings. The association cites the example of what happened in Howrah, Calcutta's twin city across the Hooghly, to explain its point. In early August, when the police fought a pitched battle with a crowd of Congress(I) demonstrators protesting against the rise in bus fares, a group of photographers were beaten up by lathi-weilding men who mingled with the police. When the media raised an outcry against the incident, accusing the CPI(M) of trying to gag the press with the help of its musclemen, the party bosses tried to wriggle out of the situation by saying that the lensmen were assaulted by plainclothes policemen. "This sort of opportunism is breaking the policeman's morale and making the cadres reckless. The politicians know, as much as we do, that they were not policemen in civil dress. They were party workers," said a WBPA leader.

DILIP BANERJEE

DILIP BANERJEE

Policemen restoring peace in Howrah on a day of violence: hard-pressed; (above) at a Republic Day parade in Calcutta: will the discipline last?

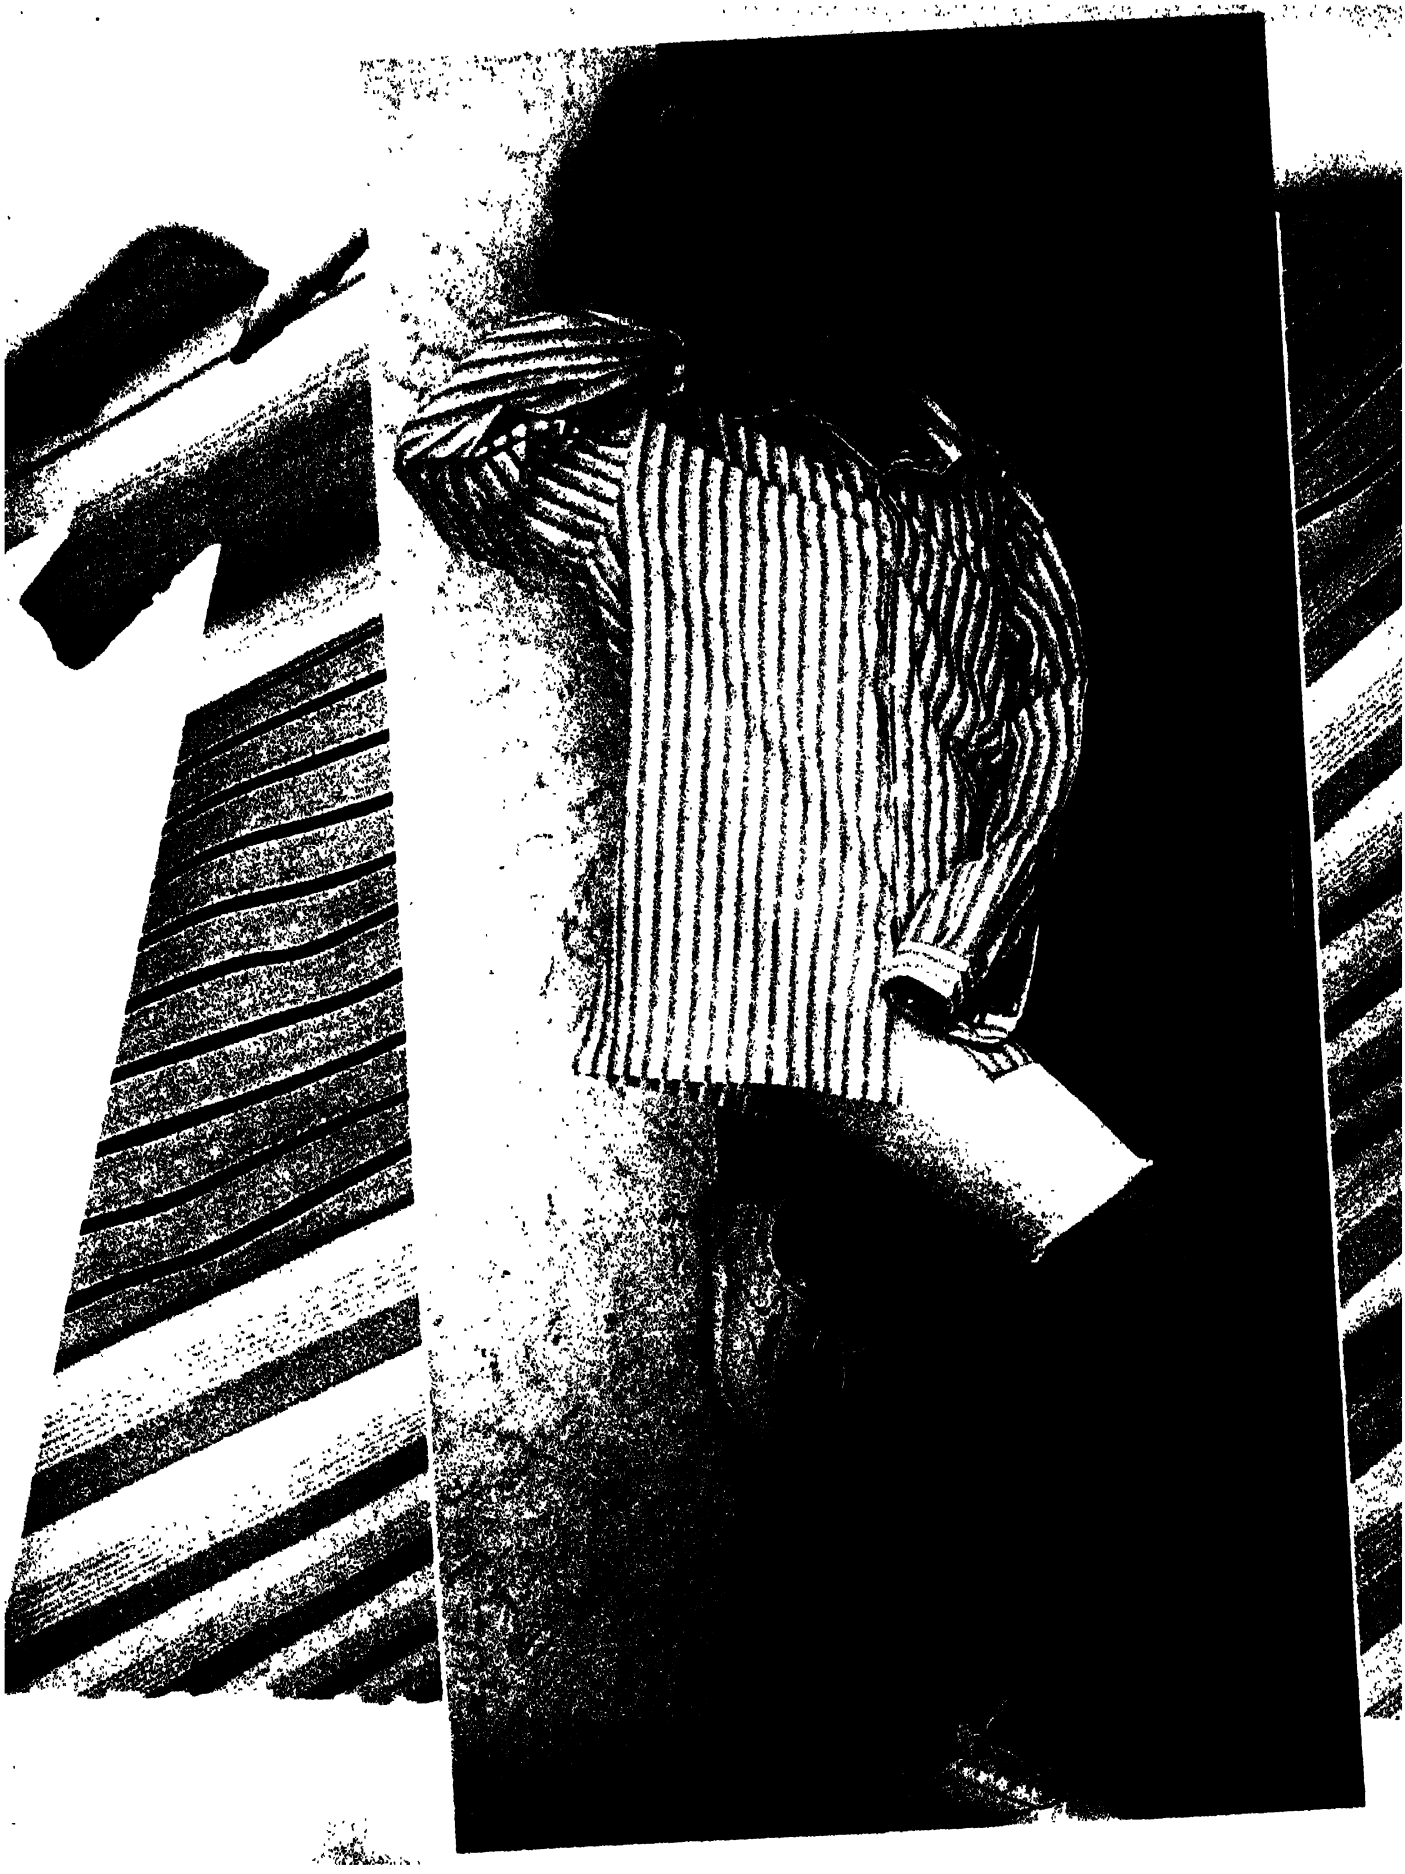
Regarding the shackling of patients in hospitals, policemen say that the step was in keeping with the norms laid down in the Police Regulations of Bengal. While the newly-appointed director general of police, Arun Prasad Chatterjee, and the state home secretary have declared the measure unlawful, WBPA leaders wonder why the practice was allowed for decades and no circular issued to end it.

Indeed, the police seems to have no alternative to putting up with political interference. "There is little we can do to prevent this," confesses a WBPA district secretary. "We are issued with vindictive transfer orders, if we fail to comply with the whims of the politically influential." The WBPA admits that the local police stations are even wary of executing court warrants. Things have come to such a pass that an officer-in-charge (OC) holds back the warrants against those who have even the remotest link with the ruling parties. The obvious reason is that he wants to avoid agitations, gheraos and, above all, humiliation.

One reason why the authority of the police has eroded is that senior officials have failed to hold their ground against political pressure. The WBPA accuses them of being pliant and forging a nexus with politicians for personal gains. The police administration, it complains, has, therefore, become topheavy with superfluous posts being created every three years, while the force at the lower level stagnates for decades. "I know of at least one IG and one DIG who have written to the government saying that they have no work. We need more men at the lower levels to cope with a growing population and fast-changing crime pattern," says Chakravarty, explaining why the police fail to perform satisfactorily.

The allegations made by the WBPA appear to have been corroborated by chief secretary T.C. Dutt himself. In a circular to the police department, he said that if anti-social elements and those involved in acts of violence have the slightest links with the ruling party, the police refuses to arrest them. In the note he has also censured the police officers for flouting rules meant to keep the police machinery in good shape.



The WBPA, however, does not believe that the circular will make things any better. The police force is demoralised, it says, because the government has kept all promotional avenues sealed for the last ten years and has systematically downgraded the policeman's position in the state's administration vis-a-vis its army of clerks. "There is no motivation and no sense of security. If a railway passenger dies in an accident his family gets a compensation of Rs two lakhs. If a constable is killed while on duty, his family gets Rs 25,000," laments Chakravarty.

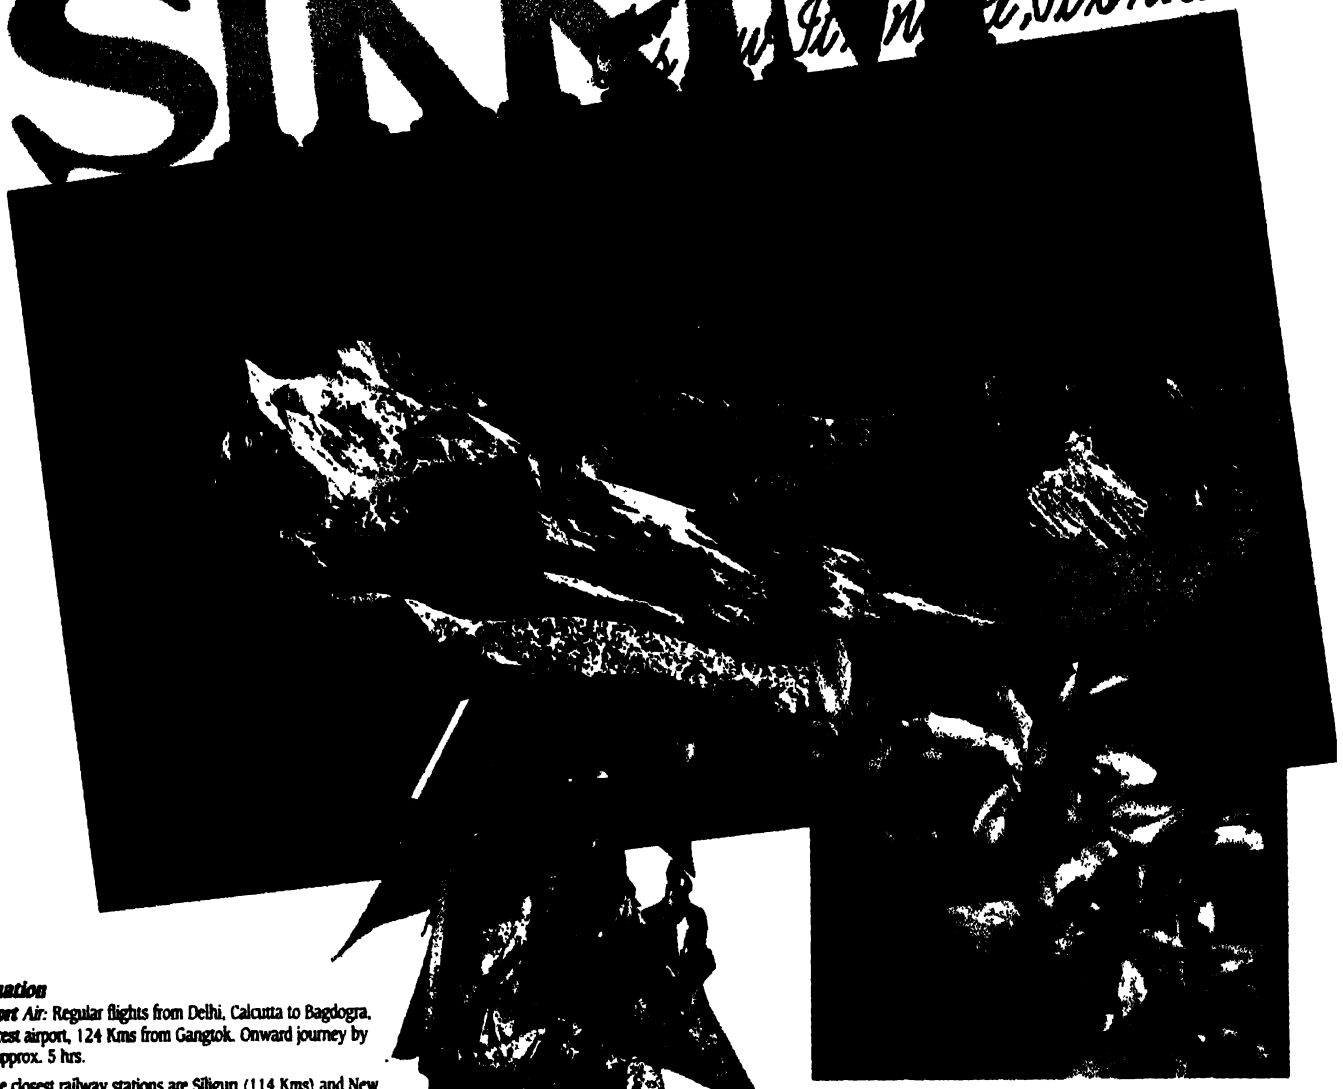
Privately, some senior IPS officers have also reacted sharply to the circular. "It has been foolish on the part of the chief secretary to issue a note like this," said one of the government's most trusted police officers. "He, more than anyone else, should know what prevents the police from acting in the way it should," says the officer from Calcutta Police. Says an inspector general of the West Bengal Police: "In most criminal cases, party activists are found to be siding with the accused. And if investigations are carried too far against politically connected people, the investigating officers are transferred."

The vernacular press characterised the stirrings in the police as a virtual "rebellion". The WBPA leaders themselves are, however, more circumspect. "There is no question of a rebellion as has been suggested by some newspaper reports," says Chakravarty. "But let me add that the way things are going there might be a revolt in spite of us."

Maybe it is time the government took heed. •

Anish Gupta/Calcutta

GREAT FABRICS / GREAT PRICES



S H I R T I N G S

DRESS MATERIALS / SUITINGS / SAREES / FURNISHINGS / TOWELS / BEDSHEETS / INDUSTRIAL FABRICS / NON-WOVEN FABRICS

SIKKIM

...w It's n...l, It's nice

Information

Transport Air: Regular flights from Delhi, Calcutta to Bagdogra, the nearest airport, 124 Kms from Gangtok. Onward journey by road – approx. 5 hrs.

Rail: The closest railway stations are Siliguri (114 Kms) and New Jalpaiguri (125 Kms) connecting Calcutta, Delhi and other important Indian Cities.

Road: Gangtok has road links with Darjeeling, Kalimpong, Siliguri and other centres. The Department of Tourism, Government of Sikkim, operates a fleet of cars, jeeps & luxury coaches. Private buses and taxis are also available

Accommodation: The starred hotels at Gangtok are Mayur, Norkhill, Tashi Delek and Tibet. Also several moderately priced comfortable hotels and lodges are available Package Tours: Many package tours are also available.

Best Seasons: Mid-February to May and October to December.

Come to Sikkim and discover a heritage that's ever alive and new. A tradition that's so novel and unique. And a culture that makes you feel nice and warm all over.

Sikkim

the ultimate destination

For further information, Contact:

Gangtok
Tourist Information Centre.
M.G. Marg,
Gangtok-737101, Sikkim
Ph: 2064.

Siliguri
Tourist Information Centre,
SNT Complex, Pradhan Nagar,
Siliguri, West Bengal
Ph.: 24602

Calcutta
Tourist Information Centre,
4C, Poonam, 5/2, Russel Street,
Calcutta - 700017.
Ph.: 297516, 296717, 298983.

Delhi
Sikkim House Annexe,
14, Panchsheel Marg, Chanakyapuri,
New Delhi-110021
Ph : 3015346.

Foreigners welcome to Sikkim, Permission available almost immediately at Indian Embassies abroad, Foreign Registration Offices in India and Sikkim Tourism offices at Delhi, Siliguri and Calcutta.

BAST/G3('90)

CHECKLIST

How the ministers are faring

It has become something of a cliche to say that the Raja heads a non-government. And like most cliches, it is true only in part. Yes, the V.P. Singh regime hasn't established the most impressive track record in the nine months or so since it took over. The law and order situation in the country is perhaps at its worst ever, with the anti-Mandal Commission stir escalating into a full-scale caste war. The Kashmir problem has worsened, with militants having the run of the Valley. Despite the enormous goodwill earned by the Prime Minister's visit to the Golden Temple soon after being sworn in, the Dal frittered away the advantage by failing to take decisive action. Result: the terrorists still call the shots, and the government is ill-put to decide whether Assembly elections in Punjab would be a good move at this juncture. In the north-east, the United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA) is creating its own distinctive brand of havoc, while the Bodoland issue is still far from settled. On the economic front, prices are rising at an ever-increasing rate, and the much talked about oil crunch will only make matters worse. All in all, a pretty depressing scenario.

But, which gives us only half the picture.

For, unbelievable as this may sound, the Raja's durbar has its share of bright sparks. And yes, some work does get done at the highest level of government, even if in only a few departments Contrary to the conventional wisdom on the subject, not every member of the Dal Cabinet is either a cretin or a crook. And some of those who, without a doubt, come into the latter category, are skilled in the art of administration as well.

The V.P. Singh government then, like any other, comprises the good, the bad and the average. (Ratings are made on the basis of administrative efficiency alone; corruption or allegations of corruption have not been taken into account.)

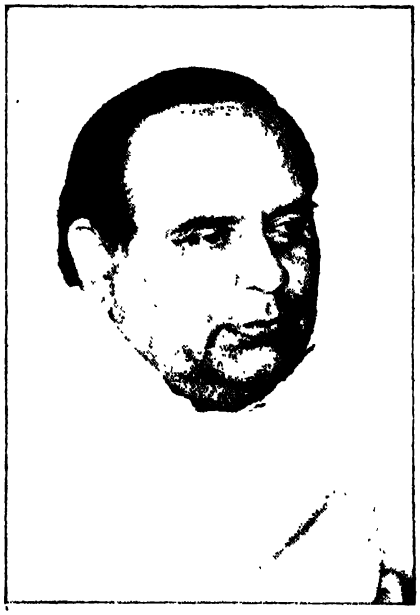
THE GOOD

Somewhat predictably, membership of this group is rather restricted, with no more than four ministers managing to make the grade. All of them have widely varying styles of functioning, but the end result is much the same. Files are cleared in record time, projects aren't held up needlessly and red-tapism is kept at the minimum. And only because the ministers won't have it otherwise.

RAJA'S COURT

Though the V.P. Singh regime hasn't established the most impressive track record in the nine months since it took over, the Raja's durbar has its share of bright sparks

Arun Nehru



The quintessential backroom boss, Nehru is one of the few ministers who has not mixed vendetta with work. As commerce minister, he could have struck terror into the hearts of those who had had occasion to displease him when he was out of power. But Nehru steered clear of such petty politics, and instead, got on with his job. Thus, despite Reliance, paraxylene stayed out of the OGL (open general licence) list, being included in the restricted list.

But Nehru's greatest achievement was in the import-export sector. The commerce minister liberalised procedure sufficiently for prospective exporters to find the going easy. The import of consumer goods was restricted to give indigenous industry a head start. The measures had the desired result: the export-import balance began looking healthy at long last.

Nehru has also clamped down hard on instances of corruption or wrong doing. The minister wound up the directorate of general supplies and disposal only towards this end. With a view to making management more effective and cost-efficient, Nehru created a holding company, Bharat Business International Ltd (BBI), amalgamating MMTC and STC, with the Vegetable Oil Corporation also scheduled to be merged into the group. Earlier, MMTC and STC would export much the same items, but run separate campaigns. Now with their merger, costs on publicity have been halved.

The minister's personal style also counted for much. On taking office, Nehru made it clear that hierarchy didn't count for much where he was concerned. Even a joint secretary could approach him directly if he wanted some things cleared. And no files should be kept pending at his office.

Not that Nehru found the going easy. The Raja never really trusted him and planted his own men in strategic places to keep an eye on the commerce minister. S.P. Shukla was, therefore, appointed secretary, commerce, and S.V.S. Raghavan was made chairman of BBI. But Nehru remained unruffled, and as efficient as ever.

Ajit Singh

He doesn't restrict himself to the industry ministry alone, but functions as de facto adjudicator of disputes—especially those relating to western Uttar Pradesh. Every morning before leaving for office, Ajit Singh meets hundreds of people from that area, all of whom relate their problems—ranging from cow theft to police brutality—to their messiah. And Singh, much the benevolent Jat, takes necessary action. Despite this early morning schedule, and his involvement in the Janata Dal squabbles (sabotaging Devi Lal's rally, dislodging Hukum Singh, etc.) the minister does justice to his work at Udyog Bhavan as well.

The most significant of Ajit Singh's achievements was the adoption of the new industrial policy. Whatever his actual contribution to what was essentially Montek Singh Ahluwalia's brainchild may have been, it goes to Ajit Singh's credit that he stuck to his guns despite the high-powered (Chandra Shekhar etc.) opposition to the scheme.

The industry minister's move to introduce the open tender bid system in awarding Maruti dealerships makes sense as well. Not only will it put an end to rampant corruption, but will also ensure that no one manages to manipulate matters enough to wangle a dealership.

Ajit Singh has used his position as industry minister to make one of Chaudhary Charan Singh's dreams come true, and benefit the sugarcane growers of Uttar Pradesh in the bargain. The minister is now granting licences for the opening of new sugar mills outside a 10-km radius from established mills (the earlier limit was 25 kms). This means that farmers will now be selling their produce in a seller's market and will, therefore, get remunerative prices.

In all this, Ajit Singh manages to play the strongman as well, refusing to allow the Raja to appoint Montek Singh Ahluwalia as secretary, industry.

Madhu Dandavate

The finance minister has his fair share of critics. And the recent row in Parliament over his decision to pay back excise enrichment to the industrialists has had its effect on his image. But there's no denying that Dandavate has brought a sea change in the working of the finance ministry. Among the minister's initiatives is the new system of announcing the budget deficit every four months, instead of springing a surprise on his countrymen every March-April. Dandavate has also altered the tax laws to make them both more effective and more paying. While personal taxation has been simplified, the tax exemption on investment allowance has been discontinued.

(From left) Arun Nehru, Ajit Singh and finance minister Madhu Dandavate going through the budget papers: impressive performance

The finance ministry has come down hard on wasteful expenses, cutting non-plan expenditure and curtailing foreign trips of both ministers and officers. Dandavate has also thought up inventive schemes to get people to put their black money into such worthy projects as slum housing.

While balance of payments is receiving due attention, Dandavate has also subtly changed the role of financial institutions as far as corporate takeovers are concerned.

Not bad going for a nine-month-old minister.

Dinesh Goswami

Despite the emotional resignation at the ULFA's antics, Goswami, who holds the dual portfolios of steel and mines and law, is a cool customer. When S.K. Ahluwalia, the marketing director of the Steel Authority of India (SAIL), managed to wangle an extension, his minister cancelled it the moment he got wind of the scheme.

But Goswami doesn't spend all his time watching over lesser mortals, preferring to concentrate on increasing the steel production of the country. Hence the decision to allow the private sector to produce upto one million tonnes of steel. The biggest blast furnace in India has been commissioned at the Visakhapatnam Steel Plant and the modernisation of the Rourkela plant has been decided upon. With a view to encourage export, steel has been decanalised, and pig iron placed on OGL in the face of its acute shortage in the country.

The licensing policy for the iron and steel sector has been rationalised. For the first time there is no conflict between the steel ministry and SAIL, with Goswami taking a pragmatic approach to coordinate better with its chairman. The minister has taken his share of tough decisions. Among them, the cancelling of the contract awarded to a Japanese company to modernise the Indian Iron and Steel Corporation. Instead, Goswami awarded the contract to different companies in different areas, reducing government expenditure by about 10-12 per cent.

As law minister, one of Goswami's first tasks was to fill the long-pending vacancies of judges in the various high courts and the Supreme Court. Government counsels were also appointed, with the Chief Justice being consulted at every step.

THE BAD

It is impossible—for reasons of space alone—to document all the acts of commission and ommission of those who qualify to this category. For, nearly every second minister of the Dal government could make it to this grade with a little bit of effort—or even a lack of it. But to mention only some prominent offenders.

Mufti Mohammad Sayeed

Political gossip has it that he owes his appointment as home minister to mentor Arun Nehru, who was offered the portfolio and declined, recommending the Mufti's name instead. The Raja, who needed the presence of a Muslim in his Cabinet—especially since he had taken the support of the BJP—was only too willing to oblige.

You can make an old buffer the home minister of India, but you can't necessarily make him perform. And that's exactly what happened with Sayeed. Now popularly known as the

Despite the emotional resignation over the ULFA (right) problem, Union minister of steel and mines and law Dinesh Goswami is a cool customer invisible man of the Cabinet, the Mufti attracted more criticism from both allies and the Opposition than the entire ministry put together.

The trouble began with the kidnapping of his daughter, Rubaiya Sayeed, and her release, obtained by letting some prominent militants off the hook. The Dal government was roundly criticised for what was regarded as the politics of capitulation and, predictably, the distraught father came off worst in this episode.

The Prime Minister hoping to minimise the damage, took Sayeed off Kashmir affairs, assigning it to George Fernandes instead. Fernandes, too, was removed from the post after his rows with Governor Jagmohan, and Kashmir was handed back to the Mufti. The Prime Minister's Office (PMO) now looks after the troubled state, and negotiations have been opened with former chief minister Farooq Abdullah much against Sayeed's wishes.

That's not the only problem the home minister is being kept out of. Punjab and Ayodhya have been handed over to his minister of state, Subodh Kant Sahay, while Ram Vilas Paswan is handling the Bodoland agitation. The north-eastern states have been assigned to Sahay as well, and he reports directly to V.P. Singh. Doordarshan projects Subodh Kant as the de facto home minister and this has, not surprisingly, created problems between the de jure home minister and his deputy.

The Mufti with V.P. Singh in Punjab: the invisible home minister

P. Upendra

His performance as information and broadcasting minister has been a bit of a disaster. What is not so well-known, however, is his abysmal record as minister for parliamentary affairs. But more of that later.

The much-touted programme Khula Manch was perhaps, the biggest nail in Upendra's coffin. Problems began from the very beginning, with one of the 'farmers' in the programme turning out to be a professional actor. A privilege motion was brought against the minister on this issue.

Barely had the dust settled down on that, when controversy erupted afresh. The programme featuring railways minister George Fernandes was censored—edited according to Upendra—and everyone, including the redoubtable George cried foul.

The Prasar Bharati Bill presented a glorious opportunity for the I & B minister to redeem himself somewhat, by granting the much-awaited autonomy to the electronic media. But Upendra threw away this chance as well. The Bill was crafted so clumsily that as many as 67 amendments of the 422 that were moved were initiated by the government itself, on the suggestion of the Opposition. And the Bill changed almost beyond recognition, by the time it got through the Rajya Sabha.

The quality of the fare Doordarshan offers has also led to a fair amount of flak. Serials are becoming more and more unwatchable, while Upendra telecasts films with his Telugu Desam boss N.T. Rama Rao in the lead, and projects such buddies as Ram Vilas Paswan, I.K. Gujral and Prime Minister V.P. Singh on the national network. Those bureaucrats who refuse to fall in line—both in Doordarshan and All India Radio—have been shifted out before you can say 'idiot box'.

As minister for parliamentary affairs, Upendra's first failure was his inability to muster enough support for the Constitutional Amendment Bill which would extend Presidnet's Rule in Punjab. And only because Upendra failed to inform his party MPs and ministers well in advance. When the Bill came up for voting as many as 12 Dal ministers were absent from the House. The Bill eventually went through because the Congress(I) chose to act magnanimous.

Much the same scenario was repeated in the case of another Amendment Bill on the extension of reservations for scheduled castes and tribes. In this instance, however, the embarrassment of the government was much worse when the Bill was presented, it led to heated exchanges between Ram Dhan and Ram Vilas Paswan. Upendra, it was felt, should have been able to anticipate this and take preventive measures.

Upendra also managed to annoy the BJP while he was at it. The Delhi Statehood Bill, which the BJP had set its heart on, was introduced in the House towards the fag end of the budget session, thus ensuring that it could never be passed. Advani was not amused.

Even the everyday business of the House is carried out less than smoothly. Members complain that printed material is not made available to them on time and that Upendra doesn't bother to maintain cordial relations with the Opposition.

His much-publicised skill at public relations, notwithstanding.

M.S. Gurupadaswami

His performance as a Rajya Sabha member over the last six years had led people to expect that he would prove to be a competent minister. That promise was however, belied. And the Raja was forced to appoint Bhajamana Behara as minister of state, to ensure that things didn't deteriorate beyond repair in the petroleum ministry.

Gurupada sami's incompetence was fully exposed during the recent oil crisis following the Gulf war. The minister failed to get the finance ministry to release foreign exchange in time to buy oil in the open market, or even organise additional supplies from such countries as Indonesia, Saudi Arabia and Bahrain. His worst moment came when the Raja despatched Arif Mohammad Khan to the Middle East to negotiate for additional supplies of oil, over his head. I.K. Gujral was despatched to Moscow on much the same errand. Both ministers had conspicuous success at their tasks, much to Gurupadaswami's chagrin.

Not content with mere mismanagement, the minister also managed to create a minor crisis by informing the press that the country's oil reserves would last only for another four weeks. Panic set in as people began hoarding petrol, and premiums were paid on oil. In the end, the Prime Minister had to intervene and make clear that the situation was well within control,

The minister then concentrated on thinking up schemes to cut down the country's petrol consumption. Among his proposals was the one which had petrol pumps closing down on Sunday and ministers refraining from using government cars on holidays. Needless to add, the proposals never achieve the object they were meant to.

Gurupadaswami proved to be a dismal negotiator as well. Not only did he fail at getting the Assam oil blockade called off, despite the fact that the Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) was one of the National Front partners. Because of the minister's bad public relations the Essential Services Maintenance Act (ESMA) had to be called into effect in the dealings with the oil sector.

In his incarnation as chemicals minister, too, Gurupadaswami didn't do any better. Prices of essential drugs have increased by 20 to 25 per cent, while the policy has been changed to allow multinationals to import drugs which can easily be manufactured in India, causing heavy loss to such Indian manufacturers as IDPL.

Not surprisingly then, the country's drug manufacturers have turned against the minister, and are even threatening to go on strike if things don't improve dramatically. And fast.

Nathu Ram Mirdha

Basically a player of state-level politics, he is clearly out of depth in his role as Cabinet minister of the Government of India. His naivete often lands him in big trouble, and V.P. Singh is taking no chances with him, assigning all the major work to the minister of state, food and civil supplies, Ram Pujan Patel.

The rush for petrol: Gurupadaswami's schemes backfired

Maneka : her boss spent more time quarrelling with her

Nilamani Routray

Not only did the environment minister fail to make much impact in the green movement, he spent all his time fighting his doughty minister or state, Maneka Gandhi, with some help from secretary Mahesh Prasad.

Today, while the state of environment remains much the same, Routray rows with Maneka over who gets to use the ministry aircraft. Documents are leaked to the press as the two antagonists gear up to fight a battle, which gets more embittered with every passing day (see SUNDAY, issue dated 26 August—1 September 1990).

Leaving Routray with little energy to address himself to the task of administration.

Mirdha's ministry has the responsibility of keeping the prices of essential commodities down. And it is no secret that it has failed dismally in this regard. Over the last six months the consumer price index has gone up from 860 to 912, with such items as edible oils and grains showing a hike. Rice is no longer available in ration shops, with the ministry failing to arrange transport from Haryana.

The minister's ineffectiveness was brought to the fore by his inability to get the new sugar policy, initiated by Ajit Singh, discontinued, despite his strong opposition to it. To make matters worse, the price of cement didn't come down despite Mirdha's new cement policy.

THE AVERAGE

This category doesn't comprise plodders alone. Some of the ministers dubbed as average have done some good work in their departments, displaying both initiative and flair, but have failed to turn in impressive performances, either because of certain constraints that operate on them, or because of their unwillingness to change their style of functioning.

Arif Mohammad Khan

As energy minister, he has several good schemes to his credit, among them the plan to induct the private sector in the task of power generation, thus saving public sector money to the tune of Rs 20,000 crores, which would otherwise be invested in new power plants. Unfortunately, the scheme has failed at the operational stage, with no private sector firm offering to put up money for the task in hand.

It is his additional charge—civil aviation—which is creating problems for Arif. During his tenure, all three carriers—Air India, Indian Airlines and Vayudoot—are in bad shape. Rajan Jetley, who had turned Air India around, has left for more lucrative pastures and what with the sorties to evacuate those trapped in the Gulf, the airline's bottom line is no longer quite so impressive. Harsh Vardhan, the Vayudoot MD, too, has quit.

The strange saga of the A320s, now doing service in the Gulf, hasn't done much good to Khan's image either. Afer announcing with due fanfare that the aircraft would be reinducted and taking a press party for a joy ride, the minister was forced to retract. There is some talk of the planes being reintroduced soon but Arif's credibility has already taken a knocking. So, despite his success in energy, Arif Mohammad Khan, in the final reckoning, comes across as a middling performer.

George Fernandes

The Konkan Railway project is, perhaps, George's greatest achievement in the railways ministry. A revolutionary concept, it has various state governments pooling in their resources, with some help from the banks, to fund a new rail line from Bombay to Kerala. Two other projects on the same lines are envisaged. Once dependence on central government funds is reduced, work will progress much faster, and it is hoped that the schemes will reach completion in record time.

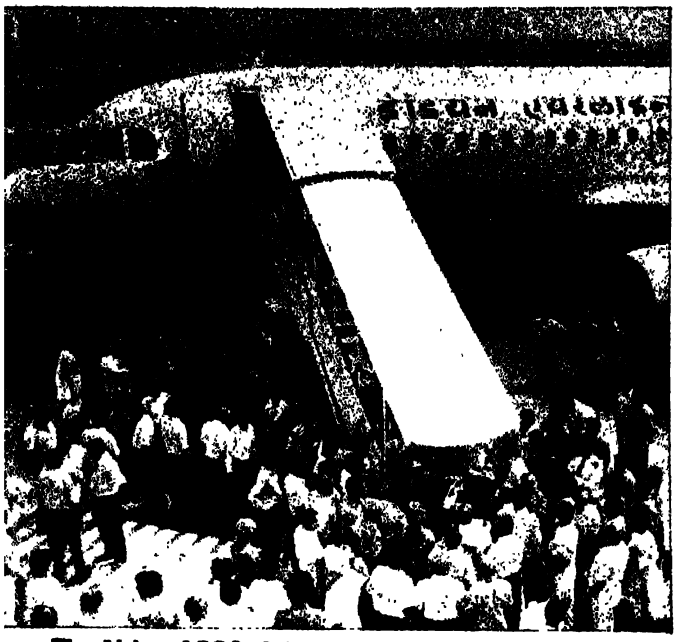
Nevertheless, Fernandes' track record doesn't look too good when compared to that of his predecessor, Madhavrao Scindia. The charitable explanation, of course, is that George never wanted to be saddled with railways, preferring some other substantial portfolio such as industry. And, therefore, he doesn't always concentrate on ministry work.

And going by his pronouncements on Pepsi, reservations and the Kashmir situation—and not just on Khuda Manch—there could be some truth in that version.

Pro-reservation rally in Delhi: Paswan jumped on to the Mandal bandwagon

K.P. Unnikrishnan

As communications minister, he had kept himself in the news, thanks to his long and often bitter rows with the C-DoT chief, Sam Pitroda. But now that Unnikrishnan is just entrusted with surface transport (despite the fancy tag of Cabinet minister), he's fading from public memory.



But to be fair, he does his job to the best of his ability. And while that may not lead to excellent results, it doesn't make for disaster either.

Sharad Yadav

He began his innings as minister by rooting for the nutritional qualities of panjiri, the health food favoured by rural women during pregnancy. But Yadav's performance as textile minister has been far

During Arif Khan's tenure, all three carriers—Air India, Indian Airlines and Vayudoot—are in bad shape. Rajan Jetley has left Air India and Harsh Vardhan, Vayudoot chief, too, has quit from satisfactory.

The Airbus A320: Arif's concern

His operational style is brilliant in its simplicity. He instructs his officials not to do anything against the "common man", and then steers clear of his ministry. The bureaucrats, of course, love him for his "non-interference", but it doesn't make for efficient functioning of the department.

But Yadav has his reasons for what appears as his indifference. Basically a political animal, he would much rather spend time trying to sort out the various squabbles of the Dal. And now that he has established himself as the unofficial adviser of V.P. Singh, his interest in textiles has flagged even further.

Indians returning from Iraq and Kuwait: Gujral's trip to the Gulf didn't help

To become totally non-existent with the implementation of the Mandal Commission's recommendations, Yadav now restricts himself to defending the Raja's quota raj and addresses pro-reservation rallies in his spare time.

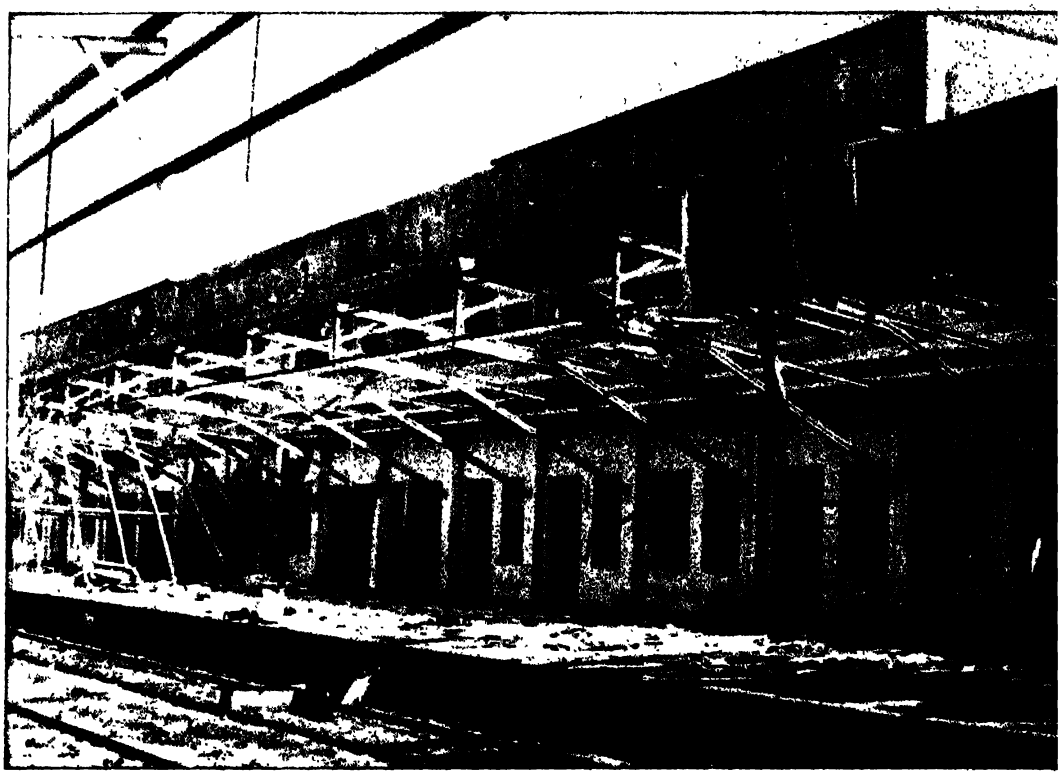
Ram Vilas Paswan

He may be a lowly labour and welfare minister, but you'd never guess that, going by the number of appearances he makes on television. At heart, however, Ram Vilas Paswan remains a populist politician. And, therefore, spends more time implementing welfare measures, rather than getting the country's labour problem in hand. (Though he admits, under pressure, that there are quite a few votes to be had here as well.)

Paswan's big chance came with the Mandal Commission report. The Prime Minister implemented its recommendations, hoping to garner the backward votes the next time he went to the polls. And Paswan jumped on to the Mandal bandwagon, addressing his fellow-backwards at a rally to exhort them not to give in to the upper castes. It was only when party higher-ups intervened that the labour minister toned down his rhetoric.

Nonetheless, there's no doubting his skills at demagoguery. Though, his performance as minister can only be rated as average.

I.K. Gujral



He started off as a high-profile, all-purpose man, who advised the Prime Minister on every issue, ranging from Punjab, Kashmir and Ram Janmabhoomi. But over the months, the Raja seems to have lost use for him and Gujral now restricts himself strictly to external affairs.

He is conservative enough to toe the foreign ministry's line on most issues. But nevertheless manages to get involved in the odd controversy. His trip to the Gulf, for instance, didn't go too well, with allegations making the rounds that Gujral was busy evacuating the prosperous Punjabi community, while the poor Keralites underwent great hardships in the refugee camps.

That's how they rate then: the good, the bad and the average. The assessment is, of course, true only at a point in time. For just as Gujral's personal rating has come down and Arun Nehru's gone up after the Dal government's first nine months in office, others may well move up and down the scale as well. Critics of the Raja's regime, of course, have it, that given the atmosphere that prevails in the corridors of power these days, the performance of the ministers can only deteriorate. And with talk of a mid-term poll doing the rounds, and the Prime Minister going in for populist gestures, the ministers are bound to lose interest in governance, to concentrate instead on nursing their constituencies.

For, as every politico worth his khadi kurta knows, ministerial competence counts for nothing if you lose your seat in the bargain. ●

Rajiv Shukla/New Delhi

THE DESTRUCTION: Jaffna railway station was heavily bombed a while ago. Among the other public buildings destroyed are the general hospital and the power substation at Chunnakam

The siege of Jaffna

The push for the peninsula—an on-the-spot report

With the battle between the Sri Lankan government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) having intensified in the north, Jaffna peninsula is virtually cut off from the rest of the island. Journalists are no longer allowed to officially visit the north—the Sri Lankan government only issues passes "at your own risk" up to Vavuniya, which lies some 100 kilometres south of Jaffna town.

SUNDAY's Mukund Padmanabhan however made it to Jaffna—a journey which meant taking a circuitous forest route through dirt track (the main road into the peninsula being heavily mined by the Tigers) and, finally, a midnight boat ride. His report:

■ Nageswari Rasappa sobs uncontrollably in a corner of her garden. Her spacious house in Jaffna's Annachathira Road is a sorry mangle of concrete, steel and glass. When Nageswari heard the bomber the previous night, she had 'hidden' in the bathroom, clasping her scared 21-year-old daughter Chitra close to her.

But the bomb—300 kilos of it—ripped her house and five of her neighbours' to shreds. The shrapnel killed Chitra—who recently graduated from a college in Tamil Nadu—even as Nageswari was hugging and comforting her. Dead also was Nageswari's husband, a rice mill owner.

By a stroke of providence, Nageswari escaped with minor injuries to her head and foot. "You call me lucky?" she wails, "What is the use of life without my family?"

■ Nearby, a bomb has just landed bang in the middle of Arasadi Road. The residents on the street have been fortunate, escaping with minor or middling injuries. But two passers-by—a man and his daughter—on a bicycle have been blown beyond recognition.

As the residents take what is left of them for cremation, some collect pieces of flesh that are scattered around the area. These are then burnt with coconut fronds on the road.

■ A few kilometres away, in Manipay Hospital, the wards are full of victims of aerial attacks. The lucky have gotten away with broken bones and bullet wounds; the not so lucky have had their limbs amputated.

K. Jayaraman, a young worker at a cement factory in Kankesanthurai, acquired his injury in a different manner. He was at Kayts island when the Sri Lankan Army overran it. Jayaraman, who was captured by the soldiers, was asked to show them the way around the island. "They kept me in detention for a while along with some others. But before they let me go, one of the soldiers was asked to slash my neck with a large knife."

Jayaraman thinks he has a lot to be thankful for. "I saw them kick one man to death," he says. "At least, I survived."

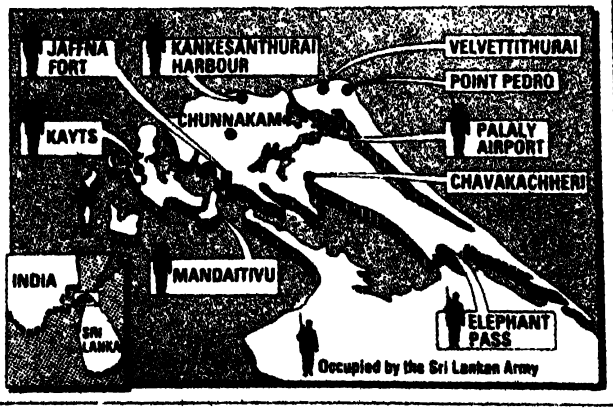
■ South of the Jaffna peninsula, a couple board a privately operated bus

THE LTTE: The Tigers are visible everywhere in Jaffna peninsula. Even though many of them are barely 12, they are as capable as any professional soldier.

in Vavuniya. They are headed for their home in Madhu, a two-and-a-half-hour journey on dirt track.

Along with them is their young daughter, who is 'sleeping' on their laps. On the face of it, this may not appear unusual—except that the girl is dead. She had been bitten by a dog and succumbed to rabies after treatment at the Vavuniya hospital failed.

There is no other way the couple can take the body of their daughter home. Taxis are unavailable—the cost of fuel is exorbitant and nobody wants to risk the journey as the main arteries out of the town are heavily mined. Fortunately, the bus driver is moved by their plight and allows them on.



What can you say about a place where the primary concern is where the next bomb will land? Where funeral processions duck for cover at the approach of helicopter gunships? Where the people have stripped the railway tracks bare in order to build bunkers? Where neither electricity nor water has been supplied for over three months? Where nothing works: whether telephones, banks, post offices or hotels? Where petty shopkeepers bicycle 70 miles or more to stock their stores with basic foodstuffs? Where virtually everything—when available—is at least twice as expensive as it should be? Where there is nothing by way of public transport and petrol and diesel cost ten times more than they should?

How do you describe the situation in Jaffna today? Clearly, none of the conventional descriptions fits. 'Ethnic crisis' is laughably inappropriate and even 'civil war' appears woefully weak. Perhaps, retired government official P.S. Sivaraja, whose son was injured by a bomb blast, sums it up best. "It is a living hell," he says. Adding, "That is, for those of us who are alive."

As the war between the Sri Lankan government and the LTTE enters its fourth month, the focus of attention is understandably the Jaffna peninsula, the traditional stronghold of the Tigers. With Colombo's armed forces having wrested control of almost every major town in the island's Tamil-dominated north and east, the outcome of the battle of Jaffna is likely to be crucial in determining the fate of the war. While the LTTE holds total sway over most of the peninsula, the armed forces are in occupation of a

The Jaffna Peninsula

■ The Sri Lankan Army is in control of a few crucial points in the peninsula. But the LTTE has the run of most of it. Now that the army has broken the siege of Jaffna Fort, the attempt to flush the LTTE out may begin in right earnest.

Map by Niranjan Maity few crucial points: the airfield at Palaly, the harbour at Kankesanthurai and the islands of Mandaitivu and Kayts (both close to the coastline). The military also controls Jaffna Fort, the siege of which was broken late last week.

The LTTE, which has entrenched itself deeply in the peninsula, is determined not to give it up. Says Anton Balasingham, the organisation's theoretician and official spokesman: "The loss of Jaffna will—admittedly—be a psychological blow. And we will do everything we can to keep it." Adds the LTTE's high-ranking Yogaratnam Yogi: "The Sri Lankan Army will lose a great deal of men if they attempt to occupy the peninsula. If they try to, they will understand why a military solution will not succeed." With Colombo just as keen on 'ridding the Tigers of their lair', Jaffna may have yet to see the worst.

For the ordinary civilian, this is an unimaginable prospect. Already, Jaffna reverberates to the dull drone of planes, the booming of bombs and artillery and the busy chatter of helicopter gunships. For the most part, this is a war that is being fought from the air and from afar. With the risk of engaging the formidable Tiger army in close combat being too great, the Sri Lankan armed forces have resorted to fighting what is largely a long-distance war.

The use of the air force—which comprises a motley collection of antiquated planes—to lead the offensive is a decision that the people have paid for dearly. Day and night, the aircrafts, which take off for sorties from Palaly airfield, pound Tiger bunkers and hideouts around Jaffna Fort—an area which has been completely vacated by the people.

The extent of the destruction is sizeable. Among the buildings bombed are:

- Scores of shops, offices and houses around the Jaffna Fort area where the Tigers have dug themselves in.
- The Jaffna Memorial Hospital, which has now moved to occupy a ward at the Manipay Hospital.
- The Jaffna railway station, which was hit by a number of bombs.
- The Tirunveli market.
- The power substation—an attack which plunged the whole peninsula into darkness.
- Sundry houses—like Nageswari Rasappa's—which are a couple of kilometres away from the fort area.

Most of the damage has been caused by the Chinese-made Y-8s and Y-12s, large transport planes that are usually used to move men and equipment. If these slow lumbering aircrafts are the most dangerous, it is because they carry the largest explosives—250-300 kilo barrel bombs (known as pipas locally) which are rolled out of the hatch. The air force also uses Avros and Italian-made Sia Marchettis, which are fitted with rocket mortars and machine guns.

About one month ago, the people were also subjected for a week to what they call 'shit-bomb-attack'. Barrels containing what was suspected to be human faeces were rolled off aircrafts and made Jaffna, in the words of a resident, "smell like one huge lavatory". Although the bombs didn't cause any damage, they managed to create a panic in a town that is already gripped by fear.

Recalls the LTTE's Balasingham, "I cannot say for certain what the bombs contained but the substance, which caused a terrible smell, began to develop a fungus-like growth on it. Many people feared that they were being subject to some kind of biological warfare. The 'shit' was sent for testing but all that was discovered was that it contained cholera germs."

But from day to day, the people have most cause to worry about the helicopters. The choppers—fitted with Browning machine guns—are a common sight over the peninsula. The approach of one is invariably met with cries of "heli!" as everyone out in the open runs for cover

If the 'helis' are so dangerous it is because anyone out on the street is a legitimate target. For the most part of this three-month long war, Jaffna has been under curfew. "This means people are expected to stay at home," says a Colombo-based brigadier. "We act from the presumption that all those outside—particularly people in vehicles—are members of the LTTE." The curfew, apparently, even extends to the marketplace. On 28 August, a chopper attacked the market at Nelliady, which is miles away from Jaffna Fort, with rocket mortars and machine gun fire. Recalls R. Sarvanangam, a farmer from the Vadamarachchi area

CIVILIAN CASUALTIES: The bomb that ripped Nageswari Rasappa's Jaffna house apart, killed her husband and her 21-year-old daughter even as Nageswari was hugging and comforting her.

GRAVE CHARGES: According to the LTTE's deputy leader Mahatayya, the armed forces are intentionally killing civilians. "What you're seeing here is simply genocide," he says.

who is being treated for an ugly leg wound at Manipay Hospital: "I was shopping for vegetables when I heard the sound of the heli. Suddenly, there was firing and commotion all around." Sarvanangam counts himself lucky. His estimate of the toll in that incident: nine dead and about 30—many badly—injured.

If this kind of incident continues to happen, the Tigers will be able to win—at least—the propaganda war. Says Mahatayya, the LTTE supremo V. Prabhakaran's deputy, who oversees the military operations: "What is happening here is a genocide of the Tamil people. At least 4,000 innocent people have been killed since the hostilities broke out on 11 June." It is a view that is shared by many ordinary people in Jaffna. Says retired government official S.P. Sivaraja: "They are bombing us at random. Their main purpose is to destroy the Tamil race."

The Sri Lankan government does not deny that there have been civilian casualties. But claims—although no estimates have been provided—that these have been minimal. In defence of the sloppy and haphazard bombing, Colombo says that its air force is not sophisticated enough to be always accurate. Says a Colombo-based brigadier: "Even the Americans—despite having all the electronic gadgetry—often missed their targets in Vietnam. How do you expect us to fare with bombs that are simply dropped off planes?" Speaking to SUNDAY, Sri Lanka's minister of state for defence Ranjan Wijeratne echoed a similar sentiment: "We can't always be accurate because we don't have guided missiles. So, you can't blame the pilots." (See interview)

The problem with these explanations is that locations far away from Tiger camps have been destroyed, that Jaffna is being bombed at night (when accuracy is an even bigger problem) and that helicopters are used to hit just about any moving target. To be fair, Jaffna may not be the unrecognisable rubble the LTTE says it has been reduced to. But, at the same time, Wijeratne's account of the destruction of civilian property—"Occasionally, there is a bomb falling here and there"—is, to say the least, an understatement.

In the island's south, the bombing has met with considerable support. By and large, educated middle-class Sinhalese believe that if the 'Tiger menace' is to be wiped out, then there must be nothing that is allowed to come in the way of the military operations. This is quite unlike 1987, when opinion was divided on the measures the Sri Lankan armed forces took when fighting the Tamil militants. Says a Colombo-based housewife: "It's now or never. This problem has plagued the country long enough."

Even Sinhalese politicians appear to have taken note of this sentiment. Last fortnight, when Opposition leader and former Prime Minister Sirimavo Bandaranaike expressed concern over the suffering the bombing had caused to the Tamils, she was met with howls of protest. The newspapers simply tore her to shreds: accusing her of hypocrisy, politicking and interfering with the operations of the armed forces. A chastised Bandaranaike is supposed to have privately assured President Premadasa that she will refrain from making the bombing an issue.

One consequence of the war is the refugee problem, which has already reached unprecedented dimensions. It is estimated that two lakh people have left the Jaffna peninsula for Tamil Nadu. This is only a small percentage of the total number who have fled their homes—to refugee camps in the south—from the island's north and east. In the Jaffna peninsula, the LTTE—although it does not admit it—appears to be against the refugee traffic. Residents say that every family that wishes to leave the peninsula is levied a charge of two gold sovereigns by the Tigers. The disincentive is probably meant at preventing a mass exodus. For if this happens, then the LTTE will be easily identifiable and no longer have civilians as a buffer against army operations.

The virtual isolation of the Jaffna peninsula had led to an incredible spurt in prices. Basic foodstuffs are available (the reports of starvation being a great exaggeration) but supplies are limited and depend on how much petty shopkeepers can procure from the southern regions. A journey which involves a trip by boat (arranged by the LTTE) and then on bicycle—sometimes for 70 miles

As for petrol and diesel, which the LTTE sorely need, they sell for about REFUGEE TRAFFIC: Thousands of people flee the island's north and east every day. Some take boats for Tamil Nadu; others choose to go to refugee camps in Sri Lanka's south.

TORTURE ALLEGATION: Cement factory worker K. Jayaraman, who was captured by the army, says the soldiers slit his throat before letting him go. He thinks he's lucky to be alive.

"We want more autonomy"

The LTTE's Anton Balasingham says that the Tigers are still willing to negotiate

The LTTE's ideologue and theoretician Anton Balasingham is regarded as the intellectual face of the LTTE. The former student of London's Goldsmith College is an old associate of Tiger supremo V. Prabhakaran and one of the top four leaders of the organisation.

SUNDAY met him at an undisclosed location in the Vadamarachchi region of the Jaffna peninsula. Excerpts from an interview.

SUNDAY: Is the LTTE prepared to negotiate once again with the Sri Lankan government?
Anton Balasingham: This is up to the Sri Lankan government. But, as you know, it has been making repeated statements that there should be no talks until the Tigers are wiped out.

Q: But what is your position? Would you be willing to negotiate if the government was prepared for unconditional talks?
A: If they offer unconditional talks, then we are prepared.

Q: Then the LTTE is still prepared to work within a unified Sri Lanka?
A: If Sri Lanka is prepared to offer substantial regional autonomy to our people, then we are prepared to accept it. The unitary features of the Sri Lankan Constitution, however, should go. If the government is not willing to concede this, then we have no option but to fight for an independent state.

Q: But what does substantial autonomy really mean? Would the degree of federalism that exists, say, in India be acceptable?
A: Well, there is some amount of federalism in India. But in India many people, as you know, are demanding more autonomy. As for us, we haven't yet worked out the details, but we would like more autonomy than what is provided for in the Indian Constitution.

Q: Why are you dissatisfied with New Delhi's response to the present situation?
A: We are disappointed with the Government of India on the grounds that it is keeping quiet when there is large-scale killing of civilians, apart from expressing its concern. It has not criticised or condemned these killings which are a genocide of the Tamil people.

The LTTE is opposed to Indian military intervention. But as a regional superpower, India can intervene diplomatically and stop the killing of innocent civilians.

We are also disappointed at the suggestion that permanent refugee camps should be set up in Sri Lanka. We think that the Indian government should persuade the Sri Lankan government to create conditions so that the people can go back and live in their villages and towns. Permanent camps will not solve the problem. Our people are opposed to camps which are under the administrative control of the Sri Lankan Army.

"If Sri Lanka is willing to offer substantial regional autonomy, we are prepared to accept it"

Rs 250 and Rs 180 a litre (one Indian rupee equals two Sri Lankan)—about ten times the price in Colombo. Kerosene goes for Rs 160 a bottle (everyone uses firewood for cooking), candles for Rs ten and a box of matches for Rs 3.50. All of these are in even greater demand given the lack of electricity.

The shortage of food and other essentials has generated controversy. Colombo says that the LTTE is preventing supplies from reaching the peninsula. The Tigers deny this ("Who would want to starve their own people?" asks Balasingham) and accuse the Sri Lankan government of trying to starve the people out. Says the LTTE's Yogi: "What we are witnessing is a calculated economic blockade of the peninsula."

One happy result of the blockade according to Yogi is the realisation that the north need not be dependent on the south. "The people now know that we can get along on our own—never mind the lack of electricity, food or communications," he says.

A noticeable attempt in the quest for self-sufficiency is the ban on the sale of cigarettes—which are manufactured only in the south. The Tigers levy a fine of Rs 5,000 on any shopkeeper who is caught selling them. Those caught smoking have to cough up Rs 500. "The taxes on cigarette sales go to Colombo. Why should we pay them to enjoy what is clearly a luxury at this time," asks Balasingham.

As one Jaffna resident points out sarcastically, there is at least one more reason for giving up the habit: "Who wants to light up when all of Jaffna is going up in smoke?" ●

PHOTOGRAPHS: MUKUND PADMANABHAN

"I will never trust the LTTE"

Sri Lanka's defence minister RANJAN WIJERATNE on the battle with the Tigers

INTERVIEWED BY MUKUND PADMANABHAN

To his detractors, Sri Lanka's minister of state for defence, Ranjan Wijeratne, is a rude, abrasive man, ill-suited for the delicacies of politics. "He seems to think that running a country is like running a tea estate," says a United National Party (UNP) colleague of the former planter's blunt and managerial approach to the nation's problems.

Those who know him, however, claim that while often direct and outspoken, Wijeratne makes a refreshing change from the average politician. "He lacks the guile and hypocrisy that is shared by people in this profession," says a Cabinet colleague. "He is essentially honest and trustworthy."

Whatever the truth, Wijeratne's rise in the island's politics has been extraordinary since former President J.R. Jayewardene persuaded him to leave the plantations a few years ago. His ruthless campaign which crushed the extremist Janata Vimukthi Peramuna (JVP) last year has won him many admirers in the country's south. It is difficult to say whether he will be as successful against the LTTE. But today, Wijeratne is arguably the most important member in the government after President R. Premadasa. And many believe that the former planter may even become President in the future.

SUNDAY met Wijeratne a few days before the Sri Lankan Army broke the siege around Jaffna fort Excerpts from the interview:

SUNDAY: How far has the army advanced since hostilities broke out on 11 June?
Ranjan Wijeratne: Well, we have taken over the three districts of the Eastern Province. We have parked ourselves in Mannar, Vavuniya, Mullaitivu, Paranthan, Elephant Pass, Jaffna Fort, Palaly Airport, Kankesanthurai Harbour and the Kayts and Mandaitivu islands. So, we have done a great deal of work in two and a half months.

Q: A lot of media attention has been focussed on the siege of Jaffna Fort. Why has it taken the army so long to break it?
A: The fort is ours. We have 200 men there. It is the surrounding areas that are with the LTTE. At the moment, we have other priorities.

Q: The current operations in Mullaitivu?
A: In the whole Eastern Province. But the area surrounding the fort will be taken now that we are in Mandaitivu (island).

Q: One gets the impression that you are conducting only a holding and softening operation. Are there any plans to take over the peninsula soon?
A: It is not a question of taking over. The whole island belongs to Sri Lanka. It is a question of getting rid of the LTTE in the Jaffna peninsula.

Q: That means occupying the peninsula doesn't it?
A: You can assume so. But I can't reveal my strategies. I can't tell you how I am going to do it.

Q: But are you strong enough to wipe the Tigers out? After all 70,000 Indian soldiers with modern weapons failed to do so.
A: I don't think the Indian soldiers were allowed to capture the LTTE terrorists. The Indian Army is the fourth largest in the world and had 1,00,000 soldiers in Sri Lanka. We can't believe that they could not vanquish the LTTE. (Even) the Indian press was critical of interference.

Q: That is, the army was not really serious. They were asked not to go all out?
A: There was interference. As I said in Parliament, the Indian Army captured (LTTE leader) Prabhakaran four times and RAW got him released.

Q: You had said that an IPKF general told you this. Will you say who he was?
A: A general without four fingers on one hand. Maybe, he wasn't a general...perhaps, a brigadier or some other senior-ranking officer.

Q: Do you attribute the failure of the IPKF to "interference"? After all, it was in Sri Lanka a long time, lost a lot of men...
A: One Sri Lankan soldier is equal to ten Indian soldiers. There is dedication on our part. (The) Indians didn't come here to fight Tamils.

Q: There was another objective?
A: That you must ask the Indian government. I should not speculate. We must have good relations with India. I must not jeopardise them by making statements that are prejudicial to our interests.

Q: Why did the truce between the government and the LTTE break down?
A: We were absolutely sincere. After all, we were talking to our countrymen. And when you talk to a person, you talk with mutual trust and confidence. We showed such sincerity that our own people became critical of us. They said we were naive. But we weren't. We wanted to solve a problem that had been festering for 30-odd years.

We were in the process of dissolving the provincial council of the north and east which had become defunct with Mr Perumal's UDI (unilateral declaration of independence) and later his vanishing. The LTTE had urged us to do so to allow them to enter the democratic process. When we were in the process of enacting laws to dissolve the council, the LTTE stabbed us in the back.

Q: Why?
A: Perhaps, they were not ready for elections. When things were beginning to happen during the discussions, they got cold feet. And then, they may have thought that we were not that sincere—that we did not mean what we said. But we really did.

Q: So they were never serious about joining the democratic process?
A: Well, they proved that by unilaterally attacking the Sri Lankan armed forces.

Q: Isn't it rather odd that while you are now describing the Tigers as fascists, you were defending them three months ago? You were willing to let them retain their arms. You allowed them to levy taxes. And you turned a blind eye to a number of other activities.
A: When we asked them about the arms, they said they needed them because the illegal TNA (Tamil National Army) had weapons. That although they promised to lay down arms when the IPKF withdrew, it had left after settling an illegal Tamil army in its place. That they needed weapons to face up to the onslaught of the TNA. And the TNA was there. The LTTE proved that by killing 140 TNA cadres and collecting two trailer loads of arms. They proved it was an illegal army planted by Perumal and the IPKF.

MUKUND PADMANABHAN

As for the question of extorting money from the Tamil people, they said we are only taking voluntary contributions from our friends.

Q: And you believed that?
A: We had to. Because they were discussing with us, we couldn't say, "You are lying." The moment we did that we would have had to break negotiations. We accepted their arguments even though there were some doubts. We were prepared to go along, thinking they would fall in line. But now we know that they had been preparing for war.

Q: But isn't the government embarrassed at all for having landed up fighting the organisation it absolved of so much?
A: It is not a question of having landed up. It is a question of talking to your countrymen who had been fighting for a cause.

As far as I am concerned, I defended the LTTE because—at that point—they were talking to us. I defended them in Parliament and in the press because I didn't want any remarks made that would jeopardise our talks. I am frank about this.

But the moment they stabbed us in the back, I couldn't keep quiet. I had to attack them.

Q: What about the indiscriminate bombing in and around Jaffna?
A: There's no indiscriminate bombing. We go by

MUKUND PADMANABHAN

"There is no indiscriminate bombing in Jaffna. We are going for the leaders... Occasionally, there is a bomb falling here and there. We can't always be accurate" intelligence reports. We are going for the leaders and they hide in the buildings and so we go for them. Ocassionally, there is a bomb falling here and there. We can't always be accurate because we don't have guided missiles. So you can't blame the pilots.

Q: Do you have an estimate of the number of civilians killed?
A: I don't.

Q: A lot?
A: No. My reports are that civilians go into bunkers when they hear a plane or helicopter coming. And then, most of them have vacated the Jaffna town area.

Q: Would you accept Indian mediation in resolving this dispute?
A: It is a question of India having been involved in this earlier. Mediation has to be international—that is what our President has been saying. It should not be left to India alone.

We would like India's advice, but as for the question of Indian mediation, I cannot speak for the President. I don't know whether he will accept it or not. But my thinking is that if there is Indian mediation, there should be no refugees allowed to come to India from Sri Lanka. There should be no arms allowed to come to Sri Lanka from India. And the LTTE should be asked to get out of India. Not otherwise.

Q: Is the LTTE smuggling arms from India? Does Sri Lankan intelligence have concrete evidence of this?
A: Yes, they are. We have captured them, we have shot them in the high seas while bringing in mortars, automatics and so on.

Q: As you know, there has been a lot of criticism in India over the government's hands-off attitude to the situation in Sri Lanka. Do you think India may be forced to intervene?
A: (Angrily) How about what's happening in Kashmir? What is this double talk? You're killing Kashmiris and there is genocide there. And you're talking about genocide in Sri Lanka.

Have one standard. Daily, 50 to 60 Kashmiris are being killed by Indian soldiers. And you're talking about genocide in Sri Lanka?

Q: So you think any concern expressed for the plight of the Tamils in Sri Lanka amounts to hypocrisy?
A: Of course. Double standards. All over the world this is happening. All over the world, they're trying to dictate terms to little Sri Lanka because we are vulnerable economically as well as strategically The Sri Lankan nation is not going to put up with this. We've had enough.

Q: Of arm-twisting by India?
A: We won't accept it. If we have to die fighting, we will die fighting.

Q: Do you think the India-Sri Lanka accord was a mistake?
A: Well, square one minus.

Q: In other words, it took you back?
A: Yes, far back.

Q: How do you assess Karunanidhi's a role in the present situation?
A: I don't want to talk about Karunanidhi's politics. When I met him, he asked me, "How can you stop these refugees from coming to Tamil Nadu?" I said, 'Your Excellency, don't make this (Tamil Nadu) a heaven for refugees. You tell them, "If you fight in Sri Lanka, stick in Sri Lanka'." I think he took my advice and made a statement at one stage that he would not allow any Sri Lankan Tamils to come to Tamil Nadu. But he has gone back on that statement and has allowed the LTTE to park themselves there.

The other militant groups are frightened to come to Tamil Nadu because of the partisanship shown to the LTTE, who will kill them. The police don't take any notice I hear.

Q: Would you agree to hold unconditional talks with the LTTE?
A: No.

Q: Why not? After all, the basis on which it agreed to talk the last time round was your offer for unconditional negotiations.
A: Yes, but they have stabbed us in the back. And one stabbing is enough. I don't go in for second stabbings. I don't trust them one bit.

Q: Does this mean you will never trust them?
A: Never. I never trust terrorists—whether Sinhala, Muslim or Tamil. ●

The marathon man

It is time Farooq Abdullah stopped running—away

You have got to hand it to Farooq Abdullah. He is as comfortable in a pin-striped suit as in a sherwani, complete with the regulation fur cap. As ecstatic when digging into a succulent raan as he is when he spies that bowl of strawberries topped with fresh cream. As comfortable on a bandstand reviewing a parade as he is turning some fancy steps in his 'Disco Farooq' incarnation. As comfortable in a Range Rover as he is on a motorcycle, showing Bollywood belles the wonder that was Kashmir.

Unfortunately, Farooq is uncomfortable about certain things. About coming to terms with Kashmir, for starters. Or understanding the current Kashmiri psyche. Or, about accepting the fact that he is finished in the Valley, the fault all his. Because Farooq has this incredible knack of slipping up when he can do the maximum good, when he can mend twisted, angry aspirations. And especially, when he is perhaps the only person around who could have done something to make Kashmiris feel that they are Indians.

Instead, Farooq made mistakes. And ran away. He is still running away.

A pity. The doctor had, for all practical purposes, inherited Kashmir and the love and support of the Kashmiri people from his father, Sheikh Abdullah. (Today, Farooq has had to face the insult of having his father's grave desecrated by militants.) That was the Farooq of old, imitating the Sher-e-Kashmir's firebrand politics to the hilt, soothing the multitudes with pro-India rhetoric—and reason.

Indira Gandhi personally supervised Farooq's installation as heir and chief minister in 1983—a change from the time she believed that a good Sheikh was a jailed Sheikh. It worked. Mrs Gandhi, more than anyone else, understood the power and practicality—however much one may dispute the assertion—of dynastic rule. As one, the Kashmiris backed Farooq. And peace returned to Kashmir.

Farooq, then a political novice, moved on to discussing national issues with politicians of every hue, jetting down to New Delhi, West Bengal, Bihar and the southern states to talk politics and priorities with leaders. And the people. The politicos and the masses loved him; here was a man who believed in what he was saying and someone who appeared to care about the country. Besides, he seemed intensely patriotic, convincing both Kashmiris and non-Kashmiris that being a part of India was the only way out.

THEN, EVERYTHING started falling apart. Rapidly Farooq's frank dalliance with the Opposition—intellectually motivated—was interpreted as a threat by the increasingly paranoid Mrs Gandhi. She moved in swiftly, did a characteristic about-turn, dubbed Farooq anti-national and pro-Pakistan, and threw him out after shuffling MLA support. Indira installed G.M. Shah, Farooq's brother-in-law—and currently, a prominent Pakistan-is-heaven man—as chief minister. Even as Farooq was away, cavorting in Pahalgam. He came back, witnessed the fait accompli and ran away. This was the first instance.

And Shah, a worse administrator than Farooq, let corruption run rampant, played with religion and the inevitable happened: militancy resurfaced. Meanwhile, Farooq roamed hurt and humiliated, snubbed by Indira and later, Rajiv, another dynastic heir. Things changed when Rajiv realised that Farooq was still true and struck a deal to return Kashmir's mantle to him. Only, it was done in a reprehensible manner. The National Conference (NC) and the Congress(I) emerged as coalition partners and rigged elections for a win.

And totally ignored the by-then powerful Muslim fundamentalist element which had made inroads in Kashmir, promising a jihad instead of an Indian-style democracy. Disillusioned youths deserted NC ranks and linked up with the relatively pro-India Muslim United Front and joined the militants in droves. That was 1987.

For the next two years, Farooq did nothing to control militancy, cocksure that his charisma would keep "the boys" in check. It did not work and Farooq ran away again in end-1989, this time to the US, pleading ill health. Leaving his people to fend for themselves with a casual, callous "I am useless anyway. I play golf". When he should have stayed, he parried with a hurt sarcasm nobody understood, and frankly, nobody cared.

HIS HOLIDAY was cut short when Rubaiya Sayeed, home minister Mufti Mohammad's daughter, was kidnapped by militants last December, less than a week after the National Front government took over. She was released on 13 December, no thanks to Farooq, and the playboy resigned after unsuccessfully trying to convince that he was, in fact, a do-gooder. The Centre was firmly divided into pro and anti-Farooq factions, with George Fernandes backing him, and the Mufti, Arun Nehru and Arif Mohammad Khan gunning for him. The troika won hands down.

Farooq ran away yet again. To London's nightlife, his mother's country home in Essex and to a fat farm in Bangalore, perhaps as much to shed his conscience as to get rid off those fresh-cream kilos. Meanwhile, Kashmir burned.

Fortunately for Farooq, there is now a change. The Mufti is a nonentity, Governor Jagmohan is through terrorising Kashmir and the Centre—different from the Rajiv era one, but similar in its total misunderstanding of the Kashmir problem—wants him back in the state. And if he can pull it off, at its helm, Farooq is still Kashmir's only hope.

Only if he would stop running away. ●

RAKESH SAHAI

LEAVE THE KIDS ALONE!

Guess who's the latest convert to the Mary Whitehouse view of the world? None other than celebrated dancer-actress Mallika Sarabhai.

According to the talented daughter of Mrinalini and Vikram Sarabhai, the increasing popularity of television and video and the sex-violence-and-death formula they beam into drawing rooms all over the country will lead the nation's youth down the primrose path to perdition. And ruin India's future in the bargain.

But Ms Sarabhai has no intentions of sitting back and watching the imminent destruction of the moral fibre of the country's under-18s. And to wean them away from the idiot box, she has started a theatre group Darpana, in order to keep them occupied with some "constructive" work. Mallika, a doctorate in psychology, had scripted a gripping drama, which will feature her neighbourhood kids. And keep them busy with rehearsals in the evenings, when the tube is best placed to do the greatest damage.

And this, the lady assures us, is only the beginning.

Mallika Sarabhai: move over, Mary Whitehouse

POET PRINCESS

When you have the legendary Carnatic music composer Swati Tirunal for your ancestor, it's no big deal to have one of your poems published in the prestigious Delhi-London Poetry Quarterly.

Nonetheless, Princess Gouri Lakshmi Bayi, a member of the Travancore royal family confesses: "I was thrilled when they published my poem, especially as it was dedicated to our family deity Sree Padmanabha Swamy, none other than Lord Vishnu, lying on Anantha, the serpent of infinity."

Princess Gouri Lakshmi Bayi: poetry is better, but religion is best

But, despite the allegations doing the rounds, the Princess is no sympathiser of the burgeoning Hindu movement in Marxist Kerala. Clarifies Gouri Lakshmi: "The most precious legacy of my prior karma is that I was born a Hindu. To me, my religion is very sacred and dear and that shows in my poems. But there is nothing political about my way of life at all. I am not another member of the royalty waitings in the wings to enter politics."

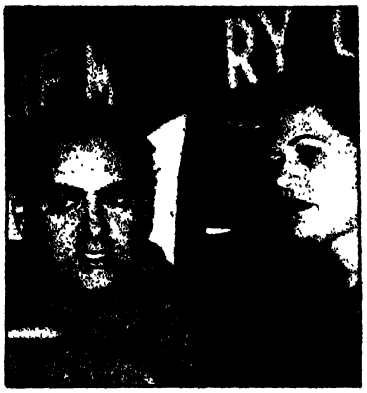
Instead, the Princess is all set to publish a book of her poems. And soon.

OFF THE HOOK?

Ever since Salman Rushdie went into hiding to escape the wrath of Iranian hit-squads, the media have regularly carried stories to the effect that the death sentence on the beleaguered author of The Satanic Verses was soon to be lifted. But even before Rushdie could begin celebrating at his secret hideout, the reports were denied by Iranian higher-ups.

This time, however, there may be some substance to the talk of the author being handed a reprieve. Apparently, the 12-nation European Community is negotiating a settlement with Iran, which will include the commuting of Rushdie's sentence. According to the Italian foreign minister Gianni de Michelis: "We are close to an agreement on an exchange of letters and we are at the stage of wording which should solve the Rushdie problem."

Salman lives in hope.



Salman Rushdie: is it for real this time?

TEA, SANDWICHES AND SALMAN KHAN

It wasn't quite what you'd expect a presidential tea party to be. For, along with the regulation tea and sandwiches, President R. Venkataraman treated his visitors to a private screening of the Rajshree blockbuster Maine Pyar Kiya.

By all accounts, the guests, including the wife of vice-president Shankar Dayal Sharma, Chief Justice Sabyasachi Mukherji and the loving duo of Rajiv and Sonia Gandhi, enjoyed watching the trials and tribulations of Salman Khan and Bhagyashree. And, in the manner of most film buffs, tapped their feet in tune with Anand-Milind's musical score.

(Above) President R. Venkataraman: entertaining (from left) Rajiv and Sonia Gandhi (among others) with Maine Pyar Kiya

At any rate, it beats discussing the wisdom of implementing the Mandal Commission's recommendations over coffee and pakoras.

PARTY TIME!

All in all, it was a party to remember. Debonair, the magazine best known for its centrespreads, was 18 years old and the Taj Mahal Hotel's ballroom was converted into a Monte Carlo-like casino to mark the occasion. And as Bombay's elite crowded over roulette tables, bent over games of flush and blackjack, co-hosts Vineet Jain and Sheena Singh circulated madly to get a word in with every celebrity.

But, despite the tall, brooding presence of Amitabh Bachchan, the star of the evening was sultry Sonika Gill (of Ram Lakhan fame), who emerged out of a huge cake, to hand a champagne bottle to Vineet Jain.

At the Debonair bash: a party to remember

DANCE, LITTLE LADY, DANCE

She may have starred in both Bengali and Hindi movies and even made a name for herself as an actress of note. But there's never been any doubt that dancing is, and always will be, Mamata Shankar's first love.

And now, the dusky damsel will be taking the Mamata Shankar Ballet Troupe for a tour of the United Kingdom and Europe, where it will perform at 19 key cultural centres.

The première will, however, be staged at Birmingham, with the Indian high commissioner to London, Kuldip Nayar, inaugurating the show. Then, Mamata will take her dancers across UK, the tour being sponsored by Birmingham's Natyam Arts Promotions, Visiting Arts (UK), the Scottish Arts Council and West Midlands Arts.

Mamata Shankar

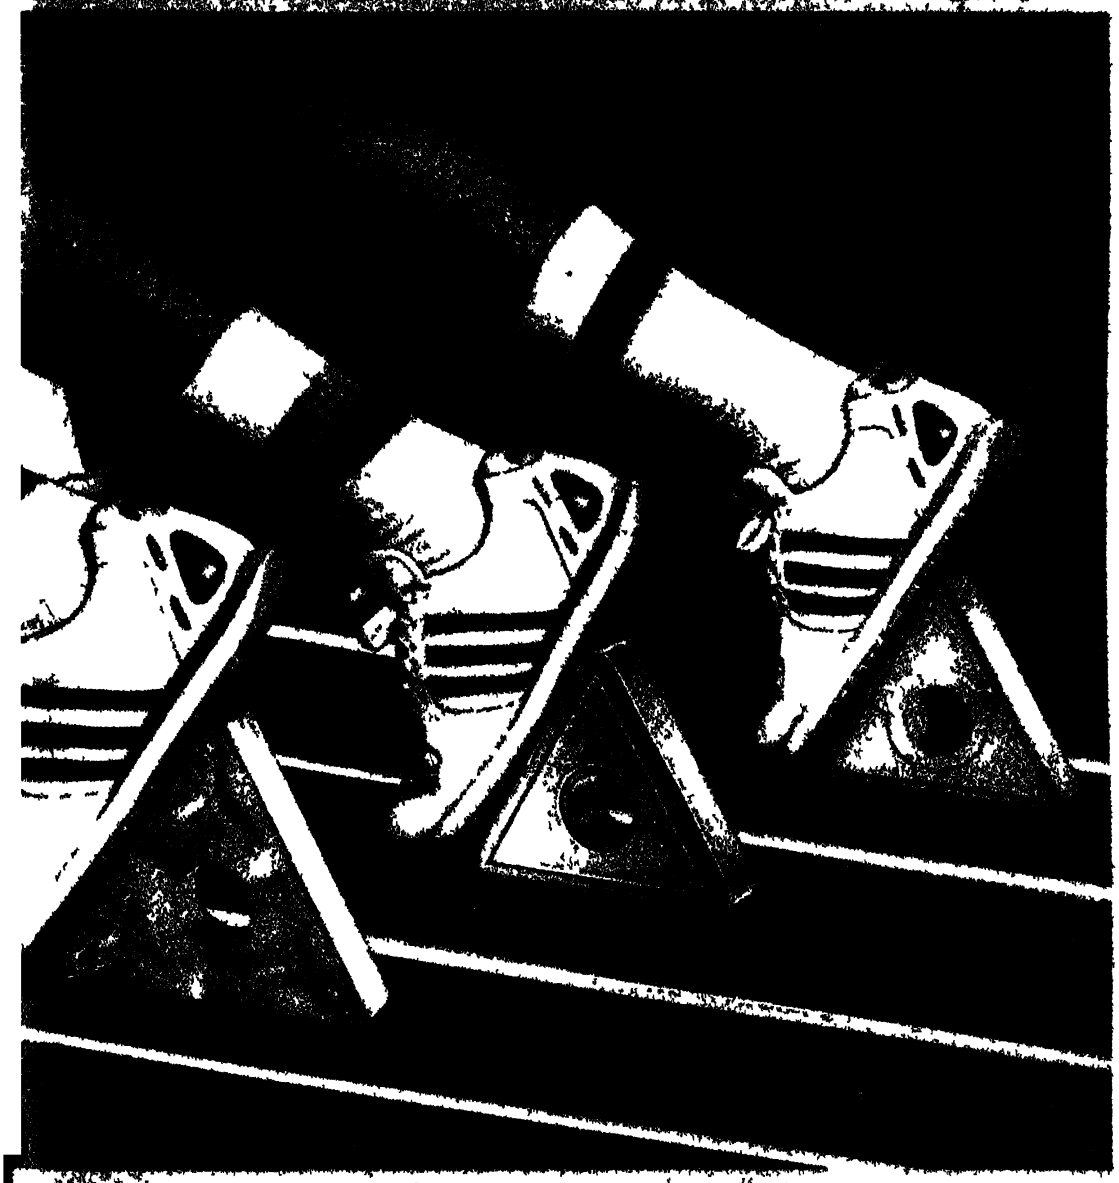
With luck, she'll get the same response her father Uday Shankar did, decades ago. ●



A HEADSTART IN PRODUCT INNOVATION

WIDIA

Your productivity – Our concern

WIDIA

THAT'S WIDIA'S TRACK RECORD

Widia — pioneer and leader. Constantly innovating, anticipating changes. Continuously meeting newer customer needs.

Quality engineered. That's Widia's track record. [illegible] its R&D. Fully synchronized with [illegible] producing technologically [illegible] computer-aided design [illegible] manufacturing. Making breakthrough contributions. Infusing superior quality in all Widia products: a comprehensive range of sophisticated toolings, flexible automation systems, special purpose machines...

Making Widia a true leader.

With its unrelenting spirit of innovation, Widia is ready for the challenges of the '90s.

RK SWAMY/WB/4065

TAPAN DAS

INTERVIEW

"Everything is for the moment"

Britannia chairman Rajan Pillai on his plans in India, and his global operations

When Janardhana Mohandas Rajan Pillai burst into the Indian corporate horizon in mid-1989 as the new owner of Britannia Industries Ltd, not many people had heard of him. That changed quickly: 42 year old Pillai is at the top of a US $400 million (Rs 720 crore) empire straddling Pakistan and New Zealand. This makes the NRI businessman too big to be ignored. His self-effacing style and unobstrusive business mannerisms make it very difficult for the media to track him—or get him to talk.

But when he does —as he did to SUNDAY last fortnight—he comes off as sure-footed, unhurried and practical. Which probably explains why he was able to pull off a corporate coup, buying Britannia operations from RJR-Nabisco, changing almost overnight from an executive to an entrepreneur. Excerpts from an exclusive interview:

SUNDAY: Unlike other NRIs or businessmen one knows very little about you. People only seem to find out about what you've done after it happens.

Rajan Pillai: Isn't that the way business is done?

Q: Not always. Quite a lot of people make a lot of noise.

A: Probably because I am not an Indian I don't believe there is any point in talking until things actually take place, there is no point in speculating.

Q: There is a lot of scope for information leaks—that also doesn't seem to happen in your case. How do you manage that?

A: There is no management in that.

Q: So you hold your cards very close to the chest?

A: No. I am open with everybody. Whoever asks me a question always gets a straight reply. Speak to my colleagues. Sunil (Alagh, BIL managing director) and people in Singapore at every point knew exactly where I was going.

Q: What is your game plan? Where do you see yourself five years from now?

A: I think we will consolidate the consumer packaged foods business in the Asia-Pacific region. These are two strong companies—one in India and one in New Zealand. There is a region (in) between that one can expand into, where the food industry is still in its infancy.

Q: Could you be more specific?

A: Indonesia, Thailand, Korea, Taiwan. There is a great scope for expanding the Western type of consumer packaged foods.

Q: Are you looking at any other areas?

A: No.

Q: Does that mean diversification is out for the moment?

A: Everything is for the moment. At this particular point of time, I think we would like to stick to the business that we understand.

Q: So far, what you have achieved is through the acquisition route. Will there be any greenfield projects?

A: The Singapore business was started by me, sold to (RJR) Nabisco and brought back to me. So it is not new. And in fact, in all these countries that we talked about, including India, it has to be greenfield (projects). Because in our type of business I don't think there will be any large companies that will be available for sale.

Q: In India there is already a base. Britannia is into bread and biscuits...

A: But it will be greenfield if we go into product diversification; in biscuits and bread it will be consolidation.

Q: The company has diversified into soya products and computer software...

A: Computer software is basically an export-oriented effort. In fact, exports are a major thrust area for us, not because it is part of our business but it is what the country needs, and being international we find it much easier to handle than other (Indian software) companies.

But when we talk of diversification it means in the food business, and we will be drawing on (Groupe) BSN's strengths—today, they are in pasta, in dairy products, champagne.

Q: Does this mean there will be collaborations to manufacture these in India?
A: Could be. We have commissioned market studies to find out what products are suitable at the present time.

Q: What sort of time frame have you in mind for these product launches?
A: In the food industry it takes a long time before a product is launched, because you cannot afford to make a mistake. There are so many food products launched all over the world, their failure rate is very high. So, we have to be very careful to do our market survey right, to identify the right product. And it is also a question of taste. So, unless we are absolutely sure we won't go ahead. Don't expect anything overnight.

Q: You're supposed to be Asia's largest biscuit manufacturer.
A: Yes, in volume.

Q: Who's second?
A: Second will be a Japanese company called Meiji and there will be an Australian company called Arnotts.

Q: To repeat my question, where do you see yourself five years down the road?
A: We do business plans on a three year basis. My former company, Nabisco, never believed in formulating any plans beyond three years.

Q: What happens later?
A: It is pretty boring. Well, on a positive note, we have talked about aviation—my wife is looking after that. But basically, we are talking about that because there is a specific need for that activity in the country. We are not talking of air taxis, what we are talking about is executive and business class travel and tour charters. Tourism is obviously one of the important sectors of growth...I think there is a niche for that kind of service.

Q: Only domestic?
A: Domestically or in the region. For instance, we can fly upto Singapore...we are looking at (the) Falcon-20 or Falcon-50s, the French executive aircraft.

Q: Where does your group stand in the global context?
A: Basically, we are a Singapore-based company which has bought the former Nabisco companies in Pakistan, India, Singapore, Malaysia, Hong Kong, New Zealand—these were the companies Nabisco had in the Asia-Pacific. Even in the Nabisco days we were looking at companies in Taiwan, Korea and Indonesia in the same business, so we continued to expand in that direction.

Q: What is the future for Britannia in India?
A: Diversification for Britannia is essential, but it is a distraction. The essential growth will come from its own core business which is consumer packaged foods. In India, as you know, in business you have to do things which you may not want to do.

For instance, Britannia went into (fishing) trawlers a few years ago—so did ITC and Hindustan Lever, because the government wanted business houses to go into these areas. We recognise the reasons for doing it, and we do it. But that's not because that is the business we know best. We are good at exploiting exports, but it is an opportunistic business which is good for the country.

But growth will come from our core businesses. In other words, the nature of the company will not change. Exports and other businesses will be opportunistic, rather than strategic. Our main strategy is to develop the foods business. If you ask me will I buy Dunlop tomorrow, the answer is no.

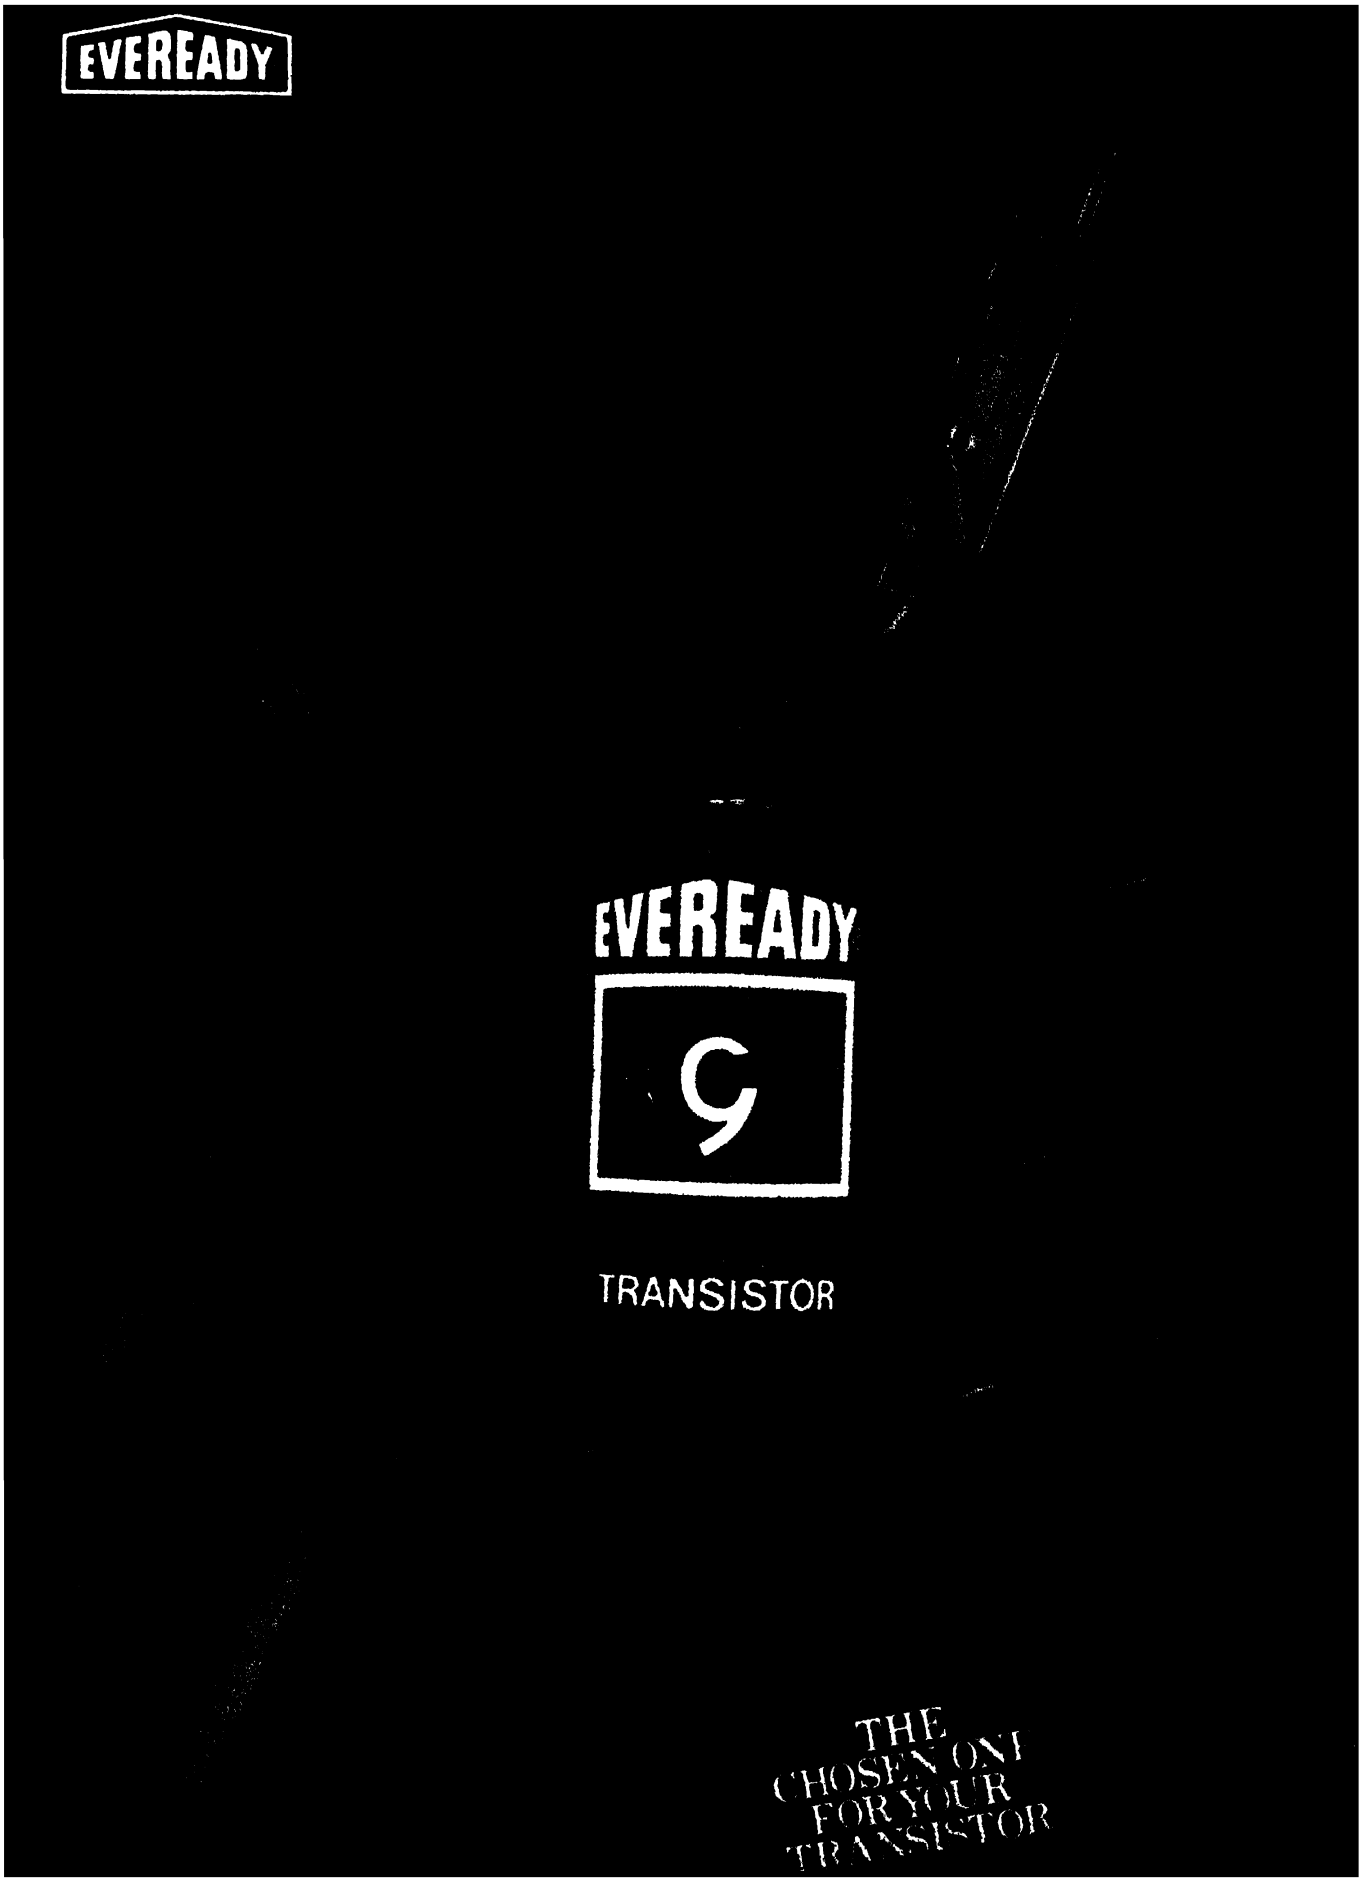
Q: What happened with ITC? We heard rumours that you were buying ITC shares overseas?
A: I don't know. It was your paper (the Ananda Bazar Group daily Business standard) which said these things.

Q: You must have expressed some interest...
A: No. It was a whole lot of others (bidders).

Q: Where does Rajan Jetley (former Air India chairman and managing director who left the airline to work for Pillai in Singapore) fit into your organisation?
A: My company in Singapore is called Britannia Industries Private Ltd (BIPL) which has a joint venture with BSN, called Britannia Brands Pvt. Ltd. BIPL holds 50 per cent of the Britannia Brands and Britannia Brands holds 100 per cent of Singapore, Malaysia (and) Hong Kong (operations). Rajan Jetley is the president and chief operating officer of BIPL and I am the chairman and chief executive of both the companies. So, he is representing BIPL in Britannia Brands and in diversification.

Q: Has your NRI status created any problems? Many NRIs have burnt their fingers in India and Indian industry.
A: On the contrary, I think we are a privileged lot. In fact, in my opinion Indian businessmen should be given the same opportunities as NRIs. If Goenkas or Tatas can find a pool of investors abroad and raise resources, or convince foreign banks to lend them money on the basis of their names, why should they be stopped from buying companies?

Q: Will you ever come back to live in India?
A: Recently, I read that there is a provision of the Income Tax Act that allows non-resident Indians to live in India for five months of the year without losing his NRI status.



Q: So you are keeping your options open?
A: No, not the option to go back. But it is a question of subjecting yourself to FERA (Foreign Exchange Regulation Act) regulations. I have been away for 16 years now and have NRI status. Why should one give that up unless you have something to look forward to? If the provision is seriously implemented, a number of NRIs would avail of this opportunity.

Interviewed by Debjani Sinha/Calcutta

TAPAN DAS

"If you ask me will I buy Dunlop tomorrow, the answer is no"

EVEREADY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Unjust enrichment?

The Raja's government is in a jam over a strange case of excise refunds

Can good times be bad news? Yes, if the government's detractors are to be believed. The stock markets are booming, industrial growth is creeping up, raids have almost become a thing of the past and even the government's supposedly implacable foe, Dhirubhai Ambani finds he can stay in business.

Yes, not everbody is terribly happy. The finance ministry's success with business is being interpreted as a sell out. Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh, the government's critics insinuate, has struck an underhand deal with big business. And to drive home their point, these critics claim that the finance ministry had planned to refund a straggering Rs 10,000 crore in excise and customs collections to businessmen and that the ministry is soft-pedalling tax evasion investigations against major industrial houses.

The issue first blew up at a Janata Dal parliamentary party meeting held in late August this year. Furious Dal MPs cornered finance minister Madhu Dandavate, claiming that the government had been hijacked by big business and demanded an explanation into the Rs 10,000 crore refund case, which had first been highlighted by the Janata Dal leader Chandra Shekhar. An ashen faced Dandavate, reportedly, could not immediately answer to the charges but promised to look into the matter. That was only the beginning.

The sniggers were growing louder in the lobbies of Parliament and finally, On 4 September, members of both the Rajya and the Lok Sabha openly confronted the government with the issue. The principal charge was that the government had surreptitiously issued a circular ordering tax officials to refund excise and customs duties amounting to Rs 10,000 crores. Dandavate's denials appeared particularly weak and even Bharatiya Janata Party leader Atal Behari Vajpayee and Dipen Ghosh, a prominent Communist Party of India MP, joined in the attack. The Congress(I) was, of course, the loudest and demanded that the entire matter be investigated by a joint parliamentary committee.

The government hedged. Finance minister Dandavate admited that he had stayed the controversial circular as soon as it had come to his notice, but insisted that it was a very routine matter and that it had not even attracted the attention of the revenue secretary. On the other hand, the finance ministry's panic and acknowledgement of the ciruclar's existence seemed to suggest there might be something behind the smokescreen.

On the face of it, the entire refunds issue appears innocuous. For, it is centered around a very simple question of equity: are manufacturers entitled to a refund if government collects more taxes than it is legally entitled to? Yes, if one assumes that if the tax authorities have deliberately or erroneously levied extra taxes on someone, they should return the excess amount. But the answer is not as obvious as that. In the past, the government has argued that manufacturers pass on the burden of customs and excise duties to consumers, and any duties refunded to them would result

THE REFUND BOGEY

Refunds are actually declining. So, why is the finance minister embarrassed about the Opposition's charge that Rs 10,000 crores have been returned to big business?

Year	Customs and Excise refund (In Rs Crores)	Total customs and excise revenue (In Rs Crores)	Refunds as percentage of total revenue
1979-80	146.9	8,935	1.64
80-81	180 8	9.909	1.82
81-82	179 15	11,721	1.53
82-83	198.32	13,178	1.50
83-84	1551 06	15,805	0.96
84-85	168 15	18,192	0.92
85-86	166 10	22,482	0.74
86-87	174 03	25,945	0.67
87-88	233.32	30,128	0 77
88-89	278.45	34,646	0 80
89-90	339.32	40,208	0.83
1990 (APRIL)	39.32	2,853	1.38
(MAY)	26 98	3,408	0.79
(JUNE)	22.13	3,522	0.63

Madhu Dandavate

Soft? who, us?

The government gets tough with ITC Ltd's excise dues

Who's forgotten the old cases? Certainly not deputy finance minister Anil Shastri. Just before Parliament's Monsoon session ended, Shastri told the Lok Sabha that the government was determined to recover Rs 80.3 crores from the Saharanpur unit of ITC Ltd. He was referring to a case that relates to excise demands of the 1975-83 period. But the speech was significant, nevertheless. For, apart from Reliance Industries Ltd, the National Front government had not taken on or talked tough against any corporate giant. Moreover, this was the first time that the finance ministry insinuated that the previous regime was guilty of surreptitiously burying evasion cases.

The Rs 80.3 crore case is really a legal dispute between ITC and the revenue department. Following a court judgement in 1973, most companies had been deducting a whole set of costs termed 'post manufacturing expenses' (PME) from their from their product cost for determining the amount of excise payable to the government. The tax authorities contested this view and the Supreme Court in May 1983 ruled that advertising, marketing and other expenses could not be deducted as PME, and laid down the items (such as frieght costs) that could be deducted from the cost of a product for excise purposes. After the 1983 judgement, numerous companies, ITC included, had to re-work how much extra they now owed the excise department since they had excluded PME from their product cost from 1975 to 1983.

"It was a question of ambiguity and interpretation," says the new chief of ITC's tobacco division, K.L. Chugh. And in 1986, collectors from all the regions where ITC cigarette factories were located met to thrash out the matter. An agreement was framed and ITC paid Rs 54 crores. Then in 1988, the excise collector at Allahabad wrote to ITC, saying that he did not agree with the method of determining the excise duty on the company's cigarettes for that period and demanded that ITC pay a total of Rs 80.3 crores for its Saharanpur operations. ITC was appalled and appealed against the decision.

Now, Anil Shastri reveals that after filing the Rs 80.3 crore demand, the concerned collector and the revenue department seemed to have forgotten all about the case. Astonishingly, the collectorate did not process the case even though the Allahabad Court had not granted a stay order. According to sources in the revenue department, the moment the collectorate was instructed to follow up the case, ITC got a stay. ITC's petition was dismissed even by the Supreme Court but the company has a month to file an appeal. Shastri said that his ministry was "seeking legal opinion whether coercive action can be taken for the recoveries even before the expiry of the one-month period allowed by the Supreme Court."

The intended message was clear: the finance ministry has not been seduced by big business, which should help combat charges that the government is taking a soft stand on excise refunds. Revenue department insiders reveal that a special officer has been appointed exclusively for the Rs 800-odd crore total excise demand raised against ITC a few years ago. Apparently, the previous regime, by regularly transferring the officers investigating the Rs 800 crore case, had ensured that ITC is not hauled up. Now, the finance ministry seems determined to subtract that inertia.

ITC, on the other hand, feels that all this publicity is unfortunate. "We have not been evading taxes," says ITC's Chugh. "In the past five years we have paid Rs 4,174 crores as excise duties and Rs 72 crores as income tax." He argues that earlier methods of computing excise duty on cigarettes was complicated and full of grey areas. This, he says, caused innumerable disputes with the tax authorities and led to unending litigation. "Today," adds Chugh, "the excise tax is levied on the basis of cigarette length and there is no controversy, no problem." While ITC might have a point, what is not in doubt is the finance ministry's determination to win back its tough, no-nonsense taxman image.

ITC chairman J.N. Sapru

Tobacco division chief K.L. Chugh

Endless litigation on excise dues in 'unjust enrichment' of those manufacturers. Industry, as is only to be expected, has always contested this view by pointing out that competitive conditions do not always allow them to pass on tax burdens to consumers.

This tussle between the industry and tax auhorities has been continuing for decades in the country's courts. The courts themselves have generally not been very clear and had tended to judge individual case on their merits. For instance, in a 1978 judgement on a Kesoram Cements case, a court ruled that "Even if the assessee passed onto his customers the duty illegally recovered from him, it is a matter between him and his consumers and the High Court cannot deny refund of the illegally levied and collected duty to the assessee, even if it results in injust enrichment of the assessee." A large section of revenue officials and government legal experts felt that since no tax can be levied or collected without the authority of law, the government had a duty to refund any money collected without authority. That was until the famous Roplas (India) Limted case where the Bombay High Court in July 1988 rejected the company's plea for excise refund on the ground that this would result in 'unjust enrichment'.

At that time, the revenue department immediately ordered its tax collectors to reject any claim they felt would result in unjust enrichment. According to Madhu Dandavate, "These instructions were issued without consideration of the Full Board (the Central Board of Excise and Customs) and without consulting the law ministry. Compalints were received by the ministry and the Board that the discretion allowed by these instructions to field officers had become a source of corruption and harrassment, and that some refund claims were being arbitrarily rejected."

The granting of discretionary powers to tax officials was disturbing and the whole question was sent to the Central Excise, Customs and Gold (Control) Appellate Tribunal for consideration. The Tribunal expressed the view that departmental officers did not enjoy the discretion to reject claims of refunds authorised by law on grounds which do not find specific mention in the law itself. Such discretion, according to the Tribunal, is a prerogative only of the higher courts which have inherent powers to decide on issues relating to equity.

Meanwhile, a full bench of the Bombay High Court again reviewed the Roplas case and this time held: "When tax has been collected without the authority of law the state is bound to refund the same." The Court declared it could not accept "extreme submissions" made by the tax authorities that in all tax refund cases which may involve unjust enrichment, the State ought to be allowed to retain the amount which is refundable. "Having collected tax without the authority of law, the State cannot have any preferential claim to decide how the amount of tax which is refundable shall be spent," the judgement added. The 'unjust enrichment' thesis, however, was not entirely abandoned. In fact, the judgement went on to say it was upto the writ courts to evaluate the facts and circumstances of each case and then decide who should benefit from the tax refund.

All this would suggest that invidivual refund cases require to be sent to the courts for arbitration. However, when the Central Board of Excise and Customs, met on 11 January this year, it took the view that departmental officers had no legal authority to reject refunds which were authorised by law. The law ministry subsequently upheld this view and on 21 March, a telex was accordingly issued to all collectors. The telex was followed up by a more detailed circular on the subject a week later.

The finance minister claims that he was not kept informed of all these developments. He told the Rajya Sabha that the secretaries of the finance ministry and the finance minister take up matters related only to changes in laws and policies. "Since this was only a matter of informing Collectors of the correct legal interpretation of the existing laws," concluded Dandavate, "the Board issued the instructions after taking necessary legal opinion. I am fully satisfied that the action of the Board was legally and administratively correct and the clarifications issued by it were fully within its competence."

Just before Parliament's Monsoon session ended, Shastri told the Lok Sabha that the government was determined to recover Rs 80.3 crores from ITC Ltd

Deputy finance minister Anil Shastri

The finance minister could not, however, adequately explain why the decision was rescinded if it was completely above board and legally justified. He told Parliament that the circular was stayed because the Government now wanted to "review the whole matter in all its aspects." He seemed more concerned about killing the controversy. The quantum of refunds, he stressed, was nowhere near the level of Rs 10,000 crores as had been alleged. He produced figures to show that refunds were a regular feature (see chart) and in the first 3 months of the current financial year refunds added up to just Rs 88.43 crores. "It is indeed unfortunate that all kinds of baseless allegations have been hurled in this regard without ascertaining full facts," he said.

Dandavate, while giving the impression that his ministry had been wronged completely sidestepped the allegation that specific individuals and firms had benefitted from the refund circular. Similarly, he did not admit that the courts had not ruled that the refund amounts should in every case be returned to the claimant. As of now, tax officials once again have discretionary powers regarding refunds and the revenue department is thinking of working out means to channel the refunds to a consumers' fund instead of returning them to business.

The finance ministry appears more keen at the moment to live down its pro-big business image. For, the Raja's government is being accused of being the business world's best friend. A host of major tax evasion cases involving some of the country's corporate giants seem to have been buried; despite routine brave statements, no action has been taken against the trading community for the constant rise in prices, and V.P. Singh today does not even remotely resemble the crusading finance minister he was during the early years of the Rajiv Gandhi regime. In the circumstances, it was not surprising that deputy finance minister Anil Shastri stood up in Parliament to declare that the government would force ITC Ltd. to pay up its excise dues (see box). Shastri took pains to give the impression that the government was prepared to come down hard on any erring business house. ITC made a good target. And undoubtedly, there will be many more acts of similar bravado. Equity, after all, is not really the issue. The image is the message.

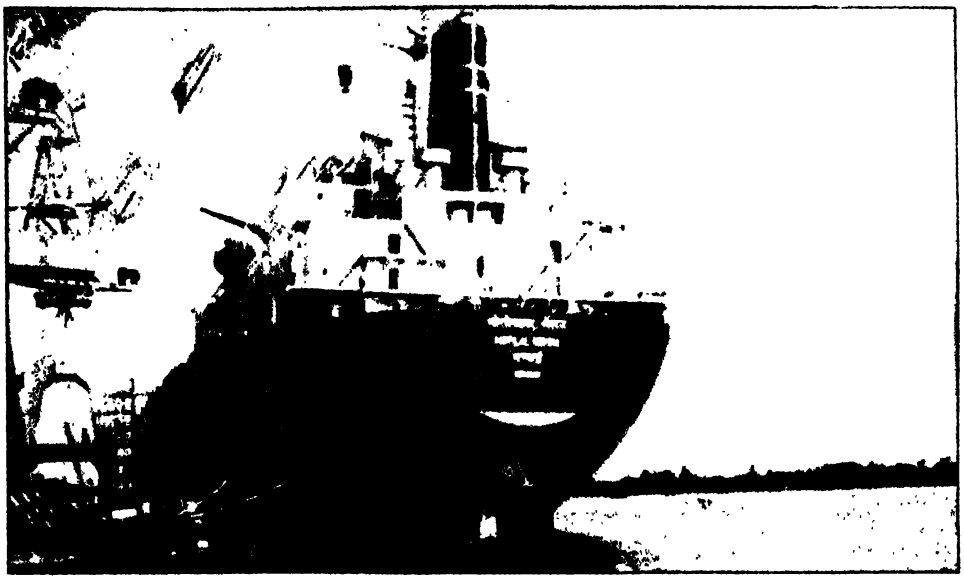
Indranil Banerjie/New Delhi

SHIPPING

In the dock

Cochin's shipyard is sinking deeper into the red, and could face closure

The Cochin Shipyard Ltd (CSL) is fast becoming the biggest public sector mess in Kerala. And the way it is going, it could soon earn a place in the national honour roll of corporate disasters.



CSL's losses up to March 1990 is a massive Rs 147 crores, on a capital investment of Rs 130 crores. Added to this is a further Rs 50 crore loss on the construction of India's first oil tanker, Motilal Nehru, for the Shipping Corp. of India (SCI). With this new deadweight, CSL is set to surpass losses at another once-prestigious unit, Vishakhapatnam's Hindustan Shipyard Ltd, which has piled up losses of Rs 195 crores. Says a top CSL official, who declines to be identified: "In a couple of months we may have to declare a lockout". He adds: "Our losses are accumulating with every ship we build."

The crisis is mainly due to an incredible pricing policy, combined with the incredible inefficiency that most sector units in India practise as a matter of course. Ships manufactured domestically are the only industrial products sold at international prices, no matter what the domestic economy dictates. This is not a bad thing, one might say. As the domestic cost of production tends to be higher, at least the buyer will benefit from more reasonable international rates. But, with this practice, subsidies come in. And technical problems on Indian-built ships are legend. So, on one count, the tax-payer is pressured, and on another, the buyer may be paying international rates, but he is paying up for a product that does not match worldwide standards.

Take the case of Motilal Nehru, the first of three oil tankers to be built for SCI by CSL. The order was placed in March 1986, and the cost of production was estimated at Rs 73 crores. But SCI had to pay just Rs 40 crores under the contract, matching interna-

The Cochin shipyard: inefficient, under-utilised and in a mess

"It is impossible to break even," says Joseph, "under the present cost-price gap in the pricing of ships" tional rates. CSL was to receive a subsidy of Rs 8 crores, but that would still mean an in-house loss of Rs 25 crores. Since the shipyard took 36 months to do the job, double the initial estimate, losses piled up to Rs 50 crores. "Nothing works in CSL", says K.P. Joseph, former chief manager (management service) with the shipyard. "And it is impossible to break even under the present cost-price gap in the pricing of ships".

Perhaps, it is as impossible to break even if CSL's inefficiency is not cleaned up. The yard's installed capacity is 1.5 lakh DWT a year, but CSL has never worked itself to reach that figure, thanks to appalling unproductivity. For instance, in Japan, the world's premier ship-building nation, it takes 40 man-hours to process one tonne of steel for ship construction work. At CSL, the norm is 240 man-hours for a tonne. "The work style in CSL is the same as seen in the state secretariat in Trivandrum," says Joseph. There is no commitment to improve productivity."

When former chairman Rear Admiral G.T. Wadhwani—one of three company top brass who have quit in the past 18 months—put forward a proposal to link productivity with wages, the trade unions dug in their heels. Consequently, the yard's 2,500-strong workforce usually lays about earning full pay. (If the SCI order had not materialised, they would have been completely idle.) Besides a string of chairmen, numerous other senior managers—such as Joseph—quit in disgust.

Alongside worker-related delays, CSL—like most other shipyards in the country—has to cope with erratic supplies. And if supplies are delayed, the yard is not permitted to import components to meet deadlines. The resultant crunch has affected the day-to-day work at the yards. At CSL, for example only 30 per cent of the work on SCI's second oil tanker is completed, and it is almost certain, say CSL officials, that work on the third will have to be abandoned. CSL has not placed specialised equipment orders for the tankers. It has not even placed fresh orders for steel plates—imported, and fast running out—as it is severely strapped for cash.

And while other yards, the one at Vishakhapatnam, for instance, are diversifying operations—fabricating drilling structures for the Oil and Natural Gas Commission, steel girders for railway bridgers and patrol ships for the navy—in an attempt to cut losses, CSL is simply limping along.

A way out for CSL could be to expand its ship repairing facility, which has the potential to turn a profit. "Ship repair is more profitable than ship building," says a CSL spokesman. "If CSL makes more facilities for ship repair, the yard can look up to better times".

Nothing would please G. Krishnan more. Krishnan, chairman of the Cochin Port Trust and acting CSL chairman, has made representations to New Delhi for junking the government's pricing policy: while this would increase purchase prices, it would reduce subsidy. Price restructuring would slash CSL's borrowings from the Centre. Yard insiders maintain that Krishnan has also submitted a confidential report suggesting that CSL be merged with SCI. Other CSl demands include liberal import of technical equipment, writing off outstanding interest, and conversion of loans into equity.

Krishnan's moves may just work out. Both surface transport minister K.P. Unnikrishnan and ministry secretary P.M. Abraham are from Kerala. "I am wearing a crown of thorns," says Krishnan. "Still, we are hoping that things would improve at the shipyard". If ministers ever help managers.

Shreedhar Pillay/Cochin

■ In creditum veritas?

Upset by industry accusations, Mudra Communications Ltd, one of the country's fastest growing advertising agencies (billings: Rs 65 crores) has dashed off a hurt letter to the Advertising Agencies Association of India. The charge: Mudra apparently gives unlimited credit facilities to its clients, which could suggest a no-holds-barred attempt to get to the top; currently, Mudra is at the number three slot. "Pure, base gossip," counter Mudra executives, and in a letter to the 3As of I, as the agency is known in colourful ad-world lingo, have requested that association appoint reputed accounting firms, either A.F. Ferguson or Arthur Anderson to look into "terms of payment in contracts with clients' credit period allowed and actual collection record, additional agency discount offered, if any, to clients". Mudra has even offered to pick up the tab for such an exercise. The ball, as they say, is now in 3As of I's court. But the association is hardly likely to do much more than just soothe Mudra's nerves.

■ Fence friends

For once, Reliance Industries Ltd (RIL) and Bombay Dyeing appear to be on the same side of the fence. Both companies have raised prices for their competing products—PTA for Reliance and DMT in Bombay Dyeing's case—without accusing each other of trying to fleece consumers. Bombay Dyeing is selling DMT at Rs 28,000 per tonne, a Rs 4,000 hike. And RIL, for its part, is charging Rs 29,700 per tonne for PTA—derived from its captive paraxylene production facility—up from Rs 24,550.

STOCK QUOTE

"Another election would be disastrous. Two lots of donations in the space of a year will wipe out my profits.

A cynical New Delhi businessman, commenting on the possibility of a mid-term poll.

Nusli Wadia (left) and Dhirubhai Ambani: sans accusations

The rumour mill has it that RIL has less reason than Bombay Dyeing to put up its prices because, till now, it has been crying about the surplus paraxylene it has, and about how the government should force Bombay Dyeing to buy its paraxylene (DMT is a paraxylene derivative, too) instead of importing it. The ostensible reason—courtesy the petrochem grapevine—for the RIL hike is that thanks to a cut in the naptha quota (naptha, bless the chain reaction, is a raw material for paraxylene), RIL is looking abroad too, and can blame increased costs on the Gulf crisis. Either way—by intent or instance—prices are up. And even if there was no Iraq, prices may have gone up anyway: price tags have never needed much reason to go up.

POLITICIAN OF THE WEEK

Jyoti Basu

West Bengal chief minister

• Jyoti Basu is at his power games—again—even while the state reels under its worst ever electricity crisis. First, Basu ran blood donation camps in a bizarre attempt to raise funds and public opinion for clearing the 630 MW Bakreshwar thermal power project, barely saving face with a hurried protocol with the USSR. Now, he is pushing for the long-delayed 2,050 MW super the thermal power plant at Sagardighi in Murshidabad district. The point Basu has consistently evaded is the fact that West Bengal has enough power potential already. Only, it's in a mess, thanks mainly to his Marxist government. Rhetoric, Basu doesn't realise, is a poor substitute for electricity. The answer doesn't lie in new plants, but in fixing the state's work culture. God help Haldia.

■ Gross National Shame

Or GNS, if one leans towards acronyms. Nothing, however, can quite abbreviate the fact that India is among the poorest per capita Gross National Product (GNP) shows in Asia. India, says a World Bank report, has a GNP of US $ 340 (Rs 6,018 at current exchange rates), barely above China's Rs 5,841. Still more signs of supremacy: India lords over Laos, Nepal and Bhutan, which all recorded a GNP of Rs 3,186, and Bangladesh, with a depressing Rs 3,009. Aid, obviously, is not the only way out. China, to an extent, and all the other countries survive on huge aid diets, with practically no industry to back them up, and still fall terribly short of a respectable GNP. On the other hand, India has a booming industry—despite strange laws and stranger political intent—the government claims that it has managed to get a handle on inflation, and incomes are going up. Unfortunately, so is the population. So are subsidies. And aid and interest payments, whether the government likes it or not—negating just about every gain. At a time when our prudent neighbours in South East Asia are raking it in. Perhaps, India should hang its head in GNS.

The Yadavs are coming

The community strikes terror in Etawah

UTTAR PRADESH

The word atank (terror) has become synonymous with Yadavs in Etawah, says a journalist based in the UP district town. "I don't mean our chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav, but members of the Yadav caste, each one of whom thinks he is a CM in his own right." And it is Mulayam Singh Yadav, he says, who has perfected the state's casteist politics.

Ever since Mulayam Singh became the chief minister, Yadav shopkeepers and businessmen are displaying their caste identity on the signboards of their establishments. Other castes had been doing the same thing but now it is the turn of the Yadavs. So it is not surprising to find tractors with inscriptions like "Yadav Mail" on them. And anyone who dares to overtake these vehicular behemoths or refuses to give them the right of way, does so at the risk of his life. Smaller automobiles showing such defiance can be edged off the roads into wayside ditches, say local residents.

Outrageous though it may sound, this tendency to hog the highways pales when compared with the high-handedness with which the influential Yadavs have been treating the Harijans in recent months. The village heads and their relatives have virtually come to control the police and the bureaucracy. "Eight months ago, the Khatris and the Jains were the only communities who had very few criminal cases against them. Now, even the Yadavs are sharing this honour," says Shyam Dutt Tewari, a leading criminal lawyer of Etawah. "It is not that they have reformed overnight, but the police refuse to register any cases against the Yadavs."

As in other parts of the country, it is the Harijans who have to bear the brunt of the atank being spread by the Yadavs in Etawah. According to Satyadev Tripathi, a former UP Congress(I) minister, there are two reasons for this. First, the Harijans voted for the Congress(I) in the last Assembly elections as they had always done. Secondly, criminalisation of politics has cut across caste barriers under the present regime, feels Tripathi, with anti-socials from the other castes—such as the Thakurs, Brahmins and Lodhis—joining Mulayam Singh's camp to harass the Harijans.

KISHAN SAITH

Durga Prasad with his wife and son: grief-stricken family

Even before Mulayam Singh became the chief minister, the Yadavs of Kabuligaon attacked the Harijans, simply because the lower-caste farm labourers demanded a minimum wage of rupees eight per day. Incidentally, the minimum rate prescribed by the government is Rs 25.

Recounts 70-year-old Bhajan Lal: "It was about 5 am when I was rudely awakened by the Yadavs and beaten up. Even women and children were not spared. One woman suffered serious leg injuries." But the nearest police station at Chaubia refused to record the Harijans' complaints.

Four months later, in April, Bhajan Lal was attacked again. This time the Yadavs used firearms, and Bhajan's son, who rushed to his father's rescue, suffered bullet injuries. "But when we went to lodge a complaint with the Chaubia police station, we found to our surprise that an FIR had been filed against us by the Yadavs. The assailants had gone to the police station with Shivpal Yadav, a brother of Mulayam Singh Yadav. So, my son and nine other Harijans were arrested. They were released on bail after 18 days."

In May, the Yadav's of Banalpur village, 20 km from Etawah, who are believed to be Janata Dal activists, lynched a half-blind Harijan, Vidya Ram, simply because he was a Congress supporter. His wife and children are now on the verge of starvation.

The most heinous incident in recent times, however, occurred at Kheda village, where a 13-year-old girl was gangraped and murdered. The girl's father, Durga Prasad, says: "Kallen Yadav, a notorious goonda, accompanied by two others, took away my daughter at gunpoint. For three days she was gangraped by the miscreants. During this time I approached the Jaswant Nagar police station, but they refused to take any action."

After the incident, Kallen's two accomplices, who happened to be when Durga Prasad refused to comply, the police quietly implicated the village headman.

The series of atrocities gave the Congress(I) reason enough to whip up an anti-Mulayam campaign. And leading the onslaught was none other than Darshan Singh Yadav, a one-time buddy of the chief minister Criminals have always played a key role in the politics of Etawah, but observers say that it is only from the early Eighties that they have come out in the open. This, incidentally, coincides with the rise of the Yadavs as a powerful class and the emergence of Mulayam Singh and Darshan Singh as important leaders of the community Both leaders helped the Yadavs, who are otherwise in the minority in the district, to consolidate their economic base. Moreover, it is said that arms licenses are being liberally issued to the Yadavs.

Shivpal Singh (left): at his daily darbar

Harijans, were arrested and severely beaten up in police custody. But Kallen himself was given VIP treatment at the thana because he came with Shivpal. It was only after the local press raised an outcry and the Congress(I) began an agitation protesting against the atrocity, that Mulayam Singh came down to Kheda.

To put the Harijans' fear at rest, Mulayam Singh promised to issue 20 gun licences to them. But only two have been actually given. He also gave the bereaved family a compensation of Rs 25 thousand. "That's generous compensation indeed for the loss of izzat we Harijans have to suffer," says Durga Prasad. In fact, it is even said that the chief minister had gone to the extent of trying to doctor the FIR: he wanted Durga Prasad to name a local Congress leader as the culprit. But

The high-handedness of the Yadavs has demoralised the district administration also. "Earlier at least people knew there was Rajiv Gandhi or Buta Singh over the heads of these local political chiefs. Today, only the writ of such people as Shivpal Singh runs in the region " says a Congressman.

In fact, the Yadavs of Etawah have become so notorious that about 120 lower-ranking police personnel, who have been transferred from Kanpur to Etawah, have refused to take up their new posts. As one sub-inspector puts it:"We are forced to do the dirty work for these politicians and then incur the wrath of the public. If this state of affairs continues, there will be a revolt in our ranks." •

Radhika Ramaseshan/Etawa

Festival of violence

A religious ceremony sparks off communal clashes in Baroda

GUJARAT

Festivals bring gloom to Gujarat. Everytime there is a religious celebration, Hindus and Muslims brace themselves for a show-down. So, during the Ganesh festival earlier this month, rioting broke out in five towns of the state, leaving 15 people dead and at least 150 injured in a single day.

Ever since the worst communal carnage in the state during April, 1985, the two communities have been clashing now and then over the flimsiest excuses. But the Hindu-Muslim chasm has widened during the past three years, thanks to the growing popularity of the pro-Hindu BJP, which now shares power with the Janata Dal in the coalition government headed by Chimanbhai Patel.

This time, the spark was provided by the pompous Ganesh festival. Everywhere, the trouble was triggered either by provocative slogans of the processionists or by heavy stone-throwing on the marchers. Soon, shops in Baroda, Anand, Ankleshwar, Surat and Bardoli were looted and set ablaze, passers-by assaulted or stabbed, vehicles destroyed, and even religious shrines damaged.

The police, caught napping, belatedly opened fire, killing five in Baroda and two in the nearby dairy town of Anand. Eight others died of stab wounds

Apart from the heavy damage caused to life and property, the riots have soured relations between the two coalition partners—the Janata Dal and the BJP. Nalini Bhatt, a BJP minister, was actively involved in organising the festivities, and the Janata Dal chief Narpatsinh Chavda, accused him of engineering the riots.

But the BJP's Keshubhai Patel has said that it is high time a committee was formed to iron out the differences between the coalition partners. •

Mahesh Trivedi/Ahmedabad

Flinging the gauntlet

A tribal organisation challenges the ULFA

ASSAM

The inexorable march of the ULFA (United Liberation Front of Assam), which has extended its sway over much of upper Assam, seems to have been halted in the tribal-dominated areas of North Lakhimpur. The United Reservation Movement Council of Assam (URMCA), an umbrella organisation of tribal and backward communities, has challenged the ULFA's sway and forced it to beat a tactical retreat, in North Lakhimpur district.

The URMCA, which maintains close links with the Naxalite faction led by Bhaskar Nandi and has the All Assam Tribal Students Union (AATSU) and the All Mishing Students Union (AMSU) under its fold, aims at protecting the tribals against forays by the ULFA.

Whether the formation of the URMCA was a spontaneous reaction of a harassed people or was inspired by external agencies is not yet clear. But it goes to the ULFA's credit to have retreated in the face of the URMCA challenge in order to avoid bloody clashes. It held two meetings recently with the AATSU—one at Guwahati and another at Dergaon—in the wake of sporadic skirmishes between the activists of the two organisations.

Though no unanimity of views between the two groups was reported, they have agreed to maintain peace by not encroaching upon each others areas of influence.

The AATSU has raised the Tribal Volunteer Force (TVF) to resist the ULFA. The formation of the TVF had become necessary because of the inaction of the state police and the administration in containing the terrorist activities attributed to ULFA. "With the rise of the ULFA in Lakhimpur and Dhemaji districts, the entire AASU (All Assam Students Union) and the AGP (Assam Gana Parishad) have joined the extremists and their anti-tribal policies are now being reflected in the ULFA's activities," says the URMCA chief, Ranoj Pegu.

The TVF squads are, therefore, deployed as resistance groups to stave off the ULFA militants. "The TVF would not hesitate to take up arms to counter any attack on the tribal villages," warns AATSU president Paramananda Chhaengiya, a doctor from the Mishing community.

The URMCA, AATSU and AMSU exercises are seen by political observers as an attempt by the tribal communities to assert their identity. These organisations, known for their tough anti-AGP stand, have been demanding the reorganisation of Assam along ethnic lines while maintaining good relations with the Muslims, the Naxalites and even the Congress(I).

The tribal activists feel that the ULFA, despite professing to respect the cultures and traditions of all ethnic groups in the state, has actually been transformed into an organisation of Assamese chauvinists. Though the ULFA has prohibited criticisms of any language, culture or religion, the AATSU complains of calculated harassment of the tribals by some ULFA activists.

MANJIT MAHANTA

ULFA guerillas: tactical truce

TVF activists: taking on the ULFA

Thus, with the URMCA organising the tribals against the ULFA and the latter determined to forge ahead, the ethnic conflict in upper Assam may sharpen in the future. The present truce may well be a lull before a storm.●

Rabijit Chowdhury/Guwahati

Filthy lucre

Veerappan Moily is accused of misappropriating money

KARNATAKA

Karnataka minister Veerappa Moily is in the news once again. Only, this time around, it is not the Machiavellian Ramakrishna Hegde and a hidden tape-recorder that have put Moily in a spot, but an incriminating letter and a designer house.

Leading an unsuspecting Moily to the court is a Cabinet colleague, B. Basavalingappa. Although oneupmanship is common among politicians, this is the first time that the acrimony between two ministers has come out into the open and threatens to turn into a smear campaign.

For some years now, forest minister Basavalingappa has borne a grudge against the law and parliamentary affairs minister Moily, for not returning the Rs two lakh the former claims Moily owes him.According to Basavalingappa, Moily had borrowed Rs two lakh as the leader of the Opposition in the Legislative Assembly for electioneering against Ramakrishna Hegde in the Kanakapura bye-elections in 1983. He never returned the money.

After persistent reminders, Basavalingappa received a photostat copy of a letter written by Moily to the then treasurer of the All India Congress Committee, Seetaram Kesri. In the letter, Moily had requested Kesri to square the outstanding loan. "I authorise him to collect the money I had borrowed as hand loan for immediate payment." wrote Moily.

Kesri did not oblige. An adamant Basavalingappa got back to Moily who still refused to shell out. Another letter followed asking for the money plus interest. Not getting a response, a furious Basavalingappa sent a legal notice in 1984 asking for a total sum of Rs 2,39,000. This drew a response from Moily. He had not borrowed the money, he said, and the demand was an "untenable contention".

"I was utterly shocked when he denied taking the money," says Basavalingappa. When mutual friends failed to settle the issue between the two, Basavalingappa filed a case with the Veerappan Moily: dirty hands?

Bangalore City Civil Court demanding Rs 2,81,000 with interest at the rate of 18 per cent.

Moily's reply stated: "The suit is false, frivolous, vexatious and instigated with the ulterior motive of defaming me. The plaintiff is evidently taking advantage of the letter to Kesri. It was issued in good faith to recommend payment of Rs two lakh to the plaintiff on the representation that he had spent that much for electioneering and propaganda in Kanakapura elections." In reply to Basavalingappa's contention that the letter to Kesri clearly incriminated Moily, he retorted: "It is a forgery. I have not written any such letter as I have not borrowed any money from him. If he spent Rs two lakh, it is his lookout. I cannot meet everyone's expenses from my pocket."

And Moily is ready to take on his opponent: "If Basavalingappa is so convinced that he has a case against me, let him pursue it. It has been four years since he filed the case. Why is it moving so slowly?"

While the two ministers fight it out in court, Moily has also become the centre of a controversy over the house rent allowance he has been collecting from the government. The issue came to light last week when a lawyer filed a High Court petition against him for collecting Rs 9,000 as rent for the house owned by his wife, where the Moily household lives. It was not right of the minister to collect such a huge amount from the already depleted state treasury, the petition claimed, to pay his wife as rent.

Apparently, Moily's rival was involved in this too. Basavalingappa got in touch with another Congressman, A.K. Subbaiah who had one of his friends file the case before the High Court. And during the debate it was Where have the girls gone?

A police effort to save 41 women from prostitution falls through

The police did a good job, but in the end their efforts came to naught.

It happened last month, in Munshigunge, Calcutta's portside redlight district. Acting on a tip-off, the deputy commissioner (DC) of police (port) and the officer-in-charge of the Watgunj thana, stationed their forces in plain clothes in the redlight zone. The DC had information that 41 girls were to be brought to the Munshigunge brothels that day.

The operation lasted two and a half hours. One by one, the police picked up 41 girls, of whom 36 were from Nepal. To the trained police eye they all looked underage, so they were booked under the Juvenile Justice Act. "This was the biggest such operation in Calcutta," claims the DC.

As most of the girls were from alleged that the site had ben allotted to Moily through the MLA's housing cooperative society in the first place, and he had it illegally transferred in his wife's name.

"Nothing about it was illegal," said Mrs Malati Moily. "Since he was just an MLA and an advocate then, and we could not get much loans for building the house, we had it transferred in my name. I am an income tax assessee and have two industries. On this we raised loans and built the house." And Veerappa Moily agrees. "Everything was above board," he says. "Transferring the site was also done within the Bangalore Development Authority's rules. There has been no fraud perpetuated in this case."

As for the rent he had been collecting, Moily said the state government had processed his application and granted the amount. Though the Moilys had asked for Rs 9,000 the government fixed the rent at Rs 8,000. But generally ministers living in their own houses are granted only Rs 1,000 a month. "What he is doing is illegal and anyone with any conscience would not be doing such a thing," says Subbaiah.

The Opposition soon latched on to the controversy. J.H. Patel, president of the state Janata Dal, called for Moily's ouster from the Cabinet and also demanded chief minister Veerendra Patil's resignation. "The matter has gone to the court," said the CM, "Let the court decide." •

Gauri Lankesh/Bangalore

High pressure

Dal leaders from the hilly and backward districts unite against Biju Patnaik

ORISSA

The hiatus between Bhubaneswar and western Orissa is increasing, so much so that it is creating a clear rift within the ruling Janata Dal. And the beleaguered man is chief minister Biju Patnaik, whose hands are already full with a plethora of problems.

While the anti-reservation stir in the coastal districts of the state took the government by surprise and forced Biju to spurn the Mandal Commission's recommendations on the grounds that they were full of "incongruities", the Dal's legislators from the state's western districts feel that the quota policies were not entirely irrelevant.

Hota: demanding his share

What has made matters worse for Biju is that leaders from the districts of Sambalpur, Bolangir, Kalahandi, Phulbani and Sundargarh, which have a predominantly tribal population, have formed themselves into a pressure group to extract their share of development funds from the state budget. And leading this anti-Biju cabal is Bhabani Shankar Hota, the Janata Dal MP from Sambalpur.

On 10 September, the Dal leaders of Sambalpur met to chalk out their plan of action, and the party's stalwarts from the other four districts, which form Orissa's most backward regions, are expected to join hands.

In fact, the Union deputy minister for sports and youth affairs, Bhakta Charan Das, who has been persistently demanding the economic uplift of Kalahandi, has openly charged the state government of being oblivious to the woes of this tribal region. Yet, before the elections, the Janata Dal had extracted considerable political mileage by highlighting the acute poverty of this district. Das told SUNDAY that he had decided to tour this district for at least four days every month, even if it meant quitting his job at the Centre. Das regrets that welfare assistance to Kalahandi has shrunk during the last six months of Janata Dal rule compared to what it used to be during the Congress(I) regime.

Balagopal Mishra, a Dal MP from Bolangir, is equally disillusioned. He is sore over the lack of development activities in his constituency and is toying with the idea of launching a stir under the banner of Western Orissa Liberation Front on the lines of the Gorkha National Liberation Front in Darjeeling, West Bengal.

Surely, the tug-of-war between Biju and his partymen from western Orissa is going to intensify in the coming months. •

Sarada P. Nanda/Bhubaneswar

Nepal, the kingdom's consulate in Calcutta was contacted. But the officer who arrived, couldn't be of much help. The only information that he could coax out of the bewildered girls was that they had been promised jobs in Calcutta.

The girls were produced before the magistrate at the Metropolitan Juvenile Court, in Salt Lake, on 11 August. The judge looked at the girls and concluded that 31 of them were adults. Birth certificates were not called for, nor did he feel it necessary to order ossification tests to determine their age.

The judge relied on his eyes only. "I observed the physical growth and appearances," he writes in his verdict, and felt that "most of the girls were overaged and well above the age of 18 years". He found only 10 of them to be minors and directed that they be sent to the Liluah home for destitute women. Regarding the rest, the judge ordered that "they be set at liberty at once".

So the girls were set free. And the police do not know whether they have fallen into the clutches of their employers again.

Maybe, the police aren't interested in knowing either. After all, it's the pimps who have had the last laugh. •

The rescued girls: duped innocents

Coming home

Goans start returning from Kuwait, but hundreds are still stranded

GOA

Dinanath Kerkar's house at Sancoale is crowded. The 58-year-old Kerkar has fainted because of low blood pressure. As he is revived, he cries for his son, Amar, stranded in Kuwait. Amar had taken his wife and child with him two months ago. The fate of all three is unknown.

Sixty-two-year old Magdalena Costa from Calangute has been waiting for her children to return home ever since the invasion of Kuwait. She remains glued to the TV, hoping to get some news of her 11 children. She talks about her dream: the plane carrying her children explodes in mid-air.

Such are the travails of people who have their relatives in Kuwait. There are hundreds of Goans who have not heard from their relatives since the country was occupied by Iraq. And a handful of people who have managed to come back, recount their harrowing experiences, adding to the anxiety of the local residents. Their stories are very different from the assuring tales aired by the government of India over the electronic media.

For instance, Agnel Fernandes, who returned to Goa on 21 August, is yet to recover from the 16-day ordeal he underwent in an Iraqi prison. He told SUNDAY that at around 5.50 am on 2 August, when he was on his way to work, Iraqi soldiers suddenly rounded up 4,000 people on the streets, herded them into buses and packed them off to jail.

The prisoners went on hunger strike, which was called off only after they were assured of proper treatment. "Among us was a pregnant Goan woman and there was no one to look after her. We were served either one or half a loaf of bread daily, along with dal for meals. Those who tried to run away, were shot," he said.

Anacleto Fernandes, another evacuee , said, "The Iraqi soldiers knocked on the door of my flat. When I opened the door, they stormed in and tried to take me away. When I told them that I had my wife and children inside, they became all the more adamant. I had to leave without bidding them goodbye, because I was dragged away. Till today, I don't know the fate of my wife and my grown-up daughters."

Understandably, after listening to such first-hand accounts the people here grew restive. The worried relatives were seen making a beeline for the local telegraph offices to make telephonic contact with their kin. But, when all attempts to establish contacts failed, tension began to increase.

For days the ruling Progressive Democratic Front (PDF) remained nonplussed. Then, when criticism against the governments' lackadaisical attitude mounted, an information cell was set up in Panaji. Interestingly, this has remained on paper. For, although over 7,500 enquiries were filed to find out about the estimated 35,000 Goans in Kuwait, the Cell has failed to give information on the whereabouts of a single Goan. Worse, the Cell which was scheduled to remain open round the clock, now functions as any other government office.

Following an outcry from the press, over the government's laxity in ascertaining the fate of the Goans, a three-member government delegation, which included tourism minister Churchill Alemao and industries minister Somnath Zuwarkar, decided to tour the Gulf states, in a bid to help stranded Goans.

Education minister Sashikala Kakodkar has, meanwhile, issued instructions that students returning from Kuwait should be given admission in educational institutions. All they will have to do is produce affidavits, if they are unable to furnish school leaving certificates. A task force has also been stationed in Bombay to help those who are coming back. Accommodation is also being provided to those

Soap opera

An attempt to hijack an Indian Airlines plane fails

"I never thought I would fail," moaned Mahalingam, as he sat in the lock-up of a Bangalore police station. He was flying high a few hours earlier, in an Indian Airlines Boeing 737 flight from Coimbatore to Madras, when he thought he would hijack the plane to Australia.

The 26-year-old youth, who dropped out of an engineering course, said: "I either had to go to Australia to realise my dream of becoming a scientist or commit suicide." He opted for the first and tried to pass off a cake of soap wrapped in a handkerchief as a grenade in a bid to scare the captain into flying him to Perth.

But the pilot saw through the hoax, landed the plane at Bangalore airport on the plea of refuelling, and soon Mahalingam found himself behind bars.

While the police put down Mahalingam, who has a brilliant academic record, as "mentally deranged" and some newspapers dubbed him "a desperado", he turned out to be just an emotionally depressed youth. When he read of some Russians successfully hijacking a plane to Karachi and Stockholm, he seriously began who wish to stay in Bombay for a few days before coming to Goa.

A Goan in Kuwait: end of the dream

At the moment, the concern of the people here is solely about the safety of their relatives in the war-ravaged country. The economic impact of the Gulf crisis on Goa is still not being considered, and what the state government does to rehabilitate the displaced people is left to be seen. But what is certain is that the fortunes of a large number of Goans have been shattered. ● thinking of doing the same.

Bosco De Souza Eremita/Panaji

For two months he mulled over the idea. When he had saved just enough money, he bought an air ticket, packed a few clothes, picked up all his certificates, and boarded a flight for the first time. "I was excited. I never thought of buying a real hand grenade because I did not want to hurt anyone," he said.

When the pilot saw through his ploy, Mahalingam knew his game was up. And as the police cordoned off the aircraft and came to arrest him, he gave in without a murmur. Now the police, who have held him under a list of charges under the Anti-Hijacking Act, are wondering whether anyone will come to bail him out. As for Mahalingam, an adventure movie [illegible] that his flight thriller [illegible] ending. ●

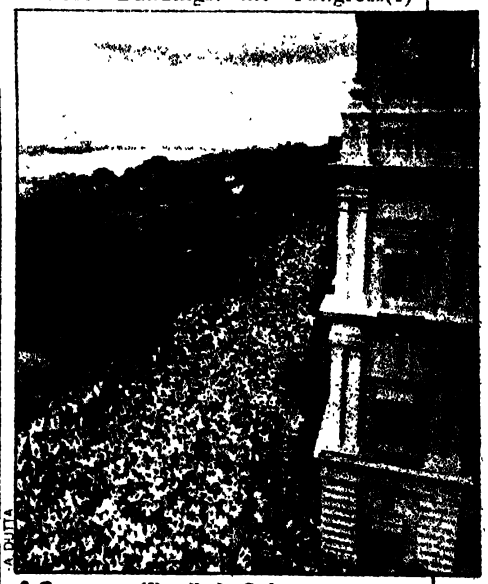
Writers' block

The Congress(I) stages a show of strength in Calcutta

WEST BENGAL

As chief minister Jyoti Basu and his ministerial colleagues huddled in their air-conditioned cubby-holes in Writers' Buildings, the crowds, raucous but disciplined, began to gather on 12 September. The siege of Writers' Buildings, the Edwardian red-brick seat of the state government, had begun.

Under the scorching September sun, thousands of Congressmen waited with patience and unexpected discipline as their leaders predicted the downfall of the Marxists. The Congress(I) leaders, normally a cabal of warring chieftains, had buried their hatchets that day.



All through the afternoon, six large meetings continued simultaneously in central Calcutta, paralysing the city and Howrah, and leaving Left Front leaders a little pensive. Temporarily at least, the senior Congressmen had forgotten their old blood-feuds and the rally was a departure from the normal divided-we-stand united-we-fall politics.

Quick to counterattack, PCC(I) president, A.B.A. Ghani Khan Choudhury asked Congressmen to prepare for a Bangla Bandh after the Durga pujas, a four-day festival of cheerful extravagance at the end of this month, were over. "Jyoti Basu has lost the confidence of the people. We will drag him from inside Writers' Buildings," he said. Other leaders including former union ministers Priyaranjan Dasmunshi, Ajit Panja, and Pranab Mukherjee, and legislators Subrata Mukherjee and Somen Mitra turned on the heated rhetoric.

Even unprecedented success did not help to paper over all the cracks in the party. Supporters of Ajit Panja and local MLA Sadhan Pande clashed publicly while other hot-blooded workers, in a breach of discipline, attempted to break into the heavily guarded Writers' Buildings.

Despite Jyoti Basu's bluster that the attempts to besiege the buildings had failed, no one was fooled by the ominous attempts at muscle-flexing by the Congress(I). Several lakh workers, mostly from the districts, had attended the rallies. Many more (about 40 per cent of the electorate in the state) are still staunch Congress(I) supporters. The "siege" after the bandhs called by the Congress(I) on August 16 and the SUCI and Naxalite combine a few days later was the third failure of the Left Front, still outwardly intact, but showing signs of inner-party conflict. After 13 years in power, the Left Front is losing its lustre, though there is little evidence that the Congress(I) has gained.

Still, if a journey has to begin to the seats of power in the gaddis of Writers' Buildings, the Congress(I)

A. DUTTA

A Congress(I) rally in Calcutta: bouncing back made several firm strides on 12 September. If only for the exemplary, if unlikely, discipline of its workers the march to Writers' was a success. The state assembly elections are still two years away, but if the long hours of power cuts, the industrial desolation continues and the crime-rate, including atrocities on women, continues to soar, the Congress(I) might begin thinking of an upset even in 1992. But without hard work and party unity, dreams of victory will remain mere dreams. ●

Srinjoy Chowdhury/Calcutta

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

Chariots of fire

The Bharatiya Janata Party's rath will send the country up in flames

In Urdu, it is called noora kushti, an exhibition of free-style wrestling where the combatants are not really fighting each other but putting up a display of acrobatics, every move fixed in advance but driving the audience to frenzy by appearing to be the real thing. As BJP president L.K. Advani's chariot of fire rolls out of Somnath and heads out towards Ayodhya, through eight states of central and northern India, the real battle over the future of India is being joined. V.P. Singh's antics are merely a diverting noora kushti. Where the real action is the grim struggle being waged between secularism and communalism to capture the destiny of India.

Strange. For we are all, it would seem, secularists now: the reality of our multi-religious society is so overwhelming that the Vajpayees—and even the Advanis—of the BJP are obliged to rein in their atavism and pay lip service, if little else, to an equal place in India for each of our religions: sarva dharma sambhaava. What then is it that distinguishes the mainstream secularism of the Gandhi-Nehru tradition from the "positive secularism" of the BJP-RSS-VHP variety? Basically, it would appear, their differing attitudes to our historical legacy. The Gandhi-Nehru tradition exults in our composite culture. It not merely accepts but celebrates the immense variety of India. It does not just come to terms with diversity; it treats diversity as the cornerstone of our unity. It is a tradition which holds that if India is not a palimpset of every major—and several minor—religions of the world, it would not be the Bharatvarsha we have known for 5,000 years and more.

The BJP-RSS tradition, on the other hand, looks back in anger. A thousand years ago, they say, India was stolen from the true Bharatvasis. One symbol of that armed dacoity they see as the Mandir at Somnath: sacked 17 times by Mahmood of Ghazni and last razed to the ground by Aurangzeb. The other symbol of their sense of deprivation is the Masjid at Ayodhya, built by that "barbarous lootera", Babar, who they believe—fact or fiction concerns them not, only what they call their "faith"—demolished a temple and built in its place the Babri Masjid. Advani, flaming sword in hand, casts himself in the role of the avenging angel and sets out from Somnath to Ayodhya to wreak his vengeance on history. Shorn of sweet reasonableness—his usual mode of communication—the president of the BJP ceases to potter around like a benevolent bank clerk. He reveals himself for what he is: not the friendly neighbourhood walrus that you took him to be but an incandescent revanchist, with a chip on his shoulder, hatred in his heart and the impassioned mission of making today's Shahabuddins pay for the sins of their "ancestors", the marauders who entered India from Central Asia many thousands of moons ago.

Listen to him speaking at Himachal Bhawan, New Delhi, on 13 August 1990 (as reported in the BJP's official organ, the Organiser, 2/9/90): "The Ram Janmabhoomi movement is the biggest cultural movement in history to unite crores of Indian hearts (note the subtle equation of "Indian" with "Hindu") and assert the emancipation of Hindu culture (see, in a minute, how the gloves come off!) against the onslaught of medieval vandals (the "looteras", in BJP chief minister Sunderlal Patwa's far more pungent phrase!) and pseudo-secular and pseudo-intellectual elements (i.e., you and me!)."

Here we have the authentic voice of "positive secularism"—a shrill litany of complaints by an overwhelming majority against a cowering minority. The BJP is not impressed with the fact of the insurmountable majority of Indians—around 85 per cent—being

D P SINHA

Hindus. They will not rest till they have bludgeoned the remaining 15 per cent—most particularly, the Muslims and Christians—into conformity with their version of the "Hindu Way of Life". Paranoia is their hallmark, revenge the leitmotif of their politics: "(The Ram Janmabhoomi movement's) loud and clear message," says Advani "is that Hindu sentiment can no more be trifled with in this country". Who is trifling with this sentiment, he does not say. But onward Hindu soldiers, onwards to Ayodhya!

An echo here too of Advani's blunt assertion to a gathering of BJP bhaktas in Brent Council, London, last June: "Secularism has come to be equated with allergy to Hinduism"; followed by the outrageous parody: "The practitioners of pseudo-secularism (how they love the word 'pseudo'—but I am afraid there is nothing pseudo about these sods!) have to believe that though all Indians may be equal yet non-Hindus are more equal than Hindus"!

The BJP just do not understand the BJP president L.K. Advani reveals himself for what he is: not the friendly neighbourhood walrus but an incandescent revanchist with hatred in his heart and the impassioned mission of making today's Shahabuddins pay for the sins of their "ancestors" desperate need of the minorities to adhere to and assert their identity. Instead, they see every act of sensitivity to minority concerns as "appeasement" and every assertion by the minorities of their respective ways of life as a denial of "justice" to the majority. Why a Muslim turning to Mecca to pray harms a Hindu is not explained, but nationalism is equated with religion and patriotism with majority communalism.

The BJP has no confidence in the fact of the Hindu majority. They have no patience with the minorities' need of an identity. They cannot abide the colourful diversity of our society. Theirs is a catatonic obsession with the fear of being overrun. What Advani is about to do is to unleash across the country the Badlu Ram Guptas of the world. And who, you might well ask, is Badlu Ram Gupta? I don't know. Never met him. And don't wish to. But he is a typical BJP-RSS cadre, infuriated—as he writes in the Organiser (29/7/90)—by the 'abject and endless appeasement of the minorities, particularly the Muslims" Gupta adds: "The kind of monstrous interpretation that secularism has acquired here has no parallel or precedent in the entire annals of human history"!

It is this mentality that V.P. Singh has, through coalitions, brought to power in Gujarat and Rajasthan. It is this mentality that V.P. Singh has, through unprincipled electoral adjustments, brought to power on its own in Madhya Pradesh and Himachal Pradesh. It is to pander to the perversions of people like Sadananda Kakde—"The Hindus have fought 76 battles for the restoration of Sri Ram Janmabhoomi and more than three lakh Hindus have laid down their lives for the cause" (Organiser, 15/7/90)—that Advani is setting out from Somnath for Ayodhya. Already, innocent Muslims have paid with their lives in Vadodra for Advani's selection of Somnath as his kick-off point. Advani himself may ensure a whistle-clean passage for his jeep-mounted rath but everywhere he goes he will be provoking murder and mayhem against "the outward manifestation", as Badlu Ram Gupta has it "of the deep-rooted festering sore of discrimination against the Hindu nation".

Ten months ago, far too many of us—decent, humane people like my generous fellow-columnist, Vinod Mehta, who don't feel intimidated by a small religious minority nor threatened by someone else reading the namaz nor polluted by someone spreading the tenets of the Quran and the Bible—chose to describe a man who had secured less than a fifth of the vote as the "voice of the people". Far too many of us kidded ourselves into believing that propping up a 20 per cent government with a communalist pillar was not compromise with communalism but "coalition politics". Far too many of us fooled ourselves into believing that the pristine secularism of the communists would not be tainted by association with the communalists. And far, far too many of us thought the BJP could be the bulwark to shore up our democracy against the ruins of the last electoral verdict.

The crunch has now come. The time is now to stand up and say,
"Enough, no more
This music mads me
Let it sound no more!". The pretence has to be thrown off, petty politicking has to be put aside—and the real issue faced. In far less time than even so prejudiced an observer as I could have imagined, the communalists are demanding their price. The BJP has dropped all pretence of even-handedness and proclaimed its intention of jettisoning the "secularist mumbo-jumbo", putting the "mad minority zealots" in their place, and pulling down the "mosque-like structure" (not, mind you, the mosque!) called the Babri Masjid. (Quotes from the Organiser editorial of 1/7/90.) Advani has described the "country-wide VHP campaign covering lakhs of villages" as "a stroke of genius". And the mad zealots of the Bajrang Dal, the Vishwa Hindu Parishad, the Shiv Sena, the RSS and the BJP have banded together to pressurise the BJP leadership into "confronting the government" on "certain sensitive issues" which—please mark the Organiser's (8/7/90) words—"are basic to the BJP's policy framework and give the party its distinctive identity". No wonder Lal Krishna Advani has threatened in Bhopal to bring the whole crazy mansion tumbling down.

It is appalling, however, that Advani should have claimed he is starting his yatra in Somnath because Nehru's Cabinet sanctioned the restoration of the Somnath Mandir. As the Hindustan Times editorial of 11 May, 1951—otherwise sympathetic to the restoration of the temple—made clear: "The government is contributing nothing to the reconstruction of the Somnath Temple...Even the Saurashtra government is incurring expenditure only in connection with the usual services which all governments render in time of fairs and melas."

Nehru was, in fact, most upset about such "revivalism" which cuts at the very roots of our secular polity, as he made clear in his communication about the Somnath Mandir to K.M. Munshi, Advani's predecessor in the re-writing of history. Panditji wrote to the chief minister on 2 May, 1951: "You must have read about the coming ceremonies at the Somnath Temple... It should be clearly understood that this function is not governmental and the Government of India as such has nothing to do with it...We must not do anything which comes in the way of our State being secular. That is the basis of our Constitution and Governments, therefore, should refrain from associating themselves with anything which tends to affect the secular character of our State" (Letters To the chief minister, Volume II, pp. 388-389). And, after the ceremonies were over, Nehru wrote again to the Chief Ministers: "Our frequent declarations that we are a secular State are appreciated abroad and raise our credit. But they are not wholly believed in...The recent inauguration of the Somnath Temple, with pomp and ceremony, has created a very bad impression abroad about India and her professions (of secularism)" (Volume II, p. 462).

It is true, as Advani never tires of stressing, that President Rajendra Prasad himself (in the face of Nehru's stern disapproval) visited Somnath to perform the puja to mark the installation of the deity. But so conscious was he of the negative vibes that might be generated that he had to stress: "I would like to make it clear that these celebrations neither imply nor can imply that we are seeking to re-establish in our country the political and social conditions of a bygone age, nor does it imply that we are seeking to open again the psychological or physical wounds which have been healed by the passage of time...The great truth, I repeat, is religious tolerance" (Hindustan Times, 12/5/51). So, before Advani starts quoting the scriptures, let him put that in his pipe and smoke it!

Communalism must be stopped. Secularism must be saved. The spirit of Nehru must be revived. The BJP is heady with delusions of grandeur—even as the Janata Dal is heady with delusions of longevity. Rajendra Kumar Gupta, the president of the Uttar Pradesh BJP, may believe that his party has now emerged as the "teesra vikalp" (the Third Alternative). And Mulayam Singh Yadav may assert that the Janata Dal will not allow the Ram Mandir to come up in "saath janam" (seven generations). But, with only one Indian in ten voting for the BJP, the party—its pretensions to the contrary notwithstanding—is no vikalp. And with the BJP pulling its saffron rug from under the JD's feet, the JD has not saath janam ahead of it but not much more than saath haftey (seven weeks) to go. The end of this interreguum is imminent. But before it ends, the question that each one of us has to ask himself, VP-lover or no, is this: Are we going to let the chariots of fire send our country up in flames? ●

The views expressed in this article are those of its author and do not purport to constitute an official statement of the Congress party's position.

JAGDISH YADAV

The mad zealots of the Bajrang Dal, the VHP and the Shiv Sena have banded together to pressurise the BJP leadership into "confronting the government" on "certain sensitive issues"

The centre will not hold

The plan to open a cultural centre in London creates controversy

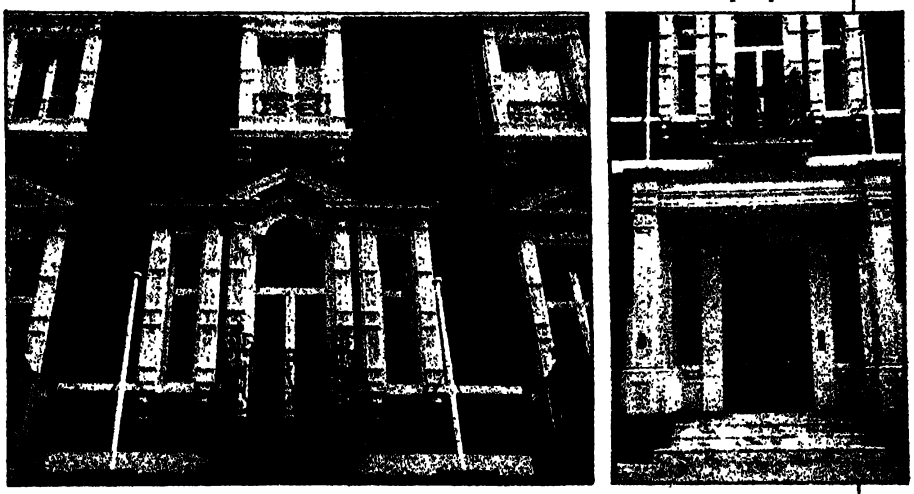
Until two years ago, 8 South Audley Street marked the site of a derelict building, crumbling away due to neglect. That, despite its illustrious history: it had, at different times, been the residence of such luminaries as the Earl of Scarborough, the Archbishop of York, Viscount Curzon and Queen Caroline of Brunswick, until it was acquired by the Indian high commission in London. But as dry rot set into the structure, it was used only by drivers of the commission to spend the occasional night.

All that will change now with the high commission's plans to restore the building and make it India's answer to Max Mueller Bhavan and the American Centre. Architects are already at work at what will be called the Nehru Cultural Centre, and will bring India's heritage—music, dance, experimental theatre, paintings, literature and films—to Britain, with a director (such names as Shabana Azmi and Girish Karnad are being bandied about) officiating over the show.

The project hasn't been without its share of controversies, though. A sum of £ 3.2 million has already been incurred on restoring the building and the commission's auditors have raised their objections to this, as the money was, apparently, spent without authorisation. Says high commissioner Kuldip Nayar about the scheme initiated by his predecessor M.K. Rasgotra: "Now that the building is there and work has started, we might as well do something about it. This place can effectively serve as a place where people of Indian origin and the British can meet. It can serve as a link to those who live abroad but like to keep in touch with India, and as a cultural centre."

Nayar now faces the daunting task of raising £ 1,00,000 which will be required if the centre is to function as a full-time office with a director in charge. He has already raised about £ 3,80,000 from contributions from local non-resident Indians and the like. The money, he says, will go to the India Foundation, a charitable organisation incorporated under British laws, to encourage cultural activities in Britain, which will be closely associated with the centre. As of now, the high commissioner is holding meetings with potential members of the foundation in an attempt to raise more money.

Meanwhile work at refurbishing the building at 8 South Audley Street continues. Restoration work includes removing the wet and dry rot, strengthening the foundation and repainting the rooms in colours which are traditionally associated with India. The roof has been covered with new slates and the windows replaced with double glazed units. The timber beams in the interior have been removed and replaced with steel or reinforced concrete, and the timber joists of the first floor strengthened so that it could be used as an auditorium. An attempt has been made to keep as close to the original design—stucco dressings, marble fireplaces and elaborate metal railings—as possible.



If everything goes according to plan, the reception room on the first floor will be converted into an auditorium, to seat about 150 people. One of the rooms will be converted into a bar and the other used as a reading room. The second floor will be converted into the residential quarters of the centre's director, and the third and fourth floors renovated to house other staffers. The rooms in the basement will be used by the artists. All in all, a plush, roomy centre for Indian cultural activities in London.

Nevertheless, the criticisms of the scheme are many:

- At a time when the high commission is contemplating cuts in jobs and services, such expenditure is wasteful and unnecessary.
- Indian artists are more likely to stage performances at Queen Elizabeth Hall and the South Bank, and don't require the centre.
- Select concerts featuring Pandit Ravi Shankar and Amjad Ali Khan have been held at the high commission before, with around 150 people in attendance. So, a small auditorium, as the one planned at 8 South Audley Street, is not required.
- London-based Indian artists don't need the high commission's backing or performing space, either.
- The post of director will soon degenerate into a job that is offered to oblige somebody by sending him for a paid holiday in London.
- The money spent on the centre could be put to better use by providing an information centre.

But while rumblings of discontent in the high commission continue, with memorandums being drafted and auditors protesting over the expenses, Nayar is looking to inaugurate the centre around the year-end. But it's bound to be a very hassled high commissioner who presides over the opening ceremony. ●

Shrabani Basu/London

At 8 South Audley Street: the proposed Nehru Cultural Centre

Southern offensive

Telugu stars Chiranjeevi and Nagarjuna now try to make it big in Hindi films

Vyjanthimala, Padmini, Gemini Ganesan, Hema Malini, Rekha, Rajnikant, Jayaprada, Kamalahasan, Sridevi...The list is endless: of stars who climbed to the top of popularity charts down south: and then risked it all in order to make it big in Hindi cinema. With varying degrees of success. While such actresses as Vyjanthimala, Hema Malini, Rekha and the now reigning queen Sridevi, effortlessly charmed their ways into the heart of the north Indian cinegoer, their male counterparts had a tougher time of it. Nobody remembers Gemini Ganesan's sole Hindi release today, while Rajnikant and Kamalahasan—whose smouldering presence sets southern screens on fire—proved to be the proverbial damp squibs.

Nobody is too sure as to what accounts for this dichotomy. But theories abound. One of them has it that while the fair, buxom southern heroines (and their thunder thighs) are a hit with audiences south of the Vindhyas, colour prejudice works against those short, dark actors, who are derisively referred to as 'Madrasi' heroes.

But, not in the least daunted by this attitude, two superstars of Telugu cinema, Chiranjeevi and Nagarjuna, are all set to storm the bastion of the Hindi film industry. And never mind the unhappy experience of their predecessors.

Chiranjeevi, who is to Telugu cinema what Amitabh Bachchan was to Bombay films in the Seventies, is today even more popular in Andhra Pradesh than N.T. Rama Rao was in his heyday. This, despite the fact that he resolutely steers clear of the mythological mish-mash popularised by NTR, acting instead in the regulation masala movie, with lots of disco dancing (or what passes for that) and dishum-dishum. And his Hindi launch vehicle, Pratibandh, an Ardh Satya-like movie, where a police officer single-handedly combats the evils of the system, is tailor-made for him, with lots of fight sequences and duets with the chirpily attractive Juhi Chawla.

Nagarjuna, the yuppie hero of Andhra Pradesh (though still second to the undisputed number one, Chiranjeevi) is best known to Hindi film audiences because of his alleged affair with the Pushpak heroine, Amala. But with the Hindi remake of his Telugu hit Shiva, a "violent campus story", Nagarjuna, the son of the legendary Akkineni Nageswara Rao, hopes to gain recognition for his acting prowess.

Of the two, Chiranjeevi will make an appearance earlier, his Pratibandh being released a week or so before Shiva. Telugu cinema observers are of the opinion that the film is bound to be a hit. Says Ravi Raja, the director of Pratibandh: "Chiranjeevi has worked his way to the top in Telugu cinema through sheer hard work and discipline. I feel he will make it big in Hindi films because he is determined to get national recognition."

Adds a Vijaywada-based distributor: "He dances better than Govinda or Mithun and his fight scenes are as good as those seen in Jackie Chan movies. Nagarjuna or Balakrishna (NTR's son) do not have his charisma. Even his flops are profitable in the long run."

Small wonder then that Chiranjeevi is regarded as a one-man industry in Andhra Pradesh. He commands an amazing price of Rs 41 lakhs, while his films, made on a budget of Rs 1-1.50 crores are sold for anything upward of Rs 2 crores and do business worth Rs 3 crores or so. Last year, his Attaki Yamudu Ammayiki Mogdu was one of the top grossers, while his latest release Jagadeka Veerudu Athiloka Sundari, co-starring Sridevi, is all set to overtake Shiva as far as box-office returns are concerned. Says Allu Aravind, who has produced many Chiranjeevi hits: "His screen presence makes him a veritable gold mine."

Nagarjuna, best-known to north Indian audiences because of his alleged affair with Amala, is determined to gain national recognition with his maiden Hindi film, Shiva

At 38, Chiranjeevi—who almost became a cost accountant after arriving in Madras from Mogultur, his village in coastal Andhra Pradesh—is the best Telugu cinema has to offer. Says noted director K. Balachander: "He is half Rajnikant and half Kamalahasan, because not only can he do action, he can also act." This testimonial is a little surprising as Balachander's Chiranjeevi-starrer Rudra Veena was a big flop. Though only because, as the star confesses: "People wanted to see me with an AK 47 not a veena in my hands."

On an average, Chiranjeevi acts in four Telugu films every year, most of them based on such Hollywood hits as Rambo and the various Bond films. Now, however, he'd much rather concentrate on making a dent in Hindi films. He explains: "I have reached a stage in my life when I am craving for a national image and popularity. That is the only reason I am doing a Hindi film. I will not do any second-lead roles and end up like Rajnikant. If I fail I will go back to Telugu films which have made me what I am."

Nagarjuna, the 31-year-old southern heartthrob doesn't share these doubts, appearing quite sanguine about the prospects of the Hindi Shiva. An engineer, with an American education, Nagarjuna was first introduced to Telugu audiences by his father Nageswara Rao in Vikram, a remake of the Jackie Shroff-starrer Hero in 1983. The film proved to be a runaway hit.

But a spate of flops followed until Nagarjuna's career was redeemed by Mani Ratnam, popularly known as the Steven Spielberg of the south, who directed him in Geetanjali. Not only did the movie get the cash registers ringing in Andhra Pradesh but was dubbed into Tamil as Idayate Thirudate, and proved to be a superhit in Tamil Nadu and Kerala. Geetanjali received the Swarna Kamal for its innovative approach in depicting passion and its technical brilliance. What's more, it established Nagarjuna as a major force in south India's film industry.

Close on the heels of Geetanjali came Shiva, one of the biggest blockbusters of the south. A far cry from the kitsch that passed off as cinema in Andhra Pradesh ever since NTR's days, Shiva proved to be the precursor of serious middle-of-the-road cinema in the state. Produced by the Nageswara Rao-owned Annapurna Studios, the story and presentation of the film owed much to Nagarjuna. Though it did glorify the cult of violence and indiscipline in the college campus, Shiva, with foot-tapping music by Illaiyaraaja, was the epitome of a slickly-directed pot-boiler, and brought realism into Telugu cinema for, perhaps, the first time.

Directed by Ram Gopal Verma, a former video-shop owner who used to supply Nagarjuna with the cassettes of the latest Hollywood starrers, Shiva is based on roughly half a dozen Western movies. Confesses Nagarjuna: "I am definitely influenced by Hollywood and its films. Verma vibed very well with me and we have tried to play down the usual melodrama and hysterics associated with Telugu films. Instead in Shiva everything is natural and casual. Most of the scenes were enacted as though we were having a normal conversation."

The idea appealed to audiences, both in Andhra Pradesh and Tamil Nadu. The Tamil version, called Udayam and sold with the catchy slogan: "A study in inhumanities", did better business than the average Tamil grosser. Made at a cost of Rs 75 lakhs, Shiva is expected to make about Rs 5 crores in Andhra Pradesh and rake in another Rs 2 crores in the other southern states.

But will the Hindi remake be just as successful? Nagarjuna certainly thinks so. "The Hindi Shiva looks very north Indian, even the extras are from Bombay and the other characters are well-known Bombay stars," he says. "Today the Hindi audiences are lapping up new heroes and ideas. And if Maine Pyar Kiya's dubbed Telugu version can be a hit in Andhra Pradesh, why can't Shiva be a hit in north India?"

The Shiva star's desire for national recognition, doesn't have to do with ego alone, though. Entry into Hindi cinema will enable him to feature in the kind of big budget slick starrer he likes best, but which is rarely made in his home state. And also star in expensive bilinguals.

Assuming, of course, that he manages to break the hoodoo that never allowed Kamalahasan and Rajnikant to make it in Bombay. Producer-director G. Venkateswaran, for one, is dubious about both Nagarjuna's and Chiranjeevi's chances: "I am very sceptical about their prospects because our heroes don't fit in with the north Indian audience concept. Nagarjuna and Chiranjeevi are wasting their time trying to make waves in Hindi cinema."

But neither of the stars have much time for such prophets of doom. And would much rather wait for the message of the box-office—whatever that might be. ●

Sreedhar Pillay/Madras

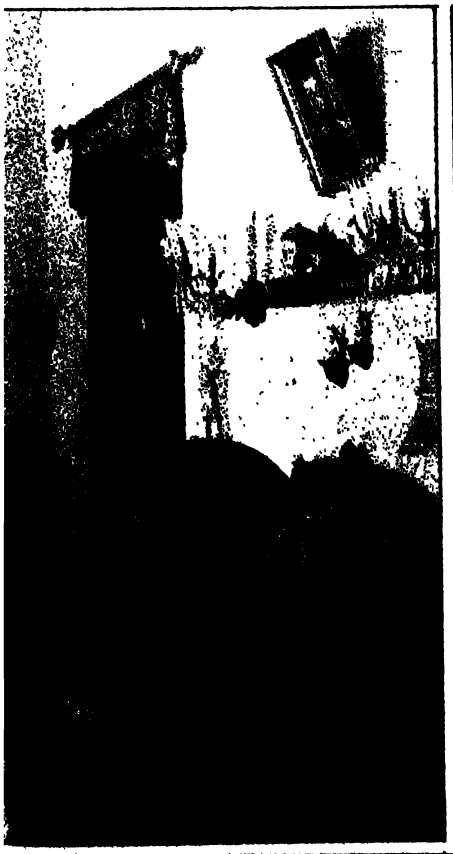
Chiranjeevi's Hindi launch vehicle Pratibandh, has him throwing his fists around with élan, and then taking time off to sing duets with Juhi Chawla

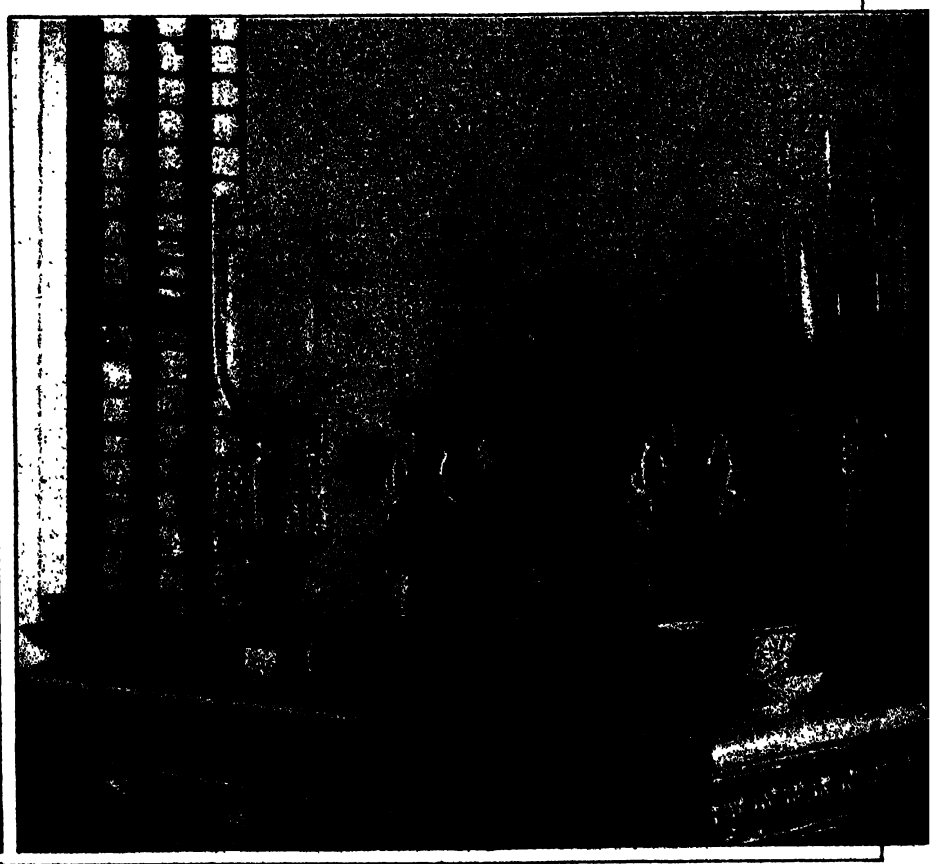
FAMILY HOMES

Suzanne Slesin and Stafford Cliff on distinctive Indian houses. Photographs by David Brittain

HOUSE OF SEVEN GABLES

Enrico das Dores Santana da Silva was born in the 300-year-old Portuguese Rococo house known as Seven Shoulders because of its seven gables, only three of which remain. The judge is a member of the eighth generation of a leading family of the imperial Portuguese colony in Goa. Sebastiano da Silva, who built the imposing residence in Margao, was an emissary to the Portuguese viceroy.

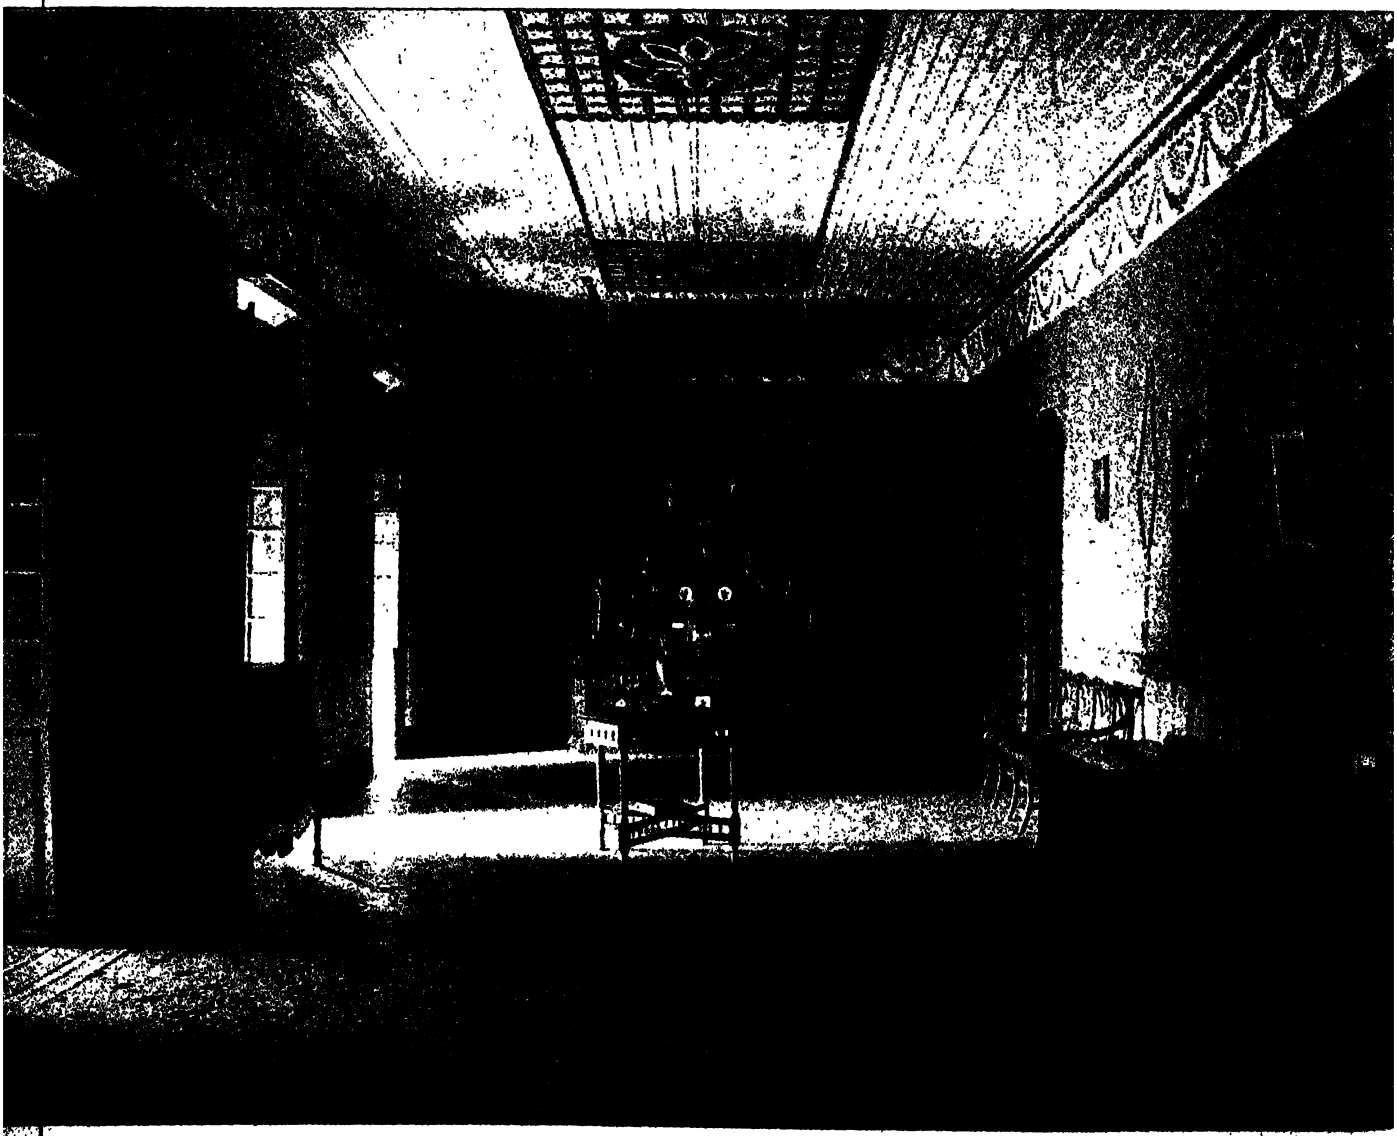




RIGHT: The drawing room was once part of an enormous salon with room for 200 guests. With its austere white walls, black-and-white terrazzo marble floor, and ebonised rosewood furniture, it is both stylish and refined. Gold and scarlet brocaded damask fabric hangs from early 19th century arrow-shaped rods

LEFT: Decorative plasterwork frames the doorways in the tiled-floor bedroom. The painted iron-and-brass Victorian bed has a half tester draped with lace

BELOW: European and Chinese ceramics from the 18th and 19th centuries have been arranged on a marble-topped console table in the drawing room. Carved and gilded wood hands once held large mirrors shipped from Europe



STATELY HOME

The Miranda house in Loutulim is one of Goa's most stately residences and has been in the same family since 1707. The Mirandas, descended from Hindu Brahmins, converted to Catholicism more than 200 years ago. The house's impressive oratory, or private chapel, underscores both the religious and decorative heritage of Goa as a Portuguese colony. It is presently owned by cartoonist Mario Miranda.

MONUMENTAL MANSION

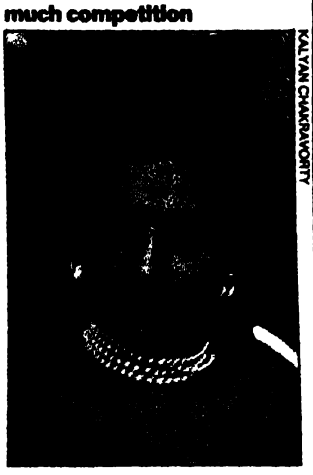
Set on Malabar Hill, one of the grandest sites in Bombay, Kilachand House is a 25-bedroom mansion that was built by a Parsi family in the late 1880s on a street known as the Street of Maharajas. It is presently owned by Tanil Kilachand.

LEFT: Twin symmetrical marble staircases rise gracefully from the entrance hall

LEFT: The oratory is focused on an elaborately carved tiered altar that is inlaid with tile. In spite of the icons, reliquaries, and other religious objects, the private chapel, where the household worships daily, is in keeping with the decor of the rest of the house

Indian Style by Suzanne Slesin and Stafford Cliff. Photographs by David Brittain. Printed by Thames and Hudson, London. Price: Rs 900

Obviously, the Rajiv Rai-Sonam love story has given much cheer to such people as Javed Jaffrey. For, the latest in filmi gossip columns is that the dancing devi...er... diva has swept up-and-coming oomph girl (if you'll, please, overlook the pounds of excess flesh) Shikha Swaroop off her feet.



Apparently, the pair discovered each other in the snows of Kulu Manali during a location shoot for Tehalka and realised that they had been made only for each other. After the regulation courtship in the course of sundry dance rehearsals, matters progressed sufficiently for them to merit a mention in film rags.

We don't know how things will go on from here. But she doesn't call him "duckie" as yet.

The rumours about the Madhuri Dixit-Aamir Khan affair may not have perturbed Anil Kapoor greatly. But it sure has got Reena, Khan's wife, very worried.

And what's more, it has led to a drastic image change. Reena, she of the demure Bharatiya nari looks, has now cut her hair short, wears figure-hugging jeans and T-shirts, and just about stops short of puffing Virginia Slims.

Madhuri Dixit: there's too much competition

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

We're not sure how Aamir reacts to this change.

But when reports last came in, Dixit wasn't too thrilled.

Sangeeta Bijlani: trouble's afoot

There's more trouble on Sangeeta Bijlani's horizon. And it's called Zeba Bakhtiar.

Not content with two-timing Bijli with his air-hostess friend, Salman Khan now has his roving eye fixed on the Kapoors' Henna girl. He was first introduced to the Pakistani beauty at Manali. And despite the disapproving presence of the various Kapoors, Chimpoo in particular, Heartbreak Khan managed to chat up Zeba in his own charming manner. And even sent her bouquets of the most expensive red roses in town.

The investment paid off. Zeba invited Khan over for dinner at an exclusive restaurant. Only the evening was spoilt by Chimpoo Kapoor, who sat at the next table and stared balefully at Salman, as he made his way through his now-insipid meal.

Now back in Bombay, Salman's still mooning over Bakhtiar.

And yes, Chimpoo is still out for his blood.

Finally, we have the truth about the Govinda-Neelam break-up.

No, the split didn't take place because the sophisticated Ms Kothari couldn't decipher the Virar ka chokra's accent.

Or even, because she resented the presence of old girlfriend/wife (depending on Govinda's public position) Sunita, who was a permanent fixture, despite his professed love for Neelam.

Apparently, the two parted company, on Neelam's initiative, because she couldn't bear being taken for granted. Not only did her lover keep her waiting on the sets, without a word of apology, he also carried on minor flirtations with other girls on the side, while throwing jealous tantrums when she was linked with such heroes as Chunky.

This wasn't the kind of relationship Neelam was looking for. So, she opted out.

After spending years on the fringes of big-time success, finally, things seem to be working out for Kimi Katkar.

No, she hasn't landed another prize role opposite the great Mr Bachchan; Shantanu is still not too keen on an on-going film career.

AMITA DESHMUKH

Kimi: the next Mama Katkar

But there is cause for celebration, nonetheless. For, only a couple of months after a radiant Kimi wed Shantanu, the lady is pregnant.

She's also very bored, what with dear husband coming back late at night from shooting. But the baby will give her something to look forward to.

Not all Greek

B.V. Karanth puts up a bilingual production of Hippolytus

When noted director B.V. Karanth got his repertory, the Nataka Karnataka Rangayana, going, he was sure about one thing. His students, talented though they undoubtedly were, would not be exposed to the paying public until they had got their act together.

All it took to change Karanth's mind was the visit of a Greek theatrical troupe to India. Former chief of the National School of Drama, Suresh Awasthi, informed Karanth that a team comprising such stalwarts as Calitsis Vasilios (director), Philip D. Kovantzis (music director) and Christopher Kikis (production manager) wanted to stage a Greek play in India. And would he like to collaborate on such a venture?

Karanth was willing, and began working on a bilingual production of the Greek tragedy Hippolytus with his foreign counterparts. The story revolved around a judicious mix of gods, godesses and mortals. Hippolytus, the illegitimate son of Theseus, incurs the wrath of the goddess of love, Aphrodite, by preferring to worship Artemis, the goddess of virginity. Aphrodite wreaks revenge by making Phaedra, Theseus's wife, fall in love with Hippolytus. Phaedra commits suicide in the end, making her husband believe that Hippolytus is the cause of her death. Theseus uses a divine boon to kill his own son.

This tale of passion and intrigue is told with all the regular trappings of Greek theatre, including a chorus. The only difference being that the chorus speaks in both Kannada and Greek.

Director Vasilios (26), who uses language as a "device of alienation" says: "Theatre which sets itself apart from the reality of the world, has a universal language. It is the only medium which can drive the viewer to think. A bilingual play can succeed better in this, especially with an audience used to leaning back and laughing."

The bilingual approach did provoke some adverse criticism, but Vasilios is unrepentent: "We tried to combine the Greek classic with what could be the most interesting aspects of Indian culture, to see where the two cultures could meet theatrically. And this has nothing to do with the understanding or logic or feeling." And sure enough, though the mix of languages was disconcerting at first, it never allowed the audience's interest to flag.

Vasilios also interpreted the story differently. His Hippolytus did not have "fully developed views" about women, while Phaedra was not a supine, remorseful woman, but one filled with anger at her plight. Raghunandana, a teacher at the repertory, translated the script from English to Kannada, opting for a free verse style, using a vocabulary easily comprehensible to the audience.

What gave the play its distinctive appeal was the quality of the music. Karanth composed the score for two songs, while music director Kovantzis used Byzantine tunes for the other numbers. Says Kovantzis: "In trying to write the music for this play I decided on Byzantine instead of purely Greek or Indian, as its rhythm is similar to Indian music."

But in the end, it was the students and the quality of their performance which kept the show going. The play lasted over three hours with no intermission: intermittent rain and numerous mosquitoes made it difficult to concentrate on the action on stage: and the emotional content of the script often made for heavy going. As Karanth explained to the audience before the performance: "This is an emotional Greek drama. Those expecting funny one-liners in this slow play will be disappointed."

He needn't have worried. The play, with simple sets made of brick and mud and the barest minimum of props, closed to a standing ovation.

For Karanth, however, this was only another play. And singularly unaffected by its success, he got down to working on a bilingual production of Mrichakatika (The Little Clay Cart), scheduled for a January opening in New York.

While the Hippolytus team makes its way to Delphi in time for the theatre festival next summer. •

Gauri Lankesh/Bangalore

Scene from Hippolytus; (above) B.V. Karanth: just another play

Crossing over

An exodus begins from the ranks of the Roman Catholic Church—to various breakaway groups

The Gajraula incident, where two nuns of Saint Mary's Convent were allegedly raped, sent shock waves through the Catholic Church, both in India and abroad. But while media reports played up this incident, several other instances of assault on Christian priests, nuns and teachers went unreported. According to Father Oswald Lewis, vicar general of the Lucknow diocese, over two dozen such incidents had taken place in Uttar Pradesh alone.

But it was Gajraula which proved the catalyst in getting the various bodies of the Church to protest. Protest rallies and marches were held all over the country, while several missionary schools closed down in anguish. In Aurangabad, 4,000 Christians, led by Bishop Dr Ignatius D'Cunha marched to the collectorate to express their unhappiness.

None of this, nor the letters written to the Prime Minister had much effect. Says Michel Joseph, one of the protestors: "If the Church had been strong, this rape would never have taken place. If we had protested strongly when Father Henry D'Souza was kidnapped by dacoits or when Janata Dal workers tried to build a temple in the campus of St John's campus in Agra, things would never have come to this pass. Turning the other cheek doesn't work."

But it wasn't just Christian doctrine which was behind the non-action of the Church. Weakened by the steady exodus from its ranks, it lacked both the strength and the will to take up cudgels against its tormentors. Though the Church professed to be unconcerned about the phenomenon, with Father Leslie J. Ratus maintaining that "those who have left are comparatively few in number, our churches are full, our religious services well attended", it was clear that all was not well with the Roman Catholic order.

For one thing, the number of splinter groups were increasing as was their membership (see box). The laity termed this "sheep stealing" but the rhetoric could not mask the fact that the desertion was voluntary. As early as December 1988, the Church recognised the danger—though only in private—and held an emergency meeting to discuss the mushrooming of splinter groups. Cardinal Simon Pimenta, president of the Archdiocesan Pastoral Council, led the discussion.

This was followed by a study of the exodus, conducted in Pune at the Jnana Deepa Vidyapeeth (Papal Athenaeum). Research findings had it that people were disillusioned with the Church because its "doctrinal teachings and religious practices were not related sufficiently to the scriptures" and there was a "serious lack of fellowship".

It was, perhaps, to provide such "fellowship" that Joseph Dias formed CROSS (Christian Revival Oriented Social Service) on Good Friday, 24 March, 1989. Dias, who felt like many others, that the Church was not doing enough, decided to unite Christians under the banner of CROSS. Among other things, the organisation exhorts its members to take part in the political process and stand for election. Says Joseph Dias: "Even in Pakistan, they have a priest as member of minority affairs in the Cabinet. When it comes to temporal and public affairs, the Church must act as a catalyst. Which it is not doing now."

Contraception, divorce, the act of confession and the concept of purgatory are criticised by the splinter groups. And the church has no answer except taking refuge behind dogma

But the ones who have strayed from the flock think nothing of questioning the infallibility of the Church. The Papacy's only reaction is to pound its authoritarian gavel and silence the critics, or even those who ask unconfortable questions. Father Luis Bermejo, for instance. The Italian priest, taught at the Jnana Deepa Vidyapeeth, the Catholic university in Pune, and published a book, Towards Christian Reunion, in 1984. The book questioned the Catholic Church's assumption that it was the only claimant to the title of the Church of Christ, and the scriptures which serve as shackles for the believers.

The wrath of the Church fell on Bermejo soon enough. The 60-year-old Jesuit was banned from teaching theology by Rome. The priest journeyed to the Vatican to plead his case and received another shock. "Six important Church officials felt that the procedure followed by the congregation was wrong," he recounts. "But they said I should keep quiet if I wanted a decision in my favour. I heeded their advice."

But restraint didn't work either. Says the disillusioned Bermejo: "It is strange that while Gorbachev tolerates dissent, the Vatican does not. Ever since Pope John Paul II took

Breaking away

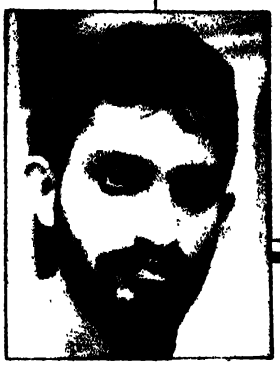
Some of the splinter groups of the Church

The Living Word Fellowship: Founded in 1972 by Allan Vincent. Most of members are Roman Catholics who have joined via the Catholic Charismatic Renewal.

Little Flock Fellowship: Its founder, Napoleon Desouza broke away from the Living World Fellowhip to start his own order. Its members meet twice week, for Bible studies and worship.

New Life Fellowship: Headed by Pastor Joseph, it has the largest membership. Funded by tithes and funds, the order meets every Sunday, with much singing, dancing and clapping of hands in praise of Jesus Christ.

Church of Christ: An Afro-Baptist church, it is headed by an American, Henry, and has about 30 members. Its service consists of drinking out of a thousand glasses filled with wine and eating unleavened bread. Members meet in Gemini, a cinema hall, every Sunday.



The Bible Speaks Outreach: Run by Americans, 90 per cent of its members are Roman Catholics. Funded by tithes, it distributes audio-cassettes on the Bible.

Jesus Cult: Rabidly anti-Catholic, it is headed by Milly Thomas and Amos, who claim to have been asked by God to preach the Holy Word.

The Charismatic Group: Its members sing the praise of Jesus and say prayers holding hands. The profess allegiance to Christ, but repudiate all practices of the Rome orders.

Emmanuel Prayergroup: Its members still belong to the Roman Catholic Church, but also hold their own meetings. Currently an investigation—headed by Cardinal Pimenta—is on into the affairs after members made some alleged anti-Mary statements.

Businessman's Fellowship: Members meet in hotels, hold massive rallies and claim that they are trying to help the Church of Christ.

Joseph Dias (left) and Cardinal Pimenta: disillusionment with the church (above) runs high over condemnations have become a routine matter." Bermejo is convinced that his case will be heard one day because God is on his side. But the average Catholic may well cross over to some splinter group or the other in the face of such provocation.

Especially since, as Father Leslie J. Ratus discovered, "these sects...seem to fulfil psycho-religious needs of certain Catholics whose spiritual and ecclestical experience in the Roman Catholic Church prior to contact with the sects left them either untouched or unsatisfied".

The explanation makes sense. As Dawn Gomes, who belongs to New Life Fellowship, one of the splinter groups, says: "Day after day the priests continue to say the same thing. It's almost as if they don't even believe their own rhetoric. They follow a man who was born in a stable but they lead lives of opulence. In the Roman Catholic Church you have to pay for everything and what you get in return are tired words and bookish reasons."

Those aren't the only objections of the various splinter groups. They also find fault with the excessive importance attached to Mother Mary in the Catholic Church and discount the idea of the Immaculate Conception. They believe in the New Testament, and maintain that they can communicate Christ person to person and no canon law can hold them guilty. Contraception, divorce, the act of confession and the concept of purgatory are criticised by them. And the Church has no answer except taking refuge behind dogma. Excommunication, once a powerful tool to get the straying sheep back in the flock, no longer works.

Instead, the non-believers walk out to join some splinter group or the other, most of whom are funded by American money. Or they begin Housechurches, conducting meetings at members' homes, where the mood is decidedly anti-Church.

The Church, for its part, seeks comfort in the fact that much the same phenomenon took place in the Sixties when the Children Of God and Jesus Freaks made their appearance in America and spread all over the world. That fad passed, they say, and so will this. •

Godfrey Pereira/Bombay and Aurangabad

The friendly Man from Eureka Forbes is about to demonstrate the most convenient way to keep your home free of dust and dirt.

One of these days the friendly Eureka Forbes salesman will ring your doorbell and introduce himself with his identity card.

This man inspires confidence – which is only natural. Because he is a member of the largest, most successful sales organisation of its kind in India. Backed by dependable after sales service.

He will introduce modern home products to cope with today's problems – dust, pollution, contaminated water and the lack of domestic help.

He has two unique products to demonstrate: EUROCLEAN all-purpose cleaning system, which is much more than a vacuum cleaner, and AQUAGUARD on-line, water filter-cum-purifier.

EUROCLEAN removes minute specks of dirt and dust in your home effortlessly. Even dust you didn't know existed. AQUAGUARD gives you clear, safe drinking water on tap – at the flick of a switch – even if the raw water has high bacterial contamination.

The Eureka Forbes salesman will show you – in your own home – how these products can bring the advantages of modern cleanliness and hygiene to your family. Making it a cleaner, safer world for you.

You need not wait till his rounds bring him to your doorstep. For further information do write to us at Eureka Forbes Limited, P.O. Box 936, G.P.O., Bombay 400 001.

Euroclean The all-purpose cleaning system which is much more than a vacuum cleaner.

Aquaguard On-line, water filter-cum-purifier.

EUREKA FORBES LIMITED Pioneers in modern cleanliness and hygiene.

everest/89/EFL/188 R2

Roll over, HTV

Doordarshan gets a new producer for Khula Manch

The Doordarshan saga continues. The National Front government's commitment to autonomy has taken another beating with Hindustan Times Television (HTV) being sacked from Khula Manch, the fortnightly interface between a minister and the public.

It was inevitable. Events had inexorably moved towards the terse letter delivered to the HTV office on Saturday, 8 September, informing them that their services as "consultants and presenters" would no longer be needed. In keeping with the new "policy", therefore, the two earlier presenters, Karan Thapar and Mrinal Pande, were replaced by PTI TV's Sashi Kumar and Nalini Singh. But no one was really taken in, least of all the HTV presenters themselves, who knew that this had been coming for a long time. "This is typical of an organisation that goes out of its way to double-deal," said a furious Thapar, who is also the executive producer of HTV.

Doordarshan officials echoed his sentiments. "We knew this would happen. But we were powerless to do anything about it," said an official. The high-profile programme, billed as a successor to the enormously successful Janvani, had spelt trouble for the government from day one. The first episode, featuring finance minister Madhu Dandavate, had faced charges of a rigged audience. The second episode, with the outspoken railways minister, George Fernandes, was hacked from 45 to 35 minutes, and let loose a veritable barrage of protests and hostile criticism. All embarrassing questions were slashed, leaving only "tame" questions on the railways ministry.

And, unfortunately for the lone Telugu Desam minister, P. Upendra, the snafu took place when Parliament was in session. Viciously attacked by both the press and MPs, the information and broadcasting (I&B) minister washed his hands off the whole programme and put the blame squarely on HTV. He was helped by widespread complaints that the two presenters, Karan Thapar and Mrinal Pande, were unnecessarily hostile and aggressive. In fact, George Fernandes announced that Thapar, in particular, was a "juvenile delinquent".

Judging by the way HTV was sacked, Upendra's ministry seems to have bungled again. "It is very obvious that someone, somewhere did not like the fact that awkward, forthright questions were being asked," said Thapar. "They throw dirt so incompetently that it sticks to their hands."

The letter, abruptly terminating HTV's services, came on a Saturday, a holiday for all government offices. For two days after that, there was no one in Doordarshan or the ministry to explain why the decision had been taken. "Doordarshan officials remained unavailable, the minister conveniently left for a tour of Hyderabad and the I&B secretary, Suresh Mathur, refused to come on the line," elaborated Thapar. After two whole days, he added, the minister's office informed HTV that he "did not think it appropriate to meet Mrs Bhartiya (the executive president of the Hindustan Times) or Mr Karan". This was particularly intriguing since the minister had been in close touch with them since the inception of the show. And, HTV had been dealing—not with Doordarshan—but with the minister.

Reacting to the ministry's explanation that there was no formal or written agreement with HTV for six shows, Thapar said that the matter had been explicitly stated in two letters dated 1 August, 1990 and 3 August, 1990. "What else is an agreement?" asks another HTV official.

For the ministry, however, things are clear. "The parameters of the programme had been stated clearly in the first episode, when Thapar himself had said that questions would be restricted to the minister's portfolio. This was violated in the second programme. Besides, the response to Thapar's abrasiveness, in particular, was so negative that we had to have another team," said an I&B official. And added hastily, "I am not saying that they will not be called again."

Viciously attacked by both the press and MPs, P. Upendra washed his hands off the programme and put the blame squarely on HTV

In charge of a fledgling TV company, Thapar is not too disheartened. "While I don't think we will get too many assignments now, I am sure things will eventually change," he says. "After all, anyone who is a serious television producer has to deal with reality." The reality of a medium caught in a vice-trap of governmental mores—so what if the Prasar Bharati Bill has just been passed! •

Minu Jain/New Delhi

Behind bars

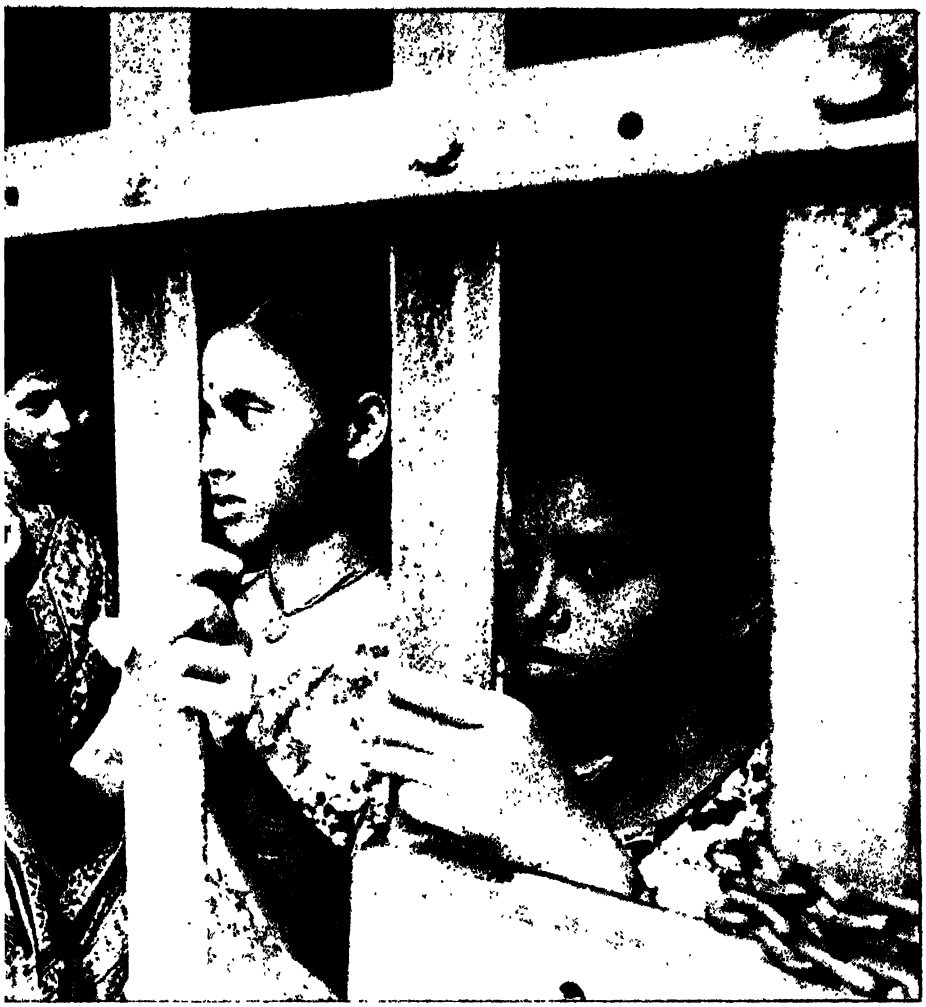
The Law Commission comes out with a report to improve the lot of women prisoners

It is a report that could well change the profile of Indian prisons—women prisoners in particular—if accepted by Parliament. The Law Commission's report on the status of female prisoners has suggested radical reforms to improve the lot of the woman in custody, who is at the mercy of a "hostile male dominated society".

Prepared at the behest of the ministry of law and justice by the Law Commission, the report makes no bones about giving preferential treatment to women prisoners. As Law Commission chairperson Justice M.P. Thakkar puts it, "We have to see how the law can be made more responsive to the needs of a woman in a male dominated society. After all, women are exposed to certain risks and it is up to us to take preventive action."

The report, which is yet to be debated in Parliament—women's organisations unhesitatingly describe it as "progressive"—essentially suggests the addition of a separate chapter in the Code of Criminal Procedure (CrPC) encapsulating the guidelines for the arrest and custody of women prisoners. For example, the commission has recommended that a pregnant woman should be exempted from undergoing imprisonment (whether for life or for a specified term), whatever the crime. It has instead proposed that the court should have the power to suspend the sentence for a specified period, subject of course, to certain conditions. The report further clarifies, "The period of suspension of sentence will not result in the reduction of the sentence of imprisonment as imposed by the court." It adds "If a woman sentenced to death is found to be pregnant the High Court shall commute the sentence to one of imprisonment for life."

The commission has also proposed that members of the fair sex should be excluded from Section 433A of the CrPC, which makes it mandatory for a prisoner to complete 14 years of imprisonment. The report argues that the "categorical application" of the section could cause undue hardship to women prisoners and their families—especially in cases where a woman's husband dies leaving behind young children.



Citing the case of a 17-year-old mother in Allahabad who killed her infant son and then attempted to commit suicide, the report has recommended that life imprisonment may sometimes be too severe a sentence for murder. Elaborating on the incident, the report states that the High Court had sentenced her to life imprisonment but had also observed that the "case was one in which a part of sentence of imprisonment should be reduced by the state government under Section 432 of the CrPC". There was no apparent motive for the murder, which appeared to have been committed "in a moment of rage". Incidentally, the young lady had lost her son and her husband had refused to accept her after that. Section 433A should therefore be amended accordingly, the commission has stated.

Prepared at the behest of the ministry of law and justice by the Law Commission, the report makes no bones about giving preferential treatment to women prisoners

Apart from making specific recommendations to commute the sentence of women prisoners, the voluminous report also concentrates on the treatment meted out to them. In carefully detailed sections, the report lays down the various guidelines to be adhered to at the point of arrest, interrogation and in custody.

According to law, a police officer will actually touch or "confine the body of the person" to signify that he or she is under arrest. The commission has now suggested a provision in the law by which no police officer shall touch the "person of a woman". The report has said that no woman shall be arrested after sunset or before sunrise. In unavoidable circumstances a police officer can do so only after permission from his immediate superior. And, in cases of "extreme urgency", when taking prior permission is not possible, the officer will have to explain the matter in writing to his superior. (A similar proposal was included in the CrPC Amendment Bill, 1988, which has now lapsed.)

Says Justice M.P. Thakkar (above): "We have to see how the law can be made more responsive to the needs of women prisoners (left). After all, women are exposed to certain risks and it is up to us to protect them"

On the question of medical examinations of the arrested, the CrPC has already specified that in the case of a woman accused, the examination can only be conducted by a female medical practitioner. This medical examination, however, is carried out only to secure the evidence of crime. The Law Commission, in this report, has added that medical examination should be undertaken as soon as the accused—whether male or female— is admitted to jail. The commission goes on to add that a copy of the medical report should be given to the woman free of cost.

The report lays down norms for interrogating a woman prisoner as well. It has suggested that a "relative or a friend or a representative of a woman's organisation" be present whenever a woman or a "young person" below 15 years of age is being questioned by the police. It goes on to add that a woman prisoner in transit from one prison to the other, or en route to court, or during investigations, shall not be handcuffed or made to wear fetters. And if required to leave the "female enclosure" in the prison, she will always be escorted by a matron or a female warden.

The commission has other ideas too. For instance, it recommends that if there is no suitable place in the prison for detaining a woman, she should be sent to an institution maintained under the Woman and Children's Institution (Licensing) Act 1956.

Finally, to ensure implementation of all the rules, the report has suggested that there should be periodic checks. It further specifies that at places, other than sessions headquarters, a judicial officer shall make an inspection of the jail at least once in two months. At sessions headquarters, such inspections will be conducted by a sessions judge. Says the author of the report, Justice Thakkar, "The object is to ensure that women prisoners are treated with dignity and that the wrong-doers are brought to book." The commission feels that there should also be visitors appointed by the government who will carry out surprise checks and submit reports to the sessions judge.

Most of these recommendations seem so innocuous and simple and yet they are so necessary, precisely because no one has ever thought of them," says a hopeful Justice Thakkar, confident that Parliament will implement it soon. But if experience is anything to go by, the report—tabled in Parliament last session—might well end up like all other Law Commission reports which are gathering dust. ●

Minu Jain/New Delhi

A campus death

And Jadavpur University staffers are charged with murder

The first time her neighbours saw Subala Das panic was the last time they saw her alive. "She was all too sure of herself," says a man who knew her. But on 26 August, Subala, 35, was dead—of burn injuries. And seven of her neighbours have been charged with murder.

Horrible. But not unheard of. What is appalling is that the incident took place inside the prestigious Jadavpur University's campus and the accused are university staff. And nobody is willing to comment. Probably because the accused includes a CPI(M) cadre, and the case might involve the top brass of the university. The silence of the students and teachers looms large as a monument to moral defeat. The ethic that perpetrated the crimes against women some months ago at Bantala and Birati, near Calcutta, seems to be gaining ground.

On 23 August, Subala had a tussle over tapwater with her neighbours in the Class Four staff quarters of the university. What started as a petty quarrel soon turned into a major fight. "Four of them held her as they doused her with kerosene and set her on fire," says Moyna, Subala's sister, flatly. "We couldn't stop them."

Subala's son Ananda, 15, had tried. He is still in hospital, fighting for his life. And receiving placebos as he asks after his mother. "We'll tell him once he's home," says Sumita, Subala's sister.

Home is the room the five sisters, their widowed mother and Subala's two sons shared—the room they were clinging on to, defying repeated unofficial attempts of eviction. The family primarily depends on Subala's younger sister Saraswati, who works at the university, as a peon. Yet, with a TV, a VCP and a fridge, they are clearly richer than their neighbours. Renting out the VCP provides a side-income, they explain. "They sell their bodies," says a campus resident.

"But this is a murder case," says a senior police official. "The victim's morals are irrelevant." However, the CPI(M)-dominated university non-teaching employees' union claims to have urged the administration on 22 August to evict the women on grounds of immoral behaviour. "The next morning, Subala set herself on fire," says Swapan Ghose, a union strongman. "Only to accuse these innocent people..."

The incident took place around nine in the morning. Yet all the neighbours seem to have been too busy with housework to notice a woman burning in the common verandah. "I was cooking and have no idea of what happened," says Anjali Sen, accused of dousing Subala as Anjali's son, Palas, struck the match. Her room is hardly 12 feet from Subala's door. According to Sumita, Bhaskar Rout, a CPI(M) cadre and university court member, had said: "Just burn her and I'll take care of the rest." Rout seems very relaxed as he sips tea in the campus tea-stall, his name written in huge red letters on the wall behind him—remnants of a winning campaign. "I was out shopping," he states. And Gokul Gharai, who reportedly started it all, refuses to comment: "The union will speak for me."

Subala Das and her son Ananda: victims of a bizarre morality?

The university registrar twice refused the police permission to arrest the accused till they got anticipatory bail

And the union does. "The FIR is totally fabricated," says secretary Harishankar Ganguly, quoting minor errors in it. The mistakes are highlighted, perhaps in an effort to weaken the plaintiff's case. Some believe the police to be involved, possibly under pressure, in the cover up. Because, Subala's dying declaration, reportedly taken three times, conflicts with both the FIR charge and the counter charges of the accused.

Even university registrar Bhaskar Bannerjee's behaviour strikes a few as odd. He twice refused the police permission to arrest the accused following Subala's death, till they got anticipatory bail. Charged with murder, an unbailable offence, the accused would have been unable to get out if arrested. "The registrar can't help it," says an administrative official. "He is a CPI(M) man."

In fact, this is not the first time that such a CPI(M)-backed union is accused of protecting criminal members. In 1982, the killers of Parbati Das, 12, who was raped and murdered inside the campus, allegedly by the sons of certain university watchmen, got away unscathed. But last time the ever-vocal CPI(M)-affiliated SFI (Students Federation of India) had taken some interest in seeking justice. This time, it is busy toeing the party line. "She was a prostitute," explains an SFI heavyweight earnestly, "and had no business being here." Bad morals—the unvoiced logic seems to be—justifies murder.

And flaunting its strict love of morals, the Red Brigade that once prided itself on keeping West Bengal the safest state for the second sex, now seems hell-bent on undoing its good deeds.

Antara Dev Sen / Calcutta

V. GANGADHAR

The ugly American

Ambassador Clark accuses India of breaking UN sanctions

The pictures on the television screen are heart-rending. Thousands of men and women, young and old, all unkempt with glassy stares, fight like animals while scrounging for the food packets thrown in their midst. The heat, at 50°C, is savage and sandstorms are frequent. As the starving people surge towards the food packets, security police lash them with bull whips.

This is happening to our brothers and sisters. Not just from India but also from Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh and Philippines. The Gulf refugees come from all over Asia. I could not spot a single White man or woman. According to reports, they are well looked after at five-star hotels.

It is in this context one has to study certain remarks made by William Clark, the US ambassador to India. We do not know if this 'Ugly American' has ever ventured out in 50° plus heat or had to scrounge for food and water. Clark's government which is spending billions of dollars in airlifting troops and arms to the Gulf region, is quite against New Delhi's feeble, belated efforts to send food to its starving population in the Gulf.

Clark told Indian journalists at Washington (he must have felt like Mr Bumble addressing Oliver Twist and his fellow orphans) that he believed there was "sufficient foodstuffs" in Iraq and Kuwait. But, what happens if the food meant for the Indians fall into the hands of the big, and bad Iraqis? Can't Clark persuade his 'wimp' of a President to loan us some Marines as well as members of the 82nd Airborne Division and other units to take charge of the foodstuffs from Delhi and see to it that they reach only Indian mouths?

Over the years, the United States had cared a hoot for UN resolutions. Yet, Clark has the gall to tell the press that food per se comes under the sanctions of the UN and that supplies from India would be breaking the sanctions. Ah, how law-abiding is the US! How touching is its faith in UN resolutions!

The 'Ugly American' also pontificated to the Indian press on the Punjab situation, accusing the government of "over-reacting in dealing with terrorism in Punjab when it could have taken recourse to other means of controlling people. This is a violation of human rights."

What others means, Mr Clark? The means used by your government to tackle the PLO freedom fighters who are identified as 'terrorists' by your clique? Why don't you suggest these "other means" to your own government?

Ambassador William Clark (above); Indian refugees in Amman: "sufficient foodstuffs"?

Naturally, there has been no reaction from the lily-livered government in Delhi to Clark's views on the food supplies and Punjab. How can they say anything after arranging a VIP tour of Punjab for Clark? I am a bit surprised that our media did not comment editorially on the views of the 'Ugly American'. Most of our papers are busy reproducing rubbish from the West portraying the Arabs as savages and Saddam Hussein as a particularly offensive specimen of the lot.

Criminal negligence

Sports and crime. These are the two most eagerly-read sections in any newspaper. Unfortunately, pontificating editors tend to look down on these two beats. Naturally, the quality of coverage suffers in consequence.

But there seems to be some change these days. Sports is getting better coverage, correspondents freely travel abroad to report on cricket, athletics, Olympics and so on. But there is no discernible improvement in covering crime.

Take the case of 'Auto Shankar' of Madras. It had everything readers would wish for—violence, blood, sex and the criminal-police link. Yet, after Shankar managed to escape from custody and was finally recaptured with his paramour in Rourkela, very few papers did justice in covering and capturing the human drama involved in it.

Starting as a rickshaw puller, Shankar soon switched over to auto-rickshaws and made money through the supply of illicit liquor and women to the Madras hotels. Ambitious and ruthless, he would not stand any competition and is reported to have murdered half a dozen people who came in his way, burying their bodies under the flooring of his house or burning them. He also had most of the policemen and politicians in his pocket. Such was his clout, that several jail officials are suspected to have helped him break out from prison and escape.

What a story! When our newspapers can ferret out so many secrets and shady deals of selected corporate giants and also uncover corruption at distant Sweden and Switzerland, why can't they do justice to simple, crime stories at home? Perhaps, there are no lobbies briefing them on these. ●

Over to Beijing

But not all is well with the Asian Games movement

Not since the Israel issue has the Asian Games movement received such a jolt. The threat to the pan-Asian sports jamboree was so real that, even a week before the eleventh Asian Games were to begin in Beijing, no one was really sure whether they would be held at all. And even if it did, whether the Games could be held smoothly.

On 2 August, Iraq overran Kuwait and proclaimed it as another province of that country. On the sports front, this meant Kuwait could no longer participate as a separate entity in the international arena. Had this "acquisition" received universal approval, all it would have meant to the Beijing Asian Games Organising Committee (BAGOC) was a change in its computer feed and minor readjustments in the schedules of some disciplines.

Unfortunately for Iraq, there was almost universal condemnation instead of approval. With the threat of a joint superpower military action, Iraq itself found it impossible to prepare itself for the Games. Despite the brave front it put up, it is difficult to see Iraq participating in full strength.

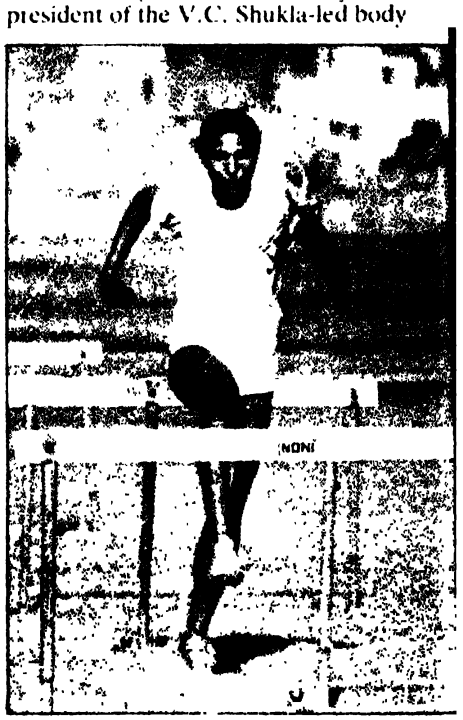
So much for Iraq's intentions. At the time of going to press, the pro-Kuwait lobby was working overtime to oust Iraq not only from the Beijing meet, but also from the Olympic Council of Asia (OCA). (The OCA controls the Asian Games movement.)

Ever since the president of the OCA, Sheikh Fahd al-Ahmed, was killed while trying to defend the royal palace from Iraqi soldiers, opinion in the OCA was overwhelmingly against the invaders. Sheikh Fahd, younger brother of the Emir of Kuwait, Sheikh Jaber, remained in the country after his brother had fled.

The Kuwait Olympic Committee being a one-man show, it was difficult for Kuwait to organise teams—especially from among the sportsmen in exile. With the country still under occupation, it was doubtful whether even officials of that country would attend the Games.

Even the legality of Kuwait's entry is in doubt, unless the OCA votes to maintain status quo. Headway had been made in this regard when the 11-member working committee of the OCA recommended that not only Kuwait be allowed to maintain its separate identity but that Iraq be banned from taking part in the Beijing Games. The committee went a step further in suggesting that Iraq's membership of the OCA be cancelled.

Two days before the scheduled opening of the Games, the full OCA council, consisting of 38 members, were expected to vote on the working committee's recommendations. Saudi Arabia, taking the lead in mobilising opinion against Iraq, hoped to get a comfortable majority when the issue was put to vote on 20 September.



The liaison officer for the Iraqi Olympic Committee in Beijing, however, had scoffed at the idea of the resolution being passed. "Politics should not be mixed with sport," Kais Al-Yacpubi said. He also felt that many of the bureau members who had voted for Kuwait would change their stance once the full council met.

But, with the International Olympic Committee voting to continue its recognition of Kuwait, the Saudi faction is already flexing its muscles. With negotiations still continuing, it is expected that the neutral members of the Asian Games movement will strive to maintain status quo, keeping Kuwait as a full-fledged member, but also ensuring that Iraq continued to participate in the Games.

The Games mascot

However, the most ironical development prior to the Games was, perhaps, the "Indian affair", as it is being called. The secretary-general of the OCA happens to be India's Chiman Lal Mehta, a former secretary-general of the Indian Olympic Association (IOA) and currently vice-president of the V.C. Shukla-led body recognised by the central government.

P.T. Usha: still the country's best bet

Mehta has no powers beyond convening meetings and chairing them on some occasions. Internal squabbles in the IOA had led to court cases on the one hand and administrative wranglings on the other. Even as different courts in the country heard the petitions of the two warring parties—one led by Shukla and the other by B.S. Adityan—the two were busy finalising their list for Beijing. BAGOC was in a quandary, not knowing which list to approve. And Mehta could do very little either.

The situation would have remained uncertain had not Roshan Lal Anand, former director-general of the NSNIS and now the IOA secretary-general of the Shukla group, sent an ultimatum to BAGOC. He stated that unless the Beijing authorities approved the list sent by him, India would pull out of the Games. BAGOC immediately relented and approved the list.

But then, once the Games get underway, attention will hopefully shift to the various arenas where skill will be matched by vigour and determination as 38 nations vie for the honours.

India may not do as well as they had done either in New Delhi in 1982 or in Seoul. This is because P T Usha, the golden girl of Indian athletics, is past her prime and will not be as strong a contender as she used to be. Even so, she is likely to top the Indian medal winners' list, with Bahadur Prasad in the middle distances and the men's and women's relay squads expected to win the gold, or at least, be among the medal winners.

The surest gold, of course, will be in kabaddi, an Indian sport being introduced in the Asian circuit for the first time. Preparations for the sport in Beijing began more than six months ago, with videotapes, copies of rules and demonstration games being staged.

Apart from kabaddi, medal prospects are bright in archery, boxing, hockey, rowing, shooting, yachting and weightlifting and perhaps, tennis. But if we win more than an overall tally of 25 medals, it should be considered an achievement of sorts. And never mind the pompous claims of the Sports Authority of India, which had initiated a programme of "excellence" four years ago, claiming that it would lead to more than 90 medals at Beijing! •

Arijit Sen

Playing host

China uses the Asian Games to improve its image

Ever since the 4 June massacre at Tianenmen Square last year, which horrified television viewers all over the world, the Chinese are desperate to end their international isolation and project a different, more humane image. And the rulers in China felt that the Beijing Asian Games could be used to do that. In fact, the Chinese authorities have not spared any expenses—it is estimated that the Games would cost a whopping 500 million US dollars—to make the event a grand success.

The main stadium in Beijing: the show begins

Beijing has already received a facelift. Roads have been repaved, building blocks have received a new coat of paint and the chubby Pan Pan—the official mascot—hangs all over the city. The authorities have also come down heavily on suspected trouble-makers. The fine for spitting on roads has been increased to ten times the usual amount. Some hoodlums have already been executed and the residents of Beijing have signed a pledge not to indulge in anti-national activities during the Games. As many as 728 students of Beijing University, who spearheaded the pro-democracy movement, had to spend ten months at the Shiziazhuang Military Academy for re-education. The kind of importance the Chinese are attaching to the Games can be gauged from the fact that 20,000 students in Beijing have given up their vacation to prepare for the Games.

The Chinese are using this sports extravaganza as a forum to clear the Tianenmen misconception. Said Wu Zhongyuan, a member of the organising committee: "The events of 4 June created some inaccurate impression in the minds of the people." And the organisers have begun a major international public relations exercise to set this right.

Here are some of the results:

- President Roh Tae Woh of South Korea is expected to attend the Games, although relations between the two countries are far from normal.
- China has mended fences with Indonesia, has resumed dialogue with Saudi Arabia and has established normal relations with Singapore.
- The symbolic flame of the Games started its journey from Tibet, which is under Chinese occupation.

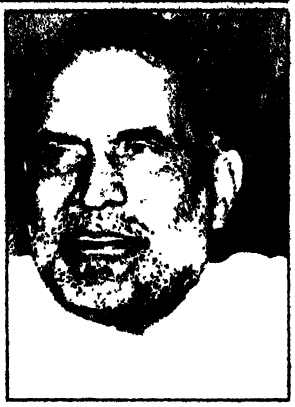
But only time will tell whether all this was worth it.

Shevlin Sebastian/Beijing

ODDS AND TRENDS

March for power

■ Calcutta, the much-touted City of Joy, is celebrating its tercentenary with flashy rides on horse-drawn trams, costume dramas and, predictably, long hours of loadshedding. It was in protest against the worsening power situation that hundreds of Calcuttans participated in a novel 'march for power'. On 10 September, the citizens of the city turned up in large numbers—braving heavy rain—to make Calcutta's first major non-political procession a success.



Organised jointly by the Calcutta Action League, Friends of Trees, INTACH, People United for Better Living in Calcutta (PUBLIC), Consumer Protection Centre and various Rotaract and Lion groups the silent march started from the Victoria Memorial and ended at the Deshapriya Park in south Calcutta. The processionists dressed in black and carried lanterns and torches, while marching down some of the busiest thoroughfares of the city. They also carried several placards with interesting slogans, denouncing the apathetic attitude of the state administration towards the power problem that has plagued the city for the last 20 years. Some of the snappier slogans were: "We pay for electricity not excuse" and "Kolaghat generates WHATS???"

At the end of the march, a charter of seven demands was adopted. Copies of this have been sent to chief minister Jyoti Basu and minister for power Prabir Sengupta. "We may not increase power generation with this march," said one of the organisers, "but we no longer intend to sit back and complain. We are determined to make those responsible feel just a little more uncomfortable than they have been doing."

SEPARATED AT BIRTH?

Ramakrishna Hegde

Chandra Shekhar

A new high

■ Mountaineers will have new heights to scale. The world's highest peak, Mount Everest, is supposed to be growing at the rate of half an inch every year, according to Professor Roger Bilham, a geologist at the University of Boulder in Colorado, USA. Professor Bilham has discovered that the Indian and other Asian landmasses are colliding at the rate of about two inches a year, "pushing the Himalayas upwards and the Everest, which about ten million years ago was under the sea, will go on growing because there is nothing to erode it".

Moreover, in the absence of any rivers to wash away the base of the mountain, its growth will continue indefinitely. Professor Bilham came to this astonishing conclusion after measuring the Everest with a gravity machine from the top of the peak using an atomic clock to calculate the changing height. So mountaineers can gear up for greater challenges.

MILESTONES

KILLED: Saimukh Singh, the Patiala district Nirankari chief, by armed terrorists in Patiala on 13 September.

DIED: Laxman Patro, noted freedom fighter and Sarvodaya leader, on 11 September at Berhampur.

DIED: Mukul Dutta, veteran sports journalist, of cancer on 12 September in Calcutta. He was 70.

ARRESTED: Arjun Singh, Madhya Pradesh Congress(I) chief, at Pichore town of the state on 11 September for his participating in an anti-reservation agitation.

ARRESTED: Kanji Karan Padiyar, the kingpin of drug trafficking in Bombay, on 11 September for smuggling heroin worth Rs 8½ lakhs.

CHARGED: Laloo Prasad Yadav, chief minister of Bihar, in a murder case regarding the 4 September anti-reservation violence on 11 September at Patna by the chief judicial magistrate of the city, Surender Narain Singh.

SELECTED: Utpal Dutt. eminent actor and theatre personality, for the Sangeet Natak Academy fellowship to be presented in February 1991, on 12 September in New Delhi.

SELECTED: Ram Gopal, noted dancer, for the Sangeet Natak Academy fellowship on 12 September in New Delhi.

AWARDED: Mercury Travels (India) Limited, the highest tourism award for 1989 for the promotion of tourism in India, on 11 September in Calcutta by the Union tourism department.

AWARDED: The Windsor at Melbourne, an Oberoi hotel, the award for top hotel accommodation and best restaurant by the Australian Hotel Association at Melbourne.

RE-ELECTED: Mother Teresa, as the superior-general of Missionaries of Charity for the sixth consecutive term on 8 September in Calcutta.

BEGINNING 23 SEPTEMBER 1990 BY AMRITLAL.

ARIES (21 March—20 April)

This is not a good week for those in service. You might have to face opposition from your colleagues. For artists, the time is favourable for they will be admired for their efforts. Letters will bring good news.

Good dates: 23, 25 and 29
Lucky numbers: 2,5 and 7
Favourable direction: South

TAURUS (21 April—20 May)

Not a good week for you. There might be problems on the domestic front. Be cautious on the professional front. Also, you will have to shoulder added burden. However, this is the time to strike new deals.

Good dates: 24, 27 and 28
Lucky numbers: 1,3 and 7
Favourable direction: West

GEMINI (21 May—20 June)

A very good week for courtship and marriage. Businessmen might suffer minor setbacks. However, others will make steady progress on all fronts. Take care of your health.

Good dates: 23,26 and 29
Lucky numbers: 4,6 and 8
Favourable direction: North

CANCER (21 June—20 July)

This week you must pay attention to your domestic front. Bad times will soon be over. Exercise tact and patience on the professional front. The time is not ripe for affairs relating to the heart.

Good dates: 26,27 and 28
Lucky numbers: 3,6 and 9
Favourable direction: West

LEO (21 July—20 August)

Those of you who are involved in intellectual pursuits will be successful. Others will have to face challenges. Be cautious in your dealings with members of the opposite sex. Romance is on the cards.

Good dates: 25,26 and 29
Lucky numbers: 3,4 and 6
Favourable direction: South-west

VIRGO (21 August—20 September)

Those in service will be rewarded with promotions. Romance is in the offing. Be on the guard against deceit. Exercise utmost caution in what you say and do. Keep an eye on your health.

Good dates: 24,25 and 27
Lucky numbers: 1,6 and 7
Favourable direction: East

LIBRA (21 September—20 October)

Your courage and confidence will see you through. This is a very favourable week for you. Romance is on the cards. The time is ripe for matrimony. A letter will bring good news.

Good dates: 24,26 and 28
Lucky numbers: 5,7 and 8
Favourable direction: North

SCORPIO (21 October—20 November)

Keep an eye on your health. Make the best use of the opportunities that come your way. The unemployed may get jobs. Businessmen should be careful in their dealings. Exercise caution and tact in whatever you do.

Good dates: 25,27 and 29
Lucky numbers: 2,4 and 9
Favourable direction: West

SAGITTARIUS (21 November—20 December)

A fairly good week lies ahead of you. Steady progress is forecast on all fronts. Letters will bring good news. Avoid gambling and speculation. Also, seek advice from elders before taking an important decision.

Good dates: 23,24 and 26
Lucky numbers: 6,7 and 9
Favourable direction: North-west

CAPRICORN (21 December—20 January)

Servicemen may get promotions. This might be a lucky week for you. A windfall is in the offing. A journey might prove helpful. Also, pay utmost attention to your business transactions.

Good dates: 23,26 and 27
Lucky numbers: 2,5 and 8
Favourable direction: South

AQUARIUS (21 January—20 February)

You are extremely fortunate this week, for your efforts will bear fruit and you will be admired and appreciated by the people around you. Keep an eye on the health of your family members.

Good dates: 27,28 and 29
Lucky numbers: 5,8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

PISCES (21 February— 20 March)

A good week for those connected with intellectual pursuits. Others might face a few problems on the professional front, but courage and fortitude will see them through. Your domestic front will remain calm.

Good dates: 26,27 and 29
Lucky numbers: 4,5 and 7
Favourable direction: West

STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—AQUARIUS

The Aquarius man might not appreciate the intensity of the Scorpio woman's emotions. His involvement with the outside world is at odds with her possessive nature and the relationship might be threatened in the long run.

HOPE

All Stainless Steel Thermo Jugs

SALEM STAINLESS STEEL INSIDE OUT

- High-efficiency PU foam insulation.
- Unbreakable
- Superior quality
- Value for money
- Latest technology
- Hygienic
- Easy to maintain
- Retains heat/cold for long hours
- No glass refill

Distributors for West Bengal

Giff-n-Giff

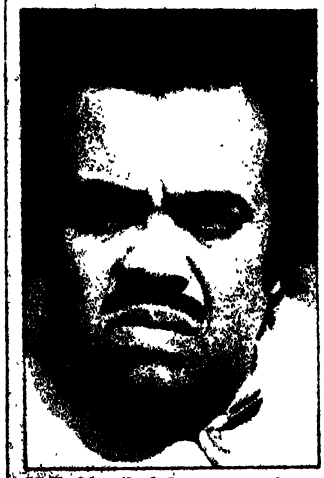
Room No. S-2, Fourth Floor
77, N.S. Road, Calcutta - 700 001
Phone: 256796/253908/257190

Manufacturers
HOPE (INDIA)
8, Vasu Street, (Behind Ega Theatre)
Kilpauk, Madras 600 010.
Phone: 665470.

Licencee
STEEL AUTHORITY OF INDIA LIMITED

Available in different capacities & colours.

Institutional & Trade enquiries solicited.



Adwise/2362/90

Unni's travels

When you're the leader of a one-man party, you have to try that much harder to keep your support base intact.

Which is why K.P. Unnikrishnan decided to take a flight to the Gulf to express solidarity with his fellow Keralaites stranded in the Middle East. Only the foray into foreign lands didn't work out as the minister had envisaged.

Unnikrishnan, who had arrived without any aid package to offer the refugees, was heckled, booed and pushed around by his compatriots, who were livid at the inaction of the Indian government. Eye-witness reports have it that Unni extricated himself from the mob with difficulty, to run into the comparative safety of his car.

K.P. Unnikrishnan: run for your life

And vowed he'd never indulge in such (mis) adventures again.

Identity crisis

As far as the Congress high command is concerned, H.K.L. Bhagat and C.K. Jaffer Sharief are general secretaries of the AICC with special charge of various states. But both have different ideas about the role they are required to play. Bhagat, for one, spends all his time organising agitations in Delhi, on one issue or the other, and setting up road blocks to express sympathy for Sajjan Kumar. His leisure is spent in rowing with fellow Congressman Jagdish Tytler.

Jaffer Sharief seems to be labouring under the delusion that Bangalore is India and India is Bangalore. Whenever party president Rajiv Gandhi summons him to discuss issues of import, the leader is ensconced in the garden city, busy trying to cut local rivals down to size. Though Sharief is ostensibly in charge of Uttar Pradesh affairs, none of the state's leaders have as much as set eyes upon him—except, of course, those who can fly down to Bangalore to say hello.

Congress workers, utterly fed up with the state of affairs, insist that the duo be appointed presidents of their respective state units. And it appears that they may well get their way.

HEARD IN CENTRAL HALL

Jis ke tan par kal tak kapda nahin tha, woh aaj kapda mantri hai.* (The man who didn't have any clothes on his back until yesterday, is now the textiles minister.)

DEVI LAL ON SHARAD YADAV

Bhagat and Jaffer Sharief: confusion confounded

CHECK-LIST

Who wants elections in Punjab—and who doesn't

■ Simranjeet Singh Mann: The Akali leader is convinced that the only solution to the state's problems lies in an early election. Especially since, as he reiterates at every available opportunity, the people will return his party to power.

■ Prakash Singh Badal: One of the moderates in Punjab politics, Badal has retained his faith in the parliamentary process. And believes that the state will return to normalcy faster if the administration is run by someone whom the people have chosen.

■ I.K. Gujral: The external affairs minister was returned to the Lok Sabha from Punjab. Ever since that electoral win, Gujral has been convinced that polls are the only way out of the Punjab imbroglio.

■ Veerendra Verma: He thinks he isn't doing such a bad job of administering the state. So, why should anyone want to discontinue President's Rule, especially since elections may well result in a fresh outbreak of violence.

■ Arun Nehru: The commerce minister has always been a hardliner on Punjab. He believes that the announcement of a poll will be treated by militants as a fresh excuse to spread terror, any which way they can. The best bet, in his opinion, is to let Verma rule until the law and order situation improves.

The party is over

The results of the Janata Dal parliamentary party elections didn't hold much cheer for the Raja. All the candidates of the Chandra Shekhar camp—Kamal Morarka, Hukum Deo Narayan Yadav and Hari Mohan Dhawan—were declared elected, while the Prime Minister's men took a beating.

VP was particularly unhappy at the victory of Hari Mohan Dhawan, who has often embarrassed him in parliamentary party meetings. The Raja had taken a personal interest in getting Dhawan defeated, even setting up a candidate against him. But while the PM's man got only 18 votes, Dhawan was elected by a thumping majority.

Is this a portent of what the future holds for the Raja of Mandal? ●

Oops, wrong telex!

Madhu Dandavate is regarded as one of the more efficient ministers (see Cover Story) of the Janata Dal government. But even the best of us can slip up, as the finance minister did the other day in Parliament—with a bit of help from revenue secretary Rajiv Lochan Mishra.

Congress(I) members were grilling the professor on the excise duty scandal, first exposed by Chandra Shekhar in his SUNDAY interview (see issue dated 26 August—1 September 1990). According to Shekhar, the government had been paying the excess excise duty back to the manufacturers, when the money by right belongs to the consumers. What did the minister have to say to that, asked agitated members.

Dandavate had his defence ready. He wasn't the only person to issue such Madhu Dandavate: some mistake, surely instructions, he disclosed. Even finance ministers of the previous Congress(I) regime had done the same and he had telex messages which would prove the point.

The Congress brigade, headed by the raven-haired R.K. Dhawan, wasn't willing to take his word for it. "Would he please produce the telex messages in question," they asked.

Dandavate immediately got the file from the officials' gallery and began reading out. Only to stop short when he realised (after some prodding from parliamentary affairs minister Jagdeep Dhankad) that all the messages—apart from the ones he had sent—asked that the payment not be made.

As the heckling from the Opposition ranks grew even more ferocious, an embarrassed Dandavate hurriedly sat down.

And then made a rapid exit to upbraid revenue secretary Mishra, who had handed him the wrong file.

HEARD IN THE LOK SABHA

You are the modern-day Manu, who will be held responsible for fragmenting Indian society.

VASANT SATHE TO V.P. SINGH

Arun aur Arun

Will V.P. Singh go the way of Rajiv Gandhi? Yes, say some Janata Dal MPs, if he continues to stick close to the two Aruns (Nehru and Singh) who played a major role in the destruction of Rajiv.

Arun Nehru and Arun Singh: the nemesis of the Raja?

These leaders, most of whom belong to the erstwhile Lok Dal, are of the opinion that the Raja should junk both the Aruns (especially since their names are cropping up increasingly in the Bofors investigations) as they are programmed to destroy the people they are closest to.

But the PM isn't paying much attention. He'd much rather deal with the third Arun (Shourie) first.

MANDALWATCH

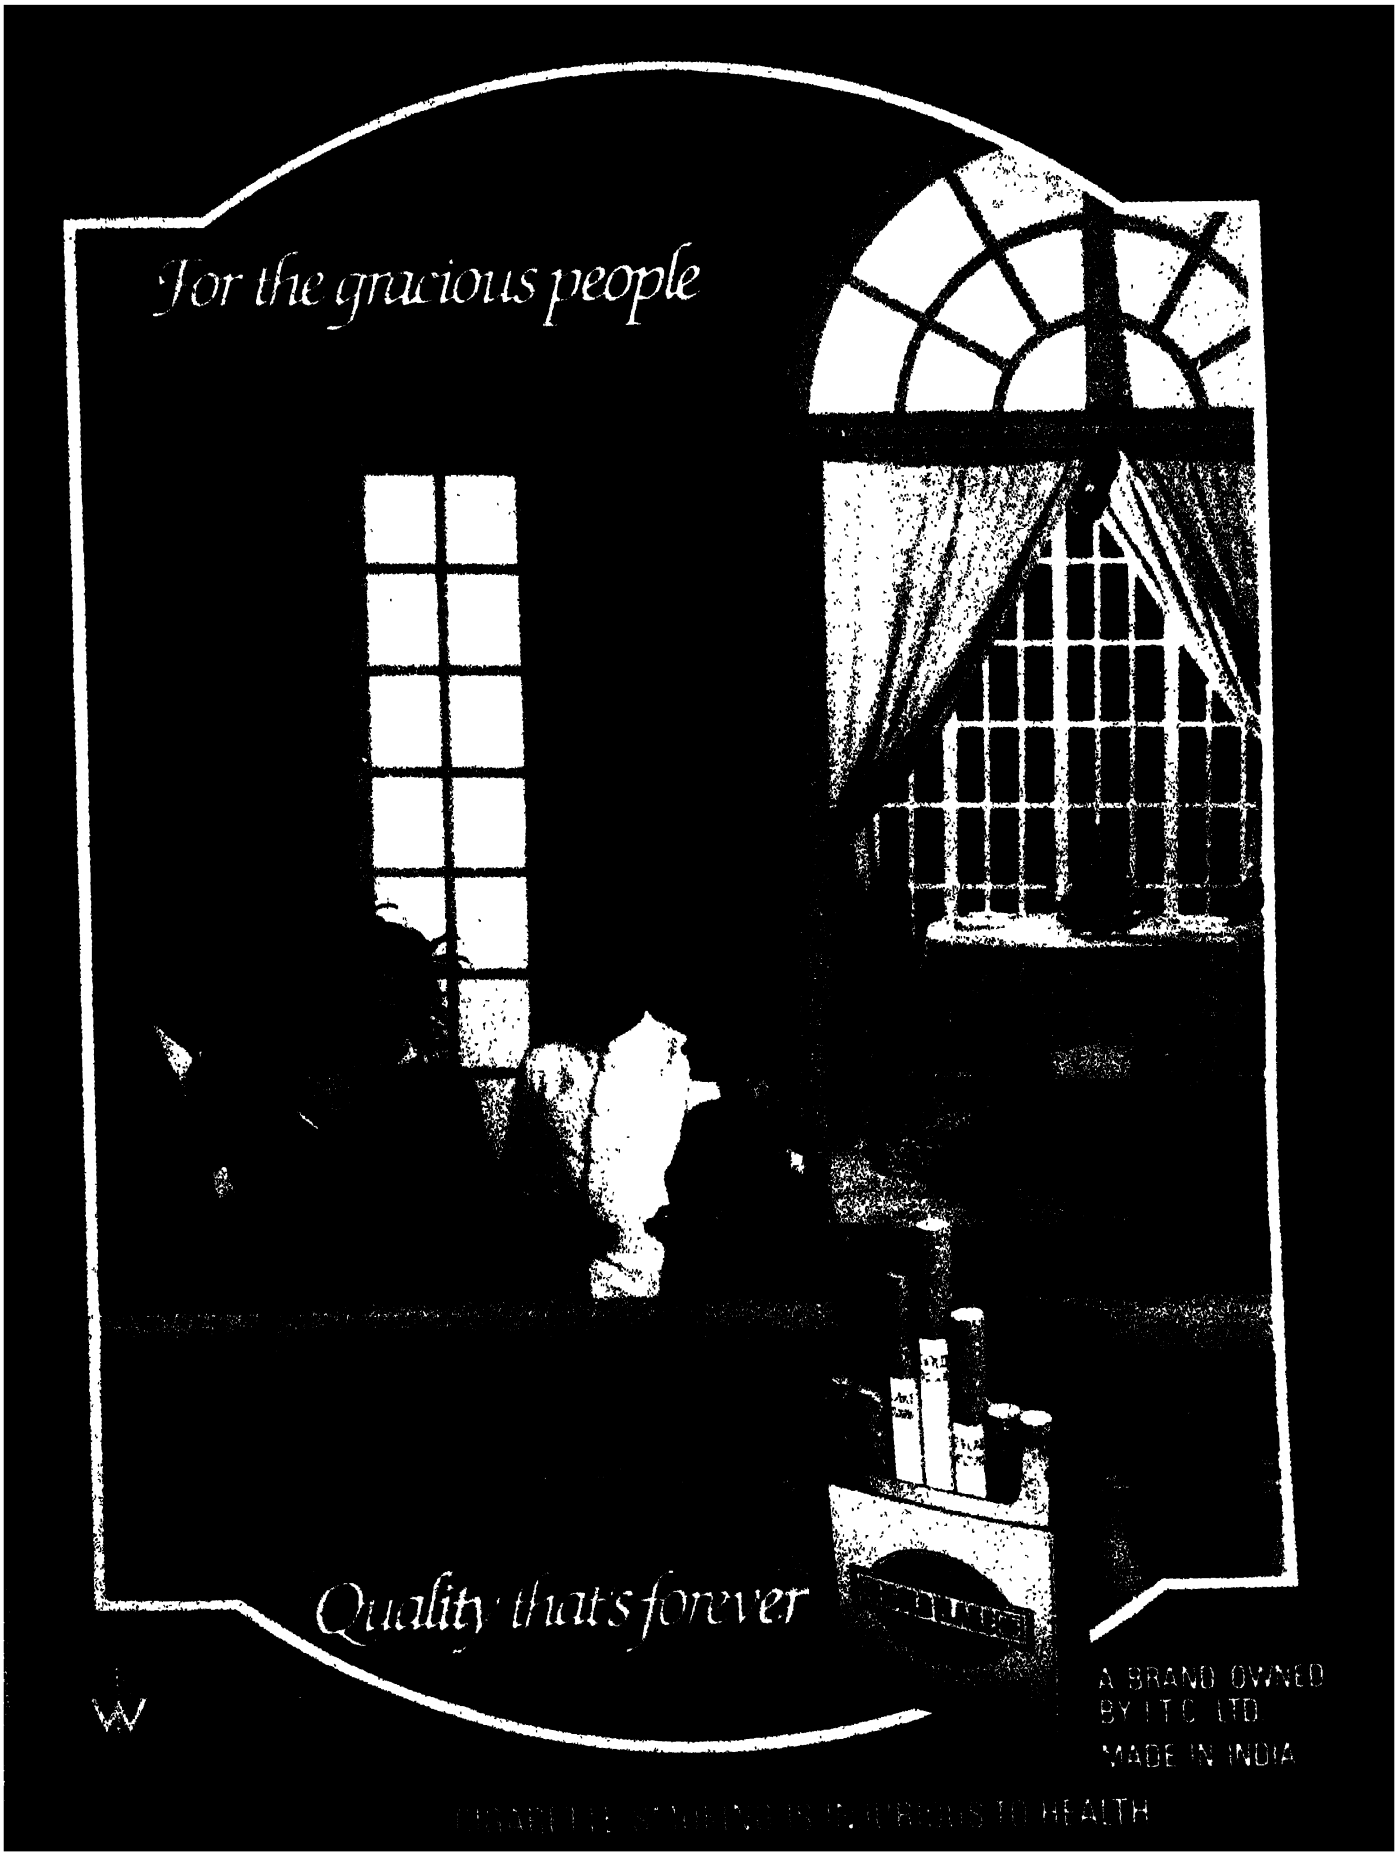
Political parties and the reservation policy

■ Janata Dal: The Raja, in his Mr Caste avatar, is intent on implementing the Mandal Commission's recommendations—and reaping the electoral benefits he is convinced will follow. Some of his partymen have reservations about the wisdom of this move, but the PM is now beyond reason.

■ Congress(I): Reservations are fine on principle, says Rajiv Gandhi, but should not be made on the basis of caste. Economic criteria should be brought into play, instead. A poor Brahmin, the argument goes, is much more deserving of a job than the son of Ram Vilas Paswan.

■ BJP: Considering how unhappy the party was with the implementation of the Mandal recommendations, it is almost a minor miracle that it didn't withdraw support to the government on this issue. But Advani makes no secret of the fact that he'd rather have quotas on the basis of economic criteria.

■ CPI(M): Marxist ideology revolves around the concept of a classless—not casteless—society. Nonetheless the communists are dead against the perpetuation of the caste system, as envisaged in the Mandal Report. Positive discrimination is all very well, they say, but shouldn't be decided on the basis of caste alone.



I'm an umble man

The Raja is really taking this man-of-the-people bit very seriously. So much so that the Prime Minister even instructed his office to cancel his membership of the Chelmsford Club in New Delhi, for fear that the hoi polloi would associate him with the capital's elite, if they ever found out.

The austerity drive didn't stop at that. V.P. Singh was the proud owner of a scooter in Deogarh, Rajasthan. The vehicle, though registered in the Raja's name, was used by his brother-in-law's family. A few weeks back, however, the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) asked the district [illegible] authority of Udaipur to transfer the ownership rights of the scooter to V.P.'s brother-in-law.

What next?

Will the Raja donate Aish Mahal to Sher Singh? Or surrender the Lucknow lamb fur cap to Maneka Gandhi? ●

For the gracious people
Quality that's forever
A BRAND OWNED
BY I.T.C. LTD
MADE IN INDIA

To the world your stride.

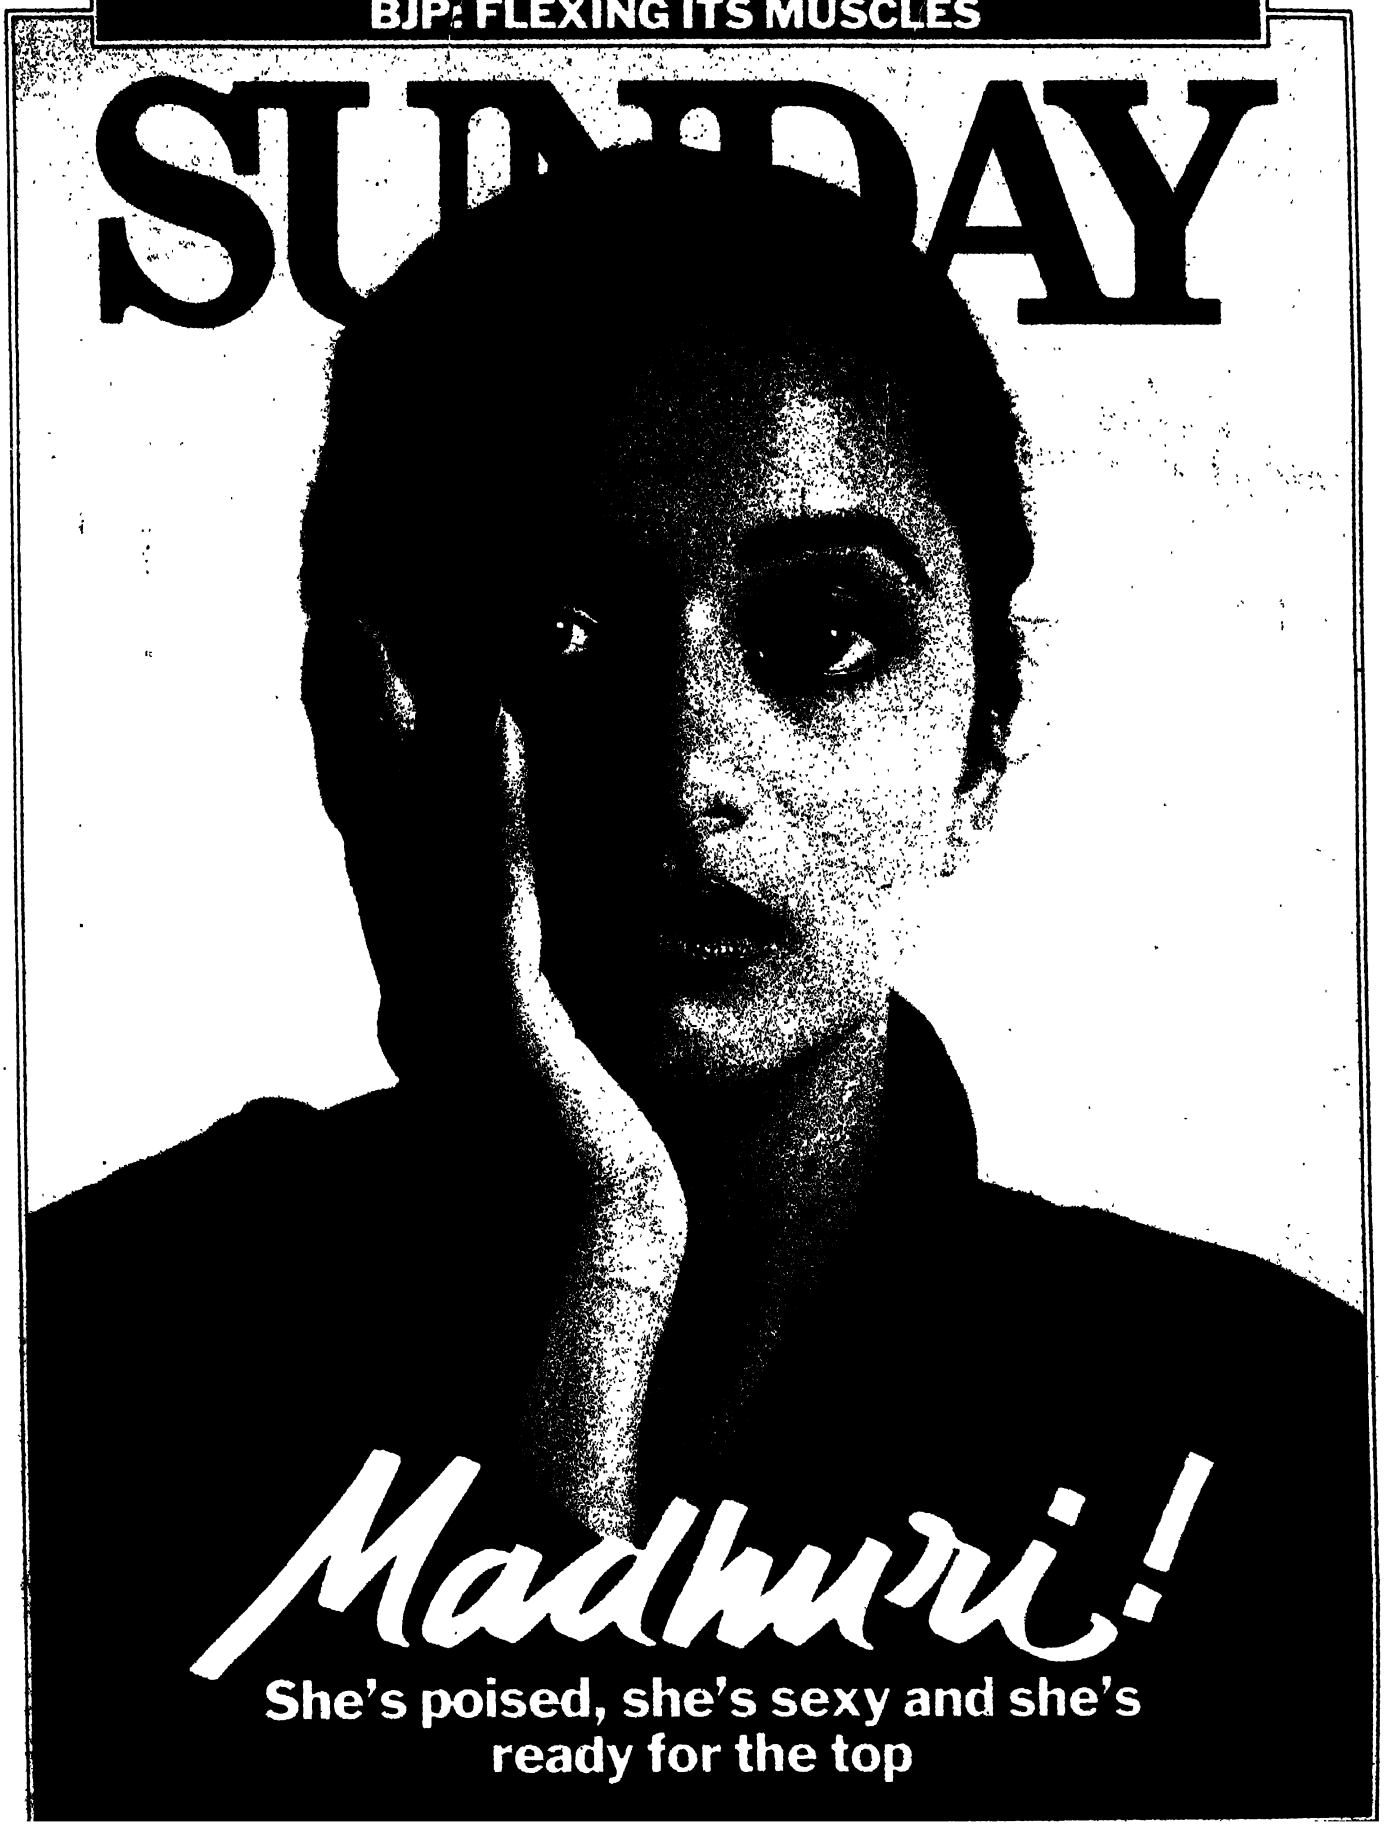
dinesh

Exclusives ▲ Suitings ▲ Co-ordinates ▲ Safaris



The choice of leading fashion houses, internationally.

Exclusive showrooms: BANGALORE: Pushkar • MYSORE: Sagar • BHOPAL: Vishal Corner • INDORE: Dawar's • BHAGALPUR: [illegible] • BUXAR: Vastralok • JHARIA: Bharat Cloth Store • PATNA: Bhartiya Bastralaya

7—13 OCTOBER 1990 □ AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION □ RS 7.00

BJP: FLEXING ITS MUSCLES

SUNDAY

Madhuri!

She's poised, she's sexy and she's ready for the top ieations for a Masterpiece.

JCT FABRICS

SUITINGS • SHIRTINGS • DRESS MATERIALS

CONTENTS

SUNDAY

VOLUME 17 □ ISSUE 39 □ RS 7 00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION
7—13 OCTOBER 1990

40
COVER STORY

Ek, do, queen

She's sexy, she's poised and she's aiming for the top. That's Madhuri Dixit.

12
DIARY

Journey to Jaffna

[illegible] on a war that has [illegible] properly [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] Amnesty [illegible]

24
SPECIAL REPORT

Flexing its muscles

The Bharatiya Janata Party gets tough with the National Front government.

28
PROFILE

The investigator

A profile of Chitra Subramaniam, probably the best investigative [illegible] India has. [illegible]

54
BUSINESS

The living daylights

The ULFA's vision of a future Assam is wrecking the present.

82
BOOK EXTRACT

The enemy within

Communist leader Satpal Dang on the terrorist problem in Punjab.

LETTERS 4
SIGHT AND SOUND 7
BODYLINE 8
SOUTH BLOCK 9
COUNTERVIEW 10
PERSONALITY 18
Mother knows best
FOCUS 22
Speaking out
MANI-TALK 36
BUSINESS DIARY 61
DE JURE 62
MEDIA MUSINGS 67
KHAAS BAAT 70
SPOTLIGHT 72
NEWS 76
THIS INDIA 87
SUNDAYWEEK 88
RANDOM NOTES 89
DELHI DIARY 90

Cover transparency:
Gautam Patole

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu and edited by V r Sanghvi from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001 Air surcharge for Srinagar ex Delhi and Tripura 20 paise, North-eastern states 30 paise

The move that backfired

The cover story (Mr Caste, 9—15 September) has been most timely. With so many problems facing the country today—spiralling rise in prices of essential commodities, the oil crunch and the Punjab and Kashmir crises—there was no reason for V.P. Singh to release the Mandal Commission Report and press for its implementation. There seems to be no rationale behind the declaration of 27 per cent reservation for the backward classes. It was nothing but a political gimmick with some ulterior motive. Neither the BJP nor the leftists have approved of the idea.

The anti-reservation movement has gained momentum and is being spearheaded by the students, who are the real sufferers. It is high time the Prime Minister did something to restore his crumbling image, before it is too late.

Kali Charan Banerjee, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ V.P. Singh seems to be fast drifting from reality. He does not know how to be decisive and is, therefore, facing one crisis after another. His most recent bungling has been the implementation of the Mandal Commission Report. This decision will divide the society along caste lines and, for that, the nation will have to pay a heavy price.

R.K. Gulati, Siliguri (West Bengal)

■ Ever since assuming power, the Prime Minister has been walking a tightrope. And recent developments show that all is not well with the government at the Centre. By implementing the Mandal Commission recommendations, V.P. Singh has created tremors throughout the country. Perhaps this is the last straw with which the PM hopes to hold on to power.

Subhashis Ray, Rourkela (Orissa)

■ The cover story was a rational analysis of a leader, whose popularity is on the wane. Nobody could imagine that V.P. Singh, the prophet of value-based politics, would use caste as his trump card. When he failed to resolve the Punjab and Kashmir problems, he opened up another front by accepting the Mandal Commission Report.

The widespread anti-reservation agitation has already tarnished his image among the youths and the country is in turmoil. How V.P. Singh will contain these agitations remains to be seen. He will definitely go down in history as the man who fanned and exploited caste consciousness to win votes. It is high time the Prime Minister reviewed his decision in the wake of his failure to obtain a consensus.

Amitava Sen, New Delhi

■ The Prime Minister has been rightly termed "Mr Caste". V.P. Singh's decision to go in for reservations, shows that he can stoop to any level in order to protect his chair. Actually, Singh's decision to implement the Mandal Commission Report has boomeranged. He has lost the support of the middle classes, which form a major chunk of his sympathisers. Therefore, by introducing the quota system, V.P. Singh seems to have driven the last nail in the coffin of his crisis-prone government.

Abhinandan K. Singh, Varanasi (Uttar Pradesh)

■ The spectre of a caste war looms large over India, thanks to Prime Minister V.P. Singh, who has legitimised the caste system for petty short-term political gains by accepting the Mandal Commission Report.

Sadly, the bosses in Delhi do not realise that the good work done by the founding fathers of the Constitution in framing a secular and classless society have been negated in one stroke by the present government.

Anamika Mehta, Ahmedabad (Gujarat)

Students demonstrating in New Delhi: a popular stir

Not at home

The profile of Mufti Mohammad Sayeed (Does anybody remember this man? 9—15 September) reveals the inefficiency of the home minister.

Though the Prime Minister's choice of Mufti for the home portfolio drew a good response initially and created confidence among the Muslims, it has done much harm to the nation in the long run. Within days of the Mufti assuming office, his daughter Rubaiya was kidnapped, and in order to secure her release, some hardcore Kashmiri militants had to be released, which complicated the Jammu and Kashmir crisis further.

Now, the Mufti's morale is at an all-time low. And with the law and order problem worsening in many parts of the country, it is time the Mufti called it a day.

V. Badari Narayana, Mysore (Bangalore)

The Mufti: ineffective

Crowing over Violet

The introduction of Violet Dias Lannoy (Violet Dias Lannoy, 26 August—1 September) by Khushwant Singh was not quite palatable. I cannot agree with him when he says that every late or living soul who came in contact with Gandhiji, can be considered to be a personality above the masses.

Violet mainly worked outside India. Even if Khushwant tries to portray her as an extraordinary person, who developed some kind of a philosophy and tried to share it with others by writing a novel. This is neither unique nor extraordinary. It seems Khushwant Singh is running out of ideas.

Sachin Sahai, Aligarh (Uttar Pradesh)

Shattered dreams

Your write-up on Maneka Gandhi (Maneka versus everybody, 26 August—1 September) reveals the personality of the green minister. Maneka has won the hearts of millions of people within a very short span of time as a free, frank, fearless and an efficient minister. The steps taken by her have encouraged nature-lovers and environmentalists. But she cannot change things overnight.

The development of a country like India depends upon industrialisation and it cannot be stopped because of environmental reasons. Unlike Maneka, Nilamoni Routray may not be very articulate, but his ability to take the right decisions cannot be doubted. His past record, both as a minister and chief minister, was clean and above suspicion. Therefore, this controversy could have been easily avoided.

Maneka Gandhi: losing out

Jagadish Patra, Matkamboda (Orissa)

Moving backwards

The interview of Ram Vilas Paswan ("We will not yield to pressure", 26 August—1 September) on the anti-reservation stir reveals that the Mandal Commission recommendations are perfectly in keeping with the Constitution and the government has done the right thing by implementing it. But the issue raises some pertinent questions.

Paswan says that the backward classes form 52 per cent of the population and the commission recommended only 27 per cent reservation for them. He also says that the reservation should be equal to the proportion in the population. Now, can he say for sure that all other castes which are not in the backward caste list have got their proportion of employment according to the population? Is merit, the criteria of employment so far, of no consequence? Again, if the government is not opposed to reservation on economic basis, then why has it not been implemented so far?

The unemployed youth of India, whether they are rich or poor, backward or forward, only want more employment. Not more reservation.

Arup K. Dutta, Patna (Bihar)

Paswan: defending Mandal

Suggesting remedies

The answers to the questions posed by V. Gangadhar in Out, damn Agenda (9—15 September) are as follows:

Q: Why do our factories produce sub-standard goods?
A: Because we don't have enough competition. Scrap licensing and we will have more competition and better quality goods. Open our doors to the world and we will produce even better quality.

Q: How is it that many units fall sick?
A: In a competitive market the less efficient units or the ones making poor quality goods will fail. They should close down. In India they are not allowed to close and hence they become "sick". If the enterprise fails the entrepreneur should also pay the penalty of failure.

Gurcharan Das

Q: Why is there so much dishonesty among our businessmen?
A: Because of state controls. If you don't need any permissions you won't need to bribe anyone.

Q: Is the foreign technology we get outmoded?
A: Only the market can judge this, not you, nor I, nor someone in Delhi. If a particular technology helps a business to succeed then who is to say it is outmoded. If we free our economy we will automatically get the latest technology because that is the way you succeed in the free market.

Q: Will we lose our sovereignty if we open our doors to foreign investment (e.g. Chile)?
A: The record of the past 40 years shows that countries which have attracted foreign investment have performed better than those who have not. And in no way have they compromised their sovereignty.

Q: Das' lingo is that of the typical entrepreneur?
A: No, it is the lingo of the world, including China and Eastern Europe.

Gurcharan Das, chairman and managing director, Procter and Gamble India Limited, Bombay (Maharashtra)

Running battle

The photo-essay (Golden girls, 9—15 September) featuring the Indian women sprinters was an eye-opener. Undoubtedly, the whole nation is pinning its hopes on them to win gold for India in the Beijing Asiad. But there is an undercurrent of hostility among the athletes, especially between P.T. Usha and Ashwini Nachappa. Though Usha is over the hill, and will soon be part of history, she has to be given her due, for she has done the country proud.

P.T. Usha: fading out?

Siddharth Sharma, Serampore (West Bengal)

Bowled out

The write-up on sports (Mixed fortunes, 9—15 September) was an interesting piece. The Indian cricket team failed miserably in contrast to their performance during their earlier visit to England. India's defeat can be attributed to a lack of strategy right through the series The killer instinct and the professional approach to the game, which their opponents displayed in ample measure, was totally lacking in the Indian team.

The fact that the English batsmen mauled our bowlers and notched up high scores in most of the matches establishes India's need for bowlers who can produce results. The good work done by the batsmen came to naught because of poor bowling.

Instead of sparking off rows and controversies, the cricket Board should do something constructive in order to improve the quality of Indian cricket in future.

Shashank Shekhar, Meerut (Uttar Pradesh)

Society's version

In the article (Getting it right, 9—15 September), the reporter quotes Uma Bharti as having said that her opinion of Madhavrao Scindia's looks was fed to her by the author of the article on her in Society.

This is not true. Ms Bharti did indeed say that she found Madhavrao Scindia good looking. Her exact words were "beautiful", which, you'll agree, is a far more potent compliment.

Uma Bharti

Furthermore, the Society clarification had nothing to do with the Madhavrao Scindia episode. It referred to her objection to the words "sexy sanyasin", that appeared as the heading.

Anselm Thomas, business manager, Lana Publishing Co. Ltd, Bombay (Maharashtra)

All is gossip

Please do not let Khushwant Singh misrepresent facts (Apple of her Papa's eye, 12—18 August). Far from being disrespectful, I showed him every consideration due to an elder who was also my editor. During the seven years I worked with him, he never had any complaints. Now, suddenly, he has discovered that I am an egoistic, ungrateful, graceless person, "unpleasant to deal with".

I was hardly out of my teens, when I had to migrate, along with my family, during the Partition riots. Sahir Ludhianvi and Sajjad Zaheer had already come back to India, when, in 1956, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad (an old friend of my father) promised to help me if I wished to return. The Maulana died in 1958. I was in England in 1961 when, instead of settling there, I chose to come back to India. Khushwant Singh writes that I was "fixed up" with The Illustrated Weekly on my return. As a matter of fact, I worked in Bombay first as a script-writer for the Films Division. (Malwa scripted by me, was awarded the President's Silver Medal in 1963.) Later, I was copywriter with a leading advertising agency in Bombay. From 1964 to 1968, I was managing editor, Imprint magazine. I resigned in 1968 (when the management changed hands), and joined the Weekly as a staffer. Such ups and downs are part of a journalist's career.

Khushwant Singh writes that when I got a better job in Delhi, I "promptly left without a word of thanks or farewell".

The job as adviser to the chairman, Central Board of Film Censor, happened to be in Bombay. There was a farewell party in the Weekly office, in which a present was given to me jointly on behalf of Khushwant Singh and Fatima Zakaria. (The editor himself was probably out of town.)

The censor board job was terminated in a most high-handed manner during the Emergency. (Nevertheless, a gentleman who had been appointed along with me, was taken back in a sister organisation after a few days. I kept quiet, knowing well that it was a man's world.)

Now, in the words of Khushwant Singh, "When the Delhi job wound up, she was back in Bombay not a bit shamefaced, but condescending as ever." Then, according to Singh, I was taken back by The Times of India. "When she got a better offer, she quit it again, with as little grace as she did the first time, and without a word of thanks for the people who had stood by her in the hour of her need."

What on earth is Khushwant Singh talking about? I never joined The Times of India again, although I was in Bombay till 1981.

It's sad, because although I haven't had a chance to meet Khushwant Singh for a long time, I have always spoken highly of him, and have continued to defend him, whenever people have criticised him.

Qurratulain Hyder, New Delhi

Owing to the Puja holidays, there will be no issue of SUNDAY dated 30 September—6 October 1990. The next issue will be dated 7—13 October 1990.

R.K. LAXMAN/THE TIMES OF INDIA

■ While we would be happy if the court proceedings are expedited, we do hold that courts cannot resolve the triangle.

L.K. ADVANI, BJP president, on the Ram Janmabhoomi/ Babri Masjid controversy

■ The threat today comes from elements that are [illegible] or no law, [illegible] the judiciary, [illegible] will be built.

CHANDRA SHEKHAR, Janata Dal leader, on the Ram Janmabhoomi/ Babri Masjid dispute

■ Has the Prime Minister himself read the Mandal report? I doubt it.

SHATRUGHAN SINHA, actor

■ We will stand by the decision even if our government is destroyed in the process.

V.P. SINGH, Prime Minister, on the implementation of the Mandal Commission report

■ This government was born deaf: it has now become dumb under the pressure of its own contradictions.

M.J. AKBAR, AICC(I) spokesman

■ If Sikhs despite their enormous sacrifices in the past, are being dubbed as unpatriotic, I will say there is not a single patriot in the country.

MULAYAM SINGH YADAV, Uttar Pradesh chief minister

■ Tweedledum Tweedledee, old wine and new bottles. I mean, no difference as the central policy remains the same.

S.S. MANN, Shiromani Akali Dal (Mann) president, on Virendra Verma, the new Punjab Governor

■ If merely stating a fact is a sin, I have nothing to say.

VEERENDRA PATIL, Karnataka chief minister, on his inference that Ramakrishna Hegde was aware that telephones were being tapped

■ It is unfair to ask us to give up control altogether and yet blame us when anything goes wrong.

P. UPENDRA, Union minister for information and broadcasting, on the granting of autonomy to the electronic media

■ People are making Hindi versions of Madonna and Michael Jackson. I might as well make a Hindi version of myself.

REMO FERNANDES, pop star

HOPE

All Stainless Steel Thermo Tiffin Carriers

SALEM STAINLESS STEEL INSIDE OUT.

- High-efficiency PU foam insulation.
- Latest technology
- Superior quality
- Each container individualy insulated to carry hot and cold together
- Unbreakable
- Value for money
- Hygienic
- Easy to maintain
- Retains heat/cold for long hours
- Easy to carry

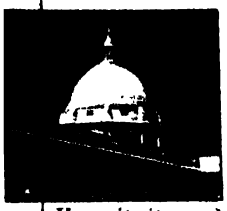
Licencee

STEEL AUTHORITY OF INDIA LIMITED

Manufacturers
HOPE (INDIA)
8, Vasu Street, (Behind Ega Theatre)
Kilpauk, Madras 600 010.
Phone: 665470.

Distributors for West Bengal
Ega-Ega
Room No. S-2, Fourth Floor
77, N.S. Road, Calcutta - 700 001
Phone: 256796/253908/257190

Available in different capacities



Institutional & Trade enquiries solicited.

Advtse/2383/90

INDER MALHOTRA

Sweating in the desert

Who is responsible for the plight of Indians stranded in Amman?

Sooner or later it was bound to happen. With the massive stampede of panicky Indians trying to escape from Saddam Hussein's clutches in Iraqi-occupied Kuwait, it would have been a miracle if complaints of inefficiency, callousness and worse on the part of relevant Indian diplomatic missions had not been heard. In the event, the howl of protests has been a lot louder and more shocking than might have been expected.

Since Amman, the Jordanian capital, was the only escape hatch for the fleeing mass, it is no surprise that the man up front in the firing line is the ambassador to Jordan, K. Gajendra Singh. The heaviest fusillade on him has come from Kerala, led by the Union minister for surface transport, K.P. Unnikrishnan, for the simple reason that the Keralites form the vast majority of the 1,70,000 Indians for whom yesterday's El Dorado has turned into today's nightmare.

It is possible, indeed probable, that the rather short-staffed embassy presided over by Singh left a great deal to be desired while trying to cope with a crisis of unprecedented magnitude. It may also be that Singh's performance, despite his seniority and creditable record in the past, might have been affected by the almost constant row he has had in recent years with his superiors over his request to marry a foreign sweetheart which was curtly denied. However, is it fair to blame him or his embassy for the unholy mess created not by him, but by faulty policies adopted at a much higher level?

The original sin in this connection was committed by the government when it decided to undertake the impossible task of evacuating such a huge mass of people, many of whom were inclined, wisely enough, to stay put and face the future along with the local Kuwaiti population. This imprudence was compounded further when Inder Gujral readily trusted Saddam Hussein's assurance that India could freely send planes and ships to take away the Indians. Almost every Indian was encouraged to pack his or her bag. Predictably, the wily Saddam went back on his word. Indians, looking forward to returning home comfortably, became hostages.

Thus it was that more than 20,000 Indians found themselves consigned to a hell-hole in the desert on the Iraq-Jordan border, burning by day, freezing by night, without food, shelter or even water. Totally without hope.

Indians trying to escape from Saddam Hussein's clutches found themselves consigned to a hell-hole in the desert

Singh and his colleagues had not created this situation. There wasn't much that they could do to mitigate it because they just did not have the resources, human or material. But where Singh certainly went wrong was in not having visited the Indians at the Shalan refugee camp even once. This is something for which Unnikrishnan has lambasted him and the refugees have cursed him.

In addition to this failure, much else also went wrong, which is not at all difficult to understand. For the lapses that seem to have infuriated the refugees are rooted deep in this country's bureaucratic culture. To put it bluntly, why should anyone expect Indian diplomats abroad to treat the general run of Indians any differently than is done by officialdom at home? Of course, theoretically, at least people in distress away from the country's shores are entitled to a more humane treatment by the government's representatives than might happen in New Delhi, a state capital or a district headquarter. But what is the reality?

Even at the best of times, visitors to Indian missions abroad come back with complaints of indifference, neglect and downright rudeness. For their part, diplomats abroad tell horror stories about impossible demands by Indian visitors, especially those having any pull back home. There is an element of truth in both the set of grievances. In a crisis situation, the mutual irritation gets aggravated a million-fold. •

VINOD MEHTA

Temple of discord

Now, even the BJP is divided on Ayodhya

It's finally happened. One of India's most astute, charismatic and urbane politicians has decided to challenge party orthodoxy on an issue which, if inflamed, could make the reservation riots look like inter-mohalla wrangling. As a result, this same politician has forced the Congress, the BJP and the VHP to re-examine long-held positions on a potentially devastating discord. I refer of course to Mr Atal Behari Vajpayee who at last has come clean on the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid dispute, thus providing the nation with the first glimmer of hope that the crisis might be resolved without large-scale communal havoc.

And the first person he has taken on is his own party president, L.K. Advani. On 19 September, Mr Vajpayee told Smita Gupta of The Independent, "Our approach has always been different from that of the VHP—it is they who have said they don't believe in a court verdict on the Ram Janmabhoomi issue as it is based on faith rather than fact. As a major national party, how can we say that we repudiate the authority of the courts?"

Our approach? On the day Mr Vajpayee was enunciating his stand in Delhi, Mr Advani, in that city was explaining his. "They (the courts) cannot determine whether or not there was a temple at Ayodhya that was pulled down by Babar in the 16th century, whether a mosque was built in its place, and, if so, what should be done about it. This remains our position till today."

On the court verdict then, it would seem that Mr Vajpayee is out of step with his party. Why, even on L.K. Advani's 10,000-km Ram rath yatra, scheduled to begin later this month, Atalji seems to be both sceptical and apprehensive. "Remember," he warns the faithful, "you are going to Ayodhya, not Lanka. At times the vanar sena does not realise where it is heading."

Grateful thanks at this juncture must be extended either to Prof. Satish Chandra, the convener of the committee for the promotion of communal harmony, or to a yet unnamed North Block official. It was their ineptitude (deliberate?) that brought the differences between the two leaders into focus. Usually, meetings of the communal harmony committee are occasions for show-biz glitterati, politicians, journalists and academics to spend a few pleasant hours debating the discharge of onerous social responsibility. However, Prof. Chandra achieved a real miracle. He and other members (Chandra Shekhar seems to have been a major player) of the committee got Advani and Vajpayee to initiate a unanimous resolution recommending that the court's decision on the Ayodhya issue be accepted. It was an extraordinary achievement, not the least because it was so unexpected. Alas, the unanimity lasted all of 24 hours.

Mr Advani was the first to protest, declaring that the resolution conveyed a "totally misleading impression" of his party's position. He had nothing to do with it. Once again, Atalji demurred, confirming to journalists that both he and Advani had been party to the resolution. And here we get into a murky area. Apparently, the commit-

Mr Atal Behari Vajpayee has at last come clean on the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid dispute. And the first person he has taken on is his own party president, L.K. Advani

ASHOKE CHAKRABORTY

The VHP's Ramshila puja. Without the BJP's support, the organisation would be lost tee had agreed that the recommendations of the meeting be kept secret until 22 September, when they would be presented to the National Integration Council scheduled to meet in Madras. The convener and the government official, working individually or in concert, ignored this directive and leaked the recommendations to the press. As I write, Mr Vajpayee has resigned in protest at the "breach of faith".

Considering the import of the resolution, it seems a small lapse. Timing is doubtless critical to decision-making in public affairs, but would a delay of four days have made such a difference? At any rate, the BJP president swiftly backtracked, thereby fuelling the mystery of his endorsement in the first place.

Almost on cue, some instant soul-searching was conducted by the Congress. There were reports that Rajiv Gandhi was under pressure from the rank and file of the party to drop his week-long padayatra from Delhi to Ayodhya. Given the party's record of ambivalence and triplespeak on the subject, why remind the electorate of an unsavoury past? Moreover, the overwhelming feeling within the Congress is that there are not too many votes to be won through championing secularism at this time. But the biggest fear centred around the possibility of clashes between the BJP and Congress stalwarts. If serious violence broke out, the government would be quick to blame the Opposition. As of now, no firm decision has been taken, but it is likely that if Mr Gandhi insists on going ahead with his "mass consciousness" drive, it will be curtailed in scope and scale.

Already, some states, beginning with Bihar, have banned not only the entry of Parishad officials but of BJP members too. Additionally that stern policeman in Lucknow, Mulayam Singh Yadav, shows no signs of relenting. With the formation of a statewide body called the Anti-Communal Action Committee, supported by the communists and Kanshi Ram's BSP, he is geared to crack the whip.

The Vishwa Hindu Parishad meanwhile, seems hesitant and marginalised. I have always maintained that these self-style guardians of Ram and Krishna have no real hold on the Hindu mind or on Hindu society. They are perceived throughout the nation as dangerous rabble-rousers exploiting the poor and uninformed. Without the active support of the BJP, they would be lost.

More pitfalls confront the advocates of Hindu revivalism. The holy men are squabbling among themselves. The sarkari Jagatguru, who Mulayam Singh arrested recently, is a known opponent of the VHP and is bound to queer the pitch. Now a much more respected voice, the Shankaracharya of Kanchi, has expressed his fears and urged all concerned to work towards a peaceful, out-of-court settlement. The Babri Masjid Action Committee, Muslim intellectuals and the Imam Bukhari of Jama Masjid have hailed the Shankaracharya's intervention. Swami Chinmayananda favours a similar strategy. Thus, the facade of Hindu unity on Ram Janmabhoomi is slowly but surely cracking up.

However, it is dissension within the BJP that poses the biggest danger to the VHP. Mr Advani's party has a formidable reputation for discipline. Nevertheless, Mr Vajpayee's brave and lone voice of dissent suggests that the few 'wets' in the BJP might speak out if the hardliners insist on going all the way. In this scenario it is difficult to label L.K. Advani. Despite his strident rhetoric, he will carefully assess the direction of the political wind before taking the final plunge.

Mr Advani knows that his party's chances for capturing power at the Centre have never been better. Today the BJP runs three states, administering over 100 million people. In two others, Gujarat and Bihar, its support is crucial to keep the Janata Dal government in office. L.K. Advani must surely want to build on this strength, not fritter it away in an unnecessary general election. All the opinion polls indicate that if V.P. Singh dissolved Parliament, the BJP would be hard put to return even half its MPs and MLAs.

Moreover, the BJP president is aware that the big prize cannot be won from the fringes. If New Delhi chalo is the cry of the party, then boxing itself in an ultra right-wing strait-jacket would be fatal. To achieve its national ambitions, the Bharatiya Janata Party will have to steadily move towards the Centre, in which case its links with the VHP in particular become unsustainable.

Dark clouds hover over the republic, but in one sphere at least there is a hint of sunshine. The single political party that has absolutely refused to accept the jurisdiction of the judiciary in the dispute is, at the very least, rethinking its position. The news from the special bench of the UP High Court which is hearing the case is that, leave alone a verdict, we will be lucky if by 30 October all the objections to the supplementary report of the survey commissioner are disposed of. In other words, the actual hearings can only begin after 30 October—and they could go on for years.

Meanwhile, Hindus and Muslims should pray that the incipient gulf between Atal Behari Vajpayee and Lal Krishan Advani persists and widens. Therein lies the nation's best hope.●

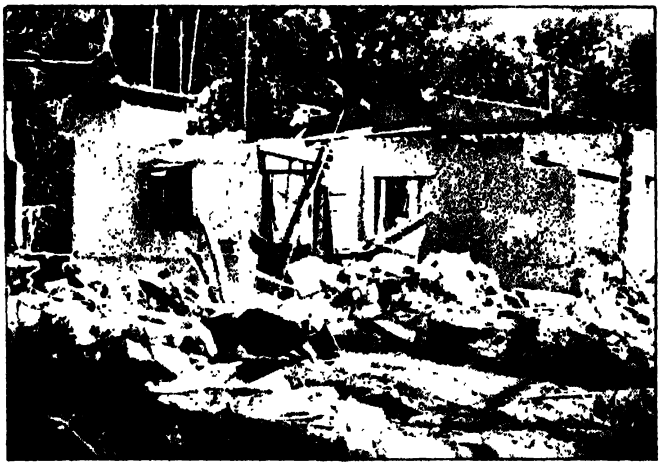
Journey to Jaffna

Jottings on a war that has never been properly understood

Getting to Jaffna isn't very easy nowadays—especially if you're driving an aging Toyota that splutters and wheezes. But engine trouble—you soon discover—is the least of the hazards.

The Sri Lankan armed forces are no longer willing to allow journalists into the peninsula. ("We can't afford to have pressmen interfering with army operations," is a constant refrain.) In fact, passes ("at your own risk") are issued only up to Vavuniya town, which lies some 100 kilometres south of Jaffna.

In Vavuniya—which the army overran a couple of months ago leaving it almost deserted—it is necessary to call in at the town commandment's office. "So, you're planning to go to Jaffna?" asks the affable Major Chandrasiri. "Be careful, there are lots of air force helicopters and Tiger mines about." The helicopters are the bigger problem and the huge 'Press' signs stuck down on the car's roof and bonnet are not much of a safeguard. For one, there is a curfew in the region and every vehicle—as the military never fails to remind you—is a 'LTTE suspect'. And then, as the choppers are not armour-plated (being essentially transport carriers fitted with heavy machine guns), they usually fire from a great height. "We can't afford to fly too low because of the LTTE's guns," says Chandrasiri.



As for the mines, they are relatively easy to avoid. Although the main road that heads north is heavily mined all the way up to Jaffna, there is a safe dirt track—which heads towards Madhu—out of the town.

The key is to keep asking villagers about the state of the road as you go along. A week or so before I made the journey, an American journalist drove her car over a mine. Luckily for her, the device was what the LTTE call a 'Johnny bomb'—a small locally manufactured mine which is designed more to tear a leg off than to blow up a vehicle-load of people. It ripped the tyre to shreds and damaged a side of the car, but she got away unscathed. One spin-off from the adventure—which included a close shave with a helicopter—is that it makes the subject for the next cover story of her magazine. My trip, however, is relatively uneventful. Save the odd overflying plane, there is no sight of the Sri Lankan armed forces.

At Vavuniya, the Socio-Economic Development Council (SEDC), a wing of the Roman Catholic church, is readying a food convoy comprising seven trucks bound for Jaffna. "Can I drive behind the trucks?" I ask the fathers and nuns who are accompanying the convoy. "No problem," they say. It seems far safer to make the journey this way. The Sri Lankan Air Force has been alerted of the convoy and, moreover, seven trucks with large white flags look unmistakably like a relief mission.

But, just three kilometres or so on the dirt track out of Vavuniya, we are stopped at an LTTE camp. Three Tigers head straight for the car. "Are you Sinhalese?" one of them asks somewhat menacingly. "Tamil," I reply. "OK, you can go then," they say.

However, not everyone on the convoy is Tamil. Four nuns and one driver—who appears frightened out of his wits—are Sinhalese. The LTTE camp leader says he cannot let them pass and suggests that the convoy go on without them. A protracted debate ensues. "The food is meant for starving Tamils—the people you are fighting for. How does it matter who brings it?" the fathers argue. The matter is referred to the LTTE's area commander who takes a couple of hours to be contacted. "The Sinhalese can't go," he orders. "Nor will the convoy then," say the fathers and the trucks head back for Vavuniya.

THE DAMAGE: Various parts of the Jaffna peninsula have been subjected to aerial bombardment. It is the people and not the Tigers—who have strong bunkers—who have suffered the most from these attacks.

LTTE FUNERAL: Seventeen-year-old Mirash Colombo fell to a sniper's bullet near the Jaffna Fort area. The Tigers gave him a fitting funeral but had no way of telling his parents in Colombo that he had died.

It's a two and a half hour ride on a bumpy road track from Vavuniya to the famous Catholic church at Madhu. It is here that the extent of the economic and social dislocation that the war has caused, begins to dawn on you. Almost 10,000 refugees have sought the safety of the church. Most of them live around it in makeshift structures that they have built themselves. The majority have come from various areas in Vavuniya district but there are a number of families who have left their homes in the north.

Food is available but not in the quantities that the church would like. Says Father Yesuraja. "We hand out a certain amount of rations to each family. For many, this means making do with only one meal a day. We appeal to all concerned for more assistance."

From Madhu, the safe route to Jaffna means taking the forest track to Vidataltivu and then travelling up along the western coastline up to Ponneryn. There is no Sri Lankan Army presence in this area. There don't seem to be too many Tigers around either—and the few there are make no attempt to stop the car and ask questions.

About five kilometres from Ponneryn, the LTTE operates a nightly boat service to Kerativu in the Jaffna peninsula. It is virtually the only means in and out of the peninsula as the land route is closed with the Sri Lankan Army having occupied the Elephant Pass.

THE ISOLATION: The LTTE's Mahatayya (right) and Balasingham feel that Colombo has the edge in the propaganda war. "We have no access to the world press and this is affecting us badly," they admit.

The service, which is crucial to food-starved Jaffna, is availed of mainly by petty traders and shopkeepers, who the Tigers charge a small fee. Every night, hundreds of people take the boat with their bicycles to buy rice, sugar and other essentials from the southern regions. The queue of people returning to the peninsula with their commodities is just as long. Says Gangadharan, who owns a shop in Jaffna town: "We undertake this risky and difficult journey because we have to. Otherwise, our own families would starve."

Although the boat service only operates under the cover of night (between 8 pm and 3 am), the Sri Lankan armed forces are not unaware of it. A little over a month ago, the ferry point at Kerativu was bombed killing seven and injuring about 30. However, it is something of a mystery why the boats have not been subject to more frequent attacks. The charitable view goes that Colombo realises the discontinuation of the service would result in the starvation of the peninsula. The cynics maintain that the government wants to encourage people to leave the peninsula so that military operations against the LTTE are not complicated by the presence of civilians.

The severity of the fuel shortage becomes evident once you reach Kerativu. Jaffna town is barely 20 miles away, but it takes all of five TALKING TOUGH: "If the Sri Lankan armed forces try to occupy the peninsula, they will understand why they can never defeat us by military means," says the LTTE's high-ranking Yogaratnam Yogi.

SOUTHERN SUPPORT: Posters exhorting the Sri Lankan armed forces to eliminate the Tigers are a common sight all over the south. This time, the army action has met with widespread support among the Sinhalese.

hours to find a vehicle heading that way. The lack of public transport (autorickshaws are available but there are very few in operation) makes one usually have to depend on the LTTE to get around. At Rs 250 a litre of petrol, even the Tigers feel the fuel crunch. If they loan you a vehicle, they ensure that it runs on diesel (relatively cheaper at Rs 180 a litre).

Surprisingly, the LTTE's main camp at Kondavil is exactly as it was in April—when it was set up after the Indian Army withdrew. The only noticeable difference is a large underground cement bunker which is tucked away discreetly. When asked why the camp—unlike scores of other LTTE hideouts—has not been bombed, the Tigers invariably share your astonishment. However, a helicopter did strafe a moving car on the road adjacent to the camp when I was present. This had everybody ducking for cover, but after the chopper left, there was much merriment among the Tigers. It was as if there was more cause in the incident for amusement, than concern.

The people of Jaffna know their aircraft. Almost everyone can distinguish an Avro, Sia Marchetti, Y-8 or Y-12, by the sound it makes. But it is the choppers (or 'helis' as they are known in Jaffna) that are the most dangerous as they overfly the whole peninsula and shoot at any moving vehicle. The approach of one is met with loud cries of "heli, heli" as the people scramble for cover.

Of the planes, it is the lumbering Chinese-made Y-8s and Y-12s that do the most damage as they carry the largest explosives (barrel bombs or pipas). On one such outing, the Landrover I am in, happens to pass under an overflying Y-8. There is no doubt that we are spotted as the plane attempts to turn towards the course of the road. The elderly guide with me goes into a frightful panic and keeps urging the driver to step on it. After shrugging off the plane by going through some bylanes with a speed that would have shamed Niki(?) Lauda, the driver—seemingly nonchalant—explains: "There was no real danger. Y-8s never conduct spot bombing. They always go for predetermined targets."

THE DISLOCATION: Almost everyone fled Vavuniya (top) after the army overran it. Many have sought shelter and food at the Catholic church at Madhu, which now takes care of almost 10,000 refugees.

Although most parts of the peninsula have come in for aerial bombardment, it is the area around Jaffna Fort that has seen the worst of it. At both day and night, planes—sometimes two or three at a time—take off from Palaly Airfield to pound Tiger hideouts near the fort. The objective: to break the siege of the fort, where about 200 Sri Lankan soldiers—constantly harassed by the LTTE's artillery—have been trapped for a couple of months.

Four days after I leave Jaffna, the armed forces manage to enter the fort in a dramatic midnight operation and evacuate the soldiers. A 100 Tigers and around 27 armymen are estimated to have been killed in the fighting. It is a victory with little strategic significance as the fort cannot be used as a base to advance into the town. But the successful operation—which is rumoured to have been conducted against the advice of senior army officials—delights Colombo. The government has held all along that breaking the siege was important as it would demoralise the Tigers—show them that they could be defeated in their own backyard, Jaffna town.

The bombing and strafing of the peninsula has hurt the people far more than the Tigers. Admits the LTTE's ideologue and theoretician Anton Balasingham: "We have strong bunkers that protect us. But what can the people do against this indiscriminate bombing?" The LTTE estimates that no more than a handful of its cadres have been killed by aerial attacks. Most of its men (or boys rather) have been lost in operations on the ground.

Seventeen-year-old Mirash Colombo is one of them. He died in a direct confrontation in the fort area, when he was hit by a single bullet. Mirash left his school and parents in Colombo to join the Tigers about three years ago. As his body lies draped with the LTTE flag in the house of a relative, there are emotional speeches made about his valour, his love for the Tamil people and his dedication to Eelam. When his body is ready to be taken for cremation, about 20 of his uniformed and armed comrades solemnly march around it.Then, the funeral procession—flanked by the Tigers—leaves the house. Mirash's parents don't know that he is dead. Says an LTTE member: "We had no way of informing them. We will have to wait until someone leaving for Colombo can pass on the bad news. This may take a few days."

His words remind me of how severely cut off Jaffna peninsula is, from the rest of the island. Of a place where the people suffer in utter and dismal isolation. Of a war that has never been properly understood. •

Mukund Padmanabhan/ Jaffna

PHOTOGRAPHS: MUKUND PADMANABHAN

ACQUITTED!

Sanjay Singh and Ameeta Modi are cleared in the Syed Modi murder case

Few court cases have generated such countrywide interest. And few judgements have been more keenly awaited as the one delivered on the Syed Modi murder trial on 17 September by the district and sessions court, Lucknow. The crowds that had been thronging the courtroom ever since the hearings had begun on 16 August swelled in even larger numbers on 17 September. Though the seven accused were present in court, all eyes were trained on two of them: Sanjay Singh, the Rajya Sabha MP, and Ameeta Modi, a former national badminton champion and wife of Syed Modi.

And as the onlookers waited with bated breath, sessions judge Om Prakash Pradhan delivered his judgement from a 67-page voluminous report, from which he read out the gist in two minutes flat. The main accused, Sanjay Singh and Ameeta Modi, were absolved of all the charges levelled against them by the prosecution—the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI). The judge, however, opined that the cases against the other five accused—Akhilesh Singh, Amar Singh, Bhagwati Singh, Jitendra Singh and Tinku—could be pursued. As soon as Pradhan delivered his ruling, cries of "Sanjay Singh zindabad" and "Sher-e-UP zindabad" filled the courtroom. Singh himself chose to betray no emotion, conveying the impression that the implications of the verdict hadn't quite sunk in. Ameeta, who was accompanied by her brother Sanjay Kulkarni, too, was calm and composed. Later in the evening, a visibly excited Sanjay Singh told newsmen, "I have won, my conspirators have lost." Ameeta, who left for Delhi the same night, said, "I am dying to meet my little one, who is with my parents in the capital." Akhilesh Singh, however, was visibly upset. "I couldn't ditch the other four, could I?" he asked.

The main thrust of the prosecution's argument was that Sanjay Singh and Ameeta Modi were involved in an extra-marital relationship and Ameeta's husband, Syed Modi, was greatly resentful of this. The two lovers, thus, conspired to eliminate him. The CBI's murder theory was buttressed in the main by some significant jottings in Ameeta's diaries and letters written by her to Sanjay Singh, a letter from Ameeta's mother in which she expressed concern about her daughter's increasing involvement with Singh, a feverish letter penned by the slain Syed Modi, a letter written by Garima, Sanjay's wife, in which she offered to set her husband at liberty if he had "found a better companion", and the testimony of a close friend of Modi, Gyan Prakash Jaiswal.

Having attempted to establish the relationship between Sanjay Singh and Ameeta, and between Singh and Akhilesh Singh, who was described as "a person who could get anything done", the prosecution deemed that "a conspiracy could be proved on the basis of circumstantial evidence, which suggested physical manifestation of agreement betweeen conspirators". The CBI's counsel, S.G. Samant, even referred to the Supreme Court verdict in the Indira Gandhi assassination case in which Kehar Singh was convicted under similar circumstances. The defence lawyer, Ram Jethmalani, spiritedly argued that the relationship between Sanjay and Ameeta was a "platonic one", that the triangular relationship between Ameeta, Sanjay and Modi was a "harmonious one", and that Syed Modi merely overreacted on occasions.

KRISHNAN SATH

Soon after sessions judge Om Prakash Pradhan delivered the judgement, an elated Sanjay Singh said: "I have won, my conspirators have lost"

But Jethmalani's argument cut no ice with judge Pradhan. He conceded that Ameeta and Sanjay were involved in an illicit relationship, but that "motive" (on which the CBI based its murder theory) alone was not strong enough to establish their involvement in the conspiracy to bump off Syed Modi. "The mere existence of motive is, by itself, not an incriminating circumstance; motive, by itself, is not much..." the judge opined. Just as the prosecution chose to read out only those portions from Ameeta's diaries and missives which revealed her amorous links with Sanjay, judge Pradhan too selectively emphasised those passages which showed that she continued to enjoy physical relations with Modi, despite her closeness to Singh. He chose to ignore those very parts which had made people sit up only two weeks ago, when Samant had read them aloud in court. Some samples from Ameeta's diary: "Today S2 (code name for Sanjay Singh) enjoyed for first time, second time. I have never seen him like that before (23 February, 1986)." And another entry on 16 February, 1986: "The night was memorable. Called on me again at midnight. Today was unusual, sent raptures, ecstasy..." Judge Pradhan, on the other hand, alluded to a diary entry of Ameeta's made sometime in mid-January, 1986, when Modi was supposed to have played a match against one Vimal, to prove her "deep concern for Modi": "Had an awful night as far as sleep was concerned. I was having total body pain. The agony of having lost and the anxiety of Modi's match against Vimal was practically eating me..." When Modi ultimately won the match, the judgement records how Ameeta expressed her "delicate feelings of love and affection": "I finally swore the worst and that was to have nothing to do with S2 even if it meant our relationship finally broke off. After Modi's match finished on 15/12, 15/11, he came and touched me. It felt lovely, but this time my stakes were high. I was upset but did not dare to show it to him. I was wondering what was in store for me. After he changed, etc., we came home for ten minutes. He became demanding again. I gave in, because he was too happy to be upset..." Again on 28 January, 1986: "Came home and today we decided to cook. We made kichidi, which was real yum for a first attempt. We were happy and made love before we went into deep slumber clinging to each other..." Her entry on 24 February, 1986, reads, "Had a ball in the bed. I just did not feel like leaving the warmth I was getting from Modi, sleeping so close."

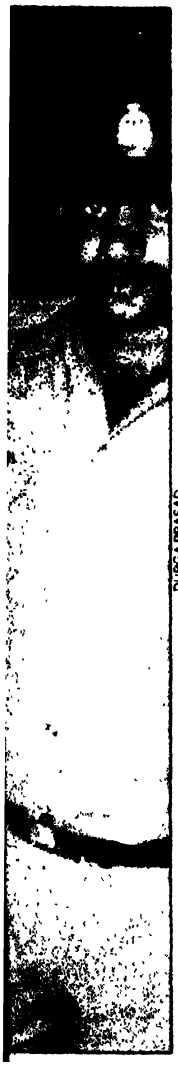
While admitting that Ameeta's diaries revealed that Modi time and again expressed his resentment and suspicion over her proximity to Sanjay Singh, which led to quarrels, the judgement observes, "All the fights and quarrels, that make the wear and tear of married life, somehow got sorted out." For example, Ameeta's diary recording of 19 March, 1986, shows that Modi had admitted to her that he had either visited a brothel or a massage parlour in London during a recent trip to London, apparently to get even with her.

In a similar vein, judge Pradhan has sought to vindicate Ameeta's coldness and animosity towards the Modi family—which was played up by the prosecution to prop up its thesis that everything was over between the Modis and Ameeta. Regarding the CBI's contention that she did not stay with her in-laws but instead put up in a hotel in Gorakhpur when she went to attend Modi's burial, the judgement deemed that this was understandable in the context of the marriage being an inter-religious one, and therefore, "not palatable to Modi's family". Similarly, the judge felt that Ameeta's not attending the majlis ceremony held at Modi's parental home was justified on the ground that this was purely a religious ritual and Ameeta was not bound to participate in it because she hadn't converted herself to Islam after marriage.

Much weightage was given by the CBI to a statement reportedly made by Sanjay Singh to Ameeta's mother that he would "silence Modi in his own way" ostensibly because the going had got tough for him and Ameeta. The judgement, however, does not construe this remark as indicative of Singh's desire or intention to liquidate Modi. Referring to four specific letters penned by Modi to Ameeta between March and April, 1984, judge Pradhan inferred that Modi was always favourably disposed towards Singh, and had even once expressed his gratitude to Sanjay for "having taught him to live and socialise". There was enough material to conclude that Sanjay Singh had dispelled Modi's suspicions on his involvement with Ameeta on more than one occasion, and therefore, the statement in question could also mean that he intended to deal with Modi in his own way, as he had done in the past. On the crucial charge made by the prosecution that Sanjay Singh had hatched the conspiracy to kill Modi along with Akhilesh at Yatrik Hotel in Allahabad sometime in June 1988, the judgement observed that the testimonies recorded merely indicate that Singh and Akhilesh were staying there to campaign for V.P. Singh, who was contesting the parliamentary elections. The judge also dismissed all the other facts garnered by the CBI in support of the conspiracy theory. Ameeta's capacity to love both Modi and Sanjay Singh equally, Modi's favourable disposition towards Singh and the lack of even a shred of direct evidence to suggest that Sanjay and Ameeta were involved in a conspiracy clinched the judgement in their favour.

Syed Modi



Ameeta Modi coming out of the courtroom: the agony is over

But on what grounds have Akhilesh Singh and the others been convicted? The major premise is the statement of Abdul Khalik, who owned the white Maruti van (MYG 999), which was allegedly used as the getaway vehicle by the assassins. Khalik, a contractor from Maldwani in Nainital district, said that Akhilesh Singh had borrowed it from him for some "urgent work", giving him in exchange his Maruti Gypsy. The van and its number plate were subsequently identified by a rickshaw-puller, Kishon Bahadur, who was present on the spot of the murder. The second round of the trial will commence on 26 September, when Akhilesh and his accomplices will have to defend themselves. But with Sanjay and Ameeta out of the scene, public as well as media interest in the case is bound to peter out, the likes of which Lucknow never witnessed before.

DURGA PRASAD

The PM with Sanjay Singh: In a dilemma

Meanwhile, Sanjay Singh is playing his cards close to his chest. The consensus political opinion in Lucknow is that the favourable judgement notwithstanding, his political career has suffered a serious setback. The UP Janata Dal is dominated by Mulayam Singh Yadav and Ajit Singh, and the former has made no bones of his resentment towards Singh by first denying him a nomination to the Rajya Sabha last March and a Vidhan Parishad nomination a month later. Given the caste equations in UP, Yadav, who is the undisputed leader of the backwards, who are themselves emerging as a powerful political lobby, wouldn't really like to see a Thakur getting an upper hand in the state's politics. Besides, Singh's own personality hasn't exactly endeared him to even the Jan Morcha members in the state. But if his proven resilience and propensity to worm his way into the hearts of the powers-that-be are an indication, Singh could resurrect himself. •

Radhika Ramaseshan/Lucknow

Union minister Sanjay Singh?

But will the Prime Minister oblige?

Now that the sessions court in Lucknow has acquitted Sanjay Singh in the Syed Modi murder case, the stage is perhaps set for his inclusion in the Union Cabinet. Not surprisingly, the recently-nominated Rajya Sabha MP is spending most of his time in the capital these days. And Singh's supporters in the Janata Dal are sparing no efforts to convince the Prime Minister to include his relative in the Union Council of ministers.

A powerful group of Janata Dal MPs have already met senior party leaders and have requested them to press for Sanjay Singh's inclusion in the Union Cabinet. Their argument is that Singh had done a lot for the Janata Dal and was among the first Congressmen to join the Opposition. Moreover, as events later proved, Sanjay Singh was even prepared to lay down his life for the party and the Prime Minister. (Sanjay Singh was shot at during the parliamentary elections in Amethi last November.) These MPs have even decided to meet V.P. Singh to pursue the case.

But there is another group within the Janata Dal which is vehemently opposing the idea of making Sanjay Singh a Union minister. Its prominent members include at least two young MPs, who were once very close to the Prime Minister but have fallen from grace now. The main thrust of their campaign against Sanjay Singh is that though the latter's name has been cleared by the courts in the Syed Modi murder case, nonetheless his inclusion in the government will give the Congress(I) a stick to beat the regime with. What is more, the anti-Sanjay lobby has been maintaining that the Prime Minister would do well not to promote the interests of his relatives, lest he be accused of nepotism.

The Congress(I) too has launched a concerted campaign against Sanjay Singh. Though the party high command is yet to react to the recent judgement, many Congress(I) MPs have demanded that the CBI, which had investigated the case, appeal against it in the Allahabad High Court. According to them, the home ministry is pressuring the CBI to drop the case—an allegation, say Sanjay Singh supporters, which is baseless and politically motivated.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister V.P. Singh has kept everyone guessing. •

Rajiv Shukla/New Delhi

Mother knows best

And no, she's not retiring, after all

So, after the touching farewell, the parting advice, the goodbye kiss—she stayed on. Mother Teresa respected the choice of the electoral college and decided against relinquishing charge of the Missionaries of Charity. Even though the Pope had granted her permission to retire due to ill-health.

For the sixth consecutive term, Mother Teresa was re-elected superior general—the post she has held since 1961—of the order she founded four decades ago. However, Father Van Exem, framer of the congregation's constitution, specified that she could not assume office till the Pope ratified her re-election. Each time the Mother was re-elected, permission was necessary because the constitutional clause, stating that a superior-general cannot continue for more than two consecutive terms, had to be waived. "For many of us it is a surprise," said Monsignor Francis Gomes, representative of the Archbishop of Calcutta, who presided over the five-hour secret proceedings. "But then, it is God's will." And once again, Mother Teresa bowed acquiescence.

Earlier, too, in 1948, Sister Teresa had answered God's call: "I want you to serve me among the poorest of the poor." She moved out of the Loreto cloister and into the slums of central Calcutta. Starting out all alone, she built the order that now has 3,000 committed workers in 410 establishments worldwide. And since 25 April, when the guiding spirit announced her retirement, the world has been speculating about her successor.

The successor had to be chosen from the six-member top council, by an electoral college. Sister Agnes, Mother Teresa's first disciple and assistant-general of the congregation, was the strongest favourite. But in this election, following "an amendment from the Vatican", all except one member of the last council were dropped and a new four-member council formed. And Sister Agnes was conspicuous by her absence.

This major reshuffle raised quite a few eyebrows. After all, the Mother calls Agnes her 'second self'. The 19-year-old Subhasini Das had simply walked into her mentor's life one day in 1949, when she had been struggling to cope singlehanded with the slumdwellers of Motijheel. She took the Mother's name—Agnes Gonxa Bojaxhiu before she became Sister Teresa—and helped her build the world s most famous missionary order. Till now, whenever the Mother was away, Agnes was in charge. Deeply spiritual and publicity-shy, Agnes was voted first councillor in 1985, despite being known as a mediocre administrator.

This reputation might have been behind her ouster from the second-in-command status in the 1979 election. And though Mother Teresa's preferance seems clear from the fact that she took Agnes with her to receive the Nobel Peace Prize, she had not voted for Agnes, in the election that same year.

So administrative abilities might be top priority. That explains keeping Sister Priscilla Lewis, former secretary-general and number three in the order, in the new council. Agnes has been replaced by Sister Federick, of Malta, who was the regional supervisor in the United States. Third in line is Sister Joseph Michael, till now the regional supervisor in Rome. The fourth councillor is Sister Monica, who was in charge in Holland.

"Looks like they want an all-white cast," says a convent teacher. Not really. Monica is a Bengali and Priscilla an Anglo-Indian. Besides, Sister Andrea Bonk, excluded from the new council, was a Polish-German. However, judging from the global exposure of the chosen faces, the order does seem to have an eye on the international scene. But, other than Agnes, the dropped councillors—Sisters Shanti D'Souza, Dorothy Francis, Camillus Pereira and Andrea Bonk—all had international experience. So, why this sudden shake-up?

"The congregation is turning corporate," explains a volunteer worker. Possible. Mother Teresa will delegate her responsibilities to the councillors and remain "an institutional figurehead". And, probably the emphasis on corporate efficiency has led to this reshuffling. In the bargain, the order might have deviated somewhat from its constitution which specifies God's work and the good of society as determinants for votes.

This stress on efficiency might have necessitated Mother Teresa's re-election. A New York Governor had once said: "When the only living saint asks you for something, how can you refuse?" However, that after 40 years of sustained applause, the order still needs the charisma of a figurehead to hold it together, might not be a happy sign. "I was expecting to be free, but God has other plans," the Mother commented.

And, from the enormous changes sprung upon the order, the plans are not quite clear. Not surprisingly, a cartoon front-paged by a leading Bengali daily showed someone reading about this election in the papers and exclaiming: "Dear God! Politics in Thy Kingdom too!" ●

Antara Dev Sen/Calcutta

Mother Teresa: happy returns

ALL -IN- ONES

GREAT SOUND GREAT LOOKS GREAT POWER GREAT PERFORMANCE
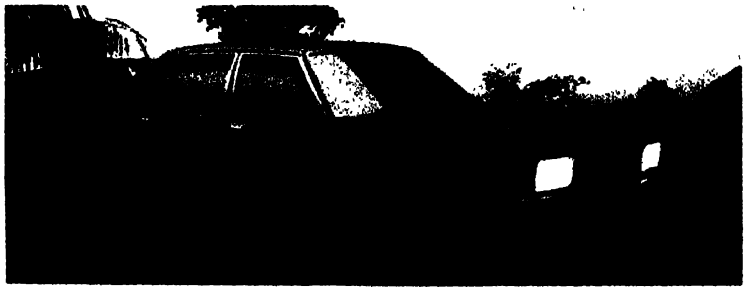
GREAT RECORDING



YES, WHY SETTLE FOR A TWO-IN-ONE, WHEN YOU CAN GET A VIDEOCON ALL-IN-ONE?

TURBO POWER	SX 48	• Detachable speakers • 60 watts PMPO • Hi speed dubbing • 5 band graphic equaliser • Rs 3375
SUPER WOOFER	SF 44	• Bass Boost selector • 60 watts PMPO • Hi speed dubbing • 5 band graphic equaliser • Rs 3050
AUTO REVERSE	SF 62	• Continuous play • 20 watts PMPO • Hi speed dubbing • 3 band graphic equaliser • Rs 2975

Prices inclusive of all taxes

May we suggest an alternative to judgi

Contract HW 22-69A

Accessories shown in the picture
are not part of standard equipment

A Limousine to every other car ing a man by the company he keeps?

Simple as it may seem, judging a man by the company he keeps isn't easy since it means you have to judge the company itself

One possible shortcut is by casting a quick glance over the cars parked in the driveway. And if they happen to be Contessas your problem is solved. Because the Contessa speaks volumes about the people who possess it.

A 1.8 litre Isuzu engine is an indication of power.

Five forward gears, including an overdrive, demonstrate an ability to perform at high speeds.

An impressively responsive steering confirms complete control.

Power disc brakes express the ability to respond swiftly and surely in times of crisis.

And, of course, a plush interior, an independent suspension and air conditioning point to an appreciation of the finer things in life.

But there's much more to the Contessa So why not get in touch with us. And judge for yourself.

CONTESSA
Classic 1·8 GL

Speaking out

It cost Lt. Gen. Sardeshpande his job

The bureaucracy can be brutally unforgiving. Especially when it comes to dealing with individuals who threaten to expose the system. The Indian Army's Lieutenant General S.C. Sardeshpande realised this a little too late. Having won a number of battles, he perhaps presumed that his career could also survive a skirmish with the military bureaucracy. Events, however, proved him wrong and a brilliant career spanning 34 long years was prematurely terminated this August.

His dismissal had everything to do with the Indian misadventure in Sri Lanka. The bunglings and the strategic short-sightedness of the Indian military high command in the 'peace keeping' operations are fast becoming history—but a history the army top brass is understandably not too keen to record, far less to publicise. The problem with Lt. Gen. Sardeshpande was that he was not the type to play ball. As chief of staff (COS) of the Indian Peace Keeping Force (IPKF) headquarters in Madras, Sardeshpande had openly clashed with his higher-ups. And as the general officer commanding (GOC), 54 Division, in charge of Jaffna, he had exposed the strategic weakness of Indian military planning.

NITIN RAI

Lt. Gen. Sardeshpande was dismissed because as GOC, Jaffna, he had exposed the bunglings and the strategic short-sightedness of the Indian military high command in the Sri Lankan operations

Lt. Gen. Sardeshpande was posted as GOC, 54 Div, because he had considerable experience in counter-insurgency operations in the north-east. He had been awarded the AVSM for his tenure as an Assam Rifles DIG in Nagaland. When he went to Jaffna in January 1988, the Tamil guerrillas had just been cleared from the peninsula town but retained control of the adjoining areas. It was a tense period for the Indian 'peace-keepers', who were routinely ambushed, shot in the back and blasted by mines. The army was fighting with its hands tied behind its back and the troops were taking a terrible beating. But not a single jawan or officer questioned the decision to go into battle. The army's job was to obey. Scores of young officers, most of them in their early twenties, fell to enemy bullets while leading their troops. Gradually, and at great cost, the Indian soldiers managed to bring down the level of LTTE violence to a point where elections could be held and a semblance of civil order restored.

The task of the IPKF was made even more difficult since the LTTE, no matter how murderous it might have been, was secretly revered by the Tamils of Sri Lanka. The LTTE supremo, Prabhakaran, had become a cult figure. The experiences of Vietnam and insurgency in the north-east had amply demonstrated how military power alone can never win a war in such circumstances. And this is precisely what Sardeshpande had pointed out. He felt that military operations in the Tamil-dominated areas of Sri Lanka should be just one strand in the Indian grand strategy. He repeatedly told his bosses that India must launch a large-scale, concerted psychological operation aimed at winning over the Lankan Tamils, against the highly successful LTTE propaganda effort.

Just as the idea of a Naga nation-state had been countered by the granting of statehood to Nagaland, Sardeshpande felt that Indian intervention in north-eastern Sri Lanka could succeed only if it managed to project a credible, viable alternative to the Eelam idea. He believed that the IPKF was only further isolating itself by just killing LTTE militants and lamented the fact that Indian policy-makers were not prepared to hear what the Sri Lankan Tamils had to say. He wanted Indian strategists to start large-scale, rehabilitation and relief work to divert the attention of the local Tamils. As it turned out, however, India could never prove that it was genuinely concerned about protecting the interests of the Tamils. In the end, the IPKF packed up and went home, leaving a debilitated LTTE to ward off the brutal, all-out attacks by the Sri Lankan military.

A number of senior Indian Army officers had foreseen precisely such a despairing denouement but few had spoken out. Sardeshpande, however, was different. As GOC, Jaffna, he had tried his best to build bridges with the local people, had formed a Civil Affairs Cell which heard complaints against Indian soldiers and he tried to prove to the locals that the IPKF was not their enemy. The idea was to win the "hearts and minds" of the Lankan Tamils. But it was the LTTE which was winning this battle since the IPKF failed in its public relations efforts. Sardeshpande had protested and even threatened to return the UYSM award conferred on him for his services in Jaffna.

After 14 months in Jaffna, Sardeshpande was transferred as chief of staff (COS) to the IPKF headquarters in Madras. Here he came up against yet another problem that suggested that the system was not working properly. The IPKF headquarters had been raised in April 1988 with a total strength of 350 officers and other personnel. Initially, Madras was declared a peace station for the IPKF, and the soldiers who could not get military accommodation took civilian residential quarters on rent as is the procedure in all peace stations. Sardeshpande, when he took over, found that a number of his officers and men had not been able to obtain permission for hiring houses even though they had brought their families to Madras and admitted their children to local schools. All senior officers, on the other hand, had been given official accommodation and, Sardeshpande felt that this was not fair.

As an officer, one of the first things he had been taught was that the welfare of subordinates came first. Every general knows that armymen are prepared to lay down their lives, but expect that they and their families would be looked after during peace time. At the IPKF headqurters, however, this age-old lesson seemed to have been conveniently forgotten. For 8-9 months, junior and non-commissioned officers (NCOs) had been paying steep rents out of their meagre earnings but the army high command was not responding to Sardeshpande's desperate messages. Finally, in June 1989 the army top brass declared that Madras was not a peace station but a 'field area' and no reimbursements would be made to officers and men who had hired civil quarters.

This was patently unfair. For, there were many IPKF personnel who had been reimbursed or had got official accommodation. Some IPKF officers even challenged the decision in court while other young officers were openly cursing their superiors. Sardeshpande felt that officers and men at the IPKF headquarters in Madras were losing faith in the system and that this trend had to be countered. In late October 1989, the IPKF, COS, wrote to the army chief in New Delhi, saying that if the reimbursements were not made, he should either be relieved of his present assignment, or, if that was not possible, to accept his premature retirement from the army.

The reimbursements for rents paid might appear to be small thing in the army's grand scheme, but it reflected much more. Here was the IPKF waging war in a foreign country and yet the army top brass could not satisfactorily solve such a small administrative problem. But no matter what Sardeshpande did, the army high command did not respond. Finally, in March this year, the IPKF returned from Sri Lanka and in April, Sardeshpande was promoted to Lieutenant General and transferred to the army headquarters in New Delhi as director general (Infantry). In June, he was suddenly asked if he wished to pursue his request for premature retirement. Taken aback, Sardeshpande pointed out that his request had been conditional. Since he was no longer the COS, IPKF, the quesiton of seeking retirement was no longer valid. He then wrote an official letter withdrawing his application for premature retirement and forgot about the whole thing.

A month later, Lt. Gen. Sardeshpande was served with a premature retirement order which said that his earlier application for the same had been accepted. This was the sack. And the general, not knowing what to do, filed a statutory complaint explaining the details of the case. In his letter, he pointed out that while his application for premature retirement had been processed so speedily, the army had proceeded at snail's pace with the demand for housing reimbursement of IPKF personnel. His complaint, predictably, was rejected and on 22 August Sardeshpande was out of uniform.

Ironically, Sardeshpande later learnt that the army headquarters had sanctioned the reimbursements sometime in end-June, which is roughly around the same time he had been served with the premature retirement order. Any other person would have gone to the courts. But Lt. Gen. Sardeshpande didn't take such a step since he believes that the army should sort out its internal problems. He has done his bit. Now, he feels that his fellow officers must stand up and learn to speak out before it is too late.●

Indranil Banerjie/New Delhi

India failed to prove that it was concerned about protecting the interests of the Lankan Tamils. In the end, the IPKF returned home, leaving a debilitated LTTE to ward off the brutal attacks by the Sri Lankan Army

In the name of Ram

The BJP prepares to do battle with the government

Now it seems to be the BJP's (Bharatiya Janata Party) turn to get tough with the National Front government. And what's worse, the party has chosen to register its unhappiness at a time when the Raja finds himself in the worst trouble ever since he assumed office. The law and order situation in the country has deteriorated what with the anti-Mandal Commission stir spreading throughout the country, while the Punjab and Kashmir problems are no nearer solution. The economy shows no signs of looking up, either. In such a scenario, the desertion of the BJP would be the worst thing to happen to V.P. Singh. But if the party's dissatisfaction with the government's working is anything to go by, such a situation may well arise.

Earlier, all talk of withdrawing the BJP's "critical support" to the Dal regime came from hardliners like Shanta Kumar and Sunderlal Patwa. But now party president L.K. Advani has also begun to send out warning signals to the government. Not without reason. The provocations have been plenty. First, the removal of Jagmohan as the Governor of Jammu and Kashmir, despite the BJP's known preference for the man. Other points of disagreement followed soon. The party was livid when Om Prakash Chautala was reinstated as Haryana chief minister, despite the Meham incident. But the BJP decided to stand by the National Front during its moment of crisis, anyway. More recently, the BJP has been irked by the government's insensitivity in reviving the Mandal Commission Report and implementing its recommendations without consulting the party and its stand (or the absence of it) on the highly volatile Ram Janmabhoomi issue.

Advani and Vajpayee at a BJP rally: growing in strength

But it was the Mandal Commission Report and Ram Janmabhoomi which dominated proceedings at the three-day study camp for BJP MPs and

The coming confrontation ☐ The BJP and the government will clash

THE MANDAL WAR

The BJP is in the awkward situation of having to go along with the Mandal Commission though it detests the idea.

V.P. SINGH'S UNPOPULARITY

"We have the responsibility but no power," Advani told SUNDAY two months ago. Now, the BJP is tiring of taking the rap for V.P. Singh's mistakes.

STATEHOOD FOR DELHI

The BJP feels let down by the government's refusal to grant Delhi statehood.

MLAs held in Bangalore. The general mood was best summed up thus: "We sincerely want that this government should last its full term but it would be a monumental folly on its part to presume that it can take our support for granted for all time to come."

The camp, the fourth such held by the BJP so far, was part of a concerted effort of the party to carve out a distinctive indentity for itself. "We want to be different from other political parties" said BJP general secretary, Kedar Nath Sahni. "We want the people to judge us on the basis of our performance in the states we rule, the assemblies there and in the Parliament."

The mood of introspection, however, could not mask the truth that the rift between the BJP and the Janata Dal had become far more serious. And that the two parties seemed to be moving towards a showdown on 30 October, when BJP would commence construction of the Sri Ram temple at the disputed Ram Janambhoomi/Babri Masjid site. While the shilanyas ceremony had been coordinated by senior members of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP), this time the top leadership of the BJP will dominate the show. And the stage seems set for a confrontation.

Advani has announced that he will participate in a 10,000 kilometre rath yatra, from Somnath to Ayodhya. Covering 300 kilometres a day, the yatris will pass through eight states, mobilising support for the temple construction. Advani has invited all party MPs and MLAs to join the kar seva which will follow the rath yatra

Advani's message was clear. If the Raja persisted in his attempts to win votes by fragmenting Hindu society with such weapons as the Mandal Commission Report, the BJP would go all out to unite Hindus on the Ram Janmabhoomi issue.

While Advani promises a "peaceful satyagraha" at Ayodhya, others fear that the situation may well take a violent turn. The Uttar Pradesh chief minister, Mulayam Singh Yadav, for one, has warned the BJP that if court orders are violated, he will crack down in his usual no nonsense manner. V.P. Singh seems to have given a carte blanche to Yadav to deal with the situation as he sees fit. And the fact that Yadav has the support of Chandra Shekhar as well makes him a formidable force to contend with, as far as the BJP is concerned. But the party can take some comfort from the fact that Chandra Shekhar spoke in its favour at the meeting of the Committee on Communal Harmony.

The BJP's stand on the Ram Janmabhoomi issue is clear There is little to be said in favour of wanting for a court verdict. High Court decision on several such contentious cases as the Shah Banu one have been nullified by subsequent orders of the Supreme Court. So, what guarantee is there that the dispute will end with the court judgement?

But it was left to BJP vice-president, Vijayaraje Scindia to take up Mulyam Singh Yadav's challenge. Said the Rajmata: "If Mr Mulayam

THE KASHMIR MUDDLE

Ever since Jagmohan was removed, the BJP has been appalled by the regime's Kashmir policy.

MULAYAM SINGH YADAV

The BJP regards his objection to the temple construction as pandering to Muslims

RAM JANMABHOOMI

The big one. The BJP's best hope of victory lies in a Hindu wave over the temple—V.P. Singh can't let this happen.

"We had cautioned the government"

BJP president L.K. Advani on the Mandal Commission report and the party's rath yatra programme

Q: Prime Minister V.P. Singh has recently said that in case the BJP withdraws support, the President will be free to invite the Congress(I) to form the government. Do you foresee such developments in the near future?
A: It is his style to make such statements. All I can say is that whether it be his earlier statement about the possibility of a national government or the episode of his resignation or this one—such things should not be done at the level of a Prime Minister. I have met many of his colleagues in the government who feel unhappy that the responses of the Prime Minister should be of this nature. His statements contribute to a sense of uncertainty and thereby undermine the efficacy of the government.

Q: But do you think V.P. Singh is prepared to go to the people? Has he lost credibility?
A: I would not like to speculate or make comments which would seem a subjective assessment of his personality. All I can say is that his own colleagues are not happy with the consequences such utterances have for the country.

Q: Do you think events are leading upto the announcement of a mid-term poll? V.P. Singh has already said he is prepared to sit in the Opposition...

A: Look at it this way: when this government assumed power there was the doubt whether a minority government supported by two ideologically different parties would last. Then came the resignation of Devi Lal and the scepticism returned. It is also true that whenever there has been a false step taken by the government we have not hesitated to criticise it—be it Rubiaya episode, the Jagmohan affair or their assessment of Mann or the ULFA. And everytime people ask us: why are you supporting the government then? Why are you not withdrawing support?

Most of them may be pertinent questions but the mere fact that they are being asked and answered has also contributed to a sense of uncertainty. I will not deny that. But that was only till the Mandal Commission. I think the way they have gone about handling the Mandal Commission has introduced a more serious dimension.

Q: Don't you think some problems like Kashmir and Punjab were inherited by the government?
A: Yes, they have been there. These and to some extent the problems on the economic front. We have pointed out to the Congress(I) in particular that they have no right to complain. We (the BJP) certainly have. To that extent we have been defending the government against the Congress(I). But it has been impossible to defend the government on the Mandal Commission. It is a matter on which both the BJP and the Marxist parties cautioned the government not to go ahead without consultation or without analysing the consequences. We were alive to the problems that its total implementation would create. The BJP has been unanimous in its condemnation of the Mandal report.

Q: Could the developments over Mandal Commission or the handling of the Ram Janmabhoomi issue become a flashpoint for the BJP?
A: I would not use the word but I have said the same thing quite sharply in Madras and harshly in Bhopal. I have said that the government ought to find out why, while it took two-and-a-half years for the cheers for Rajiv to be converted into jeers, in this case the change has come about in months. Why? I do think the decision to implement the Mandal Commission report on the one hand and the 15 August speech of the Prime Minister on the other have contributed to bringing down the credibility of the government very steeply.

Q: It is felt the rath yatra you are undertaking is intended to counter the caste division created by the Mandal Commission report?
A: People forget we had announced the 30 October programme three-four months ago. For a long time I had been thinking of undertaking some programme to project the party's viewpoint in a more comprehensive manner. But I don't blame anyone for relating the two things because my announcement came a fortnight

V.P. Singh's statements contribute to a sense of uncertainty and thereby undermine the efficacy of the government after the Prime Minister's announcement on the Mandal Commission. But the actual position is that the two are not related.

Q: Don't you think that the Muslim leaders are relatively quiet on the issue?

A: Yes, I have a feeling the Muslims are reconciled. Had it not been for pseudo-secularists like Mulayam Singh Yadav, who are inciting and provoking people, there would not have been any problems. The intensity of Hindu feeling is understood and appreciated and by and large, I feel there should be no problems on 30 October.

Q: But the Prime Minister seems to have given the Uttar Pradesh chief minister a free hand to deal with the problem?

A; I do not know. According to me the Prime Minister has twice said that he does not approve of it (Mulayam Singh's handling of the Ram Janmabhoomi issue) and that he was unhappy about it. He said he would restrain him (Mulayam Singh Yadav) but that is not happening.

Q: What will the BJP's stance be if elections are announced? Some BJP office-bearers have said that the party will maintain an independent identity.

A: It will depend on so many factors. The scenario has been changing so rapidly. Even two or three months before the last election, nobody knew what the strategy would be. So, for any party to say that it would fight the elections alone would not be a correct assessment.

Q: Are you confident that the BJP will increase its present strength in Parliament?

A: It depends on how the election comes upon us. I would not deny that the failures of this government would affect our prospects as well. This is despite our attempts to distance ourselves from the government by criticising it. Everyone knows we are supporting it and the minute we withdraw support it cannot last. But I know, even three months earlier there was a general feeling, even with in the Congress, that if there is a mid-term poll, the BJP would gain from it.

Singh Yadav becomes on obstacle, he will have to deal with Lord Hanuman since (the construction of the temple) is Bhagwan Ram's work." She added that the temple would be constructed at any cost; the survival or collapse of the National Front government was irrelevant in this context. Added Kedar Nath Sahni: "Mr Advani has already said that Ram Janmabhoomi could become a flashpoint for us. And if Mulayam Singh does what he has been threatening to do, then it will surely lead to a confrontation."

Advani himself asserted (see interview): "My only concern is that the temple should be built at the site which is believed to be the birthplace of Ram. And I would like it to be done wihtout hurting the sensibilities of any other section." The BJP president pointed out that while the foundation stone has been laid at the main gate (singha dwara)of the proposed temple, the sanctum sanctorum (garba griha) will come up exactly where the Hindu idols are placed inside the temple' masjid

But if that is done, the entire existing structure will have to be demolished. Which is what the Muslim community has been agitating about But as Advani points out quickly, "The proposal of the VHP is not to demolish it but to lift it and place it elsewhere. This should not hurt the sensibilities of anyone."

Congress(I) spokesman, V.N Gadgil, maintains that the BJP is playing the same game it did before previous elections: appealing to Hindu chauvinism In 1966, there was the cow slaughter incident; in 1984 ganga jal processions were taken out; and just before the 1989 poll, the shilanyas ceremonies were organised all over India.

Unfortunately, the implementation of the Mandal Commission Report and the boiling over of the Ram Janmabhoomi issue have coincided, thus diffusing attention somewhat. The BJP's main objection to the Mandal recommendations is that they could well lead to a disintegration of the Hindu community. The party feels — with the Congress(I)—that the government's decision could provoke caste holocaust. And that the Raja, in an attempt to garner electoral gains, has resorted to as cheap a trick as this.

What is causing some worry to the BJP is that despite the heady gains made by it in the general elections, nothing has really gone the way the party would have liked it to. The influx of refugees from Kashmir continues, with the situation in the Valley getting no better The Delhi Statehood Bill, the BJP alleges, was sabotaged by the Janata Dal and the Congress(I). The party's views on the postponement of Assembly elections in Punjab, too, have not been paid heed to.

But now that the party has announced the 30 October programme, the Dal has suddenly become concerned about the intentions of the BJP. And whether a dispute with the government on the temple would eventually lead to it pulling out of the alliance with the National Front

Advani admitted during a press conference in Delhi that matters were, indeed, coming to a head "Perhaps", he said, "it is inevitable because of the dithering attitude of the National Front government No earnest attempt has been made to solve the problem during the past seven months."

There seems to be a growing feeling among the party members that going alone in the next general election may be a good idea As Krishna Lal Sharma said "We will put up a good

BJP activists demonstrating against the Mandal report: lambasting the government dates for almost all the seats Our appeal to the people will be that since both the Congress(I) and that Janata Dal have been tried out they should give a chance to the BJP now."

And that's where the Ram Janmabhoomi issue comes in The BJP is aware that the only way it can have substantial electoral gains is if it manages to get the majority community on its side. And what better way to rally the Hindus than by construction of a temple for Ram. •

Ritu Sarin/New Delhi

THE INVESTIGATOR

How Chitra Subramaniam did it

Sometimes, when Chitra Subramaniam is in a self-deprecatory mood, she will joke about her success. "You know," she will say, "I think my sources were just so surprised to see a pregnant Indian woman walking the streets of Stockholm, speaking no Swedish at all and still hoping to get to the bottom of Bofors that they felt sorry for me."

It is an attractive image and Subramaniam's reluctance to blow her own trumpet has consistently led people to underestimate her. At one level, she is a good-looking, South Indian dancer-type in a sari, with a young son who was born in the midst of the Bofors controversy.

But there's much more to her than that. Subramaniam is also the best investigator in Indian journalism today. Whereas the majority of today's 'scoops' consist of lies, innuendo and politically-motivated fabrications, Subramaniam's Bofors stories were well-documented, had been verified by two independent sources before they saw print, and made no points beyond those justified by the evidence available. Nor did she see herself as the conscience of the nation or regard it necessary to lecture her readers on ethics.

Her detractors like to say that she was no more than a post office for leaks from the Swedish prosecutor's office, but this view ignores two realities. One: since the focus of the investigation has shifted to Switzerland, she has still come up with scoop after scoop—and these could not have emanated from the Swedish prosecutor. And two: she did not simply reprint documents that others had handed her. She double-checked each 'revelation', put it into context and then decided where to look for the next document.

The results were devastating. Subramaniam's stories—more than anything else—sealed the fate of the Rajiv Gandhi government.

Why did she do it? Subramaniam says she had no political motives. She began investigating the story with an open mind and had no idea that it would become such a major exposé. When she started out, her ideological position was clear (she was a Marxist) but it had little relevance to the story.

And she had the backing of her husband, Carlo, an Italian engineer she had met when they were both students at Stanford. "It was Carlo who taught me the importance of proof," she recalls. "At Stanford, I remember he once asked me to prove that ten was greater than zero. I told him, it was obvious. He said: 'May be, but can you prove it?' That made me realise how important it was to prove everything including things we consider obvious."

Carlo subsidised Chitra's travels because she told him that it was unreasonable to expect Indian journalists to have access to large sums of money. He thought hers was the right cause and that, as a journalist, she had an obligation to go where the story took her.

Of late, however, he has tired somewhat of Bofors. And Subramaniam too says she wishes that the story would come to an end soon. Not only has it come to dominate her life but she has also—over the last two months—become a controversial figure. A section of the media believes that she compromised her integrity by becoming part of the investigation. And the investigators, in turn, believe that she has no business speaking to the likes of Amitabh Bachchan.

In the midst of all this has come the controversy over her Arun Nehru story (see SUNDAYS passim) and her resignation from the Express. The Express lobby suggests that she tried to involve Nehru to throw the investigation off the rails.

And The Independent (which carried her Nehru documents) says that the Express sat on her story to protect Nehru. Adding to the confusion is the somewhat ambiguous role of N. Ram, her former editor at The Hindu.

Subramaniam will tell her side of the story next year in her eagerly-awaited Penguin book on the Bofors scandal. Till then, we will have to be content with the interview that follows. ●

Vir Sanghvi

Bofors and ethics

Some plain speaking from Ms Subramaniam

SUNDAY: Do you consider yourself part of the investigating team?
Chitra Subramaniam: No. Certainly not.

Q: Why do people have the impression that you are part of the team?
A: The decision to cooperate with the investigation was taken by N. Ram, when we were with The Hindu. This was announced in the press. I objected to this but it was too late and later, Ram informed me that he felt that he had a moral obligation to explain to me why he had done this.

His explanation was that the journalistic investigation into Bofors had gone as far as it could. After that, it had to be an official investigation and we would assist them from the outside.

This was very controversial because I don't think journalists can collaborate with an investigative arm of the government. I objected, and my objections are on record. The CBI's mandate is not the same as mine.

Q: So you did cooperate?
A: Well, the impression gained ground because I came with them. I was asked to come with them.

Q: By whom?
A: By V.P. Singh.

Q: Is this why people like Dr Schmid (of the Swiss police) thought you were part of the team?

A: I was never a part of the team. Before I had met Schmid with the team, I had met him soon after the elections as a journalist.

I have been in touch with Schmid as a journalist for two years now.

I met Schmid in December and told him that I thought that there would be another request (for assistance from the government) but I made it clear that I was a journalist and not a Government of India person.

I went to India after that. That's when I met V.P. Singh. I like V.P. Singh and he wanted me to come with the team. I immediately said 'no'. I had a commitment to my family that I would just stop all this now.

But I got talked into it. You can say I was weak but I got talked into it. But I was interested in the story.

I came here and phoned Schmid from Rome airport and said we were coming. And he said 'what are you doing here?' And I said 'I'm just a sidekick. I'm not an investigator.'

Q: When you say 'we', who do you mean?
A: Mr Madhavan (DIG,CBI), Mr Arun Jaitley (additional solicitor-general), and Mr Bhure Lal (joint secretary, PMO). Mr Bhure Lal had no real role in the investigation, though, as far as I know.

So, I introduced the team to Schmid and said 'this is the team' and then, I left the room.

The second time I came with the team I arranged for Marc Bonnant, the lawyer. I was asked to go to Sweden from here and I refused though my ticket was Switzerland-Sweden.

It was totally open and above-board.

Q: So you were part of the team and

I don't think journalists can collaborate with an investigative arm of the government. I objected and my objections are on record

I'm not saying that Arun Nehru made money on Bofors... I left the Express because I was made a fool of yet you were not. Did you see the documents that were handed over?

A: No. All I saw of the Letter Rogatory (LR) was the covering letter and that too I saw later. It was just the usual 'the judge presents his compliments' kind of letter. But I saw nothing else

Q: Did you see the now-famous letter from Mr Madhavan submitting a list of suspects?
A: No. Not at all.

Q: That is quite crucial because it does relate to whether you were in a position to plant stories based on this secret information.
A: But how could I plant anything? For me, the whole thing has been 'damned if you do, damned if you don't'. I did not want to get into the investigation. Yes, I could have put my foot down and said no. But I didn't do that. That was my mistake and I'm paying for it.

And as for all this rubbish about my competing with the CBI, that's nonsense. How can we compete? We have different mandates.

Q: But apparently you were present in the room when the Swiss told Mr Jaitley and Mr Madhavan that there was a sixth account?
A: What?

Q: Weren't you?
A: Rubbish. This is not true. Even Mr Bhure Lal was not present We were in another room. I remember I had a cold and Bhure Lal, who is into Ayurveda, was talking to me about Ayurvedic remedies

And then Dr Schmid came into the room and I asked him 'what's going on?'

He told me that Mr Madhavan was typing out some additional information. Then Schmid and the rest of us talked about Ayurveda Mr Bhure Lal was the witness.

Q: Well, the version that appeared in Dagens Nyheter (DN) was that Dr Schmid, when asked to freeze five accounts, said 'well, there is also a sixth account.'
A: What? Are you mad?

Q: Why do you say that?
A: Dr Schmid is known in Switzerland as the king of secrets. Here is this man that every government talks to and wants to buy off because he knows everything about everybody's accounts.

Come on! He is not going to open his mouth and volunteer information. This story is simply incorrect.

Q: Well, this is the DN story.
A: I think what may have happened is that the Indian investigators stumbled on some information, but certainly it did not come from Schmid.

Q: So what was the sixth account?
A: Five accounts had been traced earlier. And a sixth was then blocked. The only way that could have happened was if the sixth account was linked to one of the five accounts.

Q: You've done a story in The Indian Express stating that the sixth account belongs to a company called Jubilee Finance.
A: No. I've said it is a strong possibility. We know that an account is pledged to Mont Blanc as part of a laundering operation; but let's leave it at that.

Q: That's not the version that appeared in DN?
A: No. It isn't.

Q: The general view is that the DN story came from you. That the investigators told you about it but that you lacked the verification necessary to carry it yourself. So, in a fit of over-enthusiasm, you called up your friend Bo Andersen and gave him the story. Bo knew your record on Bofors, so he rushed to print with it. Had Bo been more cautious and checked with the CBI, then they would have told him to hold on.
A: Let me try and shoot this down. First of all, I was not present in any of the official meetings, so this can be verified independently through Dr Schmid's office.

I sent Andersen my story on fax as I've been doing since 1988. The next afternoon, Bo phoned me and asked, 'what do you mean by at least five accounts have been frozen.'

He wanted to know if there were

I refused to go to the Press Council for suppressing the Bofors story. Because then I would have had to go against Ram also more. And if so, who did they belong to. This is how I told him what had been told to me about the sixth account.

Q: Told to you by whom?
A: A member of the investigating team who was present with Dr Schmid when this supposed conversation took place.

Q: According to you, there were only two persons present in the room with Dr Schmid. So, do you realise the importance of what you are saying?
A: Yes, I do.

Q: Okay, but that still doesn't mean you did not leak the story. The investigators may have heard about the sixth account and then told you as a charter member of the team. But they didn't tell Bo Andersen. You, on the other hand, did speak to Bo.
A: Bo Andersen and I have been cooperating very closely since 1988. I contacted him because I needed some help and he translated all my documents. He is considered quite an authority on Bofors.

I told him the story that the investigators had given me and he said 'why don't we use it?' And I said, 'because I don't trust the information. I know Dr Schmid and unless he gives me an independent confirmation, I won't use it. I don't think you should use it either.'

I went back to India and he phoned me frantically one evening, telling me that Expressen had carried the story just as I had told him it had been told to me. Exactly in the same fashion.

He asked me if it had appeared in India and I told him that no, it hadn't. Then I said, 'I don't think you should use it and you should speak to N. Ram and see what he has to say.' I told him that this could never be proved.

V.P. Singh told me 'this is all your work' and I felt I had to help with the investigations. I still admire V.P. Singh Bo spoke to N. Ram who I believe told him that even The Indian Express hadn't used it, implying that their standards of verification were not as high as ours and if they hadn't used it, then he shouldn't use it.

But Bo phoned me back and said that as the story was out in Expressen, he no longer felt bound to not write it. He felt the pressure. And he wrote it.

Q: So you are saying that it wasn't a DN story originally. But that it was a Expressen story.
A: Yes. But Expressen has no credibility, so the DN story got picked up.

Q: And had you spoken to anybody at Expressen before the story appeared?
A: No. I don't know anybody there.

Q: Who filed the story?
A: Per Wendel. If my memory serves me right, then it was him.

Q: Was this the same story you had been given?
A: Not just me. Five other people in India were given the same story from the same source.

The Indian Express carried another story saying that this account was at Pictet & Co., which was news to me.

The Illustrated Weekly also wrote about the sixth account and said that it had been found thanks to the legal acumen of a member of the team. Coomi Kapoor, who wrote the story and had got it from the same source, asked me about it but by then it had all got out of hand.

Q: But the sixth account and Pictet & Co. are in the I.R.
A: I didn't know that then. I do now.

So, if I planted the sixth account story, did I plant it in the Letter Rogatory?

I think that is the crucial question.

Q: How do you react to the attacks on you?
A: It's not even intelligent. I wish there were some intelligent attacks. It upsets my parents who live in Bangalore which I feel sorry about.

Q: But there's more to it than that. You are being taken to court by AE Services. The Bachchans are naming you in a criminal conspiracy case for leaking the story to DN.
A: Oh that's all right. That's part of the game. I have no problems with that. I have nothing to hide. I'll go to court and tell the truth.

The important thing is that my sources haven't lost faith in me. The media called me Mr V.P. Singh's agent and Amitabh Bachchan's mole, so it cancels itself out.

Q: Moving onto the Arun Nehru controversy, how do you respond to the suggestion that the story was a plant?
A: I fall off my chair in amazement.

Q: Why did the story take so long to appear?
A: I don't know.

Q: Is that why you left The Indian Express?
A: Yes. I think so. I felt I was made a fool of. The documents were circulating freely in Delhi after I sent them to the Express.

Q: Do you think the documents incriminate Arun Nehru?
A: I'm not saying that he made money on Bofors. All I'm saying is that his role requires examination.

I have nothing to hide. I'll go to court and tell the truth... The important thing is that my sources haven't lost faith in me

Q: You are very self-righteous about the Express' delaying the story. But isn't it a fact that you had these documents in October 1989 and held them back to avoid jeopardising the Janata Dal's chances of winning the elections?
A: I was only an employee then.

Q: All right. Did G. Kasturi (editor of The Hindu) stop you from carrying them?

A: No.

Q: Who did?
A: If I tell you a lie then I won't be able to face Bo Andersen or my sources.

The decision to use or not to use (the) documents was not mine.

Q: Whose was it?
A: I was working with N. Ram who had all the responsibility about using documents.

Q: And this was fine by you?
A: There was no discussion. Ram's decisions were final

Q: The obvious question, then. If you are so self-righteous about Arun Shourie now, then why didn't you get equally outraged by N. Ram?
A: I didn't get self-righteous about Arun Shourie

I left the Express not because they sat on my story. I left because my stories were being circulated in Delhi while I was being asked to check up on certain points

Q: You don't see any contradiction in accusing the Express of playing politics if first Ram and you sat on documents and then promptly joined up with the investigation? You don't think it is a little late in the day to discover that editors have political motives?
A: No you don't understand With Ram, it was difficult to attribute motives because I trusted his judgement. I didn't have a relationship with Arun Shourie

For instance, we wanted to use Martin Ardbo's diary and I asked Ram why and his answer was 'the right context had to emerge'

Q: When did you get the diary?
A: 1988.

My sources—the people who gave them to me and the people who translated them—knew when I got the documents. So, there is no question of my being wrong on the dates.

Q: Let me get this straight. In 1988, you had documents that you did not publish till 1989. In 1988, you had the reference to the 'Gandhi's trustee lawyer'. But you waited till the election campaign before using it. And at that stage you treated it like some kind of smoking gun?
A: Yeah

Q: Does that make sense to you as a journalist?
A: No, it doesn't.

I don't want to pass the blame but I couldn't decide. You know, with Ram you don't argue

I share the responsibility I should have questioned his decisions I had no power to print.

Q: No. But you had the power to quit.
A: Yeah But I respected Ram. With the diary, we constantly talked about it I kept asking, 'when is it coming?' But he decided when to use it

Q: Was this true of all stories?
A: In the beginning it was very obvious We used it as we got it, once we had verified it

But later, there were delays and I share the responsibility But it was clearly stated to me that I was just an employee

Q: Did you assert yourself?

A: Yes. I refused to go to the Press Council against Kasturi for suppressing the Bofors stories. Because then I would have to go against Ram also Because I was a witness—and you could even argue that I was a participant, however grudgingly, to the decision to delay the publication of certain documents. When you respect somebody, the way I respect Ram, then you don't attribute motives to them in the beginning.

I did not have a clear conscience because I shared the responsibility.

But there is a difference. The Express circulated my stories around. Ram never did that Q: Are you wiser as a result of this controversy?

A: Yes My admiration for V.P. Singh influenced my decision. He told me 'this is all your work' and I felt I had to help. I still admire V.P. Singh and I respect people like Mr Bhure Lal.

But I'm wiser now about journalists who pass themselves off as outposts of public morality. I was a fool to have believed in people who talk about ethics. ●

Interviewed by Vir Sanghvi

The CBI bungles

The move to arrest former Congress(I) MP Sajjan Kumar backfires

It was the first positive step taken by the nine-month-old National Front government to assuage the feelings of the Sikh community. On the morning of 11 September, a high-powered Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) team swooped down on Sajjan Kumar's residence at Madipur, New Delhi. The purpose was to arrest the former Congress(I) MP and a general secretary of the party, against whom there were serious charges of inciting the anti-Sikh riots of November 1984 following the assassination of Indira Gandhi. Sajjan Kumar, it was alleged, had personally led the rioting in Delhi and other parts of north India.

But as usual, the CBI bungled and in the end had to return empty-handed—and humiliated. The entire operation was kept a closely-guarded secret, so much so that even the Delhi Police was not informed about it. But Sajjan Kumar's supporters got wind of the CBI's plans and prevented their leader from being arrested.

As soon as the investigating officials entered Sajjan Kumar's house, crowds began to gather outside. "Laathi goli khayenge, lekin Sajjan ko bachayenge," they shouted even as the sleuths were searching the premises. Soon, the mob swelled to well over 80,000. What is more, Sajjan's supporters began stoning cars and buses plying on the road. The crowd even damaged the vehicles in which the CBI officials had come. Sensing trouble, the sleuths quickly contacted the local police station and an ugly situation was somehow averted by the cops.

Inside the house, the CBI officials had a tough time interrogating Sajjan Kumar. "I am a Jat and I know how to use the laathi," the Congress(I) leader thundered. The confusion lasted for several hours—by which time Sajjan Kumar managed to get an anticipatory bail from the Delhi High Court. The CBI's early morning operation, reportedly masterminded by Bhure Lal, the powerful joint secretary in the Prime Minister's Office, came to nothing.

What is worse, senior Delhi Police officials confided that even if the CBI had succeeded in arresting Sajjan Kumar, his involvement in the November 1984 anti-Sikh riots would have been difficult to establish. For one, during riots, evidence is extremely difficult to come by and people are too scared to depose before the courts. Sajjan Kumar's case is even more feeble since the complaint against him was lodged three years after the crime was allegedly committed.

The complaint against the former Congress(I) MP was lodged by Anwar Kaur, whose husband Navin Singh was killed inside the Sultanpuri housing colony during the November '84 riots. Ms Kaur alleged that Sajjan Kumar had led the rampaging mob on that fateful day. But why did she file the complaint so late? Anwar Kaur said that though she went to the local police station soon after the incident, the cops refused to record her statement against Sajjan Kumar.

By then obviously all evidence of Sajjan Kumar's involvement in the crime had disappeared. Most police officers feel that the CBI pointlessly searched his house. And all they found of consequence were some saropas and kirpans, gifted to Kumar during his visits to gurudwaras.

Expectedly, the CBI's action provoked angry responses from the Sajjan Kumar camp. Demanded R.K. Anand, a senior lawyer who had rushed to help out the Congressman on 11 September: "If this is a criminal case, where is the post mortem report? Moreover, how can a case be logded on the basis of an affidavit especially since the Delhi High Court had recently questioned the validity of the affidavits filed by the 1984 riot victims?" Kumar added: "The government is clearly being vindictive."

Sajjan Kumar with his supporters: defiant

Although the CBI raid on Sajjan Kumar's house caused a temporary scare in the Congress camp, the party quickly fought back and mobilised support for its general secretary. And it was former Union minister H.K.L. Bhagat—he too faces similar charges of instigating the Delhi riots—who was most active in this regard. Two days after the fiasco, Bhagat addressed a rally of Congress(I) workers, where he warned the government that any attempt to involve Congressmen in the anti-Sikh riots would not be tolerated.

The government, too, is not likely to try such a thing in future. Ostensibly, the V.P. Singh regime had planned to follow up the arrest of Sajjan Kumar with the announcement of a "package" for Punjab. But now that the CBI fumbled in the first instance, it remains to be seen what the government will do next. •

Ritu Sarin/New Delhi

V. GANGADHAR

Poor Mr Kamath!

Too many avoidable mistakes in the newspapers

The Bombay-based Maharashtra United Nations Association recently organised a seminar on 'Gulf crisis and the UN'. One of the speakers was senior journalist and columnist M.V. Kamath. Reporting his speech, the Indian Express wrote, "Mr M.V Kamath attacked the double standards of the United Nations, which did nothing to stop the US aggression on Vietnam, Pakistan's attack on Kashmir and for that matter, India's swallowing up of Sikkim .Turning to India, Mr Kamath said we are in no position to condemn Iraq, after our aggression against Goa, Hyderabad and Sikkim."

A couple of days later, the daily carried a letter from Kamath in the 'Letters to the Editor' column. "In the first place I made no reference to Sikkim In the second place, the reference to Goa and Hyderabad was made in a different context. I am afraid the reporter tried to summarise what he thought I said, than what I actually said I never made any reference to 'India swallowing up Sikkim'. I am a strong supporter of India's action and cannot possibly have said the words that have been put in my mouth."

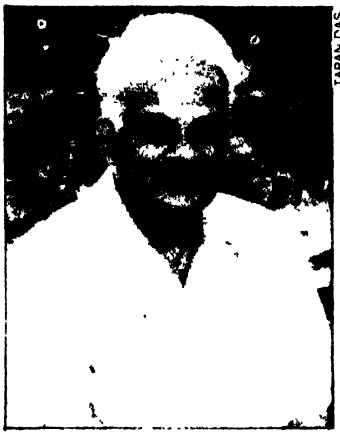
Neither the reporter concerned nor the editor had any comments to make on this issue. And this makes one wonder. how can a reporter write something which is the opposite of what had actually been said? How can there be so many mistakes in reporting a straight-forward speech?

Poor Mr Kamath! During the course of the same week, The Independent published his article, Beginning of the End,on the Gulf crisis, but carried a sketch of another columnist, Mr Nihal Singh. Till now, no apology has been published, and Mr Kamath has not chosen to write to the paper concerned.

The senior journalist is not a bit perturbed that he was booed out of the stage-managed seminar of the Maharashtra United Nations Association. But he is distressed at the declining standards of local reporting.

Another titbit on the same issue. All the Bombay dailies reported the death of film actor Dev Kumar. The Times of India and Free Press Journal stated that the late actor was 60. The PTI report in The Daily said he was 67. According to the 'film correspondent', the actor was 54. The late Dev Kumar is in no position to complain but what about the credibility of the press?

Remembering Christie



By and large, the Indian media did justice to the 100th birth anniversary of the Queen of Mystery, Agatha Christie, which fell on 15 September. Tributes, features, critical assessments and quiz on her works appeared in quite a few papers.

I was pleasantly surprised that even some of the smaller newspapers did not lag behind. The Sunday magazine of Gomantak Times, published from Goa, had an excellent two-page coverage of Christie with photographs of St. Martin's Theatre, London, where her famous play, The Mousetrap, is still running.

Murder Sife Said by Dom Moraes in Vantage, the Sunday magazine of The Independent, was obviously dashed off in a hurry and was marred by a couple of avoidable, but glaring errors. Hercule Poirot makes his appearance in The Mysterious Affair at Styles (published in 1920) and not in The Sittaford Mystery as mentioned by Moraes. Further, Miss Jane Marple lived at St Mary Mead and not at St Mary Abbot.

Now, memory can play tricks and anyone can make mistakes. But Dom Moraes knows he is not sure of his facts, yet makes no effort to cross check his material. "I have the impression that Hercule Poirot first appeared in The Sittaford Mystery. I may be wrong; but whichever book he made his debut..." Such carelessness does no credit to the writer, who is referred to as a 'genius' by a fawning Bombay eveninger.

The Bombay edition of The Times of India's Sunday Review was forced to drop an article on Agatha Christie to accommodate yet another huge colour ad. But Hercule Poirot and Jane Marple would have understood the issue. Tapping his egg-shaped

TAPAN DAS

M.V. Kamath is not a bit perturbed that he was booed out of the 'Gulf crisis' seminar. But the senior journalist is distressed at the declining standards of local reporting

Personally I feel that a bit of investigative reporting would have been quite in order. Why did Mother Teresa at this age decide to contest the election once again? Was there any justification in her remark that the Order would "fall apart after her resignation?"

head with two fingers, Poirot would have exclaimed, "Eh bien, these ad-blokes They lack those little grey cells." Jane Marple would have looked up from her knitting, laughed and said, "My dear, human nature being what it is, who can stand up to greed?"

Whose will?

"God's will!" That's how Mother Teresa explained her holding on to the post of the secretary-general of the Missionaries of Charity and the entire media appears to have been convinced by the Mother's words.

Personally I feel that a bit of investigative reporting would have been quite in order. Why did the Mother at this age and with the history of recent illness decide to contest the election once again? Was there any justification in her remarks that the Order would "fall apart after her resignation"? Why was Sister Agnes Das, who was groomed as the Mother's successor, dropped from the select, four-member council?

Of course, there cannot ever be another Mother Teresa. But that does not mean the press should ignore the behind-the-scenes happening at an 'election' which was obviously master-minded to prop up one personality.

Memory can play tricks and anyone can make mistakes. But Dom Moraes knows he is not sure of his facts, yet he makes no effort to cross-check his material

Fighting shy

Indian journalists often complain that even the most elementary military details are not made available to them on the grounds of 'national security' Such an attitude has led to extensive kite-flying with total disregard for facts.

Senior defence personnel are generally very reluctant to meet the press. Under the circumstances, it was refreshing to read about Gen. Mike Dugan, who was recently sacked as the US Air Force chief for his intemperate remarks on the Gulf situation. The general was so publicity-conscious that he had sent around laminated cards to various reporters giving his telephone numbers and asking them to call him in case they had difficulties in obtaining information from his subordinates. The general loved to match wits with the press whose representatives were often invited to the Pentagon for off-the-record sessions.

If only we had someone like Gen. Dugan during the finalisation of the Bofors purchases, we would not have needed Chitra Subramaniam or N. Ram!

Wrote the Afternoon Despatch & Courier: "Artist M.F. Husain's 75th birthday was celebrated with appropriate nostalgia on a specially prepared set. Some 800 guests, paying Rs 1,000 per head, attended the celebrations complete with a Hyderabadi banquet

By and large, the Indian media did justice to the 100th birth anniversary of Agatha Christie. Tributes, features and quiz on her works appeared in quite a few papers

Business sense

A very select few in the media business exploit every natural or man-made calamity. It may be cyclone, floods, fire, famine, war and now the Gulf crisis I am referring to the advertisements in the media extolling the 'SALE' of silk sarees, jeans, readymade garments and such other stuff .

In almost all the cases, the organiser just wants to get rid of his surplus, unsold suff and takes recourse to bizarre advertisements portraying himself as a victim of natural or man-made calamities, forcing him to sell stuff at throwaway prices.

One does not know if these gimmicks are successful but the ads make interesting reading!

The two faces of India

This news item appeared in Bombay's Afternoon Despatch & Courier: "Artist M F. Husain's 75th birthday was celebrated last night with appropriate nostalgia on a specially prepared set at the Famous Cine Laboratories. Some 800 guests, paying Rs 1,000 per head, attended the celebrations complete with a Hyderabadi banquet, mujra dancers, and qawalli singers. The highlight of the evening was the auctioning of a painting by the artist. It went to Mrs Parmeshwar Godrej for a bid of Rs 12.50 lakhs."

Underneath that, appeared another news item under the heading,

'Jobless Father, Kills Baby, Self.'

"An unemployed man committed suicide yesterday, after killing his two-year-old baby at his residence in Ghatkopar (East). The police said that Harsh Vasantrao Parikh (31) was frustrated since he had been unable to find a job."

That's India for you. ●

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

The circus manager

The BJP lion and the leftist lamb will make a meal of V.P.Singh

Aboard the IAF aircraft, of which he is growing inordinately fond just as it seems to be slipping from his grasp, our Prime Minister, returning from Madras, has vouchsafed the nation that should he have to go, it would not necessarily mean a mid-term poll. He has gratuitously added the suggestion that the President could ask the leader of the single-largest party in Parliament to form the government, after which there could be a realignment of political forces to help Rajiv Gandhi become Prime Minister again. The Raja Saheb, for his part, says he would be content to resume his natural place on the Opposition benches.

How very generous of him! How very white! Not only is our Prime Minister willing to put anyone and anything together to form his own government, he is willing to offer his expert consultancy services—gratis—to others less schooled than him in artful marriages of convenience to breed coalitions that are not only of intriguingly complex pedigree but of a legitimacy that would make an alley cat look askance! The Raja finds it difficult, apparently, to recognise that there might be people in politics who have an objective nobler than spending all their time looking for disparate nails to hammer together a political plank to stand on.

For the politics of the Raja has always been long on expediency and short on principle. He quit the PSP and joined the Congress the moment the doors of opportunity on the Treasury benches set fair to open on his ambitions. He donated much of his extensive domains to Vinoba Bhave's Bhoodan movement only to plead later in a court of law that he had done so in a fit of madness. His commitment to democracy made him one of the leading gauleiters of the Emergency. He won his spurs as the minorities' favourite chief minister presiding over the carnage at the Eidgah in Moradabad on the very festival of Id. And he had a running battle with the dacoits of UP—who just happen to be among the more shining examples of the backward communities of the state. He went on to become so faithful a servitor of the Gandhi family that for months after his servitude was ended he protested to anyone who would listen that Rajiv Gandhi was his leader, his only leader. His devotion to unimpeachable financial integrity made him find in Arun Nehru a true soul-mate. His secularism was expressed in seeking out two Muslim companions with equal felicity—the liberal messiah, Arif Mohammad Khan, and his counterpoint in rabid communalism, Maluana Obaidullah Khan Azmi, Rajya Sabha MP, no less! VP then matched this opening to minority fanaticism with an opening to the other end of the spectrum—an electoral alliance with the spokesparty of majority communalism.

Meanwhile, he had discovered the delectable joys of casteism as our late Tau (last heard of orating to audiences of two cows and one milkman in the wilds of distant Gujarat) taught him the alphabet of A for Ahir, J for Jat, G for Gujjar, and R for—gotcha!—the Raja of Manda! Always quick to learn, our Raja soon mastered the arithmetic of caste. It was to stand him in good stead when he discovered in Mandal, the means of manhandling not only his enemies without but—oh! what fun!—even his friends within. When the Tau departed, VP was nothing fazed, for by then he had discovered two rumblers in his council of ministers—Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav—only raring to discover your caste as a preliminary to taking it out on you.

The only problem is that it has landed him in a bit of a bind. He chose his Trimming his sail to any wind however it blows, V.P. Singh has discovered a fascinating new technique of governance—which is to never have a view on anything, to never have a policy and to concentrate on the gift-wrapping paper to package his next gimmick constituency of Fatehpur in Uttar Pradesh primarily because it was chockablock full of his fellow-Thakurs. Now that he has mandalised himself so thoroughly, his Rajput voters are furious with him for cozying up to the very kind that the code of the Princeling-Warriors expressly forbids. VP has always had a pretty shrewd idea of how long he can con whom, so he consistently wades into as election promising to be the Forever Candidate from that constituency. Since, in the somewhat elastic morality of Manda, promises are made so that they might be broken, friend VP has never fought a second election from the same rotten borough. So he can't be losing much sleep over the end of his affair with Fatehpur for, all his protestations of last November notwithstanding, he has no intention of setting himself up again in Fatehpur. (Wanna bet? Remember Allahabad and his solemn promise that he would not leave Allahabad till the sangam ran dry? Meri man ka wayda/Aur teri man ka kayda/Bol voter/Bol sangam/Hoga ki nahin? To which the answer, of course, is "Nahin, nahin, nahin!")

When it comes to economic policy the Raja Saheb made quite a name for himself as the Great Liberaliser. He took pains to let all and sundry know that the 1985 budget—which had even Nani Palkhivala going all gaga—was his personal handiwork. None of which then stood in the way of his announcing himself, when the time came, to be the "natural ally" of the left. (Our left, of course, is notorious for not letting even itself know what its right hand is doing, which is what makes Dhirubhai Ambani Joyti babu's favourite dinner companion and Calcutta the most accommodating of our state capitals for any carpetbagger on the make!)

VP started out last December as chairman of a Planning Commission dedicated to ending the tyranny of growth—and has now transformed himself (gillie! gillie!) into the dispenser of 5.5 per cent growth at Rs 16,00,000 crore a try (not accounting for what the oil sharks might yet do to our sums). Now, that transformation is, of course, all to the good—until you wake up sweating in the watches of the night at the realisation that our Quick-Change Artiste might anytime find it more convenient to put the brakes on growth. That would have nothing to do with economics but everything to do with whether Ajit Singh is to be pulled down or pushed up—or even with whether he is to be pushed up as he is really being pulled down; or even vice versa; or, who knows (who cares?) even versa vice! The Artful Dodger can make the most linear programmer of the Planning Commission look twisted as a corkscrew if that is what the imperatives of palace intrigue demand.

So with defence. The profligate days of Spendthrift Rajiv we were told were over. But just as we were reconciling ourselves to taking on the Pakis with our bows and arrows (not to mention the rubber slings with which, as children, we used to take a shot at nesting birds) VP decided to find a sweetheart in the BJP. Now the BJP believes passionately in getting a bigger bang for its buck (especially if that can knock the kulla off a passing mullah). So the NF manifesto was consigned to the dustbin and we've got ourselves the biggest defence budget ever and a defence provision in the latest draft Plan that kisses goodbye forever to monkey-nuts at chhota hazari!

Trimming his sail to any wind however it blows, VP has discovered a fascinating new technique of governance—which is to never have a view on anything, to never have a policy and to concentrate his own energies on the gift-wrapping paper to package his next gimmick. As for the problem itself, he calls in all the incompatibles from all the different parties together and asks them to tell him what to do. When they fail to agree among themselves, Weepy wails that no one ever

V.P.Singh persuaded himself that with 18 per cent of the popular vote and a bare quarter of the seats in the House, someone had booked the circus ring for him to return a sterling performance. In he stepped. Out came the BJP lion. Next came the leftist lamb

V.P. Singh's devotion to financial integrity made him find in Arun Nehru a true soul-mate

Always quick to learn, our Raja soon mastered the arithmetic of caste. It was to stand him in good stead when he discovered in Mandal the means of manhandling not only his enemies without, but even his friends within helps him govern. When that fails to work, Weepy instructs his press-wallahs to spin a yarn to the press. The press, of course, is ever ready to bite at any bait. An uproar ensues, with everyone accusing everyone else; arcane details are leaked about who did what to whom; denials, clarifications, elucidations and rebuttals follow in hot succession. In the melee, everyone forgets that they had got together in the first instance to help VP govern. VP, for his part, persuaded that the Prime Minister's task is to put the cat among the pigeons, is content to let one problem smoulder as he moves on to stoke the next fire. The burning down of Vigyan Bhawan is the paradigm of this government's conception of what the country needs. We don't have a Prime Minister; we have an arsonist!

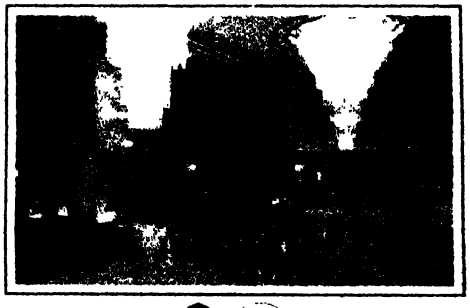
Such a Prime Minister can, of course, think in no other terms than other politicians also resorting with delight to the art of managing contradictions. So he suggests that if his round of musical chairs is coming to an end, the next birthday party child might continue playing the same game. He forgets that last November, Rajiv Gandhi declined to stake his claim to forming the government, notwithstanding his leadership of the largest single party in Parliament, because he had not got a majority of the seats and, therefore, recognised that he did not have the mandate of the people to govern. Therefore, he gracefully bowed out.

Anyone other than a circus manager would have recognised that if the largest party had not received the mandate to govern, then none of the smaller groupuscules had received it either. But our circus manager's special skill is at making the lion and the lamb lie together. Therefore, instead of admitting that no one had received a mandate to form a government and recommending a return to the electorate to secure a clearer and more decisive verdict, VP persuaded himself—with much cheering on the sidelines from editorialists and column pundits—that with 18 per cent of the popular vote and a bare quarter of the seats in the House someone had booked the circus ring for him to return a sterling performance. In he stepped. Out came the BJP lion. Next came the leftist lamb. For a while, the lion and the lamb were content with the novelty of finding themselves together. Now the snarling has begun. And circus manager Weepy is shinnying up the maypole to get away from it all. He knows that the minute he comes down, the lion and the lamb are first going to make a meal of him before they turn on each other.

It is not for such games that serious politicians are in politics. When the supporting parties finally say, "Basta" and bring the whole sham crashing down, there won't be any Rajiv Gandhi around for them to play footsie with. There will be a fresh election. Which, without a shadow of doubt, the Congress will win.

Meanwhile, Weepy has found the ideal solution to his dilemma. His press advisor, Prem Shankar Jha (Mack the Leak), has become the de facto Prime Minister. And he even has his own Tau—in the redoubtable person of principal information officer Rammohan Rao! Good luck all—till we meet again at Philippi! •

The views expressed in this column are those of its author and do not purport to constitute an official statement of the Congress party's position



Ashok and Radisson offer you new standards of world class hospitality at Delhi

Radisson Hotels Corporation with its dynamism, its philosophy 'Yes I can' is the fastest growing hospitality group in the world, with hotels at 240 locations.

Ashok now joins hands with Radisson to bring you the finest international hospitality at New Delhi and three other places in the country. With a new work culture, a new ethos to ensure even greater consumer satisfaction.

Other Ashok Radisson Hotels: Ashok Radisson Lalitha Palace Hotel, Mysore; Ashok Radisson Hotel, Bangalore; Ashok Radisson Beach Resort, Kovalam.

Ashok Hotel
New Delhi

An affiliate of Radisson Hotels Corporation

50 B Chanakyapuri, New Delhi 110021
Tel: 600121, 600412 Cables: ASHOKAHOTEL
Telex: 031-65207, 031-65647 ASOK IN
Fax: 91 11-6873216

VISIT INDIA
TOURISM YEAR 1991

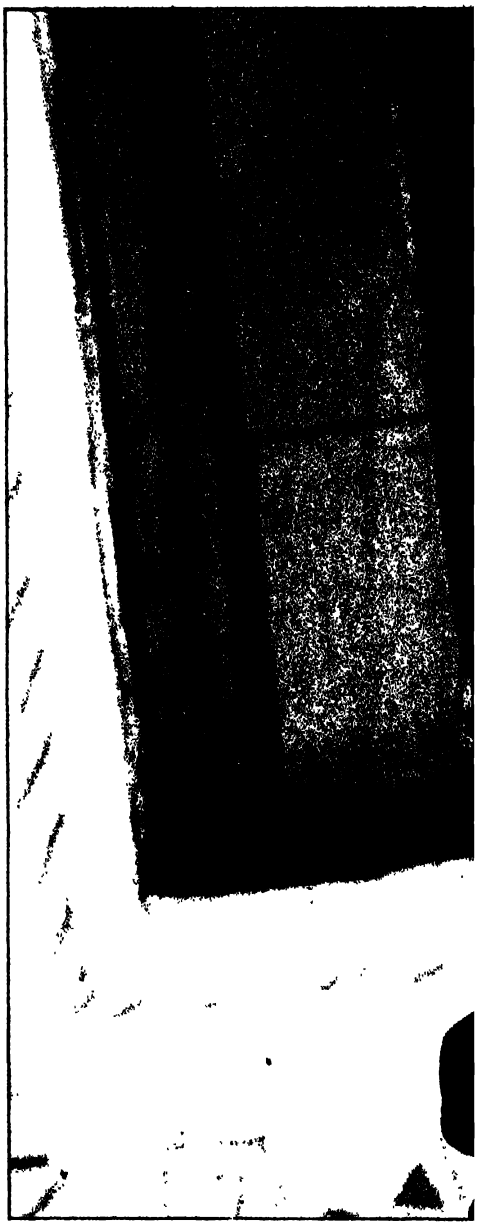
AKSHARA/ITDC-210

INDIA'S HOST TO THE WORLD

Ek, do, queen

Madhuri Dixit. The making of a star

In an industry where hearts beat with the box-office, nobody had given Madhuri Dixit an outside chance. Since her debut in 1984, she had delivered a series of flops—Abodh, Swati, Mohre, Awara Baap, Hifazat and Uttar Dakshin—and despite such mentors as Subhash Ghai and Boney Kapoor, the film world appeared to have given up on her.



If anyone didn't give up it was Dixit herself.

And with Tezaab (1988), her quiet confidence was vindicated several times over. The N. Chandra-directed potboiler was a runaway hit, going on to chalk up a golden jubilee run, and doing business worth Rs 5.5-6 crores in the first 12 months after its release. And in the process, Madhuri managed to turn the conventional wisdom on its head. For, despite the ubiquitous presence of current number one Anil Kapoor, and the fact that the script favoured him quite unabashedly, Dixit managed to pull off the impossible. She ensured that Tezaab was seen as her film. And what's more, her hit.

Of course, Ek do teen, which had Madhuri gyrating sexily in a skimpy sequinned outfit, and dancing right into the heart of every cinegoer, had a lot to do with it. Dixit positively sizzled in this sequence as Mohini, the professional dancer who has her audience chanting her name in a frenzy. When the rushes were shown to Anil Kapoor, he read the writing on the screen only too well, and demanded that the song be picturised on him as well. N. Chandra obliged.

But by then, it was too late. Madhuri had already put in an unbeatable performance. And Kapoor, despite straining every sinew, couldn't match it. Dixit was the winner, by a very long margin.

Inevitably, this led to comparisons with the reigning queen, Sridevi. The film press, always willing to create a controversy, played up Dixit's success and pronounced that Sridevi's place at the top could well be threatened. While Sridevi seethed, Madhuri played it cool. No, she maintained, she was only a newcomer and couldn't even hope to compete with such a senior star.

WITH HER PARENTS They are her greatest strength

GAUTAM PATOLE

It was a smart move. For, it put her rival off guard. And while she relaxed, Madhuri notched up further successes: Ram Lakhan (a golden jubilee, grossing Rs 7 crores in the first year of its release), Prem Pratigya (silver jubilee), Tridev (which did business worth Rs 5 crores in the first year) and Kishen Kanhaiya (which grossed Rs 3 crores in the same time-span). None of these films revolved around Dixit, the way Chandni did around Sridevi, but they were hits nonetheless. And, as they say in the trade, everyone benefits from a hit. Madhuri more than others, for her electrifying screen presence meant that she stayed in the minds of the audience far more than her roles warranted.

It was only with Dil (1990) that she was given a role that exploited her undoubted calibre as an actress. Madhuri was required to play a young college girl, who graduates to becoming a young wife whom circumstances force to desert her husband. The role asked for a lot from the actress, who had until then performed the regular dance and disappear routine. Madhuri proved more than equal to the situation. Her top-notch performance was duly appreciated. The film has already raked in Rs 4.5 crores and the figure, say trade experts, is bound to grow even further once the new song, Dum duma dum, is added on.

GAUTAM PATOLE

A STAR IS BORN But minus the mystique; Madhuri remains her natural self

Critics, of course, point out gleefully that for every Dil, Madhuri has had a Deewana Mujh Sa Nahin. But even such rank disasters cannot detract from Dixit's success. For, Madhuri has the ability to break every rule of the industry and thrive. She can star in indifferent films by the dozen. come a cropper at the box-office ever so often, and yet Madhuri Dixit remains a star.

For, her star quality is independent of the cash registers.

The relationship between Madhuri and the film world is symbiotic. While the industry needs a heroine who can draw the crowds—as she undoubtedly can—Dixit is unlikely to be as big a success at anything else

It all began when a family friend introduced her to the Barjatyas of Rajshree Productions. Madhuri was never too keen on a film career, preferring microbiology instead, but she played along for a lark. She admits all too readily: "I entered the film industry just by chance. So, when Abodh was released and flopped, I did not feel too bad about it. The way I saw it then I didn't have much to lose anyway."

A series of eminently forgettable films followed, before Madhuri's luck changed. She was signed on by Subhash Ghai for a small role in Karma.

Dixit put all she had into it and Ghai was duly impressed. This girl, he decided, had potential. He promptly shot a video on her and showed it to Boney Kapoor, who was then (1986) looking for a co-star for his youngest brother, Sanjay, in the film he'd decided to start after Mr India.

Boney approved of Dixit and with Ghai he took out an advertisement in the trade papers, with a dramatic black and white picture of Madhuri and the caption: "Who's that girl?" The write-up that accompanied the photograph answered that question. As a publicity stunt it wasn't too innovative, but it managed to arouse the curiosity of the industry folk.

GAUTAM PATOLE

THE ARTIST With her sketches, Dixit makes a pretty picture

Says Boney Kapoor: "Subhash and I were convinced she had it in her. I have never seen any scene in which she falls short. She is the kind of actress who enhances her role by her ability. She is not the kind of actress who needs to do homework, but on the sets she delivers with perfection and ease." Ghai agrees: "She has a certain quality about her which is timeless and goes beyond the constraints of time and a particular era. In Karma, she was made to wait for 12 hours for one shot but she never once complained."

No, there wasn't any doubting her professionalism. Boney remembers telling her that she should do something about her thin arms. The very next day Madhuri joined up Dr Snehlata Pandey's (Chunky's mother) fitness classes, to work with weights. With this kind of single-mindedness, Dixit just had to succeed. Testifies distributor-producer Gulshan Rai: "The most outstanding thing about her is her desire and willingness to

The rivals

Whom Madhuri should watch out for

MEENAKSHI SESHADRI

• Long dubbed the jinxed actress, what with every second release of hers coming a cropper at the box-office, Meenakshi came back into the reckoning with the runaway success of Ghar Ho To Aisa, co-starring Anil Kapoor. Even before the shamefaced look was off the visages of her critics, Seshadri delivered yet another hit: Ghayal, this time with Sunny Deol in the male lead.

Meenakshi, however, seems to have gone a little overboard with her recent run of successes, insisting in interview after interview that she deserves all the credit for the box-office magic her films have worked. And this attitude will go down ill with her producers, directors and co-stars.

Right, Sunny?

JAYANT DAS

DIMPLE KAPADIA

• Despite her Bobby charisma and the success of Saagar, Dimple never really made it to the big time. Now, on the wrong side of 30, she seems to have missed the bus as far as the race to the coveted number one (or even number two) slot is concerned. But in showbiz, anything is possible.

What Kapadia has going for her is her classical beauty, and her ability to portray raw emotion on celluloid: witness her moving performance in Kaash. But there's no getting around the fact that she can't pair up romantically with the likes of Aamir Khan and Salman Khan without stretching credibility somewhat.

JAGDISH MALI

And the likes of Anil Kapoor prefer Madhuri, while paramour Sunny Deol is bashful about signing too many films with his auburn-haired lover.

JUHI CHAWLA

• When it comes to public relations there's no beating this baby-faced charmer. But conquering the box-office is another matter.

And Juhi hasn't displayed any great expertise in this field. True, she did come up with a Qayamat Se Qayamat Tak, but that success was followed by a spate of indifferent films, all of which bombed, while hits like Chandni did more for Sridevi than for Chawla (and, with good reason).

Perhaps, it was this experience which made Juhi turn down the second lead in Randhir Kapoor's Henna, despite her avowed fondness for his younger brother Rishi.

GAUTAM PATOLE

LOOKING UP How much further is the top rung?

learn. She certainly brings more to even the smallest role."

